If there is a criticism of this book it is the fact that it is so tightly written that it is likely to frighten away or lose those who most need its message. Much of the material so contradicts the "conventional wisdom" in the field of organization theory that to incorporate these insights would require a basic re-structuring of most of the teaching materials now used in the field.—Donald Smithburg, Illinois Institute of Technology.

The Exercise of Influence in Small Groups. By TERENCE K. HOPKINS. (Totowa, New Jersey: The Bedminster Press, 1964. Pp. viii, 205. $6.50.)

In this book a sociologist at Columbia University reduces to system a wide range of research and theory building on small groups. He uses the work of psychologists like Kurt Lewin, Muzafer Sherif, Solomon Asch, Herbert Hyman, Robert Bales, and Leon Festinger; of sociologists like Durkheim, Lazarsfeld, Parsons, and Merton; of philosophers like Ernest Nagel; and of comparably distinguished writers who are harder to classify. The work of these researchers and writers is indeed of durable vitality. It is in this book, logically and neatly arranged within a hermetically sealed retort, in which all these rich and yeasty cultures die.

Within its own terms the book is brilliantly successful. It sets out to examine patterns of influence within small groups, which the author defines as those not containing subgroups. It limits itself to influence patterns as they are determined wholly by forces that generate (or—to use a term more appropriate to contained analysis—function) within small groups. Hopkins states that influence, which is not equally shared by all group members, reflects status, which in turn has five properties: rank, centrality, observability, conformity, and influence.

The non-static relationship between these five attributes is not quite clear. The author correlates each with every other one, though the subject of the book, influence, is the property to which the four others presumably bear some special relationship. In describing the book, one hesitates to use such terms as independent and dependent variables, or causes and effects, because they are not consistent with the static style of thought that characterizes the book. Rank, centrality, conformity, and influence all positively correlate. Rank, influence, and centrality tend to cumulate. Aside from what is implicit in cumulation, there is no real consideration of why these attributes tend to interact statistically with each other.

The author states that there is less change in group members as a consequence of inter-personal influence (i.e., by a single individual working on another individual) than of group influence. He offers two explanations for this: that it is easier to change opinion in a group context and that group pressure is visible. The first is not really an explanation but rather a tautology; the second is an intriguing, little discussed enigma.

Why are people more influenced by their fellow group members than they are by a person who has one or another attribute of high group status?

At various points, Hopkins gives clues. He says that the motivation for compliance is outside the interaction system, and he does not look into motivation. He says that those parts of a person that are outside the group are causally relevant to individual behavior in small groups. But again these parts are not part of his analysis of these groups. What the author has done by mentioning these factors is to indicate that the etiology of group interaction is in part external to the system and therefore not a matter of concern. This is as grand a non-sequitur as the chemist who says that the analysis of acids and bases relates to ions of hydrogen and hydroxyl, but since positive and negative charges of electricity are outside the chemical system, they are not to be considered. Chemists do not so exclude physics.

What is curious is that a sociologist so manifestly competent in psychological and sociological literature and in logic itself can so casually eliminate from consideration those forces that would reanimate the cultures sealed in his bottle and produce in vitro an analysis in vivo. The book's systemism concerns rank but has no odor. Indeed, even within the group as system, the author refuses to consider dynamic forces: "The principal mechanism checking the tendency to anomie . . . is the exercise of influence." This is almost another tautology and may be valid only if other (non-group) causes of anomie are excluded. Why some individuals have influence and others accept it is not considered, because these would involve an analysis in depth of group interaction and in breadth of the non-group aspects of the personalities of the group members.

As an attempt to abstract and codify some manifest characteristics of group interaction, the book is a success. But abstraction of principles, a necessary ingredient of all scientific endeavor, is by no means sufficient. It is like reducing all chemistry to the periodic table. Group interaction involves long and complicated equations, with elements compounding and interacting in a manner that such a periodic table as this book helps little to understand.—James C. Davies, University of Oregon.

The Crisis of German Ideology: Intellectual Origins of the Third Reich. By George L. Mosse. (New York: Grosset & Dunlap, 1964. Pp. 373. Cloth $5.95, Paper $2.65.)

After the military defeat of the Berlin-Rome-Tokyo Axis in 1945, scholarly interest in Fascism rapidly and sharply declined, while communism (particularly after the start of the cold war in 1947) became the focus of attention among students of totalitarianism. Yet the unexpected phenomenal success of William Shirer's Rise and Fall of the Third Reich a decade and a half after World War II showed that the interest of the reading public in German Nazism was stronger than the professional historians and political scientists had assumed. The continued relative lack of interest in the Italian and other varieties of Fascism may be based on an inarticulate—and yet very perceptive-realization that German Nazism was not just another variety of Fascism but a phenomenon sui generis-totalitarianism in its most nihilistic form so far experienced. As time goes on, therefore, it may be expected that more and more searching analyses of Nazism will be forthcoming, abandoning the shallow interpretations of Nazism as capitalism in depression and decay or as a reaction to the Versailles Treaty or as the product of a few evil men of the Hitler-Himmler-Eichmann type.

Professor Mosse's book is a valuable symptom of, and contribution to, this stirring process of serious and probing study of German Nazism and its background. While many dismissed Nazi ideas for long as mere tools of propaganda that few Germans-including the Nazi leadership-took seriously unless they belonged to the cultural and social riff-raff of German society, the author emphasizes at the outset that it "is important to keep in mind that the Nazis found their greatest support among respectable, educated people" (p. 1). The interpretation of the small Nazi movements in countries like Holland or Norway in terms of the concept of Lumpen-Bourgeoisie possesses considerable validity, but is entirely inappropriate in analyzing the ideological forces that culminated in German Nazism. In fact, one of the most striking results of the author's research is to demonstrate the questionable usefulness of the general conception of Fascism to the extent that the differences between German Nazism and other varieties of Fascism may be greater than the similarities. Thoroughly familiar with Fascist movements outside of Germany, the author concludes that "the German variety came to be unique" (p. 315), and that the fundamental difference between Nazism and other types of Fascism "reflects the difference between German thought and that of the other western European nations" (ibid.). Professor Mosse singles out the rationalism of the Enlightenment and the social radicalism of the French Revolution as the two most important ideological forces that were repudiated by the German "Volkish" tradition that finally culminated in the triumph of Nazism. The author correctly points out that these ideological forces were, and remained, alive throughout the high tide of Fascism elsewhere in Europe, and consequently Fascism remained a relatively small movement in the western countries outside of Germany. What was a (perhaps the) central cultural tradition in Germany over a long period of time, was only a marginal and episodic current of opinion in the rest of Western Europe. In elaborating these basic differences between Germany and other western nations Professor Mosse fails to deal with the all-important phenomenon, both in thought and behavior, of nihilism. In this nihilistic attitude, developed in Germany long before the rise of Nazism, nothing was sacred or permanent. In religion, Germany was the only country in which it was seriously planned to destroy the Jewish-Christian tradition and ethics and to revive the ancient pre-Christian pagan cults of Wotan et al. Among primary social institutions, even the family was to be done away with-something which, again, no other Fascist movement intended to do. Finally, in murdering six million Jewish men, women, and children at Auschwitz and other extermination camps, German nihilists revealed how the unthinkable could be turned not only into the thinkable but into real events. It is Professor Mosse's merit to show in his book that this mentality has a long background in German thought and institutional life, and while he does not propose that the tradition that culminated in Nazism encompassed all facets of German thought and action, he shows that it was a trend strong enough to eventually become the dominant force of the German state and society. In particular, he points out the crucial role played by the German conservative classes in actively aiding the rising tide of racialism, irrationalism, and totalitarianism.

The wealth of material in Professor Mosse's book, inaccessible to anyone not intimately familiar with the German language and writings unduly neglected outside of Germany, makes his work a must for any student of modern totalitarianism. The book would have been more valuable still if the author had not confined himself to the period after 1870 in tracing the ideological background of Nazism. The late eighteenth century would perhaps have been a better starting point, since the author could have then shown the impact of Romanticism, for example, in literature as well as in history, politics, economics, and law. Finally, while the author shows in a masterly fashion how the ideas and sentiments developed in Germany that found their final and disastrous expression in Nazism, he hardly comes to grips with the basic question of why such attitudes were embraced by so many Germans but rejected very largely elsewhere in Western Europe. But perhaps this is a theme for another book.—William Ebenstein, University of California (Santa Barbara).

The Liberal Idea of Freedom. By DAVID SPITZ. (Tucson: The University of Arizona Press, 1964. Pp. 210. $5.50.)

This far-ranging book, by our most persistent and industrious spokesman for the political theory tradition that reaches from Mill to MacIver and Bertrand Russell, includes inter alia: a refutation of the "iron law of oligarchy"; a demonstration that the Communists are not, properly speaking, of "the Left"; a new attempt to salvage John Milton as a legitimate forerunner of contemporary "open society" doctrines; an indictment of the American South (it is seceding "not merely from the country but from civilization itself;" it "may well drown the country in [a] . . . torrent of barbarism which is a continuing affront to democracy and to mankind") that some readers, including this one, will have to interpret as a summons for a new Civil War; a defense of "the right of civil disobedience"; a vindication of Hobbes against the classical political philosophers, who "pretentiously" claimed to know the highest good, while Hobbes did not. On all these matters, Professor Spitz' conclusions flow from his premises just as inevitably as ever Euclid's did from his axioms; for those who share those premises, he provides the best of all possible refresher courses in how to use them as weapons with which to rout the forces of reaction, authoritarianism, aristocracy. At the end of the book Professor Spitz stands, like Fortinbras in the last act of Hamlet, himself unscathed, among the fallen corpses of those who have, in one fashion or another, stood in his way. Two groups of readers, perhaps, will hesitate to celebrate his victories: First, those who do not share his premises. And second, those whose specifically intellectual history has been, in recent years, a little different from his.

We have all had the experience: the orchestra on the radio begins a tune that we have not heard for a long while, and suddenly we are transported across time and distance to a moment and place we had supposed to have faded completely from our memories; we feel again the feelings, experience again the associations, even re-know bits of knowledge, that make us, for the nonce, 18 or 25 or 32 again. So it is with The Liberal Idea of Freedom: it evokes a world in which World War Two has not yet happened (so that it seems only natural, not surprising at all, when, at one point, Professor Spitz refers to Josef Stalin as if he were still alive and running the USSR, and, at numerous points, cites MacIver and Laski as if they were names to conjure with). One searches, as one reads, for the secret of the evocation, which cannot be a matter merely of the unfamiliarity of the names or even of Professor Spitz' very considerable literary skills. Then, suddenly, one understands: the world he conjures up is a world not yet touched by the Strauss-Voegelin revolution in political theory scholarship, the world of Sabine and Catlin, a world, therefore, in which modern political theory has not yet been brought into focus by Natural Right and History, and in which the American political tradition continues to look as it can never look again to the man who has moved into the Strauss-Voegelin universe. Those whose recent intellectual history has been different from Professor Spitz' will not, I repeat, celebrate his victories; but there could be, for them, no better bench-mark than his new book from which to measure the eons that separate us from MacIver and Laski. A not-yet-dead Stalin will, for them, be less of an anachronism than a Hobbes (Hobbes the very inventor of those individual "rights" that constitute the essence of Professor Spitz' explicitly "anti-conservative" position) whom the author, without blinking an eye-lash, can describe as a "conservative."

It remains to mention the part of The Liberal Idea of Freedom that should most gladden the hearts of Professor Spitz' political co-religionaries, namely, pp. 127-174, in which he takes up "the curious contemporary revival of what may loosely be called conservative thought" and passes in rapid review some of its typical spokesmen: Senator Goldwater, Bertrand de Jouvenel, Walter Berns, Peter Viereck, Russell Kirk, Willmoore Kendall. Here his theses seem to be first, that the writers in question all suppose themselves to be in possession of a higher truth, or set of principles, or orthodoxy, that they are only too eager to impose upon others, that they seem little able to agree among themselves as to what that higher truth, or those principles, are, and that, taken individually, they turn out, upon examination, to be pretty much unintelligible. On the unintelligibility charge, this reviewer finds himself in substantial agreement with Spitz, except perhaps, but only perhaps, in the case of that one of the writers whose work he (the reviewer) knows best. On the lack-of-agreement charge, again no quarrel from this quarter-at most the suggestion that our author pay less attention in future to the Conservative intellectuals he takes time to vivisect—they are indeed, for the most part, a poor lot—and more to the real well-springs of American Conservatism, which is the continuingly-successful though inarticulate resistance, out in American society, to what I have called elsewhere the Liberal Revolution. On the eager-to-impose-anorthodoxy charge, I content myself with (a) denying it, and (b) observing that it might come with better grace from a theorist less intoxicated than Professor Spitz upon the absolute rightness of his own position.—Willmoore Kendall, University of Dallas.

The New Meaning of Treason. By REBECCA WEST. (New York: The Viking Press, 1964. Pp. viii, 374. $6.95.)

Rebecca West is one of those fortunate people untroubled by serious doubts. Not for her are the agonies of a Gheorghiu or a Hesse or a Kafka striving to understand the pathos, even the absurdity, of the human condition. Not for her are the confusions of a mind torn by a conflict of loyalties, or by the uncertain meaning of loyalty itself-whether this implies devotion to the laws or to the state or to the people or to a moral or political principle by which we may judge those laws or that state or that people. Not for her, again, are the qualified and tentative portravals and judgments of the skilled biographer or historian; despite the absence of adequate dataand as Herbert L. Packer's Ex-Communist Witnesses makes clear, even the most exhaustive legislative investigations, administrative hearings, and court trials are deficient fact-finding instruments—she simply and repeatedly asserts "he must have imagined" and "it can be taken as certain that . . . " Not for her, finally, is there an appreciation of the fact that her book is about The New Traitors, not The New Meaning of Treason; for what really concerns her is not treason or changing concepts of treason-least of all the haunting thought that the ultimate dishonor is treachery to one's self-but the character and motives of some of England's recent and contemporary traitors. In short, Miss West's projected clarity is the clarity of the innocent; and in the absence of sustained and systematic political and philosophical analysis, the innocent are as unlikely to understand the guilty as the rich are to understand the poor.

If we can set all this aside, the encomiums heaped on Miss West's book—a revision and expansion of a work originally published in 1947—are understandable. For Miss West tells an absorbing story in an absorbing way. With uncommon literary grace, she spins the tale of treason in England from William Joyce (Lord Haw-Haw) and John Amery to Alan Nunn May and Klaus Fuchs to the defectors Burgess and Maclean. Even the sordid Ward-Profumo-Keeler case falls under the purview of Miss West's acid yet stylistically elegant pen. For one who wishes to while away an otherwise dull afternoon, and who has no Eric Ambler at hand, this is an intriguing volume.

But one must not read or inquire too closely. If he does, if for example he asks: who or what is the new as distinct from the old traitor? he will find it difficult to apply with consistency the three chief labels Miss West provides: the New Traitor is the extrovert rather than the introvert, the professional rather than the amateur, the Communist rather than the Fascist. If he takes seriously her oft-repeated contention, reminiscent of Socrates in the Crito, that "if a state gives a citizen protection it has a claim to his allegiance" (p. 361), he will have to ask, what Crito with his intellectual limitations did not ask, why then was Socrates in prison in the first place? Clearly a claim is not always equivalent to an obligation or a right; and it is not the least of Miss West's shortcomings that in all her many pages she has room for but a single paragraph that barely touches this side of the coin. And if the reader enjoys such quips as, "The French Revolution has given pleasure to all subsequent generations, because it was an outstanding event which afterwards proved never to have happened" (p. 80), and "communism... is fascism with a glandular and geographical difference" (p. 141), he will also have to ask himself, what is their relevance to her argument? and more importantly, are the statements true?

That Miss West's book is a superior example of sophisticated journalism, that it abounds with sprightly aperçus, and that it raises questions of major significance, make it all the more regretable that the book warranting this title is not the volume Miss West has written.—David Spitz The Ohio State University.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON POLITICAL THEORY

JUDITH N. SHKLAR Harvard University

Arendt, Hannah. Krieg und Revolution. Merkur. January, 1965.

Armstrong, A. MacC. Usage and Duty, American Philosophic Quarterly. January, 1965.

Aron, Raymond, et al. Organisation der Macht; Macht der Organisation. Archives Européennes de Sociologie. No. 1, 1964.

Aron, Raymond. Société industrielle, ideólogies, philosophie. Preuves. January & February, 1965. Badaloni, Nicola. Interveno sul marxismo.

Rivista di Filosofia. July-Sept., 1964.

Bergmann, F. H. The Purpose of Hegel's Svi

Bergmann, F. H. The Purpose of Hegel's System. Journal of the History of Philosophy. October, 1964.

Bernard, Jessie. Some Current Conceptualizations in the Field of Conflict. American Journal of Sociology, January, 1965.

Blanchard, Brand. The Objectivity of Moral Judgment. Revue Internationale de Philosophie. No. 4, 1964.

Burton, D. H. Theodore Roosevelt's Social Darwinism. Journal of the History of Ideas. January-March, 1965.

Casamayor, et al. Le Risque. Ésprit. January, 1965.

Cranston, Maurice. Jean-Paul Sartre as a Social Theorist. Rationalist Annual. 1965.

Davis, Morris. Participant Obervers in Platonic

Cities. Midwest Journal of Political Science. November, 1964.

Day, John. Hume on Justice and Allegiance. Philosophy. January, 1965.

Effenterre, H. van et Trocme, H. Autorité, justice et liberté aux origines de la cité antique. Revue Philosophique. October-December, 1964.

Friedrich, C. J., et al. Rational Decision, Nomos VII, 1964.

Gabel, Joseph. The Psychology of Destalinisation and the Problem of Political Alienation. The Review. No. 3, 1963.

Graham, A. C. Liberty and Equality. Mind. January, 1965.

Gregor, A. J. Marx, Feuerbach and the Reform of the Hegelian Dialectic. Science & Society. Winter, 1965.

Heisig, Karl. Machiavellismus in der Antike. Archiv für Kulturgeschichte. No. 1, 1964.

Holborn, Hajo. Origins and Political Character of Nazi Ideology. Political Science Quarterly. December, 1964.

Holton, Gerald, et al. Science and Culture. Daedalus. Winter, 1965.

Horton, John. The Dehumanization of Anomie and Alienation: A Problem in the Ideology of Sociology. British Journal of Sociology. December, 1964.

Jouvenel, Bertrand de. The Principate. The Political Quarterly. January-March, 1965.

Kateb, George. Theucydides' History: A Manual of Stateoraft. Political Science Quarterly. December, 1964.

Kaufmann, Walter. Nietzsche in the Light of Suppressed Manuscripts. Journal of the History of Philosophy. October, 1964.

Kittrell, E. R. The Development of the Theory of Colonization in English Classical Political Economy. The Southern Economic Journal. January, 1965.

Kreitzer, D. J.. An Analysis of the Nature of Power. Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. March, 1965.

Leemans, Victor. Die Freiheit des Sozialwissenschaftlers. Der Staat. No. 4, 1964.

Ludwig, Mario. Montesquieu und die Engländer, Archiv für Kulturgeschichte. No. 1, 1964.

McCloskey, Herbert and Schaar, J. H. Psychological Dimensions of Anomy. American Sociological Review. February, 1965.

Mansfield, H. C., Jr. Party Government and the Settlement of 1688. American Political Science Review. December, 1964.

Matczak, S. A. A Select and Classified Bibliography of David Hume. The Modern Schoolman. November, 1964.

Maurer, Reinhart. Popper und die totalitäre Demokratie. Der Staat. No. 4, 1964.

Papaioannu, Kostas. Le Mythe de la Dialectique. Le Contrat Social. September-October & November-December, 1964.

Perelman, Ch. Jugement moral et principes moraux. Revue Internationale de Philosophie. No. 4, 1964.

Perrow, Charles. The Sociological Perspective and Political Pluralism. Social Research. Winter, 1964.

Pitkin, Hanna. Hobbes' Concept of Representation—II. American Political Science Review. December, 1964.

Prosch, Harry. Limits to the Moral Claim in Civil Disobedience. Ethics. January, 1965.

Randall, J. H., Jr. J. S. Mill's Empiricism. Journal of the History of Ideas. January-March, 1965. Reeve, E. G. Does Fichte's View of History Really Appear so Silly? Philosophy. January, 1965.

Rohrmoser, Günter. Hegels Lehre vom Staat und das Problem der Freiheit in der modernen Gesellschaft. Der Staat. No. 4, 1964.

Rossi, Pietro. La filosofia de fronte alla pluralità della cultura, Rivista di Filosofia. July-September, 1964.

Russell, Conrad. The Theory of Treason in the Trial of Strafford. The English Historical Review. January, 1965.

Scarpelli, Uberto. Positivismo logico e società contemporanea. Revista di Filosofia. July-September, 1964.

Shklar, J. N. Rousseau's Images of Authority.

American Political Science Review. December,
1964.

Simon, W. M. Auguste Comte's English Disciples. Victorian Studies. December, 1964.

Simon, W. M. Victor Cousin and Auguste Comte. Journal of the History of Ideas. January-March, 1965.

Sontheimer, Kurt. Der Antihistorismus des gegenwärtigen Zeitalters. Neue Rundschau. No. 4, 1964.

Szasz, T. S. Psychiatry as an Ideology. Rationalist Annual. 1965.

Vilar, Pierre. Histoire sociale et philosophie de l'histoire. La Penseé. December, 1964.

Walter, E. V. "Mass Society": the Late Stage of an Idea. Social Research. Winter, 1964.

Waterkamp, Rainer. Tabus und autoritäre Tendenzen. Politische Studien. November-December, 1964.

Weingartner, R. H. Vulgar Justice and Platonic Justice. Philosophy and Phenomenological Research. December, 1964.

Willms, Bernard. "Ein Phoenix zu viel." Der Staat. No. 4, 1964.

Wittgenstein, Ludwig. A Lecture on Ethics. The Philosophical Review. January, 1965.

Zeeden, E. W. Aufgaben der Staatsgewalt im Dienste der Reformation, Untersuchungen über die Briefe Calvins an Fürsten und Obrigkeiten, Saeculum. No. 2, 1964.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON

METHODOLOGY AND RESEARCH IN THE SOCIAL SCIENCES*

S. SIDNEY ULMER University of Kentucky

OPINIONS AND ATTITUDES

Angell, R. C. (20) Social Values of Soviet and American Elites: Content Analysis of Elite Me* The number in parentheses following the name of each author indicates his institutional affiliation which may be determined by reference to the list at the end of this section.

dia, The Journal of Conflict Resolution, Vol. 8 #4 (December 1964) pp. 330-423.

Arkoff, A. (25); Meredith, G.; Iwahara, S. Male-Dominant and Equalitarian Attitudes in Japanese, Japanese-American, and Caucasian-American Students, The Journal of Social Psychology, Vol. 64, second half, (December 1964) pp. 225-229.

Carron, T. J. (31) Human Relations Training and Attitude Change: A Vector Analysis, Personnel Psychology, Vol. 17 #4 (Winter 1964) pp. 403-424.

Elenson, H. (4) The Implications of Pentecostal Religion for Intellectualism, Politics, and Race Relations, The American Journal of Sociology, Vol. 70 #4 (January 1965) pp. 403-415.

Haiman, F. S. (29), Duns, D. F. Validations in Communicative Behavior of Attitude-Scale Measures of Dogmatism, The Journal of Social Psychology Vol. 64, second half, (December 1964) pp. 287-297.

Hetherington, E. M. (28), Carlson, M. Effects of Candidate Support and Election Results Upon Attitudes to the Presidency, The Journal of Social Psychology, Vol. 64, second half, (December 1964) pp. 333-338.

Moskos, C. C. Jr.; Bell, W. Attitudes Towards Democracy Among Leaders in Four Emergent Nations, The British Journal of Sociology, Vol. 15 #4 (December 1964) pp. 317-337.

Press, C. (36) "Efficiency and Economy" Arguments for Metropolitan Reorganization, Public Opinion Quarterly, Vol. 28 #4 (Winter 1964) pp. 584-594.

Sears, D. O. (4) Freedman, J. L., O'Connor, E. F. Jr. The Effects of Anticipated Debate and Commitment on the Polarization of Audience Opinion, Public Opinion Quarterly, Vol. 28 #4 (Winter 1964) pp. 615-627

Singer, J. D. (20) Soviet and American Foreign Policy Attitudes: Content Analysis of Elite Articulations, The Journal of Conflict Resolution, Vol. 8 #4 (December 1964) pp. 424-485.

ORGANIZATIONAL BEHAVIOR

Indik, B. P. (8) The Relationship Between Organization Size and Supervision Ratio, Administrative Science Quarterly, Vol. 9 #3 (December 1964) pp. 301-312.

Patel, N. (17), Koloja, J. Personal-Impersonal Dimension in Organizational Behavior: A Variation of the Weberian Model, International Journal of Comparative Sociology, Vol. 5 #1 (March 1964) pp. 73–77.

Ziller, R. C. (15) Individuation and Socialization, Human Relations, Vol. 17 #4 (November 1964) pp. 341-360.

CULTURE AND INSTITUTIONS

Clifton, J. A. (19) The Acceptance of External Political Controls on Truk and Ponape, International Journal of Comparative Sociology, Vol. 5 #1 (March 1964) pp. 91-103.

Jacob, H. (28) The Consequences of Malapportionment: A Note of Caution, Social Forces, Vol. 43 #2 (December 1964) pp. 256-261.

Little, A.; Westergaard, J. The Trend of Class Differentials in Educational Opportunity in England and Wales, The British Journal of Sociology, Vol. 15 #4 (December 1964) pp. 301-316.

Mitchell, J. C. (18) Ocupational Prestige and the Social System: A Problem in Comparative Sociology, International Journal of Comparative Sociology, Vol. 5 #1 (March 1964) pp. 78-90.

COGNITIVE PROCESSES AND INDIVIDUAL DECISION MAKING

Anderson, L. R. (39), McGuire, W. J. Prior Reassurance of Group Concensus as a Factor in Producing Resistance to Persuasion, Sociometry, Vol. 28 #1 (March 1965) pp. 44-56.

Barnard, J. (6) Some Current Conceptualizations in the Field of Conflict, The American Journal of Sociology, Vol. 70 #4 (January 1965) pp. 442-454

Glasser, B. G. (10), Strauss, A. L. Discovery of Substantive Theory: A Basic Strategy Underlying Qualitative Research, The American Behavioral Scientist, Vol. 8 #6 (February 1965) pp. 5–12.

Glass, D. C. (23) Changes in Liking as a Means of Reducing Cognitive Discrepancies Between Self-Esteem and Aggression, Journal of Personality, Vol. 32 #4 (December 1964) pp. 531-549.

Gold, M. M. (16); Stedry, A. C. The Effect of Role Playing in a Problem Solving Situation, Industrial Management Review, Vol. 6 #1 (Fall 1964) pp. 81-95.

Goldman, M. (27), Warshay, L. H., Biddle, E. H.; Knowledge, Exposure and Personal Characteristics, The Journal of Social Psychology, Vol. 64, second half, (December 1964) pp. 263-273.

Lichtenstein, S. (20) Bases for Preferences Among Three Outcome Bets, Journal of Experimental Psychology, Vol. 69 #2 (February 1965) pp. 162–169.

Nigel, W. (11), Argyle, M. Does the Law Affect Moral Judgments? The British Journal of Criminology, Vol. 4 #6 (October 1964) pp. 570-581.

Sieber, J. E. (15), Lanzetta, J. T. Conflict and Conceptual Structure as Determinants of Decision-Making Behavior, Journal of Personality, Vol. 32 #4 (December 1964) pp. 622-641.

Stuart, I. R. (26) Primary and Secondary Process as Reflections of Catastrophe: The Political Cartoon as an Instrument of Group Emotional Dynamics, The Journal of Social Psychology, Vol. 64, second half (December 1964) pp. 231–239.

Tajfel, H. (11), Richardson, A., Everstine, L. Individual Judgment Consistencies in Conditions of Risk Taking, Journal of Personality, Vol. 32 #4 (December 1964) pp. 550-565.

Whittaker, J. O. (35) Cognitive Dissonance and the Effectiveness of Persuasive Communications, Public Opinion Quarterly, Vol. 28 #4 (Winter 1964) pp. 547-555.

Wiggins, J. A. (29) Interaction Structure, Frustration, and the Extensiveness and Intensity of Aggression, Sociometry, Vol. 28 #1 (March 1965) pp. 89-99.

RESEARCH METHODS

Archibald, G. C. (24) The Qualitative Content of Maximizing Models, The Journal of Political Economy, Vol. 73 #1 (February 1965) pp. 27-36.

Binder, A. (9), Wolin, B. R., Terebinski, S. J. Leadership in Small Groups: A Mathematical Approach, Journal of Experimental Psychology, Vol. 69 #2 (February 1965) pp. 126-134.

Blankenship, L. V. (2) Community Power and Decision-Making: A Comparative Evaluation of Measurement Techniques, Social Forces, Vol. 43 #2 (December 1964) pp. 207-216.

Brooks, F. C. (30) The Stochastic Properties of Large Battle Models, Operations Research, Vol. 13 #1 (January-February 1965) pp. 1-17.

Butler, J. B. (13) Simplest Data Factors and Simple Structure in Factor Analysis, Educational and Psychological Measurement, Vol. 24 #4 (Winter 1964) pp. 755–763.

Costner, H. L. (7), Wager, L. W. The Multivariate Analysis of Dichotomized Variables, The American Journal of Sociology, Vol. 70 #4 (January 1965) pp. 455-466.

Ehrlich, H. J. (40) Instrument Error and the Study of Prejudice, Social Forces, Vol. 43 #2 (December 1964) pp. 197-207.

Gaito, J. (33) Unequal Intervals and Unequal N in Trend Analysis, Psychological Bulletin, Vol. 63 #2 (February 1965) pp. 125-127.

Holley, J. W. (38) A Note on the Relationship Between Q and R Factors, The Scandinavian Journal of Psychology, Vol. 5 #3 (1964) pp. 143-146

Holley, J. W. (38) Guilford, J. P. (14) A Note on the G Index of Agreement, Educational and Psychological Measurement, Vol. 24 #4 (Winter 1964) pp. 749-753.

Ramanujacharyulu, C. (34) Analysis of Preferential Experiments, Psychometrika Vol. 29 #3 (September 1964) pp. 257-261.

Ross, J. A. (3), Smith, P. Experimental Designs of the Single-Stimulus, All-Or-Nothing Type, American Sociological Review, Vol. 30 #1 (February 1965) pp. 68-80.

Zavala, A. (32) Development of the Forced-Choice Rating Scale Technique Psychological Bulletin, Vol. 63 #2 (February 1965) pp. 117-124.

GROUP BEHAVIOR

Boyd, R. D. (28) Emotional Control as a Factor in Productivity of Small Interaction Groups, The Journal of Social Psychology, Vol. 64, second half, (December 1964) pp. 275–285.

Geschwender, J. A. (39) Social Structure and the Negro Revolt: An Examination of Some Hypotheses, Social Forces, Vol. 43 #2 (December 1964) pp. 248-256.

Goldman, M. (27), Fraas, L. A. The Effects of Leader Selection on Group Performance, *Socio*metry, Vol. 28 #1 (March 1965) pp. 82-88.

Hagstrom, W. O. (28) Two Dimensions of Cohesiveness in Small Groups, Sociometry, Vol. 28 #1 (March 1965) pp. 30-43.

Higgin, G., Bridger, H., The Psychodynamics of an Inter-group Experience, Human Relations, Vol. 17 #4 (November 1964) pp. 391-446.

Hodgson, A. M. The Solution of Technical Problems by Groups-2, Systematics, Vol. 2 #3 (December 1964) pp. 177-213.

Inada, K. (12) A Note on the Simple Majority Decision Rule, Econometrica, Vol. 32 #4 (October 1964) pp. 525-531.

Weitzman, M. (16) Utility Analysis and Group Behavior: An Empirical Study, The Journal of Political Economy, Vol. 73 #1 (February 1965) pp. 18-26.

VOTING

Grunbaum, W. (37) Desegregation in Texas: Voting and Action Patterns, Public Opinion Quarterly, Vol. 28 #4 (Winter 1964) pp. 604-614.

Epstein, L. D. (28) Electoral Decision and Policy Mandate: An Empirical Example, Public Opinion Quarterly, Vol. 28 #4 (Winter 1964) pp. 564-572.

MOTIVATION AND PERSONALITY

Cohen, A. K. (1) The Sociology of the Deviant Act: Anomie Theory and Beyond, American Sociological Review, Vol. 30, #1 (February 1965) pp. 5-14.

Haan, N. (2) The Relationship of Ego Functioning and Intelligence to Social Status and Social Mobility, Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, Vol. 69 #6 (December 1964) pp. 594-605.

Hill, K. T. (21) Zigler, E. The Action-Thought Dimension and Performance in an Action Versus Thought Conflict Situation, *Journal of Personal*ity, Vol. 32 #4 (December 1964) pp. 666-681.

Kievit, M. B. (8) Social Participation and Some Demographic Variables, The Journal of Social Psychology, Vol. 64 Second half, (December 1964) pp. 355-368.

Maier, N. R. F. (20) Hoffman, L. R. Financial Incentives and Group Decision in Motivating Change, The Journal of Social Psychology, Vol. 64 second half, (December 1964) pp. 369-378.

McClosky, H. (2) Schaar, J. H. Psychological Dimensions of Anomy, American Sociological Review, Vol. 30 #1 (February 1965) pp. 14-40.

Photiadis, J. D. (5) Overt Conformity to Church Teaching as a Function of Religious Belief and Group Participation, The American Journal of Sociology, Vol. 70 #4 (January 1965) pp. 423-428.

Ring, K. (22) Some Determinants of Interpersonal Attraction in Hierarchical Relationships: A Motivational Analysis, Journal of Personality, Vol. 32 #4 (December 1964) pp. 651-665.

Schwartz, M. (9) The Reciprocities Multiplier: An Empirical Evaluation, Administrative Science Quarterly, Vol. 9 #3 (December 1964) pp. 264-277.

Key to Institutions Listed in Bibliography

- 1. University of Connecticut
- 2. University of California at Berkeley
- 3. Albion College
- 4. University of California at Los Angeles
- 5. University of Minnesota
- 6. Pennsylvania State University
- 7. University of Washington
- 8. Rutgers University
- 9. Indiana University

- 10. University of California Medical Center, San Francisco
- 11. University of Oxford
- 12. Tokyo Metropolitan University
- 13. University of Chicago
- 14. University of Southern California
- 15. University of Delaware
- 16. Massachusetts Institute of Technology
- 17. University of Kentucky
- 18. University College of Rhodesia, Nyasaland
- 19. University of Kansas
- 20. University of Michigan
- 21. Yale University
- 23. Ohio State University
- 24. The University of Essex
- 25. University of Hawaii
- 26. Hunter College
- 27. University of Missouri at Kansas City
- 28. University of Wisconsin
- 29. Northwestern University
- 30. Technical Operations Inc., Burlington, Massachusetts
- 31. Ethyl Corporation
- 32. Kansas State University
- 33. York University, Toronto
- 34. Indian Statistical Institute, Calcutta
- 35. North Dakota State University
- 36. Michigan State University
- 37. University of Houston
- 38. University of Goteborg, Sweden
- 39. Wayne State University
- 40. National Institute of Mental Health

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

The Federal Bulldozer: A Critical Analysis of Urban Renewal, 1949-1962. By MARTIN ANDERSON. (Cambridge, Mass.: The M.I.T. University Press, 1964. Pp. xii, 272. $5.95.)

This is an unfortunate book. It is unfortunate in that the author presents it as a work of objective scholarship, and it fails lamentably to meet minimum scholarly standards. It is unfortunate in that a university press has seemed through this publication to give the imprimatur of academic respectability to a book which would not otherwise have acquired such credentials. It is unfortunate in that the book has debased the currency of the academy among knowledgeable men of affairs. It is unfortunate in that this inadequate polemic has already come to play a major role in the political debates over urban policy. The issues involved in urban affairs are complicated and difficult enough without the distortions and obfuscations Anderson introduces with his array of nonevidence.

Anderson's general conclusion is that the federal urban renewal program should be repealed. He argues that renewal projects involve major social costs, primarily by destroying large amounts of low-cost housing (slums), relocating the low-income residents, and building a smaller volume of higher priced housing. The effect is to shift slums rather than eliminate them, and efforts to inhibit further blight through rehabilitation programs are, says Anderson, inherently doomed to failure. As against these costs, the benefits of renewal are alleged to be far smaller than commonly supposed. Actual rebuilding is slow and not very profitable, only privileged economic and intellectual elites benefit, tax resources are lost to the city, and so on.

These are important arguments, in much need of careful inquiry and constructive dialogue. Renewal did generate a halo effect for itself and has subsequently generated opposition from such strange bedfellows as urban liberals and ideological conservatives. Thus the political issues have both curiosity and social importance. Their elucidation cannot be served by incompetence.

Anderson makes a strong case against reliance on summary statistical reports and occasional secondary sources for analysis of complex problems. He makes the case through his exclusive reliance on this sort of material. There is no evidence that he has conducted any field inquiries at all, and he makes no effort to determine whether there are significant variations among cities and, if so, why. His data are not only inadequate but quite out-of-date. Generally he stops in early 1961 which was about the time that many large projects began to move into construction phases. At one point (p. 106) Anderson concedes that more recent data may undercut his position, but he decided that it was "not feasible to attempt to redo the entire study in order to update the data." A perfectly reasonable position, provided the argument is altered to take account of the new prospects.

In his preface Anderson acknowledges that readers thought his book was unbalanced. In reply, he asked, "But what haven't I considered? What have I left out that is important?" (p. x) The answer is that he left out a great deal. For example, he stresses the fact that urban renewal projects had destroyed, as of March, 1961, some 126,000 dwelling units, mostly low cost slums, and built only about 4000 low cost units to take care of the erstwhile slum dwellers. He neglects to mention the 268,000 units of public housing completed during this same period in other parts of these cities.

There is a chapter questioning the constitutionality of renewal programs. The author sustains his argument by quoting at length from a district court opinion which the U.S. Supreme Court subsequently overruled and by omitting mention of later reaffirmations of this position. Anderson's conception of constitutionality hinges on his notion of virtue, not on the law, which on this question is not at all uncertain. Another curious use of material involves a quotation from the president of Alcoa respecting that firm's experience in renewal work. "We have seen enough to know that we have had it" (p. 122). The same man is quoted in The Journal of Housing as follows:

"We have the conviction that urban renewal is essential if our cities are to survive and that Alcoa can play a constructive role in that battle and bring home to its shareholders a reasonable return on their investment." (October, 1964, p. 472)

If Anderson wants to establish the disenchantment of investors with renewal, he needs systematic evidence, not an isolated instance.

In his concluding chapter Anderson cites twenty "quite persistent" beliefs about the urban renewal program. No clues are given as to whose beliefs these are, but they constitute a summary version of the straw men against whom Anderson is arguing. He then arrays twenty "facts and estimates" which purport to demonstrate the invalidity of the beliefs. In one such pairing Anderson asserts that it is believed that, "Urban renewal is definitely in the public interest, that is, its net result is 'good' when looked at from the national viewpoint." The "fact and estimate" reads, "It has never been clearly established that urban renewal is in the public interest. In fact, a strong argument can be made that it is not in the public interest." (p. 223)

An unfortunate book.—Robert H. Salisbury, Washington University (St. Louis).

Bureaucracy on Trial: Policy Making by Governmental Agencies. BY WILLIAM W. BOYER. (Indianapolis: The Bobbs-Merrill Company, Inc., 1964. Pp. ix, 184, $1.95.)

"This book," William Boyer writes in his preface, "not only attempts a general description and analysis of policy making in administrative agencies but is also concerned with administrative policy making in terms of its relation to democratic government and 'due process'." By policies, he refers to "agency statements, essentially legislative in substance, that affect private rights and interests" (page 1). If a teacher is looking for a brief and relatively simple introduction to administrative procedure for use by students, this book should do quite well. The diversity of formal procedures and the arguments for and against various standard practices are outlined throughout the book. But the reader who takes the title seriously and expects discussion of how administrative agencies make decisions on substantive policy matters is bound to be disappointed. The only policy decisions treated here are those concerning the kinds of procedures to be followed in making administrative rules.

In his concluding chapter, the author begins by observing that typical policy making does not exist in the context of governmental pluralism, at least not in details, but that

Nevertheless, in an idealized form the policy-making cycle is tantamount to the structure of a model. From this model, certain conceptual propositions emerge that have important implications for administrative theory:

- 1. Policy making in public administration is not devoid of an identifiable process capable of descriptive analysis.
- 2. This process consists of a cycle of five sequential stages—initiation, preliminary drafting, public participation, final drafting, and reviewing.
- 3. The most important stages substantively, and the most complex procedurally (those that involve the most participants) are the initiation and public participation stages.
- 4. The initiation and public participation stages involve the vital interaction of public administration with its external environment
- 5. This vital interaction is organized and purposeful, rather than individual and accidental. (pages 166-167)

Apparently, the author wishes to convey his belief that there is some definable pattern in administrative rule making and that the world outside the agency has some impact upon it. It would be interesting to speculate on why he saw fit to draw up these elementary notions in the form of "conceptual propositions" or even "the structure of a model." What might otherwise be reasonable statements turn into vacuous grand conceptions only because the author abandons his material in favor of genuflections to the worst aspects of contemporary fashion in the social sciences. His real contributions risk getting buried amidst the rubble of pseudo-propositions.

Taking material not only from the usual sources on national administrative law but also from a variety of state sources, Boyer adds to our knowledge of administrative procedure. He shows us the great variety of procedures and the many problems connected with them. We see how contact with the application of rules sometimes makes administrators reluctant to codify or even publish them. The problems which this creates for the affected citizens and for those concerned with due process are brought out so that students can appreciate the difficulties. The author's special knowledge of Wisconsin adds a valuable dimension to his discussion.—Aaron Wildaysky, University of California (Berkeley).

Who Speaks for the South? By James McBride Dabes. (New York: Funk & Wagnalls Company, Inc. Pp. 398. $5.95.)

James McBride Dabbs speaks for the South in the voice of his prototype, the Southerner. Mr. Dabbs believes that there is a predominant southern type and a characteristic southern attitude. The reviewer is inclined to doubt that the South is singular or that there is a typical Southerner. But Mr. Dabbs, who was born and reared and continues to live on a South Carolina plantation, speaks with more authority than the reviewer who was born and reared in the North and has lived in the South only a little over thirty years. Moreover, Mr. Dabbs is past President and a member of the Executive Committee of the Southern Regional Council, "champion of the best in the South," "the most solidly based interracial organization in the South."

This is not a book in political science, or social science, though it offers many discerning views on southern politics and southern society. The analysis is highly subjective and introspective. The author himself concedes that his interpretation of southern culture is probably influenced by the fact that he was born in a seaboard state of the Old South and not in one of the later southern states such as Alabama or Mississippi. Quite obviously, the Southerner is a White Southerner though the author treats White Southerners and Negro Southerners with equal courtesy and concern. This, indeed, is the crux of his thesis, that the Southerner has been created largely by the relationship between the two races, a relationship which he traces back to the early settlers whose "basic error" was to accept the institution of slavery for plantation life.

The South about which Mr. Dabbs writes "was, and is, in part legendary, in part real." One gains the impression that the author admires and loves the legendary part, regrets and deplores much of that which is real. A truly religious person, his perception of the South and the Southerner reflects his own values and convictions. The Southerner is "the product of history, still existing, though daily being modified toward the American norm." Because the region perpetuated the "basic error" of its first settlers, it still suffers from a sense of guilt that sets it apart from the rest of the nation. As Mr. Dabbs points out, the South has always been a great land for politicians. Politics perforce has substituted for religion, for the roots of religion are necessarily shallow in a society that accepts slavery. Protestantism with its emphasis on individual morality was never able to encompass the whole culture of the region. And, even after the Civil War, the treatment of the freed Negroes remained on the conscience of the Southerner who tried to keep ethics out of politics and to talk more about State's Rights than civil rights.

If the author lingers too long upon the tragic as well as the heroic past, it is not because he has no vision of the future. He notes briefly, and almost incidentally, that industrialization and urbanization in the past twenty years have been producing revolutionary changes in the region. He notes also that the South has been increasingly drawn into national circles by the Democratic Party (obviously written before the 1964 election!) and that it has felt the unifying impact of federal appropriations for military installations. More impressively he suggests that "The South has been God's project"—a kind of pilot project --- "learning how to do within a limited area what now has to be done in the world if civilization is to survive." As he views it, "southern history was God's way of leading two opposed peoples into a richer life than either could have found alone." Thus, tomorrow the South, "By God's Grace."

What can a political scientist learn from this?—what one thoughtful and sensitive Southerner thinks and believes about his own land and people. But the South is a complex subject and no one person speaks for its entirety. Other southerners are no less southern who speak quite differently about the same land and people—Strom Thurmond, Martin Luther King, Ralph McGill, George Wallace, James Prothro, Emmette Redford, et al., southerners all!—MARIAN D. IRISH, Florida State University.

Essays on the American Constitution. GOTTFRIED DIETZE, ED. (Englewood Cliffs, N. J.: Prentice-Hall, Inc., 1964. Pp. x, 245. $6.50.)

All who labor in the field of constitutional law know the impact of Alpheus Mason's efforts. This Festschrift makes it clear that a famous scholar may also be a great teacher. Plainly Alpheus is not one of those professors who—after a short burst of youthful enthusiasm—come to look upon their work as the casting of false pearls before true swine. For he has kept his enthusiasm in the only way an intelligent man can keep it-by passing it on to others. This of course is high art, and obviously Alpheus has it. Year after year Princeton undergraduates have cited him as their "most inspiring teacher." Now in this volume a group of his former graduate students pay similar tribute in the special coinage of scholars-the commemorative essay.

Even so, I think, Alpheus has been a bit short-changed. For these essays are confined almost exclusively to problems of the American Constitution. That leaves largely untouched the history of American political thought in which—as I see it—A.T.M. is second to none.

The first selection, entitled "The Chasm that Separated Thomas Jefferson and John Marshall," was written by Julian P. Boyd, who studied under Mason in the 1920's at Trinity College, now Duke University. He is now Professor of History at Princeton and editor of the papers of Thomas Jefferson.

The other contributors—Gordon Baker, Harold Chase, Andrew Hacker, John Hopkirk, Woodford Howard, Samuel Krislov, Richard Leach, Donald Mathews, Jack Peltason, and James Prothro—are post-World War II graduates whose work already suggests that at least two or three of them may ultimately match their teacher's accomplishments.—Wallace Mendelson, The University of Texas.

At the Pleasure of the Mayor: Patronage and Power in New York City, 1898-1958. By THEODORE J. LOWI. (New York: The Free Press of Glencoe, 1964. Pp. xvi, 272. n.p.)

This study of the appointments of New York mayors since 1898 is tinctured with arsenic and decorated with old lace. The first takes the form of an occasional patronizing attitude toward predecessors in the community politics field, extending even to Robert A. Dahl, and of an annoying and unjustified tone of arrogance. ("The novelty of my own approach is that it combines the historical methods of earlier scholars with the quantitative, empirical methods of today." But the approach is not novel. It is today routine.) The old lace is found in a Victorian style of writing. ("If the recruitment role of interest groups has grown it is because..." It is the task of the author to tell us if it has grown. And if it has, why not say so declaratively?) The book as a whole suffers from an inferior writing style that could and should have been corrected by the author or the editors of the publishing house. The book is also cluttered with value judgments that could better have been left out. They destroy the disinterested analysis we have been led to expect from the opening statements.

Lowi spends part of the book in whipping a horse that died about a decade ago: "It is a great mistake to treat a political system from the beginning as though there were only a single power structure or a single influence process; it is extremely misleading to refer glibly [or even thoughtfully?] to 'the power structure'..." He urges us to search for conditions rather than "universal" generalizations, by which he means, apparently, that we should seek to identify dependent variables. Most researchers will surely not disagree.

The book is an extension of the Sayre and Kaufman study, Governing New York City, and uses its analytical framework. It makes an important contribution to the study of local politics, but that contribution is not in the "more sophisticated approach" to community politics that the author promises, rather it is in the excellent historical analysis of the office of mayor as it has been buffeted in the political gales of the great city. A prodigious amount of work went into the data collection and into the analysis of interest group behavior in relation to the mayor's office. The description of the class-oriented group conflicts involved in the politics of distribution as distinguished from the non-class-oriented politics of regulation is first rate. The two best chapters in the book, I thought, were those dealing with "arenas of power": Personal Continuity, and Attribute Continuity. Lowi finds the tenure pattern in distribution agencies to be significantly different from that in regulatory agencies. The critical decision-making positions where the policy concerns of the mayor are great also have a different pattern from the highly structured offices where policy is shaped largely by public expectations and a professional bureaucracy. In these, administrative values dominate.

The chapters on patterns of pressures for appointments are important and impressive. The conclusions reached in them are more convincing than what the author calls his "major conclusions" which "revolve around the thesis that it is the minority, or majority-in-the-making party that is the source of innovation." He cites as evidence the reform administrations of Seth Low and John P. Mitchel, and especially of Fiorello H. LaGuardia and the supporting political parties of each. The idea is not new. Reform parties are expected to be innovative and during the Great Depression innovation was rampant throughout the land, everywhere encouraged by desperate protest. "Without history," Lowi asks, "how is one to know what phase of community trend he has captured?" Even with a fifty-year time span, can one generalize about the relationship between parties and innovation? Can one, in such a span and in only one city, generalize about innovation and patterned variables? The generalization he makes is not false, of course. He shows that political innovation has come through the minority party and has been much less characteristic of the majority party. He does not and cannot show that it could not also have come through the majority party.

This is an important book which makes contributions to both our collections of data and to theory building. With a bit more modesty on the author's part, it could have been a much better book. "The proper question for political scientists," the author tells Robert Dahl and the rest of us in his conclusion, "is not 'Who rules?' but 'What are the conditions for rule?" It is perhaps, more accurately, "Who rules under what conditions?"

The book has many helpful charts and graphs and a good index. It received the J. Kimbrough Owen Award of the American Political Science Association in 1962.—Charles R. Adrian, Michigan State University.

Mr. Crump of Memphis. By WILLIAM D. MILLER. (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1964. Pp. xiii, 372. $6.75.)

Edward H. Crump preferred to be known as "Mr. Crump, leader of the Shelby County delegation," but author Miller adopts the popular view that Crump was the "last of the old-fashioned bosses." Crump was in the tradition of the "boss and the machine" but he cannot be considered typical. In fact, there is some difficulty determining what is typical because, as the late Harold Zink discovered, it is risky to make generalizations for all bosses. Crump would have been happy to be considered by himself alone and not in other bosses' company. He particularly refused to be bracketed with such men as Curley, Hague and Pendergast.

Crump entered politics early in the century espousing the Progressive philosophy of that period, at least as much of it as is associated with civic reform and the castigation of the alliance between city government and corporate interests. If this background is distinctive among bosses, much of the operation of the Crump organization is Memphis was predictable. All of the standard practices of ward politics were followed. To a degree that few other bosses achieved, it was one-man rule and his rules were clear. In cases of infraction, the person was "excommunicated" and Crump was implacably opposed to him thereafter. One of Crump's signal achievements was to bring generally high calibre men into public office and compel them to operate within the broad lines he set. He both gave and expected loyalty.

As an individual, Crump had a passion for order in all things and was strongly puritanical. Simple and direct, he ordered his own life on the maxims he frequently repeated to others. "He was an absolutist in everything he did from the way he kept order in his dresser drawer to the way he organized the Memphis political machine." (p. 189) Crump was wedded to politics, at least Memphis politics. He had the virus in his political bloodstream, not to be a candidate and hold public office, but to dominate because he knew what was best for his people.

Although he was rich, it is difficult to prove that he enriched himself improperly from political activity. The connection was probably much more subtle-the realization of Memphians that it was wise to insure with the E. H. Crump Company, for example, although this biography does not hint of such connections. The Crump organization was noted for its honesty even among its detractors. He did not rise to the heights or stay there by dependence upon rackets or a privileged group. He worked much of his life in politics without financial compensation and did not resort to the usual demagogic devices and issues to keep his control. Author Miller concludes that the motivation was a romanticism in Crump's makeup but that Crump "determined to actualize his romantic fancy." (p. 222) All he asked in return for his organization's substantial contributions was that he run the City. Memphians got "good government" at the price of self government or, as some insisted, by selling their souls.

The sources of the Crump strength are found in the group basis of politics. Crump took care of the vital interests of Memphis groups and, by the use of various techniques, kept down the normal factionalism which arises from clashes of interests. He held himself aloof, was not identified with any group or intimate with anyone. Even within his organization, he was "Mr. Crump," never "Ed." Most groups considered him a friend who had a special understanding of their problems. He maintained a channel to each group through one of their representatives and held together Baptists, Jews, Catholics, Irish, Italian, Negroes, business and the AFL but not the CIO. His relations with business perhaps were most publicized. To the business community, Crump was their man. He provided an efficient and honest administration of city services; kept insurance, transportation, electric, and tax rates low; provided a climate for growth in political stability. Thus, large industries as well as small business were enthusiastic supporters and pressured their employees to vote.

The Negroes were a special case, for the organization "voted" them regularly, and there were no nice distinctions about residence inasmuch as Arkansas and Mississippi Negroes were as acceptable as those living in Memphis. Crump was a racist in the traditional Southern school, believing that Negroes had their own place. However, he gave them consideration in appointments, in health, and in housing and was committed to improving their conditions.

Restiveness after World War II supplemented the backlog of opposition from the dissidents. Whites were more responsive to the intellectual's attacks upon the lack of self government and Negroes were more interested in equal rights and less in noblesse oblige. The culmination was Crump's famous state-wide defeat in 1948. Crump's style of campaigning had become out of date and, in many respects, so had he. It was a new world, one he would never have made. Despite his reverses, he was never overthrown in his own bailiwick; but, the organization being his, died with him. No one else could possibly have carried it on.

Miller apparently was the first to have access to the Crump papers and while they proved illuminating in some respects, the student of Tennessee politics may have the feeling that not all of the Crump story was found there. Extensive interviews with many participants in the events of the Crump years yielded no noteworthy revelations. The author is a former Memphis resident and has previously written on Memphis politics. On at least one occasion he was a poll-watcher for Crump's opposition, but he indulged no grudges in this book. There is an obvious attempt to be fair and objective, admitting quietly what was unquestioned and resisting charges for which he concludes there is no proof. Crump's operations and relations with some Tennessee political figures are sometimes blurred. For instance, the late Senator McKellar suddenly comes into the picture but from where the reader is not told.

The author has summed up the issue by admitting that Crump authoritarianism restricted freedom. "But the extent of freedom is bound by the ordering factor of its intrinsic worth. Had there been no Crump there doubtless would have been more freedom for independent political action, but would the people of Memphis have been as free in those areas that represent the basis for any humanized society—order and material well being? Considering the character of Memphis as Crump found it, it is doubtful that they would have been." (pp. 222-23)

This may not be the last word on Mr. Crump but it can well be the last word in his behalf.—William Goodman, Southern Illinois University (Edwardsville).

The Costs of American Governments: Facts, Trends, Myths. By FREDERICK C. MOSHER AND ORVILLE F. POLAND. (New York: Dodd, Mead & Company, 1964. Pp. xvi, 180. n.p.)

Anyone concerned with public policy, whether scholar or citizen, will find this book useful. It presents many facts and discredits many myths regarding public fiscal affairs. It deserves wide reading.

In this reviewer's experience most undergraduate and many graduate political scientists are illiterate with respect to the facts of fiscal policy. Sharing a general bias with their instructors in favor of fiscal policies espoused by Democratic Administrations, most political science students express only a superficial understanding of fiscal policy issues or of the facts relevant to them. Yet if politics is defined as "who gets what, when where and how," fiscal decisions are of crucial significance.

Among the reasons for the neglect of fiscal policy issues by political science students has been the absence of brief and definitive treatments. A big step in remedying this lack has now been taken by the Mosher-Poland volume.

In nine chapters crammed with data, much of which is in chart or table form the authors consider: Perspective and Public Finances; Trends in Public Spending; Expenditures and the Federal System; Public Revenues; Balancing the Budget; The Public Debt; The Purposes of Public Spending; Public Employment; and The Ecology of Public Finances.

Their presentation is clear and there are many wise insights scattered among the 152 pages of fact-filled text. The discussion of the limited savings likely from improvement in administrative efficiency (p. 147) represents both wisdom and realism. The well-documented statement that "... by every yardstick, the national debt has gone down [since the end of World War II]" is an example of authors' success in dispelling many fiscal myths. Many more examples might be cited to suggest the value of this book. Each chapter, incidentally, concludes with an excellent summary, testifying to the orderliness of presentation.

Criticisms of a book as fine as this one by Mosher and Poland may seem gratuitous, yet the book might have been even better it there had been more than passing references to the politics of fiscal decision-making. In the discussion of "Defense Spending and the Economy" (p. 109) the reader is left to infer the political consequences of the fact that "An unusually large number of the companies that have experienced rapid growth since World War II have been concerned with products for the defense effort." It might similarly have been useful to discuss the political implications of the so-called "trust funds," and the myths associated with them. The politics of Social Security taxation may become a burning issue in the not too distant future when expenditures from the "trust funds" exceed revenues.

With respect to the presentation of state and local data, it might have been useful if distribution ranges and regional differences had been pointed out, in addition to aggregates and averages. Students might have found the charts and tables more interesting, if some "Madison Avenue" touches had been used—perhaps in the style of recent Twentieth Century Fund reports on the American and European economies.

But despite these possible deficiencies, this book is a first rate piece of work. It should find many uses in and out of the classrooms.—Norman Wengert, Wayne State University.

The Miami Metropolitan Experiment. BY EDWARD SOFEN. (Bloomington, Indiana: Indiana University Press, 1963. Pp. vii, 330. $6.95.)

Among contemporary domestic problems, few are more challenging than planning for metropolitan areas. The difficulties that beset our great cities and their mushrooming suburbs cannot be solved by local communities alone, for governmental functions now cut across boundary lines. They can be resolved only by planning on a metropolitan scale. Most efforts to plan regional services have been pragmatic, taking the form of cooperative arrangements, understandings, or agreements. Sometimes special districts, created to perform a single function, have been superimposed on existing governmental structures.

Such devices have created crazy-quilt patterns of responsibility and authority. In some regions local jurisdictions have proliferated into jungles of local governmental authorities. What is needed, many political scientists believe, is a more sweeping approach, which will assemble the hodge-podge of units in a metropolitan area and fit them together into a new political framework, with adequate power for regional planning.

One of the very few regions that has created a metropolitan-wide unit for coordinating governmental service is Florida's Dade County (the Miami area). That is why Sofen's scholarly and perceptive account of this unique area offers a valuable contribution to our understanding of metropolitan politics and government. Sofen wanted to know how Dade County succeeded in adopting far-reaching structural changes in government, while similar proposals, as well as less drastic plans, had failed in most other areas where they had been introduced. He also wanted to find out how the county officials managed to defeat repeated efforts to dismantle "Metro," as the metropolitan government of Dade County was called, and what problems it had to resolve before it could survive. In providing answers to these important questions, the author includes the political and social background of Dade County, a history of the development and early years of "Metro" in this area, an account of its internecine squabbles and the attempts to emasculate it, and a description of its titanic problems and initial achievements.

Sofen was unusually well qualified to write this volume, the second "Metropolitan Action Study." (This series, sponsored by the University of Indiana, analyzes efforts to change metropolitan governmental institutions.) A member of the University of Miami's Committee on Municipal Research, he has closely followed Metro's development and published analyses of its political, legal, and financial problems in professional journals and research reports. This background enabled him to probe the subject in depth, applying the techniques of political science. For example, Sofen not only describes Metro's evolving mechanism of government, but also presents a detailed analysis of its charter, a summary of court decisions on the subject, and an extended interpretation of the federal system of relationships it established between the county and its twenty-six constituent municipalities. Again, when he describes the stakes of the region's interest groups in metropolitan consolidation, he draws on detailed political behavior surveys conducted by his colleagues in the Government Department of the University of Miami. Many of the sources in this thoroughly documented work required considerable effort to ferret out.

One of the outstanding characteristics of this volume is that it does not confine its analysis to a single area. The typical study of a single region offers the advantages and limitation of a case study. It makes implicit comparisons with other areas, but the reader has to puzzle them out for himself. Relatively few studies of the government and politics of metropolitan areas, however, are available. This underscores the importance of explicit comparisons. Before attempting to explain why Dade County succeeded in creating a viable metropolitan government, Sofen made an intensive study of the literature relating to comparable areas. This gave him a sound apperceptive base for drawing conclusions about the Miami area.

The Miami Metropolitan Experiment presents a massive set of relationships, based on an enormously detailed body of source material its author has collected over the years. To read it readily and fluently, however, requires not only a background of political science, but also a thorough familiarity with the politics of Dade County, a combination probably only a handful of students of the Florida scene possess. Fortunately Sofen offers a few guides to this labyrinth of detail, such as chronologies, chapter summaries, and a summing up in his final chapter.

Several decades usually elapse before the initial adoption of a constructive political or social idea; often it requires a full century before it is universally accepted. Political scientists' proposals for drastic governmental reorganization of metropolitan areas, however meritorious, are not likely to obtain immediate widespread acceptance. But when other metropolitan areas seek systems of comprehensive regional planning that are superior to their present patchwork arrangements, they will find valuable lessons in The Miami Metropolitan Experiment.—FREDERICK SHAW, City University of New York.

The Rationing of Justice. By Arnold S. Trebach. (New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1964. Pp. xii, 350. $10.00.)

This is an important book, both substantively and methodologically. It draws attention to a significant subject to which political scientists have in recent years drawn more and more attention, the problems facing a man who is accused of a crime. At the same time, Dr. Trebach adds to a considerable body of knowledge about the law on this subject, as laid down by legislative bodies and appellate courts, a substantial amount of empirical information.

In the effort to study not merely the law in the books, but also the law in action, Dr. Trebach interviewed many judges, prosecutors, lawyers, prison-keepers and other officials concerned with the administration of criminal justice. But most important of all, he also interviewed a considerable number of prisoners-359 to be precisefrom whom he sought information as to their treatment during the various stages of their difficulties, from arrest to sentence and appeal. Of these prisoners, 245 were in New Jersey institutions, 39 were in a jail in Philadelphia, and 75 were in the federal penitentiary in Lewisburg, Pennsylvania. While Dr. Trebach draws heavily upon federal rules of criminal procedure, and is quite aware of general tendencies in the criminal law at the state level, he relies largely upon New Jersey law for his local illustrations.

While Dr. Trebach has broken new ground, from the point of view of political science methodology, and while he is to be commended for the imaginative diligence he displayed in pursuing his research, it is difficult to avoid the observation that the author's sample is very small indeed, as he himself repeatedly warns the reader. I suspect that a one-man crime survey is simply a physical impossibility. What this book teaches us-among many other things—is that the time has long since arrived when a truly national crime survey, adequately supported and staffed, is urgently needed if the country is to secure any significant body of reliable information as to what is going on in the field of criminal law administration, as a basis for enlarged public understanding and for reforms in both institutions and procedures. There has been no such national inquest since the old Wickersham Commission, which was created by President Hoover, who was so strongly devoted to the utilization of social science research as a useful tool of government. While Dr. Trebach does not come to this conclusion, though he does come to other useful and interesting conclusions, it seems to me that in many ways this is the basic teaching of this book.

Several propositions stand out crystal clear in this fine study. One is that most of the people who get involved in the toils of the criminal law are poor. As the author puts it, "those most affected by injustice or inefficiency in the criminal process are almost always socially powerless if not insignificant. They stand at the bottom of the social heap." Another is that we still have many unresolved problems in this area which clamor for attention, such as illegal arrest, police violence, eavesdropping, delay, coerced confessions, denial of bail, bad jail conditions and "bargain justice." But the preeminent problem is lack of counsel, and Dr. Trebach makes the significant point that the right to counsel involves many things, including compensation for counsel, the availability of investigative services, assistance during the critically important pre-trial stages, the use of expert witnesses, more adequate discovery procedures, and counsel at the sentencing, appeal and postconviction stages. While the author spells out the inadequacies of the public defender system, which is now used in 184 American counties, he concludes that on the whole it is to be preferred to the assigned counsel system. He also advocates improved professionalization of the police, independent advisory boards to deal with complaints against the police, and some device for over-all supervision, such as the Scandinavian Ombuds-field, though not in the academic law field, something of a pioneering work. One may hope that other political scientists will continue the work in respect to which Dr. Trebach has made such a good start.—David Fellman, University of Wisconsin.

In many ways this is, in the political science

First Tuesday. BY DAVID WALLACE. (Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday and Company, Inc., 1964. Pp. viii, 328. $6.00.)

This book reports a survey based on 829 mailed questionnaires representing a 54 per cent response from a sample of registered voters in Westport, Connecticut. Addresses were drawn equally from the official lists of Republican, Democratic, and unaffiliated registrants; the mailing was made in the Spring of 1960. After the election of November, 1960, a short follow-up form was returned by three out of every five of the original 54 per cent.

Westport is an upper income "liberal Republican" town on the perimeter of the New York City commuting circle. According to Wallace, in the 1940's it experienced over a 40 per cent population increase and in the 1950's a 60 per cent increase. In the 1930's and 1940's its normal majority for the Republican presidential candidate was approximately two-thirds. It gave Eisenhower a larger majority than this in both his elections, but in 1958, Abraham Ribicoff, as Democratic candidate for governor, also received more than 50 per cent of the two-party vote in Westport.

Unfortunately, this work is ambiguous as to purpose. Sometimes findings are discussed seemingly to confirm propositions from earlier research by the Michigan or Columbia groups. Sometimes findings are used as a basis for marvelling at the perceptiveness of men like Simmel (p. 254) or Tocqueville (p. 257). The literary style is journalistic, and suggests a lay audience as the target -perhaps the avid library patrons of Westport itself. Mr. Wallace feels it necessary to explain the "socialization" should not be confused with "socialism," "socialized medicine," or other leftish political usages (p. 229). On the other hand, the work is replete with complicated tables presenting the Westport data, with the clear inference that something new has been found there. It is necessary to evaluate the book as a separate social inquiry—not simply as a popular exposition of Westport politics.

One of Wallace's theses seems to be that in this Connecticut town at least, suburban life does not transform Democrats into Republicans. Westport Democrats comprise two principal elements: first, the (old) working-class descendants of Italian Catholics, the lowest income and education groupings in the town (and underrepresented in First Tuesday samples) and, second, the new "Madison Avenue" group of in-migrants, drawing membership heavily from high SES strata and including most of the suburb's relatively large proportion of Jews (overrepresented by their heavy response to the mailed questionnaires). Insofar as Wallace's data bear on the question of partisan conversion in Westport, he reports that a between-generations shift toward the Republican party did occur among the "old style Catholic, second generation Democrats," and that this is barely offset by the post-1930 Democratic trend among the Jewish migrants to Westport.

Wallace's argument against the Republicanizing tendencies of suburban life is apparently based on his finding that the net shift toward Republican partisanship among Westport respondents has been just about zero-using intergenerational change as the acid test. (No comparison is made with the secular Democratic trend elsewhere and hence there is no rigorous basis for his claim to have refuted the "doctrine of predestined suburban Republicanism.") It is not clear whether his contention is against the view that the suburbs are more Republican in percentage than they were in the 1920's-a view held by few familiar with available voting statistics-or whether he is maintaining that the suburban social climate exerts no decisively Republicanizing effect on newcomers. Chapter III discusses some related questions posed in the relevant literature (especially the political significance of migration to and from urban centers) but without formulating hypotheses to be tested with the Westport data.

The book's subtitle, "Rationality in Voting," suggests a major theme for analysis. But here again the specific contentions of the author are hard to identify. Chapter V seems to propose a nonrational basis for partisan identification. Becoming partisan, like accepting the religion of one's parent, is seen as an "inevitable" part of early socialization. The acquisition of political and religious loyalties is treated by Wallace as strictly analogous, though little beyond statistical parallels can be adduced for such a view. In his summary, after observing that in Westport the "modal Republican" is Protestant and the "modal Democrat" Jewish, Mr. Wallace remarks that "The act of voting is guided by essentially nonrational political partisanship that is culturally transmitted . . . the same as is 'character,' 'breeding,' or any other of the abstruse terms used to describe a cultural heritage." In other words, the effort to explain rationality in voting has been abortive. This is a pleasant book that highlights suburban politics in mid-century without crystallizing any insights into the underlying configurations. - DWAINE MARVICK, University of California (Los Angeles).

Tales Out of Congress. By Senator Stephen M. Young. (Philadelphia and New York: J. B. Lippincott Co., 1964. Pp. 254. $4.50.)

Senator Young's book is both entertaining and enlightening. He tells of his long and useful public life with disarming and engaging pride. He has fought what he regards as "the good fight" and relishes telling of his victories and "occasional" defeats. But most importantly he offers insights into why he dedicated his life to "the good fight" against poverty and injustice and why his efforts were rewarded with a goodly measure of electoral success in conservative Ohio.

The book was written and published before his victory over Robert A. Taft, Jr. on November 3, 1964. The book, though, helps unravel the mystery of the biggest election upset of that election day. Election analysts who adopt a mode of thinking which they mistakenly associate with the processes of the automatic computers explained his victory in terms of the Lyndon Johnson landslide and Taft's endorsement of an unpopular Republican presidential candidate.

Such analyses overlook the hearts and minds of both the voters and the candidates, and in this case the character of Stephen M. Young. Interestingly, the electronic computers which forecast the results of the election never make such an error. They simply take the vote of a representative part of the state's voters and project the returns on this basis. No black magic is included in the electronic calculations of the vote results and there is no dehumanization of the electorate. The votes placed in the machine are the product of flesh and blood reactions to the candidates, and all the machines could say election night was that the division in Ohio was too close to be predicted. The dehumanizers of the electorate are the commentators who attempt to squeeze out of the final electoral decision every element of rational and irrational calculation of the relative merits of the candidates and reduce it to a kind of "mass mind" reaction to the Johnson-Goldwater race.

Without doubt, the principal element in Young's personality that appeals to Ohioans is his independence. Senator Frank Lausche is also "independent" of political bosses and special interests. However, Young's independence as it emerges from the pages of Tales Out of Congress takes a radically different form from Lausche's. Young's political independence seems due to the fact that he is a "gut" liberal. Throughout Tales Out of Congress he refers to his concern with poverty and injustice. According to Young, his awareness of and concern with injustice was a product of his father's liberal attitudes, and acts of injustice he witnessed as a child, e.g., senseless police brutality directed at helpless people, such as a hobo who was beaten by a town police officer. The most important manifestation of Young's liberalism is his voting record in Congress. However, for Ohioans and the world his fame as a maverick is founded in the letters he writes badtempered constituents. Young takes pride in the letters and devotes a good deal of space in the book to them. Perhaps his most widely known letter is the one in which he helpfully informed a constituent: "I am sending you a letter received this morning, evidently from some crackpot who used your name." Again, when Young was told by a voter that he was the sort of fellow who would enjoy descrating the graves in Arlington Cemetery, the Senator succinctly replied:

"You are a liar."

Young was equally blunt in his correspondence with the officers of pressure groups. For example, when he received a letter from the Americanism Chairman, Hamilton County Council of the American Legion of Ohio "Disapproving and censoring" one of his actions, the senator's reply was as follows:

"Sir

"So—you self-appointed censors and self-proclaimed superduper 100 percent America Firsters censure me. You professional veterans who proclaim your vainglorious chauvinism have the effrontery to issue a press release gratuitously offering an expression of censure and making urgent demand that I cancel a speaking engagement previously made.

"I repudiate your resolution, Buster, and your pompous, selfrighteous, holier-than-thou title of Americanism Chairman! Why don't you read and try to understand that cornerstone of our liberties, the Constitution of the United States?

"If, in your press release, you asserted, or implied that I am likely to become a tool of the Communist apparatus, you are a liar.

"Another thing—why don't you puffed up patriots write my American Legion Post demanding my expulsion? Or, do you self-appointed vigilantes demand that I submit a list of speaking engagements for clearance by your outfit before I, as, a Senator of the United States, open my mouth in public?"

Ohioans laughed when they read Young's letters in the papers—and the laughter was generally with Young and against his enemies. A frequently heard comment was, "Whatever else you say about Young-he sure has guts." By virtue of his letters Young became a personality in Ohio, and his liberalism was given concrete meaningful expression. Senator Young, then, defeated Robert Taft, Jr., in 1964 because many voters respected him as a personality and felt an affinity for his political philosophy as expressed in his letters. Johnson's landslide victory helped Young, but the history of Ohio politics demonstrates that the Ohio voters never hesitate to split their tickets, if they prefer the candidate of the other party, e.g., witness Lausche's landslide victories in the face of Eisenhower's overwhelming electoral triumphs in 1952 and 1956.

In 1958, Lou Harris noted in an analysis of Ohio's voting behavior that it was a source of amazement to him that no Democrat had ever forcefully attacked John Bricker's "reactionary" voting record in Congress. Steve Young proceeded to fill that vacuum and subsequently defeated the "unbeatable" John Bricker. Similarly, in 1964 Stephen Young accomplished the "impossible" by defeating Bob Taft, Jr.

In reality, neither victory was as unpredictable as observers alleged. Bricker was not popular in Ohio. Similarly, the Taft name was never as great a political asset in Ohio as myth would have led us to believe. Bob Taft, Sr., won only one "big" electoral victory in Ohio, and that was against Joe Ferguson, a candidate of somewhat limited attainments. And in 1962, Bob Taft, Jr. won an impressive victory against a Democratic opponent who was repudiated by both the Ohio Democratic party and his Democratic running mates because of his racist position.

Senator Stephen Young exploded the myths concerning the "political invulnerability" of Taft and Bricker. And these victories symbolize a lifetime devoted to exploding myths and attacking windmills. But when Steve Young attacks a windmill it had best look to its moorings.—John H. Fenton, University of Massachusetts.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

FRANKLIN L. BURDETTE University of Maryland

ARTICLES AND BOOKLETS

National Government

Anderson, Lee F. Individuality in Voting in Congress: A Research Note. Midwest Journal of Political Science. November, 1964.

Havens, Murray Clark. Metropolitan Areas and Congress: Foreign Policy and National Security. Journal of Politics. November, 1964.

Heinlein, J. C. The Problem of Continuity in the Presidency. University of Cincinnati Law Review. Fall, 1964.

Kuhn, Edward W. Presidential Inability and Vice Presidential Vacancy. Tennessee Law Review. Fall, 1964.

Presidential Succession and Inability. Committee for Economic Development. 1965.

Quade, Quentin L. The Truman Administration and the Separation of Powers: The Case of the Marshall Plan. Review of Politics. January, 1965.

State Government

Allen, H. Kenneth, and Richard F. Fryman. Comparison of Revenues and Expenditures in Income and Non-Income Tax States in 1962. National Tax Journal. December, 1964.

Background and Priorities for Legislative Reapportionment in Montana. [Symposium.] Montana Business Quarterly. Winter, 1965.

Ball, Clyde L. The General Assembly of North Carolina: A Handbook for Legislators. Institute of Government, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill. 1965.

Botner, Stanley B. Gubernatorial Succession. Business and Government Review, University of Missouri. March-April, 1965. D'Alemberte, Talbot, and Charles C. Fishburne, Jr. The Unicameral Legislature. University of Florida Law Review. Winter, 1964.

Dunham, Paul C., Vermont State Administrative Agencies, 1777-1946. Government Research Center, University of Vermont. 1965.

Hopkins, Samuel B. The Apportionment of the Maryland House of Delegates: An Historical View. Author: 5 Ellesmere Avenue, Delmar, N. Y. 1965.

Jacob, Herbert. The Consequences of Malapportionment: A Note of Caution. Social Forces. December, 1964.

Legislative Reapportionment. Ohio Legislative Service Commission. 1965.

Leuthold, David, and Carlyle Dewey. Multi-Member Districts for Missouri's Legislature? Business and Government Review, University of Missouri. March-April, 1965.

Michener, John H. The History of Legislative Apportionment in Maryland. Maryland Law Review. Winter, 1965.

Morse, Howard Newcomb. Theories of Legislation. De Paul Law Review. Autumn-Winter, 1964.

Murray, Alan P. Wage-Withholding and State Income Taxes. National Tax Journal. December, 1964.

Oden, William E. Tenure and Turnover in Recent Texas Legislatures. Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. March, 1965.

Simmons, Richard H. American State Executive Studies: A Suggested Departure. Western Political Quarterly. December, 1964.

Sturm, Albert L. Recent Trends in State Constitutional Revision. Bureau of Government Research, Arizona State University. 1965.

Vandermeulen, Alice John. Reform of a State Fee Structure. National Tax Journal. December, 1964.

White, John P., and Norman C. Thomas. Urban and Rural Representation and State Legislative Apportionment. Western Political Quarterly. December, 1964.

Local Government

Anderson, Martin. Fiasco of Urban Renewal. Harvard Business Review. January-February, 1965

Anton, Thomas J. Budgeting in Three Illinois Cities. Institute of Government and Public Affairs, University of Illinois. 1964.

Are Property Taxes Obsolete? Nation's Cities. March, 1965.

Blankenship, L. Vaughn. Community Power and Decision-Making: A Comparative Evaluation of Measurement Techniques. Social Forces. December, 1964.

Coltrane, George A., ed. County Government in North Carolina. Institute of Government, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill. 1965.

County Action for Outdoor Recreation. National Association of Counties. 1964.

Dye, Thomas R. Urban Political Integration: Conditions Associated with Annexation in American Cities. Midwest Journal of Political Science. November, 1964.

Ellis, James R. Citizenship for Cities. National Civic Review. February, 1965.

Enforcement of Municipal Housing Codes. Harvard Law Review. February, 1965.

Expenditure Trends—Data Processing. [Symposium.] Municipal Finance. February, 1965.

Hady, Thomas F., and Clarence J. Hein. Congressional Townships as Incorporated Municipalities. Midwest Journal of Political Science. November, 1964.

Larson, Arlyn J. A Price Index for Illinois Municipalities. Institute of Government and Public Affairs, University of Illinois. 1964.

Manvel, Allen D. Paying the Urban Bill. National Civic Review. January, 1965.

McBride, Donald Bruce. Military "Second Career" Potential: Employment Opportunities for Retired Military Personnel in Local Governments of the United States. Airpower. January, 1965.

Miller, James Nathan. Your Town's Budget. National Civic Review. February, 1965.

Moore, Marvin M. The Termination of Nonconforming Uses. William and Mary Law Review. January, 1965.

Municipal Incorporation and Annexation in Ohio Ohio Legislative Service Commission. 1965. Municipal Power to Regulate Building Construction and Land Use by Other State Agencies. Minnesota Law Review. December, 1964.

Press, Charles. "Efficiency and Economy" Arguments for Metropolitan Reorganization. Public Opinion Quarterly. Winter, 1964.

Smith, Lincoln. The Manager System and Collectivism. American Journal of Economics and Sociology. January, 1965.

Southern, Dodd A., and Charles T. Canterbury. Michigan Mayor-Council Charters. Institute of Public Administration, University of Michigan. 1964.

Stoudemire, Robert H., and J. Eugene Klugh. Business Licensing in South Carolina Municipalities. Bureau of Governmental Research and Service, University of South Carolina. 1964.

Stother, Robert S. Self-Help on Slums [in Dallas]. National Civic Review. January, 1965.

Intergovernmental Relations

Bane, Frank. The Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations: Its Origin, Purposes and Progress. State Government. Winter, 1965.

Berger, Lawrence. When Is State Law Applied to Federal Acquisitions of Real Property? Nebraska Law Review. January, 1965.

Brennan, William J., Jr. Some Aspects of Federalism. New York University Law Review. December, 1964.

Flynn, John J. The Crisis of Federalism: Who Is Responsible? American Bar Association Journal. March, 1965.

Hirsch, Werner Z. Local versus Areawide Urban Government Services. National Tax Journal. December, 1964.

Kuebler, Jeanne. Megalopolis: Promise and Problems. Editorial Research Reports. February 10, 1965.

Reciprocity in Commercial Motor Vehicle Taxation. Ohio Legislative Service Commission. 1965.

Constitutional Law and Civil Liberties

Administrative Inspections and the Fourth Amendment—A Rationale. Columbia Law Review. February, 1965.

Anastaplo, George. Due Process of Law—An Introduction. University of Detroit Law Journal. December, 1964.

Anderson, Robert L. Free Speech and Obscenity: A Search for Constitutional Procedures and Standards. UCLA Law Review. January, 1965.

Auster, Paul. De-Facto Segregation. William and Mary Law Review. January, 1965.

Baldwin, Fletcher N., and Stanley K. Laughlin, Jr. The Reapportionment Cases: A Study in the Constitutional Adjudication Process. University of Florida Law Review. Winter, 1964.

Bartholomew, Paul C. The Supreme Court of the United States, 1963-1964. Western Political Quarterly. December, 1964.

Beranek, John R. Prior Restraint of Racial Picketing. University of Florida Law Review. Winter, 1964.

Berney, Arthur L. Libel and the First Amendment—A New Constitutional Privilege. Virginia Law Review. January, 1965.

Bloustein, Edward J. Privacy as an Aspect of Human Dignity: An Answer to Dean Prosser. New York University Law Reivew. December, 1964.

Bogaard, William J. The Act of State Doctrine after Sabbatino. Michigan Law Review. January, 1965.

Burgess, Wells D. Obscenity Prosecution: Artistic Value and the Concept of Immunity. New York University Law Review. December, 1964.

The Civil Rights Act of 1964. Harvard Law Review. January, 1965.

Constitutional Amendments Proposed by the Council of State Governments. [Symposium.] Notre Dame Lawyer. Vol. 39, No. 6. 1964.

The Constitutional Rights of the American Indian. Virginia Law Review. January, 1965.

Controversy over Supreme Court Decisions on Apportionment of State Legislatures. [Symposium.] Congressional Digest. January, 1965.

Duncan, Richard G., Jr. Federalism and the Fifth: Configurations of Grants of Immunity. UCLA Law Review. January, 1965.

Enker, Arnold N., and Sheldon H. Elson. Counsel for the Suspect: Massiah v. United States and Escobedo v. Illinois. Minnesota Law Review. November, 1964.

Frankfurter, Felix. Memorandum on "Incorporation" of the Bill of Rights into the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Harvard Law Review. February, 1965.

Freund, Paul A. Civil Rights and the Limits of Law. Buffalo Law Review. Winter, 1964.

Goldfarb, Ronald, and Stephen Kurzman. Civil Rights v. Civil Liberties: The Jury Trial Issue. UCLA Law Review. January, 1965.

Gordon, Charles. The Citizen and the State: Power of Congress to Expatriate American Citizens. Georgetown Law Journal. Winter, 1965.

Hecht, Neil. From Seisin to Sit-In: Evolving Property Concepts. Boston University Law Review. Fall, 1964.

Holden, Lawrence T., Jr., and William W. Willard. State Apportionment—The Wake of Reynolds v. Sims. Ibid. Winter, 1965.

Kopp, Robert W. Management's Concern with Recent Civil Rights Legislation. Labor Law Journal. February, 1965.

Lynch, James J. The Right to Read—and Not to Read. Modern Age. Winter, 1964-1965.

Miller, Arthur Selwyn. On the Need for "Impact Analysis" of Supreme Court Decisions. Georgetown Law Jornal. Winter, 1965.

Monaghan, Henry P. Law and the Negro Revolution. Boston University Law Review. Fall, 1964.

Morgan, E. Dwight, reporter. The Future of a Federal Common Law. Alabama Law Review. Fall, 1964.

Nelson, Harold C. On Liberals and the Current Racial Crisis. Phylon. Winter, 1964.

Pittman, R. Carter. The Fourteenth Amendment: Its Intended Effect on Anti-Miscegenation Laws. North Carolina Law Review. December, 1964.

Prosch, Harry. Limits to the Moral Claim in Civil Disobedience. Ethics. January, 1965.

The Reapportionment Decisions. [Symposium.]

American Bar Association Journal. February, 1965.

Roman Catholicism and the State. [Symposium.] Journal of Church and State. Winter, 1965.

Schaar, John H. Some Ways of Thinking about Equality. Journal of Politics. November, 1964.

Sultan, Allen. Recent Judicial Concepts of "Cruel and Unusual Punishment." Villanova Law Review. Winter, 1965.

Swindler, William F. Reapportionment: Revisionism or Revolution? North Carolina Law Review. December, 1964.

Three-Judge Court Practice under Section 2281. Georgetown Law Journal. Winter, 1965.

Vorenberg, James. Police Detention and Interrogation of Uncounselled Suspects: The Supreme Court and the States. Boston University Law Review. Fall, 1964.

Weinstein, Jack B. The Effect of the Federal Reapportionment Decisions on Counties and Other Forms of Municipal Government. Columbia Law Review. January, 1965.

Whittaker, Charles E. A Confusion of Tongues [and the Commerce Power]. American Bar Association Journal. January, 1965.

Wyse, Ronald. Expatriation: Demise of the "Rational Nexus." UCLA Law Review. January, 1965.

Judicial Administration and Law Enforcement

Ague, Robert M., Jr. Intent to Defraud in Postal Fraud Order Cases. Temple Law Quarterly. Fall, 1964.

Antell, Melvin P. The Modern Grand Jury: Benighted Supergovernment. American Bar Association Journal. February, 1965.

Arnold, Richard S. State Power to Enjoin

Federal Court Proceedings. Virginia Law Review. January, 1965.

Attorneys under the Foreign Agents Registration Act of 1938. Harvard Law Review. January, 1965.

The Availability of Counsel and Group Legal Services: A Symposium. UCLA Law Review. January, 1965.

Bloom, Murray Teigh. Justice for the Poor. National Civic Review. March, 1965.

Calkins, Richard M. Grand Jury Secrecy. Michigan Law Review. January, 1965.

Cross, Roscoe. Federal Tort Claims Act and Conflict of Laws. Mississippi Law Journal. December, 1964.

Danelski, David J. A Supreme Court Justice Steps Down. Yale Review. Spring, 1965.

Developments in the Law—Injunctions. Harvard Law Review. March, 1965.

Gales, Robert Robinson. The Assassination of the President: Jurisdictional Problems. Syracuse Law Review. Fall, 1964.

Ginsburg, Ruth B. Special Findings and Jury Unanimity in the Federal Courts. Columbia Law Review. February, 1965.

Hill, James D. Liability for Aircraft Noise— The Aftermath of Causby and Griggs. University of Miami Law Review. Fall, 1964.

MacCorkle, Stuart A. The Texas Grand Jury. Institute of Public Affairs, University of Texas. 1964.

McGrath, George F. The New England Interstate Corrections Compact. State Government. Winter, 1965.

Mendelson, Wallace. The Untroubled World of Jurimetrics. Journal of Politics. November, 1964.

Ohio Domestic Relations Law. Ohio Legislative Service Commission. 1965.

Parker, Graham E. The Education of the Sentencing Judge. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. January, 1965.

Problems of Judicial Administration. Ohio Legislative Service Commission. 1965.

Reed, John P. Jury Deliberations, Voting, and Verdict Trends. Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. March, 1965.

Shaffer, Helen B. Criminal Justice and Crime Control. Editorial Research Reports. February 17, 1965.

Sheridan, Richard George. Urban Justice: Municipal Courts in Tennessee. Bureau of Public Administration, University of Tennessee. 1964.

Sprecher, Robert A. Bar Admission Agencies: Their Right to Be Informed. American Bar Association Journal. March, 1965.

Tate, Mercer D. Judicial Reform in Pennsylvania. Villanova Law Review. Winter, 1965.

Turner, Kathryn. Federalist Policy and the Judiciary Act of 1801. William and Mary Quarterly. January, 1965.

Whinery, Leo H. Policy, Legislation, and Organization of Municipal Courts in Oklahoma. Oklahoma Law Review. February, 1965.

Winters, Glenn R., and Bob Allard. Two Dozen Misconceptions about Judicial Selection and Tenure. Journal of the American Judicature Society. December, 1934.

Public Administration and Administrative Law

The Administrative Conference Act. Georgetown Law Journal. Winter, 1965.

Berger, Raoul. Administrative Arbitrariness and Judicial Review. Columbia Law Review. January, 1965.

Boas, Maxwell S. Insights and Guideposts: Administrative Law in California. Journal of the State Bar of California. November-December, 1964.

Cary, William L. Why I Oppose the Divorce of the Judicial Function from Federal Eegulatory Agencies. American Bar Association Journal. January, 1965.

Fuchs, Ralph F. Agency Development of Policy through Rule-Making. Northwestern University Law Review. January-February, 1965.

Graves, F. M., and W. A. Steger. Management Systems Analyses and Administrative Law: A Railroad Merger Example. *Transportation Jour*nal. Winter, 1964.

Halset, Walter G. The Paradoxes of Public Administration. Public Personnel Review. April, 1965.

Keith, John P. Planning the [New York] Region. National Civic Review. February, 1965.

Macy, John W., Jr. The Manager's Role in Quality Staffing. Civil Service Journal. January-March, 1965.

Mellhorn, Donna J. Security in Retirement: Local Government Systems in Tennessee. Bureau of Public Administration, University of Tennessee. 1964.

Paine, Frank T., and William M. Bassin. Sensitivity Training: Theory and Practice. Public Personnel Review. April, 1965.

Police and Firemen's Pension Funds. Ohio Legislative Service Commission. 1965.

Posner, Ben. Financial Management and Executive Decisions. Civil Service Journal. January-March, 1965.

Priest, A. J. G. Some Bases of Public Utility Regulation. Mississippi Law Journal. December 1964.

Roper, Burns W. Public Opinion Surveys in Legal Proceedings. American Bar Association Journal. January, 1965.

Schein, Edgar H., et al. Career Orientations and Perceptions of Rewarded Activity in a Research Organization [NASA]. Administrative Science Quarterly. March, 1965.

Shapiro, David L. The Choice of Rulemaking or Adjudication in the Development of Administrative Policy. Harvard Law Review. March, 1965.

Simon, Herbert A. Administrative Decision Making. Public Administration Review. March, 1965.

Storing, Herbert J. Leonard D. White and the Study of Public Administration. Ibid.

Waldo, Dwight. The Administrative State Revisited. Ibid.

Political Parties, Elections, and Public Opinion

Ackerman, Nathan W. The Social Psychology of Prejudice. Mental Hygiene. January, 1965.

Anast, Philip. Temporal Opinion Orientation: An Adaptive Process. Journal of Social Psychology. February, 1965.

Barron, Jerome A. In Defense of "Fairness": A First Amendment Rationall for Broadcasting's "Fairness" Doctrine. University of Colorado Law Review. Fall, 1964.

Bostian, Lloyd R., and John E. Ross. Functions and Meanings of Mass Media for Wisconsin Farm Women. Journalism Quarterly. Winter, 1965.

Burnham, Walter Dean. The Alabama Senatorial Election of 1962: Return of Inter-Party Competition. Journal of Politics. November, 1964.

Campbell, Angus. Voters and Elections: Past and Present. Ibid.

Carey, Kevin W. Tom Swift and His Electric Electorate: Legislation to Restrict Election Coverage. Notre Dame Lawyer. February, 1965.

Clem, Alan L. West River Voting Patterns. Governmental Research Bureau, University of South Dakota. 1965.

Congressional Redistricting. Ohio Legislative Service Commission. 1965.

Deskins, James Wesley. On the Nature of the Public Interest. Accounting Review. January, 1965.

Dexter, Lewis A. The Good Will of Important People: More on the Jeopardy of the Interview. Public Opinion Quarterly. Winter, 1964.

Donohew, Lewis. Publishers and Their 'Influence' Groups. Journalism Quarterly. Winter, 1965.

Epstein, Leon D. Electoral Decision and Policy Mandate: An Empirical Example. Public Opinion Quarterly. Winter, 1964.

Ferguson, Jenniellen W., and Paul J. Hoffmann. Voting Behavior: The Vote on the Francis Amendment in the 1962 California Election. Western Political Quarterly. December, 1964.

Fuchs, Douglas A. Election Day Newscasts and

Their Effects on Western Voter Turnout. Journalism Quarterly. Winter, 1965.

Gove, Samuel K. The Illinois Municipal Electoral Process. Institute of Government and Public Affairs, University of Illinois. 1964.

Gross, Ronald S., and Leonard V. Kaplan. Legal Problems of Ward Realignment in Philadelphia. Temple Law Quarterly. Winter, 1965.

Grunbaum, Werner F. Desegregation in Texas: Voting and Action Patterns. Public Opinion Quarterly. Winter, 1964.

Hayman, Donald, and O. Glenn Stahl. Outdated Political Activity Rules Unfair to Employees. Public Management. January, 1965.

Hays, Samuel P. Archival Sources for American Political History. American Archivist. January, 1965.

Hobart, Charles W., and Nancy Fahlberg. The Measurement of Empathy. American Journal of Sociology. March, 1965.

Huthmacher, J. Joseph. Charles Evans Hughes and Charles Francis Murphy: The Metamorphosis of Progressivism. New York History. January, 1965.

Jennings, M. Kent, and L. Harmon Zeigler. A Moderate's Victory in a Southern Congressional District. Public Opinion Quarterly. Winter, 1964.

Kemper, Kenneth D. Restrictions on Negro Voting in Mississippi History. Appendix to brief of American Civil Liberties Union (156 Fifth Ave., New York), amicus curiae in U. S. v. Mississippi, U. S. Supreme Court, October Term, 1964.

Kintner, Robert E. Broadcasting and the News. Harper's Magazine. April, 1965.

Krug, Mark M. Lyman Trumbull and the Real Issues in the Lincoln-Douglas Debates. Journal of the Illinois State Historical Society. Winter, 1964.

Leege, David C. 1964 Election Survey—Boone County, Missouri. Business and Government Review, University of Missouri. March-April, 1965.

Leuthold, David. Voter Attitudes in 1964. Ibid. January-February, 1965.

Lewis, Lionel S. Political Heroes: 1936 and 1960. Journalism Quarterly. Winter, 1965.

Lindquist, John H. Socioeconomic Status and Political Participation. Western Political Quarterly. December, 1964.

Lopez, Claira S. James K. Vardaman and the Negro: The Foundation of Mississippi's Racial Policy. Southern Quarterly. January, 1965.

Lyons, William E. Populism in Pennsylvania, 1892-1901. Pennsylvania History. January, 1965.

Mather, George B. Effects of the Use of Voting Machines on Total Vote Cast: Iowa—1920-1960. Institute of Public Affairs, University of Iowa. 1964.

Merritt, Richard L. Woodrow Wilson and the "Great and Solemn Referendum," 1920. Review of Politics. January, 1965.

Moore, John Robert. Senator Josiah W. Bailey and the "Conservative Manifesto" of 1937. Journal of Southern History. February, 1965.

On the Death of the President. [Symposium.] Psychoanalytic Review. Winter, 1964-65.

Perrow, Charles. The Sociological Perspective and Political Pluralism. Social Research. Winter, 1964.

Prince, Carl E. James J. Wilson: Party Leader, 1801-1824. Proceedings of the New Jersey Historical Society. January, 1965.

Salisbury, Robert H. Urban Politics: The New Convergence of Power. Journal of Politics. November, 1964.

Silva, Ruth C. Relation of Representation and the Party System to the Number of Seats Apportioned to a Legislative District. Western Political Quarterly. December, 1964.

Simmons, J. L. Tolerance of Divergent Attitudes. Social Forces. March, 1965.

Stempel, Guido H., III. The Prestige Press in Two Presidential Elections. Journalism Quarterly. Winter, 1965.

Van Riper, Paul P., and Darab B. Unwalla. Voting Patterns among High-Ranking Military Officers. Political Science Quarterly. March, 1965.

Watson, Richard L., Jr. A Southern Democratic Primary: Simmons vs. Bailey in 1930. North Carolina Historical Review. Winter, 1965.

Woodward, C. Vann. From the First Reconstruction to the Second [in the South]. Harper's Magazine. April, 1965.

Wrightsman, Lawrence S., and Frank C. Noble. Reactions to the President's Assassination and Changes in Philosophies of Human Nature. Psychological Reports. February, 1965.

Economic and Social Functions

National Economy

Anderson, Paul S. Relative Economic Growth Rates and Fiscal-Monetary Policies. Journal of Political Economy. February, 1965.

Atkinson, Sue N. Financial Flows in Recent Business Cycles. Journal of Finance. March, 1965.

Berle, Adolph A. Property, Production and Revolution. Columbia Law Review. January, 1965.

Dewald, William G. Commission on Money and Credit Research Studies. Journal of Political Economy. February, 1965.

Kelso, M. M. A Critical Appraisal of Agricultural Economics in the Mid-Sixties. Journal of Farm Economics. February, 1965.

Kuebler, Jeanne. National Economic Planning. Editorial Research Reports. January 13, 1965.

Lukaczer, Moses. Economic Insights into an Actuarial Issue: The Growth of Earnings in the Medium Range Future. Insurance Law Journal. February, 1965. Also: Labor Law Journal. March, 1965.

Phelps, Edmund S. Anticipated Inflation and Economic Welfare. Journal of Political Economy. February, 1965.

Raffaele, Joseph A. Evolution of the American Industrial Relations System. Labor Law Journal. January, 1965.

Shrimali, P. D. Professor Rostow's Leading Ideas on Economic Growth. Indian Economic Journal. April-June, 1964.

Treiber, William F. The Federal Reserve System after Fifty Years. Business Lawyer. January, 1965.

Van Horne, James C. Conflicting Objectives in Treasury Debt Management. Business Topics. Winter, 1965.

Weckstein, Richard S. Fiscal Reform and Economic Growth. National Tax Journal. December, 1964.

Witt, Lawrence W. Role of Agriculture in Economic Development—A Review. Journal of Farm Economics. February, 1965.

Natural Resources

Beuchert, Edward W. State Regulation of Channel Encroachments. Natural Resources Journal. January, 1965.

Cooley, Richard A. State Land Policy in Alaska. Ibid.

Fox, Irving K. New Horizons in Water Resources Administration. Public Administration Review. March. 1965.

Gray, Horace M. Privileged Monopoly in Water Resources. Quarterly Review of Economics and Business. Winter, 1964.

Hague, A. Bartlett, Jr. Resolving Conflicts in Natural Resource Allocation. Journal of Soil and Water Conservation. November-December, 1964.

McCleneghan, Thomas J. Land Ownership in the West. Arizona Review of Business and Public Administration. March, 1965.

Pealy, Robert H. Organization for Comprehensive River Basin Flanning: The Texas and Southeast Experience. Institute of Public Administration, University of Michigan. 1964. [1965.]

Sax, Joseph L. Problems of Federalism in Reclamation Law. *University of Colorado Law Re*view. Fall, 1964.

Taylor, Paul S. Excess Land Law: Calculated Circumvention. California Law Review. December, 1964.

Water Pollution Control: No. 1—Enabling Legislation for Pollution Control Programs. County Officer. March, 1965.

Yeutter, Clayton K. A Legal-Economic Critique of Nebraska Watercourse Law. Nebraska Law Review. January, 1965.

Agriculture

Colman, Gould P. Government and Agriculture in New York State. Agricultural History. January, 1965.

Griffing, Milton E., and Loyd K. Fischer. Government Purchase of Crop Limiting Easements as a Means of Reducing Production. Journal of Farm Economics. February, 1965.

Halcrow, Harold G. Emerging Farm Policy Issues. Quarterly Review of Economics and Business. Winter, 1964.

Kirkendall, Richard S. Howard Tolley and Agricultural Planning in the 1930's. Agricultural History. January, 1965.

Shover, John L. Populism in the Nineteen-Thirties: The Battle for the AAA. Ibid.

Trelogan, Harry C., and Norman Townshend-Zellner. On Benefits of Agricultural Marketing Research. Journal of Farm Economics. February, 1965.

Business and Labor

Beaird, James R. Reporting Requirements for Employers and Labor Relations Consultants in the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959. Georgetown Law Journal. Winter, 1965.

Becker, Joseph M., William Haber, and Sar A. Levitan. Programs to Aid the Unemployed in the 1960's. W. E. Upjohn Institute for Employment Research, Kalamazoo, Mich. 1965.

Bernstein, Merton. Nudging and Shoving All Parties to a Jurisdictional Dispute into Arbitration: The Dubious Procedure of National Steel. Harvard Law Review. February, 1965.

Browne, Harry L. The Impact of Supreme Court Decisions on Free Collective Bargaining. American Bar Association Journal. February, 1965

Burstein, Herbert. Labor Arbitration—A New Theology. Villanova Law Review. Winter, 1965.

Carroll, Terence E. Workmen's Compensation and Comprehensive Health Services: Existing and Emerging Patterns. Journal of Public Health. February, 1965.

Cohen, Manuel F. Current Developments at the SEC. Accounting Review. January, 1965.

Coudert, Alexis C. The Application of the United States Antidumping Law in the Light of a Liberal Trade Policy. Columbia Law Review. February, 1965.

De Keyser, Leon J. Territorial Restrictions and Export Prohibitions under the United States and the Common Market Antitrust Laws. Common Market Law Review. December, 1964.

Drotning, John E. Employer Free Speech: Two Basic Questions Considered by the NLRB and Courts. Labor Law Journal. March, 1965.

Duvin, Robert P. The Bargaining Lockout: An Impatient Warrior. Notre Dame Lawyer. February, 1965.

Feldesman, William. Another Approach to Strikes: Inducements to Voluntary Arbitration. George Washington Law Review. December, 1964.

Frank, H. Stephen. The Myth of the Conflict between Antitrust Law and Labor Law in the Application of Antitrust Law to Union Activity. Dickinson Law Review. Fall, 1964.

Grodin, Joseph R., and Duane B. Beeson. State Right-to-Work Laws and Federal Labor Policy. Labor Law Journal. March, 1965.

Grooms, T. L. The NLRB and Determination of the Appropriate Unit: Need for a Workable Standard. William and Mary Law Review. January, 1965.

Hollander, Stanley C. Nineteenth Century Anti-Drummer Legislation in the United States. Business History Review. Winter, 1964.

Horvitz, Paul M. Stimulating Bank Competition through Regulatory Action. Journal of Finance. March, 1965.

Irwin, Manley R. The Communication Industry and the Policy of Competition. Buffalo Law Review. Winter, 1964.

Kaufman, Jacob J. The Railroad Labor Dispute: A Marathon of Maneuver and Improvisation. Industrial and Labor Relations Review. January, 1965.

Krasnow, Erwin G. Copyrights, Performers' Rights and the March on Civil Rights: Reflections on Martin Luther King, Jr. v. Mister Maestro. Georgetown Law Journal. Winter, 1965.

Lemov, Michael R. State and Local Control over the Location of Nuclear Reactors under the Atomic Energy Act of 1954. New York University Law Review. December, 1964.

Levin, Harvey J. Organization and Control of Communications Satellites. *University of Pennsyl*vania Law Review. January, 1965.

Levine, Marvin J. State and Local Retraining Programs and Legislation: A Case for Federal Action. Labor Law Journal. January, 1965.

Long, Norton E. Conflict of Interest: A Political Scientist's View. Social Research. Winter, 1964.

Lowndes, Charles L. B. The Revenue Act of 1964: A Critical Analysis. Duke Law Journal. Autumn, 1964.

Marcus, Sumner. New Weapons Against Bigness. Harvard Business Review. January-February, 1965.

Matteoni, Norman E. An Antitrust Argument: Whether a Federal Trade Commission Order Is within the Ambit of the Clayton Act's Section 5. Notre Dame Lawyer. February, 1965.

Miller, Richard Ulric. The Enigma of Section 8(5) of the Wagner Act. Industrial and Labor Relations Review. January, 1965.

The New Haven Railroad Reorganization Proceedings, or The Little Railroad That Couldn't. Harvard Law Review. February, 1965.

Oil and Gas Law in Ohio. Ohio Legislative Service Commission. 1965.

Painter, William H. Section 16(d) of the Securities Exchange Act: Legislative Compromise or Loophole? University of Pennsylvania Law Review. January, 1965.

Peterson, Richard B. Representation Elections under the Railway Labor Act. Labor Law Journal. January, 1965.

Phillips, Richard M., and Morgan Shipman. An Analysis of the Securities Acts Amendments of 1964. Duke Law Journal. Autumn, 1964.

"Political" Blacklisting in the Motion Picture Industry: A Sherman Act Violation. Yale Law Journal. January, 1965.

Rate Regulation in Ocean Shipping. Harvard Law Review. January, 1965.

Read, Frank T. Minority Rights and the Union Shop: A Basis for Constitutional Attack. Minnesota Law Review. December, 1964.

Shaffer, Helen B. Unemployment Benefits in Prosperity. Editorial Research Reports. March 5, 1965.

Stokes, John M. A Few Irreverent Comments about Antitrust, Agency Regulation, and Primary Jurisdiction. George Washington Law Review. December, 1964.

Symposium on Patents, Copyrights, and Trademarks. Federal Bar Journal. Winter, 1965.

Symposium: Securities Regulation. Western Reserve Law Review. December, 1964.

Warner, Michael A. Product Picketing—A New Loophole in Section 8(b) (4) of the National Labor Relations Act? Michigan Law Review. February, 1965.

Health, Education, and Welfare

Caldwell, Lynton K. Public Administration and the Universities: A Half-Century of Development. Public Administration Review. March, 1965

Champlin, Linda K., and Mark E. Winslow. Elective Sterilization. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. January, 1965.

Conant, James B. Shaping Educational Policy. State Government. Winter, 1965.

Ellis, Elmer. Federal Financial Support Required for Necessary Growth of Higher Education. Business and Government Review, University of Missouri. January-February, 1965.

Fiss, Owen M. Racial Imbalance in the Public Schools: The Constitutional Concept. Harvard Law Review. January, 1965.

Friedman, Rose D. Poverty: Definition and Perspective. American Enterprise Institute for Public Policy Research. 1965. Gatewood, Willard B. The Evolution Controversy in North Carolina, 1920–1927. Mississippi Quarterly. Fall, 1964.

Goals and Practices in Public Education. Ohio Legislative Service Commission, 1965.

Gordon, David A. The Unborn Plaintiff. Michigan Law Review. February, 1965.

Hospital Liability Law in Ohio. Ohio Legislative Service Commission. 1965.

Hyman, Jacob D., and Wade J. Newhouse, Jr. Desegregation in the Schools: The Present Legal Situation. Buffalo Law Review. Winter, 1964.

Levenson, Rosaline, ed. Integration of Public Welfare Services in Connecticut. Institute of Public Services, University of Connecticut. 1965.

Ligon, Roddey M., Jr. North Carolina Hospital Law. Institute of Government, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill. 1964.

Mattison, Berwyn F. Political Implications in Good Public Health Administration. Journal of Public Health. February, 1965.

Miller, James L., Jr. State Budgeting for Higher Education: The Use of Formulas and Cost Analysis. Institute of Public Administration, University of Michigan. 1964. [1965.]

Nash, Bernard E. Community Services for the Aging: A Field for State Action. State Government. Winter, 1965.

Nursing Home Regulation. Ohio Legislative Service Commission, 1965.

Ohio's Public Assistance Programs. Ohio Legislative Service Commission. 1965.

Pettigrew, Thomas F. Continuing Barriers to Desegregated Education in the South. Sociology of Education. Winter, 1965.

Waggaman, John S. Health Regulations and the Indiana Food Industry. Institute of Public Administration, Indiana University. 1965.

Military Affairs and National Security

Arms Control and Disarmament. [Symposium.] Temple Law Quarterly. Winter, 1965.

Baldwin, Hanson W. Slow-Down in the Pentagon. Foreign Affairs. January, 1965.

Brown, Seyom. An Alternative to the Grand Design. World Politics. January, 1965.

Cleland, David I. Project Management [in the Department of Defense]. Air University Review. January-February, 1965.

Congress Weighs Soundness of Present U. S. Space Policy. [Symposium.] Congressional Digest. February, 1965.

Dougherty, Clifford A., and Norman B. Lynch. The Administrative Discharge: Military Justice? George Washington Law Review. December. 1964.

Etzioni, Amitai. Strategic Models for a Policentric World. Centennial Review. Winter, 1965. Fink, Clarence F. More Calculations about Deterrence. Journal of Conflict Resolution. March, 1965.

Garner, James G. General Order 100 [U. S. Rules of Land Warfare] Revisited. Military Law Review. January, 1965.

Hauk, James G. Logistics and Physical Distribution Management in the Military. Transportation Journal. Winter, 1964.

Hollander, Bennet N. The President and Congress—Operational Control of the Armed Forces. Military Law Review. January, 1965.

Jacobs, Walter Darnell. Insurgency: The Third Alternative. World Affairs. October-December, 1964.

Kohl, Wilfrid L. Nuclear Sharing in NATO and the Multilateral Force. Political Science Quarterly. March, 1965.

Maurer, Maurer. The Constitutional Basis of the United States Air Force. Air University Review. January-February, 1965.

McKay, William P. The Serviceman and the Law: Personal Liability for Acts and Omissions While Acting in Performance of Official Duties. University of Detroit Law Journal. December, 1964.

Riemer, Neal. Kennedy's Grand Democratic Design. Review of Politics. January, 1965.

Seaborg, Glenn T. Existing Arrangements for International Control of Warlike Material—5: The United States Program of Bilateral Safeguards. Disarmament and Arms Control. Autumn, 1964.

Stratton, James H. Sea-Level Canal: How and Where. Foreign Affairs. April, 1965.

Van Riper, Paul P., and Darab A. Unwalla. Military Careers at the Executive Level. Administrative Science Quarterly. March, 1965.

Worsnop, Richard L. Reserve Forces and the Draft. Editorial Research Reports. January 20, 1965

Zoghby, Guy A. Is There a Military Common Law of Crimes? Military Law Review. January, 1965.

Government Documents

Congress

House. Committee on Appropriations. The Budget for 1966. Hearings. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.

- Aid to Elementary and Secondary Education. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also House Report No. 143. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- ——. Committee on Foreign Affairs. To Amend Further the Arms Control and Disarmament Act. Hearings. Also House Report No. 37. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Drug Abuse Control Amendments of

- 1965. Hearings. Also House Report No. 130. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- Standards for Congressional Redistricting. House Report No. 140. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- ———. Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. The Federal Paperwork Jungle. House Report No. 52. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- Department of Defense. House Report No. 129. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- ——. Committee on Public Works. Appalachian Regional Development Act of 1965. House Report No. 51. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- Select Committee on Small Business. Small Business Problems in Urban Areas. Hearings before Subcommittee. 88th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1965.

House and Senate. Joint Economic Committee. Fiscal Policy Issues of the Coming Decade. Joint Committee Print. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.

January 1965 Economic Report of the President. Hearings. Also House Report No. 175. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.

Senate. Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. Acreage-Poundage Marketing Quotas for Tobacco. Hearings before Subcommittee. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.

- ———. Importation of Foreign Agricultural Workers. Hearings. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- ——. Committee on Finance. Coffee Agreement. Hearing. Also Senate Report No. 53. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- ------. Committee on Foreign Relations. Automotive Parts Agreement between the United States and Canada. Hearing before Subcommittee. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- and Disarmament Act. Hearings. Also Senate Report No. 73. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- Traffic in Narcotics. Senate Report No. 72. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- According to the President on the Management of Automatic Data Processing in the Federal Government, prepared by the Bureau of the Budget. Senate Doc. No. 15. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
 - ---- Committee on Interior and Insular

Affairs. Indiana Dunes National Lakeshore. Hearing before Subcommittee. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.

- ------. Committee on the Judiciary. Economic Concentration. Hearings before Subcommittee. 88th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1964.
- ————. Federal Bail Procedures. Hearings before Subcommittee. 88th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1965.
- ———. Physician Ownership in Pharmacies and Drug Companies. Hearings before Subcommittee. 88th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1965.
- Vacancies in the Office of Vice President. Hearing before Subcommittee. Also Senate Report No. 66. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- ———. Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. Amending the Manpower Development and Training Act of 1962. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also Senate Report No. 123. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- Cancer, Stroke, and Other Major Diseases. Hearings before Subcommittee. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.

- Quality Act of 1965. Hearing before Subcommittee. Also Senate Report No. 10. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- ——. Committee'on Rules and Administration. Reorganization of Congress. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also Senate Report No. 71. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- ——. Select Committee on Small Business. Small Business Conversion Problems. Hearings. 88th Cong., 2nd Sess. 1965.
- ——. Special Committee on Aging. Frauds and Deceptions Affecting the Elderly. Committee Print. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.

Other Federal

Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations. State Technical Assistance to Local Debt Management. 1965.

Department of Commerce. Bureau of the Census. City Employment in 1964. 1965.

————. Finances of Employee-Retirement Systems of State and Local Governments in 1963-64. 1965.

—————. Historical Statistics of the United States. Continuation to 1962 and Revisions. 1965.

——. National Public Advisory Committee on Area Redevelopment. Area Redevelopment: Three Years in Review. December, 1964.

Department of Labor. Manpower Report of the President. 1965.

COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT AND CROSS-NATIONAL RESEARCH

Africa's Quest for Order. By Fred G. Burke. (Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, Inc., 1964. Pp. 177. $4.50.)

If the title of this book emphasizes order (and the search for it) the material is largely devoted to the analysis of change. Mr. Burke, describing the various ways in which change is occurring, emphasizes the transition from a rural to an urban environment, subsistence to commercial enterprise, local to central government, and, more generally, particularism of traditional social life to a more complex all-embracing pattern of overlapping association.

Indeed, disassociation of individuals from one set of institutions and their reassociation in new corporate groups is a central theme of the book. The "order" to which he refers arises out of this process. To emphasize this he chooses Simmel's term, sociation, as the critical variable. The result will be useful for beginning courses on Africa.

For the specialist the book is not very helpful. The sweep is broad but lacking in insight. It does not compare well with Wallerstein's Africa, The Politics of Independence, or Hunter in The New Societies of Tropical Africa. Bohannan and Lucy Mair have covered similar ground with greater knowledge and shrewder judgments. One cannot help wondering why Burke fails to employ the aspects of Simmel's theory dealing with conflict, without which the concept of sociation has little significance. In effect, Burke realizes this. After introducing the idea of sociation, little use is made of it in the substance of the book.

There are a number of irritating small errors such as, reference to Lumumba's tribe (the Otetela or Batetela not Valetla, p. 30). The proof-reading is careless. (For example, the word American is used where African is clearly meant, p. 81). The late Soviet Africanist, Ivan Potekhin is spelled Potemkin. (p. 73)

There are surprising omissions. A discussion of the role of women leaves out any reference to Denise Paulme's Women of Tropical Africa. In the discussion of the city, one of the most interesting and significant, Dakar, is scarcely mentioned. The example of urban redevelopment in Lagos, so carefully analyzed by Peter Marris in Family and Social Change in an African City is not even mentioned. Such books would have been helpful, the sketchiness of an over-view notwithstanding. They contain mature judgments on topics with which the book deals.

The last half of the book suffers considerably when, departing from the earlier effort at analysis, we are treated to a survey of events. The survey should have been more carefully done. For example, it is misleading to say that Mali was not displeased at the breakup of the Mali Federation. Not only were Malien's displeased but they were furious at what appeared to be Senegalese acquiescence to French imperialism.

Sometimes the sequence is confusing. A discussion of the Casablanca group and the association of Guinea, Ghana and Mali (p. 122), fails to make clear the fact that the association had been dissolved at the time of the Addis Ababa Conference. The latter point is made only on p. 138 and in a different context.

In general, however, and despite these criticisms, the book is a useful addition to the growing literature on Africa. Its style is felicitous despite an unfortunate tendency towards misplaced cliches; with Africans "flexing their newly acquired racial and political muscles" (p. 111), and changes in relationships described "heady wine" (p. 112), to choose some examples at random. By far the best material is on East Africa, which Mr. Burke knows best, and that, of course, is to be expected.—David E. Apter, University of California (Berkeley).

Political Parties and National Integration in Tropical Africa. By Coleman, James S., and Carl G. Rosberg, Jr. (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1964, xiii, 730 pp. $10.00.)

Rarely has a book in the field of African politics been awaited with such anticipation and for so long as Political Parties and National Integration, edited by James S. Coleman and Carl G. Rosberg, Jr. In the light of the time it took to edit and bring out this massive collective work, it is perhaps not ungracious to have expected that the concepts defined in the introduction and conclusion would have been used more obviously in the individual sections, and that there would have been comparisons within and thus more cumulative impact by the sections themselves. Nonetheless, the volume is an impressive one, and includes a wide range of useful factual material written clearly and very succinctly.

The framework within which the sections of the book are presented is suggestive in itself. Two-thirds of the work are devoted to what is called "The One-Party Tendency"—surely a considerable understatement—which is divided in turn into "The Pragmatic-Pluralistic Pattern" (Senegal, Ivory Coast—an outstanding piece—Sierra Leone and Cameroun); "The Revolutionary-Centralizing Trend" (Guinea, Mali and Ghana); and "The Control of Nonparty Groups" (Voluntary Associations, Trade Unions, Traditional Rulers, and Students).

The other third carries virtually the same title as the book as a whole, "Parties and National Integration." It has a number of subsections whose titles are more suggestive; under "The Transformation of Historic Oligarchies" are Liberia and Zanzibar, of which the latter's transformation, considered briefly in a postscript, has gone a great deal farther then Mr. Lofchie could have guessed at the time of writing and "The Expansion in Political Scale" deals with Somali-where more could have been done with the fact that there is a genuine cultural nationalism, closer to that of the European or Arab-Middle Eastern pattern than is found elsewhere in sub-Saharan Africa with Congo (Leopoldville)where events have far outstripped and unhappily overlaid the description provided—and with Nigeria. Several, though not all of these countries have been treated along somewhat the same lines in other recent collections, or as with the Ivory Coast, Cameroun, and Nigeria, in far greater detail by the authors who handle them in this volume. The justification for their appearance here is in part the fact that this volume was planned so much earlier, but possibly more so because the experience of particular countries illustrates specific types of regimes and development.

Since Professor Coleman and Professor Rosberg are both well known for their pioneering efforts at system making with the somewhat intractable material of African politics, the introduction and conclusion attract particular attention. Both are stimulating though it may be questioned whether the sophisticated terms that are used do not sometimes confuse more than they illuminate. This is the more so since the descriptions, as for example of the four patterns of oligarchic situations, are so spare and refined that they do not transmit the full meaning which lies behind them. Indeed, there is enough in these last thirty-five pages of conclusion to expand into a useful and stimulating "Government and Politics in Africa" that might fill one of the more noticeable gaps in the literature of this area.

The American scholarly study of Africa coincided to considerable degree with the rise of the behavioral sciences in this country. It is not surprising, therefore, that some of the newer tools of scientific and theoretical analysis have been tried out in conjunction with African studies. What is still needed-and what, perhaps too optimistically, had been hoped for from this work-is a pervading quality of theoretical analysis that goes beyond the efforts made to date. Instead Political Parties and National Integration in Tropical Africa joins the other solid, competent studies with which we have been favored in the past few years, to some degree distinguished by the analysis of its editors, and occasional original summations by its authors, but destined like the others to become outdated by passing events. Is it too much to hope that the insights of classical theory and the solid accomplishments of political history may be joined one of these days to the imaginative conceptualization of behavioralism to produce a new framework of analysis and understanding that encompasses those elements of African life that are relatively untouched by contemporary politics as well as those fragile aspects that can alter so sharply and noticeably with changing events?—Gwendolen M. Carter, Northwestern University.

The New Liberia: A Historical and Political Survey. By LAWRENCE A. MARINELLI. (New York: Praeger, 1964. Pp. 228. $5.95.)

This laudatory and largely uncritical account of the regime of President William V. S. Tubman of Liberia is published under the auspices of the Africa Service Institute of New York. Mr Marinelli dismisses the central problem of Liberian society, the relationship between the 90 per cent of the population engaged in agriculture and the fractional ruling elite of Monrovia, in terms of personal impressions gained during his visit to the country. "Has the Unification Policy really been effective? Has it really improved the lot of the tribal people? Has it really brought a change in the attitudes of the Americo-Liberians toward their tribal country men? Based upon several months of research and first hand observation, this writer must reply in the affirmative." Regrettably, Marinelli does not present sufficient evidence on which judgment could be made as to whether the ambitious health, education and economic projects of the Tubman regime have substantially improved the living conditions of the tribal majority. Some years ago infant mortality figures in "bush" villages were reported as touching on 80 per cent. Current vital statistics are missing from this work though account is given of the number of hospitals constructed and the measure of success reached in the control of yaws, leprosy and small pox through campaigns undertaken by the World Health Organization. Also missing are Labor and Income statistics that might assist in elucidating specific ways in which the majority of the people benefit from the exploitation of Liberian resources. However non statistical appendices, containing Tubman's speeches and correspondence together with the text of the Liberian Constitution, amount to 82 pages as against 146 pages of text. Marinelli may prove correct in his major contention that the Tubman Open Door Policy-basically a foreign concession policy-"is an important model for the continent wide progress of emerging Africa." Certainly the private sector of United States power and influence has committed itself fully to this viewpoint in Liberia. The French observers, Pierre and Renée Gosset in their book, L'Afrique, les Africains, describe Liberia as "esclave et enclave du dollar." Witticisms and visitors' impressions aside, a requirement exists for an objective review of the consequences of the flow of external capital into the Liberian economy. If a resulting breakthrough in social development for the bulk of the population is indicated, then the system will stand justified despite accusations of neo-colonialism. On the other hand if an oligarchy is being entrenched and enriched contrary to the interests of the common people, United States policies, both private and governmental, may founder in another Zanzibar-type revolt. Raymond Leslie Buell's pioneer work in Liberia, a century of survival, deserves updating in line with its scholarly standards from the abundance of statistical and sociological material now available. Marinelli writes as an advocate for President Tubman, unquestionably a key figure of singular attainments in the existing Liberian situation. A useful chapter is devoted to Tubman's skilful diplomacy in the interplay of African states. In a brief Introduction, Leopold Senghor expresses his esteem. Liberia, under Tubman, enjoys a respected place amid the turmoil of African affairs, providing American interests and influence with a favorable base on the Continent. It would be regrettable if our investment in capital and prestige were squandered through lack of objective analysis of underlying social and political conditions.—Thomas R. ADAM, New York University.

The Crisis of British Government in the 1960s. BY BERNARD CRICK. (London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1964. Pp. 274. 36/-.)

This is an excellent book which, within its self-chosen limitations, can scarcely be praised too highly. Dr. Crick has a natural and rare aptitude for combining theory with its application to practical affairs of state. Supplemented by seven factual appendices, on, e.g., 'The Work of the House of Lords,' the book concludes with a chapter, 'What is to be Done?', itself carrying ten recommendations. That "British government and politics is British government and politics" (recommendation 10) may seem somewhat Gertrude Steinish but, after the recent Conservative Party Blackpool Conference, many a British politician (including Mr. Reginald Maudling) has cause to reflect on the wisdom of the remark here that "much of politics is the art"—and the luck also—"of being present at the right time." That "Parliament serves to inform the electorate, not to overthrow Governments" (No. 1) is provocative and controversial. That "technical and expert advice is more and more necessary to modern government but is more and more open to opinion and interpretation" is close to the core of Dr. Crick's theme.

The privileges of Parliament are archaic, arbitrary and excessive. The British Constitution is 700 years old and not good. This is not only because, under the doctrine of the sovereignty of Parliament, "there are no overriding legal restraints whatever upon a British Government's actions" set by the people-admittedly interference with the judiciary is regarded with disfavour, even when it keeps for sizable lengths of time probable thugs in prison without trial. It is indeed, as Blackstone says, "an extraordinary tribunal." The issue is not even whether the power of the Prime Minister has increased, is increasing and should be reconsidered. At present, as in the last days of Sir Alec Douglas-Home, he can remain in office, not because he has a popular mandate, but because he knows that he hasn't, and bides his time. (In one respect indeed the power of Members against Ministers has recently increased: they debate decisions in Foreign Affairs. As late as Asquith this was considered a 'mystery of State,' not for their eyes, but to be agreed secretly by a few of 'the King's Ministers.' The Union of Democratic Control did something to end that.) The system is bad because it is a mix-up between the principle of local representatives coming to Westminster to agree to taxes, in return for redress of local grievances, and the need in a highly technical age for an Executive competent to rule its Civil Service, but which yet appreciates what the expert issues are. The requirements can be sharply different. The answer is the usual British one: "The muddle works." Does it? That is one of Dr. Crick's questions. Another real issue is the relations of Premier and Party (a far more formidable, nationally organized body than in the States).

Dr. Crick argues that, as a fact, "governing has now become a prolonged election campaign." Much of this indeed will be carried on outside Parliament, through media where the little unelected Popes of Broadcasting can quiz senior Ministers in a fashion no back-bencher would dare to attempt. "The public must know all." An appendix to this book discusses TV in Parliament and "powdered Parliamentary faces."

Is, then, the government of a great nation to be conducted like a perpetual political rag-market? "Corruption," writes Dr. Crick, "exists wherever the function of a government is held to be reduced to one overwhelming consideration: political survival." Many people today would so far agree with Dr. Crick about this inflated importance of party victory in the brawl of political football as to hold: (a) that we are democrats, and alone pure democrats, in judging that polls, plebiscite and direct TV appeal are indeed "the chief procedural invention of the democratic era," and that the graph of these political consumer polls must be watched, but not servilely followed; (b) that of respect for these polls an elected Parliament is the watchdog, moving in decent fear of constituents; (c) that, as in Switzerland, Cabinets should be enduring coalitions of elected professionals, conducting the nation's business on the basis of a sought consensus, proportional to the Parliamentary representation; (d) that rival Party shops, stocked with salesmen and even 'fans' (or fanatics) may be well enough, but that this should not obscure the prior importance of the sober and efficient transaction of the nation's business. This book is a sprightly plea, scholarly but light-hearted, for the Reform of the Mother of Parliaments. The question is whether this very elderly lady has the least desire to be reformed.— GEORGE E. G. CATLIN, London.

Australian Party Politics. By James Jupp. (Melbourne: Melbourne University Press, 1964. Pp. ix, 235. $7.50.)

The ten chapters of this study fall logically into three parts: brief general surveys of party history and party background; discussions of each party; the two final chapters analyzing "The Party Machine" and "Australian Politics."

Australian politics has been characterized by dissension and confusion. Only the Australian Labor Party has a continuous history of more than fifty years. The author gives coherence to what might otherwise appear chaotic by stressing three points: the trend from loose, personal alliances battling over narrow issues in the colonial period to "national politics organized by mass parties on domestic and international issues"; the importance of the tradition of "colonial radicalism" which, although waning, is inherited to some extent by all present-day parties; and lastly, the influence of events outside Australia upon the crises which have precipitated periodic realignments. The discussion of the environmental factors affecting Australian politics is illuminating. What appears to be a homogeneous society is torn by sectional, sectarian and separatist tendencies. These, coupled with the federal structure and tensions between "town and country capital" generate conflicts within the parties which are often more significant than those between them.

It is impossible here to do justice to the discussion of the machinery, inner conflicts and policies of each of the parties which makes up the central half of the volume. The material is rich, the treatment is well-balanced and perceptive, the theses developed in the earlier chapters are fully illustrated, and the author builds up a strong case for the conclusions which follow.

The final chapters are an acute analysis of the party machines and their effect on democratic processes. The similarities in party machinery and the influence of the A.L.P. upon its rivals are stressed. Labor is still the most extreme advocate of parliamentary subservience to the party machine, but the gap between it and the other parties has narrowed in the last fifty years. The Country Party has adopted many of its methods as well as much of its machinery. And even the Liberal Party has adopted some of the relationship between parliamentarians and party which its predecessors attacked so violently. The author concludes that all parties have become machines for providing access to power rather than "movements striving after ideals." For the last forty years the power base of each party has been stabilized in certain geographical areas and occupational groups. Mr. Jupp is at his best in analyzing the groups supporting each party, and in pointing out features of the electoral system and social structure which have encouraged this stability. Preoccupied with power, the parties are barren of new ideas and it is difficult to discuss them in terms of "progress" and "reaction," "left" and "right." Within them bitter conflicts take place among "power" and "interest" groups with little ideological significance. Because of this the parties are not attracting new members and gradually their mass-base is being eroded.

In his critique of Australian parties the author concedes that they have gone a long way toward channeling regional and social differences into two coherent parliamentary followings. But insofar as they are "transmission belts" it is between organized interests and the government rather than between the party's mass support and the government. Lacking interest in policymaking, the parties have failed to provide the machinery and the climate which encourage discussion of ideas and generally favor "practical" men rather than "intellectuals." Only in the federal secretariat of the Liberal Party is there any serious attempt at coherent formulation of policy. As the parties fail to attract mass support and translate it into influence on the government, initiative in policy-making comes from organized interests and the contest between parties becomes a struggle of interests to allocate the nation's resources. What troubles the writer about this is not its "pragmatism" but that it is "irrational. aimless and conservative," and that it leaves the parties so ill-prepared to cope with pressing issues of foreign policy being forced upon them from outside Australia. Parties do not remain static and Mr. Jupp suggests several interesting marginal realignments as possible. But whatever direction these take, two changes seem certain: the development of "centralist" tendencies, and the greater dependence on professional staffs by central party executives. The author even suggests that reliance on technicians may reach the point where the parties will become "public relations agencies for the parliamentarians," thus completely reversing the tradition that the politician is the servant of the party.

Mr. Jupp has given us an excellent interpretative study based upon recent research which helps fill in many gaps in our knowledge of Australian parties. One may not agree with him throughout, but one cannot quarrel with the consistency of his interpretation or the scholarship with which he supports his points. It is a study which demonstrates the rapid progress made in the field of political science in Australia since World War II, and which suggests trends well worth exploring in studies of parties in other democracies. A critical bibliography would have been a welcome addition, especially to overseas scholars.—Louise Overacker, Professor Emeritus, Wellesley College.

The Politics of British Defense Policy, 1945-1962.

BY WILLIAM P. SNYDER. (Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1964. Pp. xx, 284. $6.25.)

In the dust-jacket's claim of "a definitive study of a complex and neglected subject," there is only the usual publisher's exaggeration. It would be surprising to have a definitive work on the politics of any nation's recent defense policy. The subject is new and by no means entirely open to scholarly scrutiny. Even more often than in other policy-making areas, defense decisions of a democratic government—not to mention those of a nondemocratic government—are made for reasons concealed from public view. It is even difficult to know whether the reasons derive from domestic pressures, economic or political, or from strategic responses to external circumstances.

It says much, therefore, for Snyder that he has written a good and useful book on a subject about which we would like to know much more. Trained both as a West Point officer and as a political scientist, Snyder writes knowledgeably on defense policy itself as well as on British politics. While well-balanced in every respect, the work conveys a tone of general approval of the British policymaking process. Certainly Snyder criticizes that process less than many recently fashionable commentators on British institutions, but this is not because of any ignorance of the pressures now widely believed to influence British governmental decisions no less than American. Snyder simply recognizes conflicting pressures as part, indeed as a useful part, of the decision-making process. Neither the pressure nor any other part of the process is held responsible for deficiencies in British defense. If there are such deficiencies (and Snyder appears to think that there is a gap between British commitments and the conventional forces to fulfill those commitments), he attributes the deficiencies to a conflict between military policy and other national goals. In other words, Britain has not been spending enough on defense, or enough on conventional as opposed to nuclear deterrent defense. Yet Snyder does not argue that Britain should spend more. Instead he presents data indicating the relatively large British program. Even in 1960 defense expenditures were seven per cent of the gross national product, and they were as high as twelve per cent during the Korean war.

The British defense policy of 1945-1962 is fairly labelled an "alliance-deterrence strategy," replacing the nation's older "maritime-intervention strategy." The new policy is clearly described and evaluated, but this aspect of the book is less original than the effort to show how the policy has been made. Snyder discusses the influence of parliament, the articulate public, pressure groups (notably industrial groups), policy elites, and service departments. He also takes into account the limits fixed by Britain's balance-of-payments problem and related economic difficulties. His main observations under each of these headings are within the now standard view of the British governmental process, and what Snyder has to say is an important contribution to our knowledge of that process. Thus he shows that parliament, while possessed of limited information and at any rate excluded from direct policy-making participation, remains an influence if only because of ministerial responsiveness to backbench pressure. Similarly, while emphasizing the extent to which decisions are actually made by the executive authority, Snyder makes it clear that there is a great deal of bargaining within this executive authority before the decision is made. He is at his most interesting when he tells us even a little about this bargaining and especially about the role of the service departments, often backed by their respective industrial suppliers, in making the bargains. There is the important suggestion that the navy and air force, with stronger links to private manufacturers, fare better than the army, which receives much of its equipment from royal ordnance factories.—Leon D. Epstein, University of Wisconsin.

The Rise of Political Anti-Semitism in Germany and Austria. By Peter G. J. Pulzer. (New York: John Wiley & Sons, 1964. Pp. 364. n.p.)

How hard it must be to lay aside one's feelings on a subject as emotion-laden as anti-Semitism and write a book with restraint and clinical objectivity. But Peter Pulzer, lecturer in politics at Oxford University, has achieved this objective. Not that he withholds his views entirely and provides the reader only with sets of facts; on the contrary, his sophisticated analyses and interpretations lend substance to the distressing and depressing subject.

The author traces the roots and the development of anti-Semitism in Germany and Austria, with primary emphasis on the period from 1867 to 1914. His chief contribution lies in unearthing and tapping private archive papers and documents hitherto not used, and then weaving these into a fabric of the history of the movement. He demonstrates the remarkable parallels between German and Austrian anti-Semitism, and devotes much space to the latter since it has been less fully discussed in other writings.

The pre-World War I epoch was selected because despite few significant successes on the part of the anti-Semites, their ideology "penetrated the general stock of political thinking and undermined the acceptance of the liberal values of the nineteenth century." Pulzer's thesis is that anti-Semitism represented a reaction to Western rationalism and liberalism, to capitalism and urban civilization: "It is a revolt, not of the sentimental idealist or the hardheaded reformer, but of the dionysiac element in man, a hunger for precivilized standards of conduct."

In this "cult of the grass roots" the movement's political foundations were laid in the 1870's, followed by an era of uncertainty in the 1880's, and some successes in the 1890's. The author deals at length with such men as Adolf Stöcker and Otto Böckel in Germany and Karl Lueger in Austria who attempted to gain mass followings by writing tracts, and organizing meetings and political parties. What is remarkable is the failure of many respectable elements of society to resist their exhortations and their irrational arguments. It was the support of members of the clergy and the middle and lower middle classes which propelled Lueger into the mayoralty of Vienna in 1897 and which kept him in power until his death in 1910. While Lueger's victory can be attributed partially to the resentment of many people against the economic position of the Jews, his maintenance in power can also be attributed to his skill in politics and his dabbling in municipal socialism. Other leaders had less political success than Lueger, and around the turn of the century the movement became dormant as the old generation of leaders disappeared.

If the anti-Semitic movements had been only the product of a few obscure fanatics during the nineteenth century, they might be relegated to the pages of history, but unfortunately the ideology on which they were based permeated other sectors of society: the nationalist and pan-German movements, the university community (including dueling fraternities, student organizations and academicians, e.g. Heinrich von Treitschke), and in the early period even European socialist parties. Later when the German Social Democrats became staunch foes of anti-Semitism, their Marxist ideology blinded them in their forecasts: "The solution of the Jewish question, like that of all other problems, would be provided by the coming of Socialism, which would not only remove the economic basis of anti-Semitism but do away with the separate identity of the Jews." August Bebel even commented that anti-Semitism would never decisively influence German politics.

Pulzer argues in the epilogue, dealing with the period 1914-1938, that such forecasts proved wrong and that anti-Semitism made relatively more headway in Germany and Austria than in the Anglo-Saxon countries, because in the latter liberal ideas and institutions had become an integral part of the open and relatively mobile society. In the former, members of the professional and small and middle business community did not accept liberalism, and vented their frustrations and difficulties on members of the financial-capitalist elite, many of whom were Jews. Religious and "racial" biases compounded the hate.

The schisms in Germany and Austria and the "ravings of obscure sects," however, would not have led to the final catastrophe if it had not been for the political and economic crisis, accentuated by "sins of commission and omission," and finally by the Nazis who, unlike earlier anti-Semites, actually engated in mass violence and sadism.

If any criticism is to be made of the book it lies in the scope of its narrative. The reader could have judged the movement in a wider context if some space had been devoted to the relative power of anti-Semitic movements in other countries during the same era, and more space to the power of forces opposed to anti-Semitism in the two countries under review.

To interested political scientists and historians this book is recommended as an important social documentary. To the racists wherever they may be this book should be required reading to make them aware of the consequences of their preachments of hate.—Gerard Braunthal, University of Massachusetts.

Zwischen Demokratie und Diktatur: Verfassungspolitik und Reichsreform in der Weimarer Republic. Vol. 1 Die Periode der Konsolidierung und der Revision des Bismarckschen Reichsaufbaus 1919-1930. By Gerhard Schulz. (Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 1963. Pp. 678, n.p.)

The profusion of subtitles of this book indicates that Schulz had difficulties in determining exactly its subject matter. Did the author want to write the political or the administrative history of the Weimar Republic? Or was he mainly concerned with one particular aspect of both: the practice of German federalism under the Weimar Republic? At any rate, using very profitably the mass of hitherto unknown official documents and autobiographical material, Schulz begins by presenting various plans and projects for the future constitutional and administrative organization of the Weimar Republic, as seen from the vantage point of the closing days of 1918 and the first half of 1919. In this period the bureaucracy, which had remained intact from before the war, and its new social democratic rulers found an easy meeting ground in their common desire to uphold and defend continuity and order against all suspicious attempts to experiment with new forms of organization. It was not only Kurt Eisner who-to quote a famous dictum of Meinecke-slipped into the temporarily empty mansion of the Bayarian state. In his later chapters the author demonstrates convincingly how Eisner's more skillful Prussian colleague, Otto Braun, without the burden of any intellectual baggage, and more favored by circumstances of time and place, performed successfully a similar feat.

Once the framework of the Reich-Laender organization had been re-established, even without Bismarck's effective linkage of the Reich and Prussian political and administrative machinery at the command level, the question of its adequacy for the political life of the new state arose. To answer this question the author is compelled to describe in some detail much of the history of the political conflicts of the early twenties. His survey includes the occupation of Saxony and Thuringia by the Reichswehr, the effective ejection of their deviant governments, and the tortuous methods by which the military, political, and bureaucratic leaderships of the Reich and of Bayaria were able to reach an accommodation. His description frequently corrects previous more partisan and partial accounts.

To this part belongs the story of the divisive and unitary tendencies present in both the Rhein and the Ruhr, and described for the first time, as having occurred in East Prussia as well. The author's presentation continues to emphasize both thrust and counterthrust tendencies affecting the rights of various bureaucratic apparatuses, and making their influence felt through constitutional formulae, ministers' and civil servants' memos, conferences and committees.

In evaluating Schulz's first volume, it is important to differentiate between the early period and the period of consolidation from 1924 to 1928. During the earlier years the history of federalism is so closely interwoven with substantive problems of the period that constitutional theorems and bureaucratic strategems appear simply as byproducts of major political and social struggles. But with the beginnings of consolidation in 1924, those in power in the territorial governmental units became actors in their own right. Therefore, if one considers the staying power of the administrative structure, the later period is the more revealing. For despite the impetus received from the financial plight of the Laender, reform of the Federal structure was frustrated by the resistance of the Prussian S.P.D. leadership. The author shows convincingly how at that late stage Prussian political leaders lost interest in a Prussian-Reich merger which could not guarantee them a permanent share of political power.

Whatever one might think of the author's organization of his material, his book will long remain indispensable for the analysis of two problems: 1) the relative weakness of federal structures in dealing with major problems of a socially heterogeneous society; 2) the conditions and chances of successful collaboration between higher bureaucracy and the conservative leadership of various mass parties and protest movements.—

Отто Кірсннеімев, Columbia University.

Il clero di riserva. By Gianfranco Poggi. (Milan: Feltrinelli, 1963.)

Il clero di riserva (The Auxiliary Clergy), subtitled Studio sociologico sull' Azione Cattolica Italiana durante la presidenza Gedda (A Sociological Study of Italian Catholic Action During the Gedda Presidency), is an analysis of how the structure and functioning of Italian Catholic Action in the years preceding 1958 prevented it from achieving the goals set by the Church. It is a very good analysis of the particular Italian situation and a contribution to our understanding of the relationship between structure and goals in a church-related association.

The author, formerly at the University of Florence and now teaching at a university in the U.K., is well qualified by background and training to undertake this study; it originated as a doctoral dissertation in sociology at the University of California, Berkeley. Dr. Poggi worked with Professor Joseph La Palombara in his study of Italian interest groups and had access to his materials and interviews dealing with Catholic Action. Il clero di riserva, however, does not focus on Catholic Action in politics. Nor is the author primarily interested in Catholic Action as an organization.

His concern is rather with the interaction among the organization, the Church, and the larger society. It is his principal thesis that the use of Catholic Action by the Church as a defense mechanism, an auxiliary clergy shielded from the main stream of Italian life by an emphasis on rigid individual morality and complete subordination to the hierarchy, prevents it from performing its historical mission of serving as the church's vital link with a rapidly changing and increasingly secular society. Instead of being an extension of the church in the secular world it is a means of selecting out the more pious elements and detaching them from the main stream of developments. As a result, the teachings of Catholic Action and the church are largely irrelevant to contemporary Italian problems.

In presenting his argument the author shows how the internal structure of Catholic Action serves to detach the member from many important contacts and experiences of his age group. The principal organizations of Catholic Action divide members by age and sex on the basis of the parish or diocese. Diocesan organization groups all social classes together; the author believes that separate organizations for young workers, as in France and Belgium, would be more effective. Apart from the four large organizations for men. women, young men, and young women, there are specialized organizations for university students, university graduates, and school teachers (associations for workers, farmers and other specific categories are outside Catholic Action proper).

At all levels in these organizations the real power rests with priests and, ultimately, the Vatican. Although laymen occupy important positions, they are closely controlled by the clergy. The absence of lay initiative leads to sterility in ideas and a lack of dynamism. The more creative and able, even among practicing Catholics, tend to leave Catholic Action or never to join. As a result it is a recruiting ground for religious orders and the Christian Democratic party; but it does not achieve its goal of penetrating society as the example of Catholic adaptation to the modern world, for it "does not take seriously the things of this world." Its too close ties with the church, its limited adaptability, and the authoritarian proclivities of Gedda were primarily responsible for this lack of success.

This study does not attempt to evaluate the changes which have taken place since 1958. Under Pope John XXIII Italian Catholic Action took on a new image and Gedda was replaced as president. As Dr. Poggi points out, the Gedda line had met important opposition even within Catholic Action and the church hierarchy. The situation is now considerably altered from that analyzed in Il clero di riserva.

The basic questions asked by Dr. Poggi remain. How can one organization sponsor another without dominating it? How can a highly hierarchical church adapt to an age of political democracy and lay participation? How can a traditional organization such as the church engage in adaptive and dynamic action in an increasingly secular world? Certainly the church has done a better job of adapting in numerous countries than in Italy. The closeness of the Vatican, its interest in Italian affairs, the fear of communism in Italy, and the close ties between the church and dominant Italian elites have caused Italian Catholicism to lag far behind in coming to grips with the modern world. Perhaps the era described by Dr. Poggi was the last of its kind and the fresh views of Pope John XXIII will come to dominate in Italy. Certainly the Gedda leadership of Catholic Action, however, fitted neatly into the spirit of Italian Catholicism. A new approach will have to overcome not only the opposition of much of the Italian hierarchy but also the restraining influence of the ingrained habits and attitudes of Italian society itself.—Samuel H. Barnes, University of Michigan.

Sofavaelgerne—Valgdeltagelsen ved danske foketingsvalg. By Jens Jeppesen and Poul Meyer. (Aarhus: Aarhus University Institute of Political Science, 1964. Pp. 105.)

This distinguished study of electoral turnout in Denmark uses both official voting statistics since 1909 and survey data from the parliamentary elections of 1957 and 1960. Since Danish voting statistics, like those throughout Northern Europe, are comprehensive as well as of long standing, the raw material is almost overwhelming. Jeppesen and Meyer have, however, with considerable conceptual sophistication, made intellectually interesting a study which of necessity consists mostly of statistical tables.

These tables demonstrate that a remarkably high proportion of the Danish electorate votes regularly. Since the 1939 election the turnout for parliamentary elections (Jeppesen and Meyer make valuable comparisons with turnout in Danish local elections, as well as in parliamentary elections in West Germany and Sweden, and in local and parliamentary elections in Norway) has remained above—generally well above—80%. In 1957, for instance, the turnout was 83.7% and in 1960, 85.8%. Significantly, the highest turnout (89.5%) was in 1943, when Denmark was occupied by German troops, and voting became even more meaningful as an act of national commitment. The number of Danes who never vote in parliamentary elections is very small; the number who vote in some but not all parliamentary elections is substantial. Participation in elections increases with age until a relatively late age-for men. until sixty or seventy years of age, and for women somewhat earlier. Those who would be more likely to vote only irregularly, or not at all, include women, the youngest and oldest voting ages, and rural residents. The greatest differences between voters and non-voters, however, are in marital status. Married men vote more often than married women, who vote more often than single men, who vote more often than single women. Least likely to vote of all Danes are single women, either very young or very old, living in rural areas isolated from Copenhagen, the center of political life. Supporting recent Norwegian and Swedish findings, Jeppesen and Meyer conclude that separated and divorced persons have the lowest electoral turnout. Unmarried men vote much less often than widowed men, but unmarried women vote a little more often than widows. In Denmark, as elsewhere, the self-employed vote more often than wage-earners, higher employees more often than lower employees, and skilled workers more often than unskilled workers. High-status members of Danish communities, especially in rural areas, apparently obey a social norm according to which they are expected to vote regularly.

Regional differences in electoral turnout in Denmark are relatively small. Among the few exceptions to this geographical uniformity were the 1935 and 1939 elections in Southern Jutland, where the threat presented by National Socialist Germany was especially evident. To explain that degree of geographical variation in turnout which does exist, Jeppesen and Meyer argue that electoral turnout is inversely correlated with the distance of the electoral district from Copenhagen. This hypothesis proves valid for rural areas, but not for larger cities. The authors suggest that in these cities a special urban electoral milieu is created, which is completely independent of the adjoining rural milieu. With continuing urbanization of Denmark, there will be presumably even further reduction in geographical differences in electoral turnout. Social location is clearly more important than spatial location, and social distance is more important than spatial distance. Neither of these distances, of course, is very great in Denmark. The dominant impression one receives from this study is the national uniformity of electoral turnout. In this important respect, as in so many others, the Danes have come as close to achieving a true political community as is perhaps possible in this imperfect world.—Marvin Rintala, Boston College.

History of the Communist Party of Yugoslavia. By IVAN AVAKUMOVIC. (Aberdeen: The Aberdeen University Press, 1964. Pp. xii, 207, Vol. One, 60s.)

The first volume of this projected series on the history of the Communist Party of Yugoslavia launches a truly monumental project, even if the first installment is only slender in size and restricted in scope. The author, a native of Yugoslavia, who left his country and was subsequently educated in Scotland and at Canadian universities, is currently a professor of political science at the University of British Columbia. He is uniquely qualified to write the definitive history of Tito's Communist movement since he is completely conversant with, and seems to have excellent access to, the original documentary materials dealing with the Party and its rapidly changing leadership.

Volume One focuses on the 1914-1941 period. beginning with the years of World War I and stretching to the spring of 1941 when the German invasion of Yugoslavia heralded not only the advent of an inevitable World War II, but also the emergence of a Communist nucleus in the forefront of the country's resistance struggle. Despite the voluminous documentation of the earlier period, this reviewer found the story more interesting (and more relevant to the current Eastern European scene) as the late nineteen thirties are being discussed in terms of the rise of Tito and the factional inner-strife of the Comintern hierarchy. This impression also suggests that subsequent volumes will be increasingly important contributions to scholarly work on Balkan politics, and possibly of more appeal to the general public and college students alike. The first volume is clearly a specialist's book written for fellow-specialists.

The study is lucidly organized into four central parts; although each section is a chronological slice of Yugoslav Communist history, it also has a definite main theme running through that particular period. Thus we witness the "years of legality" (1919-1920, in which the Socialist movement crystallized between the Social Democrats and a small Communist group); the "years of semi-legality" (1921-1928, marked by bitter infighting on the Communist "home-front" and bewilderingly contradictory instructions from Stalin through various Balkan Comintern specialists); the "years of illegality" (1929-1936, when King Alexander's royal dictatorship and efficient secret police succeeded in breaking apart the burgeoning Communist Party while imprisoning its leaders), and finally the years of "Popular Front Tactics" (1937-1939, when Tito gradually assumed the center of the small CP stage to the exclusion of everyone else). Finally, an all-too brief chapter deals with the onrush of the "Second Imperialist War" which engulfs both protagonists and bystanders, both Royalists and Stalinists alike.

In specific terms, the book's highlights include a discussion of an interesting Yugoslav Communist call for a general strike as early as December 1920, to be carried out by the Communist trade unions (p. 49 et seq.); an ideologically significant argument with the Comintern as to whether the Yugoslav Communists were ready and able (in the 1920's) to profit from the Bolshevik experience and organize a "successful revolution in Yugoslavia" (p. 57), and the first membership purge carried out by Tito in the 1937-1938 period when he proceeded to shake up the Croatian and Serbian CP members with the full blessing and support of Moscow's Comintern leadership (p. 137). Indeed, the Comintern authorization was so broad, giving Tito "the task of pursuing the purge of all alien, vacillating elements from the Party." that one could date the origins of this man's monolithic rule over the CPY from this 1938 order.

The volume ends with a social and economic analysis of the crucial 1939-1941 transition years which saw the CPY assume a defeatist, anti-Western attitude in foreign policy, while accelerating at home the drive to recruit members in Belgrade University, in the secondary schools of the major cities and in the various literary societies. This period is characterized even more interestingly, and certainly with more eloquence, in Milovan Djilas' Land Without Justice which reported on his own "capture" by Communism as a young high school and college student. Everyone concerned with Communism and with Central-Eastern European politics will look forward to subsequent volumes by Dr. Avakumovic.-ANDREW GYORGY, Boston University.

World Communism: The Disintegration of a Secular Faith. By RICHARD LOWENTHAL. (New York: Oxford University Press, 1964. Pp. xxii, 296. $6.00.)

Richard Lowenthal has put together in this volume a number of essays which have previously appeared in Problems of Communism, Encounter, The China Quarterly, and various German magazines and journals. When most of these articles were first published, there was less agreement among specialists on World Communism that this movement was in such a highly fissionable state. Commencing his discussion with the unsuccessful Soviet attempt to return Tito to the Communist fold and ending with an epilogue on the events in the summer of 1963 on the Sino-Soviet split, Lowenthal takes the reader through a fascinating chain of events plaguing the Communist bloc. The author analyzes the significant XX Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union of February 1956, which might be regarded as the beginning of the split in the bloc under Khrushchev. By admitting separate roads to "Socialism," the Soviet leader took the lid off to Pandora's box. Since then, the Soviet bloc has not been the monolith which it once was, Khrushchev had hoped that this new freer discussion would usher in an ideological rebirth of Soviet and international communism. It did the opposite. Chaos, insubordination, and ideological warfare have followed. The book is especially good on the 1959, 1960, and 1961 periods of the breakup of world communism.

Khrushchev's advocacy of peaceful coexistence was one of the divisive forces separating Moscow and Peking. Enunciated at the XX Party Congress in February 1956, this disputed doctrine has been ever present in the ideological tug of war between the Soviet Union and Communist China. Khrushchev's trip to the United States in September 1959 and his efforts in behalf of a summit conference without China contributed to the furthering of the rift which became increasingly more acute with each new month. Khrushchev's policies of the reduction of Soviet armed forces in early 1960 and his expressed willingness for discussion of controls for a nuclear test ban contributed to the feeling on the part of the Chinese that Khrushchev was letting them down. The U-2 incident made the attempt at a summit conference abortive but the Russians did not lessen their ideological pronouncements of peaceful coexistence. At the December 1960 meeting of the eighty-one Communist parties, Khrushchev said, "Peaceful coexistence of states with different social systems does not mean reconciliation between the socialist and bourgeois ideologies. On the contrary, it implies an intensification of the struggle of the working class, and of all Communist parties for the triumph of socialist ideas . . . Peace is the true ally of socialism, for time is working for socialism and against capitalism." The Khrushchev formula of avoiding international wars but justifying wars of national liberation was a Soviet-proffered ideological compromise with the Chinese—a compromise which Mao could not accept.

On the leadership question of the international Communist movement, the 1960 declaration indicated the failure to have a single Communist center. The 1957 Moscow declaration implied that there was such a center, the USSR. By December of 1960, there was admitted the existence of two actual centers of Communist authority, Moscow and Peking, because Khrushchev had asked "for the omission of the flattering formula placing the Soviet Union 'at the head of the Socialist camp' and the CPSU 'at the head of the Communist world movement'." But by the XXII Congress of the CPSU in 1961, Khrushchev was openly defied by the Chinese Communists. This forced him in Lowenthal's opinion to wipe out the last symbolic remnants of Stalinism, including the removal of his body from the sacred position of repose in the mausoleum in Red Square. The Chinese had persisted in backing the defeated Stalinist remnants in the USSR and in the Soviet bloc. The Chinese refused to accept the expulsion of Albania from the Communist camp and flouted Khrushchev by laving a wreath on Stalin's tomb.

Lowenthal discusses some of the various repercussions of this schism. He predicts that some individual Communist parties will become less dependent on Moscow while remaining as national Communist totalitarian states. Rumania's recent independence from the USSR by going its own way economically and ideologically, has borne out this prediction. Lowenthal believes that the most marked new results of the schism will come within the USSR itself, in the Soviet Communist Party. Khrushchev's dethronement has transpired since Lowenthal wrote these essays. But what Lowenthal prophetically wrote has been revealed in fact. The ideological implications of the schism have been realized in the CPSU. In Lowenthal's words written in 1963, the schism "has also sown the seeds, then, of a future 'de-Khrushchevization'; in the next crisis of succession, reassertion of the primacy of an ideological party may no longer be the safest road to victory."

In an Epilogue: On the Stages of International Communism, written in 1963, Lowenthal traces how the centralist World Party stage of Lenin and Stalin, which followed the loosely organized Russian Revolutionary stage had been transformed into the Khrushchev international leadership stage. The Khrushchev stage reached its apotheosis in 1957 and proved unworkable by 1960. Lowenthal believes that the present stage of attempting to maintain Party unity by compromise, which the reviewer might add has been continued with some modifications by Khrushchev's successors, can never work at all. It remains to be seen whether this is true. This test will come in to course of events in Vietnam. The future development of Communist Parties dependent on the USSR will, according to Lowenthal, show a withering away of power as the Soviet Union declines in authority in the world Communist movement. Lowenthal argues that those parties with the greatest potential for independence are those "concentrated in underdeveloped regions, where today, Chinese ideological influence is greatest." This is a far cry from the predictions of Marx, Lenin, Stalin, or even Khrushchev.—William B. Ballis, The University of Michigan.

The Arabs: Their History & Future. By Jacques Berque, trans. by Jean Stewart. (New York: Praeger, 1964. Pp. 290. $7.50.)

Professor Berque brings a rare combination of qualities to his studies of the Arab world. His anthropological work, Structures Sociales du Haut-Atlas (1955) is a classic, and he has lived and worked in both North Africa and the Middle East. His book, originally published as Les Arabes d'Hier à Démain (1960), reflects his acute awareness of disciplinary demands tempered by an intimate knowledge of the Arabs, their mentality and their aspirations. His book borders on the poetic, but it is poetry with full recognition of the real dilemmas and frustrations of the people of whom he writes. Moreover, Professor Berque's anthropological and sociological interests give the study a forceful action orientation, something which many scholarly works on the contemporary Muslim world lack.

The focus of the study is the contemporary Arab in relation to his environment and his intellectual history. Perhaps there is nothing equivalent to spending months in an isolated village to develop the extraordinary sensitivity Berque displays: the saint's tomb in the midst of the junkyard, the Arab League office overshadowed by a Coca Cola sign, the Arab intellectual destroying his copies of Racine in tearful rage during the Suez crisis. Examples of this kind are scattered throughout the book, and might lead the superficial reader to regard it as an unintelligible mélange of impressions. In a sense, it is, because the Arab's view of the world is such a mélange, but in a more important way it is not because Berque sees these dramatic situations as revealing the Arab conflict with a realism that permits orderly differentiation and analysis.

Despite the symbolism essential to ordering such a work, Professor Berque deals with very real problems. Indeed, seven of the fourteen chapters deal with specific economic questions: finance, technical innovation, entrepreneurial qualities, working conditions, etc. These chapters might be considered the most useful because they shed a completely new meaning on the barren figures economic analysts are prone to project on the human problems of the Arab world. His curiosity takes him to psychological fundamentals in the emergence of a more complex society, e.g., what are the connotations of "things" and "number" in Arabic. The Islamic injunctions about saving and investment are not sterile theological speculations, but brilliant insights into how the Arab relates the objects of his environment to his feelings, frustrations and intellectual history. Every student of emergent nations will sympathize with the "need to build new pyramids" (p. 141), and every diplomat should appreciate Berque's notation that the Aswan Dam represents Nasser's reply to the Suez disaster.

The later chapters of the book may seem less clear, in part because the juxtaposition of object and perception is much less well defined in discussing art, music, language, the role of women and politics. No more succinct statement of the meaning of marriage in the Arab world exists than his observation that marital relations are "an affirmation rather than an exchange." (p. 175) Seldom have the problems of the Arabic language been more acutely summarized than in his note that Arabic "scarcely belongs to the world of men; rather it has been lent to them." (p. 190) As a student of North African politics, this reviewer could not agree more with his observation that "emancipation took place when total independence had become a euphemism." (p. 260) These insights, however, would be in the category of wisely written memoirs were it not that Berque constantly returns to the symbolic meaning of each conflict in the total experience of the contemporary Arab.

Berque's method is unclear because he indeed does not insist that his conceptual tools provide concrete limits to variations in human experience. Much that he writes would receive corroboration in learning theory and in Gestalt psychology, e.g. "radical reconsideration of the past involves paradoxically the deliberate choice of swift progress." (p. 147) His optimism about the future of the Arabs, then, is not derived from how their social relationships might conform to ours, but from the creativity that might take place in the process of their struggle to adapt the past to the future. His reliance on symbolism is dictated by his insistence that the layers of meaning be recognized, often using old logical patterns and meanings in completely new situations. This is not an easy book to read, but the careful reader may learn to free his imagination and perception from many of the unproductive ground rules of more commonly used concepts and conventional studies. He will surely come to appreciate the Arab world in its total complexity in a way that few other books have approached.—Douglas E. ASHFORD, Cornell University.

The Formation of Malaysia; New Factor in World Politics. By WILLARD A. HANNA. (New York: American Universities Field Staff, Inc., 1964. Pp. 247. $6.50.)

The formation of Malaysia seemed to provide a quiet and graceful disentaglement of British authority from its last colonial remnants in Southeast Asia. In actual fact, it created a new storm center lashed by the winds of President Sukarno's "newly emergent forces." The twentyfour chapters of Willard Hanna's book (excluding the newly-written Introduction and Postscript) represent his original American Universities Field Staff reports submitted between February 1962 and mid-September 1963. They present a lucid account of how a tentative proposal for federating the State of Malaya with the former British colonies of Singapore, Sabah (North Borneo) and Sarawak led to the creation of Malaysia through the rational adjustment and manipulation of conflicting interests. Recorded before and while international pressures began to exert themselves upon Malayan policymakers, these chapters contain a freshness which might well have been lost if they had been written at a later date. At the same time they reflect the insight of a competent on-the-spot observer into the internal politics of the merger proposal both in Singapore and the relatively little-known Borneo territories.

Hanna's discussion of the gradual (1957-62) economic merger of the former Crown Colony (and free port) of Penang into the newly formed Federation of Malaya led him to predict that the economic merger of Singapore with Malaya could well be mutually profitable and prevent fewer serious immediate problems than anticipated at the time of his writing. Nor can Hanna be accused of hindsight when he mentions the possibility (in his Febr. 28, 1962 report on "Politics in Borneo") that, in spite of official pronouncements, Indonesia was likely to turn its attention to the "liberation" of the Borneo territories after the successful completion of its West Irian liberation campaign.

The tiny (2,000 square miles, 90,000 people) colony of Brunei is an oil-rich paradise with an annual state income of $40,000,000, ruled by a Sultan who was willing to reform. Guided by British technical know-how, the ordinary family was able to afford most of the world's modern amenities. Yet it was this highly favoured Brunei welfare laboratory which fomented a widely-supported local rebellion. This incident causes Hanna to ask whether peace, progress, and prosperity by themselves are sufficient to ensure stability or whether the mystical appeal of the "newly emerging forces" is irresistable. If the latter is true, chances for stability in the remainder of Southeast Asia are dim indeed (p. 151). Hanna admits that the Malaysia experiment itself stands in sharp contrast to the whole idea of "violent revolution" and he believes that the very gravity of Singapore's dilemma "becomes the best insurance of its sanity" (p. 205). He leaves some doubt in the minds of his readers, however, whether this victory of rationalism will be able to withstand the onslaught of ultranationalism and the stigma of being part of a "neocolonial conspiracy." Hanna notes that contrary to original expectations the orderly and successful development of the Malaysia experiment seems to depend mainly upon the wiles of Indonesian policymakers.

Interesting though each of the 24 AUFS reports are, their presentation in one volume has some disadvantages. Several of the chapters provide the reader with interesting insights and sidelights of life in Malaya and Singapore, but in combination with those which focus on political matters do not make for easy reading in bookform. The elimination of these chapters might have deprived readers of precious vignettes but the central theme of the book—the formation of Malaysia-would have stood out in better perspective. With the consequent reduction in length, more space could have been devoted to the causes of the Philippine and Indonesian reactions. With regard to the latter, for example, this reviewer was surprised to find no mention of the Indonesian fear that Malaysia would become a state dominated by Chinese. It is also to be regretted that there is no discussion of the British position which would have required a Hannan analysis of the Cobbold Commission report. The latter comments, however, are mainly criticisms of organization and expression of regret that there were not more AUFS reports by Hanna. His compilation is evidence not only of his ability as a shrewd observer but also of the value of the AUFS to the American student body in providing timely analyses of foreign affairs.-PAUL W. VAN DER VEUR, Australian National University (Canberra).

Jamaican Leaders: Political Attitudes in a New Nation. By Wendell Bell. (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1964. Pp. xiv, 229. $6.00.)

The postwar period has seen the birth of new nations in greater profusion than at any other time in history. Almost all of them have inevitably had to be phoenixes (though not always birds of great beauty) rising from the ashes, or at least the embers, of worn out colonial empires. Inevitably, too, most of them have been in Africa, where colonialism most recently flourished.

Opportunities for the establishment of new sovereignties in the Western Hemisphere are relatively few. It is the more useful, consequently, to have available a good study of Jamaica, one of the most recent of the new nations. Wendell Bell, a Yale sociologist, has carried on extensive research in the West Indies, especially in Jamaica, and this study is the fruit of that long investigation. As becomes a devotion to its author's discipline, the approach and content are primarily sociological but there is much of interest and value to the political scientist.

In an introductory chapter the author sets the stage historically, politically, and economically. The overwhelming conditioning fact of Jamaican life is of course its enormous percentage of Negroes. For more than a hundred years that percentage has varied only slightly between 75 and 80. The presence of this segment of the population, both under Spanish and, after 1655, English control, determined Jamaica's economy, its social structure, and in recent years its politics.

In this chapter, too, we are introduced to the two dominant figures in contemporary Jamaican political life, Sir Alexander Bustamante, founder of the Bustamante Industrial Trade Union (BITU) and later of the Jamaica Labour Party (JLP), and Norman Washington Manley, chief figure in the formation of the People's National Party (PNP), Jamaican affiliate of the British Labour Party.

Later chapters move more directly into an analysis of Jamaican leadership. They are based chiefly on a thorough and skillfully devised questionnaire submitted to some 800 Jamaican "elites" selected from Who's Who, Jamaica and other sources. Of those queried, 238 responded, and the scientific analysis of these comprehensive answers gives the basis for much of the fascinating information included in the study. The questionnaires were supplemented by widescale interviewing. Numerous statistical tables give the gist of the analysis; the text admirably supplements and explains such findings.

In one chapter title Bell asks whether Jamaica should have a democratic political system. He concludes that political cynicism is fairly wide-spread in Jamaica, that the politically cynical leaders (nondemocrats) tended to oppose independence for the island and the politically idealistic leaders to favor it, and that the real danger to the continuation of fledgling democratic forms comes chiefly from those leaders who wanted both political independence and at the same time social and economic progress.

In examining the attitudes of his elitist respondents toward the question of whether Jamaica should be independent Bell finds that about two-thirds were nationalist, that nationalist attitudes did not generally reflect great bitterness toward the mother country nor hold that independence would be a panacea for all Jamaica's problems, and that most of his respondents believe that independence will bring economic benefits but that close economic relations with the United Kingdom should be maintained.

An independent Jamaica faced a theoretical choice between East and West and the problem was made somewhat more difficult by the pseudoglamour of nearby Communist Cuba. It was decided by 1963, however, that Jamaica would align itself with the Western democracies, a decision which, the author holds, must necessarily affect the island's future in significant ways. That future is precarious, though, inasmuch as the economic base is small and so much remains to be done in the fields of education, housing, economic diversification, removal of the sense of political alienation and cynicism.

Jamaica's leaders, Bell maintains, seem to have avoided corruption and opportunism but it is not yet determined whether they can avoid a drift toward increasing cynicism about political democracy and whether they can lead the way to a more equalitarian society.

In appendices the author gives an analysis of Jamaican occupational ratings, a discussion of his methodological procedures and problems, and a reproduction of his 54-point questionnaire. A number of excellent photographs add to the interest of the book.

Bell has skillfully wedded sociological and political analysis. His techniques might well be borrowed by others interested in making similar basic studies of new nations and underdeveloped countries.—Russell H. Fitzgibbon, University of California (Santa Barbara).

Colombia Today—And Tomorrow. By PAT M. HOLT. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1964. Pp. viii, 209. $5.50.)

This is an interesting book which is mistitled, for it is not an analysis of Colombia Today-And Tomorrow, but rather a collection of miscellaneous information which probably should have been entitled "Observations on Colombia." The author, a former newspaperman and a staff member of the U.S. Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, writes in a preface that "this book is based largely on a series of newsletters that I wrote to the Institute of Current World Affairs when I was a fellow in the Institute in residence in Bogotá in 1961-62. It is based also on independent research and on information gathered and impressions received during five other visits to Colombia between 1953 and 1963." The book contains a brief geographical description of the country, something on the social classes, an outline of its history, and a great deal of descriptive material about the government, the agricultural system, the role coffee plays in the country's economy, the steps being taken to introduce agrarian reform, and to industrialize the country. One chapter deals with the experiences of the United States Peace Corps volunteers in Colombia, another analyzes the elections of 1962 and 1964, and one deals with the Catholic church. The material is not knit together by any systematic analysis, nor is the author sure what the future holds for he writes, "Colombia faces a future heavily charged with "ifs." (p. 195) "The question remains whether the bursting, shifting population of Colombia, now awakening after centuries of slumber, can continue on this slow and difficult road—or whether new violence lies in ambush around the next bend." (p. 197)

Colombia is one of the most difficult of all the Latin American countries to understand, For many decades, as Lewis Hanke has written, there was a "widely held idea that Colombia represented Latin American democracy at its best." This misconception died quickly when the most violent and destructive riot ever to take place in Latin America left part of Bogotá in ruins in 1948 and almost broke up the 9th Conference of the American Republics. At least 200,000 men, women, and children were murdered during the next ten years as chaotic violence swept the country. Conditions became so bad that, to try to stop the senseless slaughter, the leaders of the two most important political parties quit opposing each other and won support for the novel idea that all governmental power should be shared equally by the two large political parties and some stability returned. Thus, from 1958 to 1964 all positions on all levels and in all branches of the government are equally divided and the presidency rotates between the parties every four years. It is hoped that by 1974 the country will have been pacified enough so that democratic government based on competition between political parties can be reintroduced.

This book will be useful to those unfamiliar with what has been happening in Colombia since there is no other good book available in English. Mr. Holt describes a country undergoing rapid change in which urbanization, industralization, and a rapid rise in population have disrupted the old traditional society. Yet at the same time, he points out, "Colombia's social structure and cultural habits are still basically those brought there by the Spaniards in the sixteenth century." (p. 7) This is best seen in his description of the country's agricultural system. Mr. Holt writes: "In the country as a whole, roughly four per cent of the land is owned by sixty per cent of the farmers in lots of less than three Hectares (about seven acres). The farms of more than one hundred Hectares are owned by less than three per cent of the farmers and account for more than half of the land." (pp. 85-86)

"The way in which land is used in Colombia seems to be somewhat more uniform than the way in which it is distributed. With some exceptions, the general pattern is that the best lands are used extensively for cattle (frequently with unimproved pastures) and the pocrest lands are used intensively for crops." (p. 86) As a result of the land tenure system and other aspects of the organization of society, the economy does not as yet supply a decent standard of living to most of the population. Thus, the country has been living through a serious crisis for decades and a race goes on between the "National Front" government trying to induce ordered change and the chaotic social forces no one seems able to control.—HARRY KANTOR, University of Florida.

Generals vs. Presidents: Neo-Militarism in Latin America. By Edwin Lieuwen. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1964. Pp. 160. $4.50.)

This little book is an updating of Professor Lieuwen's earlier and well-known Aims and Politics in Latin America. There are brief descriptions of the seven military coups occurring in Latin America between March, 1962 and April, 1964; there is a general discussion of military politics in Latin America and suggestions for U.S. policy-makers.

An attempt to compress factual analysis and policy critique in a slender volume covering such a vast and complex area is fraught with conceptual difficulties. The tendency is to hover somewhere between reporting and polemics and to confuse assumptions with conclusions. This book epitomizes these problems. Crucial words and phrases go undefined. An example here—as in many books on Latin America—is the term "oligarchies." They are variously referred to as "landed," "commercial," and/or "business oligarchies." They are treated throughout as if in all countries they share monolithic interests and have similar simbiotic relations with the military.

The very term "military" offers similar difficulties. To arrive ultimately at some general policy declarations the author treats the "military" as a transcontinental institution of common aims and interests. Thus, "there is little question that the armed forces are a conservative, antirevolutionary institution standing in the way of the achievement of evolutionary social revolutions by democratic means" (p. 130); and on the same page, "ten of Latin America's twenty republics are gripped in military vises designed to hold back the pressures of social revolution." (My italics.) But from the evidence which Lieuwen adduces in his seven case studies, plus those of Venezuela and El Salvador-cases of the military "acquiescing" in social reforms-it is clear that generalizations about the "Latin American military" become misleading. He himself underscores the importance of discussing the military in terms of its varying reactions to the "acute social crisis through which Latin America is passing" (p. 8). He is careful to discuss the important divisions within the Argentine military in 1962, not all of which can be dismissed as merely personal or opportunistic power plays undivorced from ideological or policy positions. Throughout the descriptive parts of the book a distinction is made between military interventions which obstruct social reform; those where the military announces an interest in the idea of reform but may intervene to keep the "labor-left" out of power; and those where the military acquiesces in social reform. A biref section is devoted to "Nasserism"-a vaguely defined term referring to the leadership of social revolution by the military. Lieuwen does not give much hope to this kind of development in Latin America, but on the other hand he speaks of an awakening social consciousness in the military, increasing recruitment into the armed services from the lower middle class, the development of more responsible middle-rank officers. Though he does not want to make the picture look too gloomy, he concludes that even where armies justify their intervention in politics as arbiters of conflicting civilian forces, to save the Constitution from "Communists" or to lead reforms, they really intervene to save their own institutional interests and are, therefore, the "chief impediments to democratic social revolution." (pp. 86, 107)

Unrigorous conceptualization leads to contradictory policy recommendations. Lieuwen is quite correctly conscious of the conflicting goals of the U.S. regarding Latin America. He is frank to admit that "despite its noble efforts and intentions, the Kennedy Administration accomplished little in furthering the cause of democracy in Latin America." (p. 129) Nevertheless, after criticizing the Johnson Administration's apparent move away from the policy of non-recognition of military governments, he urges its reassertion. He suggests the argument that the failures of the Kennedy Administration in Latin America were due to the inability of Washington to exercise control over the actions of Latin American military organizations. (p. 128) But if it is true, as he has explained earlier, that the Latin American military are political actors, not apolitical professionals and intervene politically to defend their own institutional interests—then it is quite apparent that Washington simply can not exercise control over them, whether or not it should.

Although Lieuwen states that "the attempt to use reason, to lecture the military on its responsibilities toward the law and the constitution does no good whatsoever," as President Bosch of the Dominican Republic discovered (p. 111), he insists, in the closing sentences of the book, that the most fruitful policy for the U. S. is to continue to try to convince the Latin American military to "eschew politics completely... to become the tools rather than the masters of the state . . ." (p. 149). The desire to compress the analysis of such diverse and complex events as those that form the descriptive base of this book into immediate policy exhortations seems to lead us into ever-narrowing circles.—ROBERT W. ANDERSON, University of Puerto Rico.

British Guiana. Problems of Cohesion in an Immigrant Society. By Peter Newman. (London and New York: Oxford University Press, 1964. Pp. 104. Map. Tables. $1.95. Paper.)

This timely volume, issued under the auspices of the British Institute of Race Relations, provides the general reader with a very good introduction to the emerging nation of British Guiana, whose violent political life has several times appeared in newspaper headlines in recent years. Chapter titles—Geography and Natural Resources, Historical Background, Demographic and Social Pressures, The Performance of the Economy since 1953, Political Developments, and Conclusions—well indicate the scope of the author's treatment. It should be added that the treatment of these various themes tends to focus upon the political problem.

The author traces historically the development of the British colony (Chapter II) as a basis for his demographic and social analysis in Chapter III, possibly the most informative part of the book. His analysis of the economy (Chapter IV), an economy based on sugar, rice, bauxite, and timber, concludes with a plea to remedy the lack of planning which has resulted in an unemployment rate (1961) of 18 per cent. In the discussion of political developments (Chapter V) the author points out how various factors in the situation contributed to moving both of the popular political parties toward a generally socialist position, while blaming the British suspension of the constitution in 1953 for much of the subsequent violence and political anarchy:

The net effect of the 1953 intervention was to postpone for a long time the development of responsible thought about the real economic and social problems of the country, and therefore to move the locus of discussion back to constitutional problems of independence and eventually to problems of racial division... (p. 81)

Both Burnham and Jagan are criticised for their demagogic political leadership, particularly the latter. The author believes that Dr. Jagan merely pretends to be a marxist and is greatly at fault for not presenting a clear cut description of his economic program. Yet much of the blame for present conditions, the author insists, lies with Britain for her "thoughtless colonial assembly of planatation labour from so many disparate sources," and for neglect of the kind of "active and generous participation" without which the economic and social future of British Guiana will be bleak. (p. 102)

A Postscript (pp. 103-104) written after the political and racial violence of 1964, which grew out of a strike of the sugar workers union, supported by the Peoples Progressive Party costing 160 lives, adopts an even less optimistic view of the future than that set forth in the main text. The author writes that "it is clear that the present situation is not stable at all in the long run." He is skeptical of the suggestion of Eric Williams, Premier of Trinidad, made in the Commonwealth Prime Ministers Conference of July 1964, for a limited UN trusteeship, believing that somehow a solution should be found within the Commonwealth.

The book is well written, objective in tone, and cogent in arguing its central thesis of British historical responsibility for an anarchic political situation. Some readers may feel the author is too imbued with the concept of class struggle. (See page 78.) None will suspect him to race prejudice.—HAROLD EUGENE DAVIS, The American University.

Quisqueya: A History of the Dominican Republic.
BY SELDEN RODMAN. (Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1964. Pp. x, 202. $5.95.)

This is an outstanding book on the Dominican Republic and its pre-Columbian predecessor, part of which was known to the Tainos as Quisqueya. But "outstanding" is a lefthanded compliment, a phrase with no political coloration.

It is lefthanded, for Quisqueya is the only work on the nation nearest Puerto Rico worthy of being rated in a fairly-good-to-very-good range since Sumner Welles' Naboth's Vineyard (1928). Briefly, this reader knows of no outstanding book in any language by a social scientist on Columbus' first permanent settlement, a tragic colony, an international pawn of big power politics, a Marine-ruled Wall Street debtor, intermittent nation, corporate-type private fief of a voraciously efficient thief, and short-lived Alliance for Progress showcase that today is the Dominican Republic.

With emphasis on political stress and strain, especially on domestic ineptitude and greed, nonetheless there is a vast amount of condensed, valuable, and dramatic information in 172 of the pages. Of the thirty left, twenty consist of a physical description appendix. A blue pencil should have cut out the appendix. It is partly a useless appendage, partly a painful one, and partly a gangrenous one. By that is meant it is repetitious of what has been said earlier; or it should have been included in the first chapter; or it is incongruous. Numerous tourist guide interjections about the palatability of the fare in hotels throughout the country, highway mileages, beach bathing facilities, and historic monuments make up the appendix's incongruity. Few tourists go any place except to Santo Domingo; virtually none brings a car with him or visits the interior. These intrusions are unduly subjective. For example, Rodman refers to the "hopelessly restored" palace of Diego Columbus. In view of the poverty and cultural level of the Republic, there is nothing hopeless about the edifice, and found at it is infinitely less commercialism than at Williamsburg.

A selected bibliography indicates about as much of a dearth of politico-historical literature on the Dominican Republic up to 1910 as on Puerto Rico. On a comparative population appraisal not much more has been produced on the Republic since 1910 than on the French Antilles, in which to date have occurred no notable outbursts for independence.

Rodman's subjectivism in the appendix and elsewhere may be accounted for by his background. An occasional contributor to the long defunct New Masses, he is the author of six books of verse, has compiled five anthologies of poetry, and has written seven books on the visual arts, including three on Haitian art. Quisqueya is the only book of his he identifies as being a history. Those who would quarrel with his scarcity of footnotes, infrequent dramatic flourishes, failure to treat adequately of the impact of exterior economic events, might dilute their acerbity by recalling they have not written a book on the Dominican Republic. Rodman did. He has thus measurably filled up with a largely dispassionate recital a historical time gap existing since 1928.

The work would be more useful had Rodman devoted another hundred pages to the Trujillo era and its aftermath, probably most of them to the aftermath, particularly to Juan Bosch and the aborted Alliance for Progress program. But books on the Dominican Republic, even those on Trujillo, have not been best sellers. Within the limitations of his market potential and subject, Rodman has done well.

Quisqueya is not comparable in quality, coverage, scholarship, and documentation to Eric Williams' History of the People of Trinidad and Tobago (1962), a 294-page paperback which sells in Port-of-Spain for less than U.S. $2.00. This contrast cannot be explained simply by some glib over-simplification about British thoroughness and Spanish haphazardness. After all, Cubans have produced excellent histories of their island.

At present (May 1965) 30,000 American troops occupy Santo Domingo, in the aftermath of the Dominican Revolution. That our marines are back in Santo Domingo is evidence of a new Johnson Corollary to the Monroe Doctrine. Having been a professor at Santiago de Cuba in 1956, just prior to the Castro Revolt, and also at Santiago de los Caballeros early in 1965, I feel qualified to make a prediction, even though I am now jobless. In the next ten years five other Cuban-Dominican-type revolts will occur in hungry, desperate, hopeless Latin American countries. In 1964 there was a dearth of unbiased, well-rounded, in depth books, monographs, and other studies on the Dominican Republic. I expect the same can be said in 1967 by which time a dozen new ones will have been published. Byron White, Universidad Cátolica Madre y Maestra, Santiago de los Caballeros, Dominican Republic.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON

COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT AND CROSS-NATIONAL RESEARCH

RICHARD L. MERRITT, WITH ELLEN B. PIRRO Yale University

General

Allardt, Erik. Institutionalized Versus Diffuse Support of Radical Political Movements. Transactions of the Fifth World Congress of Sociology. (International Sociological Association, 1964).

Groth, Alexander J. The "Isms" in Totalitarianism. American Political Science Review. 58:4 (December 1964), 888-902.

Hugues, Emile. Les Partis Politiques Dans Une Democratie Moderne. Revue Politique et Parlementaire. 66:750 (November 1964), 27-34.

Marsh, Robert M. The Bearing of Comparative Analysis on Sociological Theory. Social Forces. 43:2 (December 1964), 188-96.

Senior, Derek. The City Region as an Administrative Unit. Political Quarterly. 36:1 (January-March 1965), 82-91.

Silvain, Rénè. La Dernier Empire Colonial. Revue de Paris. 71:11 (November 1964), 48-61.

Weiner, Myron. Traditional Role Performance and the Development of Modern Political Parties: the Indian Case. Journal of Politics. 26:4 (November 1964), 830-50.

Elite Analysis

Angell, Robert C. and J. David Singer. Social Values and Foreign Policy: Attitudes of Soviet and American Elites. Journal of Conflict Resolution. 8:4 (December 1964), 329-492.

Bauman, Zygmunt. Economic Growth, Social Structure, Elite Formation: the Case of Poland. International Social Science Journal. 16:2 (June 1964), 203-17.

Bourassa, Guy. Les Elites. Politiques de Montréal: De l'Aristocratie à la Démocratie. Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. 31:1 (February 1965), 35-51.

Fischer, George. The Number of Soviet Party Executives, A Research Note. Soviet Studies. 16:3 (January 1965), 330-33.

Hambly, Gavin. Attitudes and Aspirations of the Contemporary Iranian Intellectual. Royal Central Asian Journal. 51:2 (April 1964), 127-40.

Joung-Sik, Lee. The Social Origin of Members of the Sixth Assembly. Korean Affairs. 3:1 (April 1964), 1-20.

Moskos, C. C. and Wendell Bell. Attitudes Towards Democracy Among Leaders in Four Emergent Nations. *The British Journal of Sociol*ogy. 15:4 (December 1964), 317-37.

Nayacakalou, R. R. Traditional and Modern Types of Leadership and Economic Development Among the Fijians. International Social Science Journal. 16:2 (June 1964), 261-75.

Yong-mo, Kim. The Social Background and Mobility of State Ministers of the Yi Dynasty. Korean Affairs. 3:2 (July 1964), 238-60.

Political Development

Almond, Gabriel. A Developmental Approach to Political Systems. World Politics. 17:2 (January 1965), 183-215.

Binder, Leonard. National Integration and Political Development. American Political Science Review. 58:3 (September 1964), 622-32.

Dube, S. C. Bureaucracy and Nation Building in Transitional Societies. International Societies Science Journal. 16:2 (June 1964), 229-37.

Janowitz, Morris. The Military in the Political Development of New Nations. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. 20:10 (October 1964), 6-11.

Lasswell, Harold D. The Policy Sciences of Development. World Politics. 17:2 (January 1965), 286-310.

Martin, Paul. The Challenge of Under-development. External Affairs. 16:11 (November 1964), 525-30.

Schramm, Wilbur. The Uses of Communication in National Development. East-West Center Review. 1:2 (October 1964), 2-16.

Han, Tai Soo. National Democracy in the Underdeveloped Nations. Koreana Quarterly. 6:1 (Spring 1964), 31-38.

Cross-National Research

Arendonk, Joep van. Basic Relations in Theoretical Models: A Socio-Economic Approach. Philippine Sociological Review. 12:1/2 (January-April 1964), 53-63.

Gold, David. Some Problems in Generalizing Aggregate Associations. American Behavioral Scientist. 8:4 (December 1964), 16-19.

Onishi, Akira. Aggregate Economic Projections for the Developing Asian Countries. Developing Economics. 2:3 (September 1964), 254-70.

The United States and Canada

Smiley, Donald V. The Two Themes of Canadian Federalism. Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. 31:1 (February 1965), 80-97.

Latin America

Ahumada, Jorge. Hypothesis for the Diagnosis of a Situation of Social Change: the Case of Venezuela. International Social Science Journal. 16:2 (June 1964), 192–203.

Baer, Werner, Isaac Kersteneztky, and Mario Henrique Simonsen. Transportation and Inflation: A Study of Irrational Policy Making in Brazil. Economic Development and Cultural Change. 13:2 (January 1965), 188-202.

Bray, Donald W. Chile Enters a New Era. Current History. 48:281 (January 1965), 21-25.

Burt, Al. Haiti:Alternatives to Tyranny, Nation. 200:1 (January 4, 1965), 10-12.

De Kadt, Emanuel. Brazil: Reaction, Reform or Standstill? World Today. 20:12 (December 1964), 505-08.

Despres, Leo A. The Implications of Nationalist Politics in British Guiana for the Development of Cultural Theory. American Anthropologist. 66:5 (October 1964), 1051-77.

Duff, Ernest A. Agrarian Reform in Colombia: Colonization or Parcelization. Inter-American Economic Affairs. 18:3 (Winter 1964), 39-51.

Gellner, Marianne. Mexico: New Frontiers of Progress. World Today. 20:12 (December 1964), 523-32.

Goodrich, Carter. Argentina as a New Country. Comparative Studies in Society and History. 7:1 (October 1964), 70-88.

Grayson, George W. Jr. Christian Democrats in Chile. SAIS Review. 9:2 (Winter 1965), 12-20.

Halperin, Ernst. Racism and Communism in British Guiana. Journal of Inter-American Studies. 7:1 (January 1965), 95-134.

Hinojosa Ortiz, Manuel. Las Reformas Legislativas y el Desarrollo de México. Ciencias Políticas y Sociales. 10:35 (January-March 1964), 145-60.

Ianni, Octavio. Proceso Político y Desarrollo Económico del Brasil. Ciencias Políticas y Sociales. 10:35 (January-March 1964), 11-48.

Johnson, John J. Brazil in Quandary. Current History. 48:281 (January 1965), 9-15.

Johnson, Kenneth F. Political Radicalism in Colombia: Electoral Dynamics of 1962 and 1964. Journal of Inter-American Studies. 7:1 (January 1965), 15-26.

Knapp, Frank A. Jr. The Meaning of Militarism in Latin America. Foreign Service Journal. 41:12 (December 1964), 20-26.

Mathews, Thomas. The Caribbean Kaleidoscope. Current History. 48:281 (January 1965), 32-39.

Needler, Martin C. Changing the Guard in Mexico. Current History. 48:281 (January 1965), 26-31.

Schneider, Ronald M. The U.S. in Latin America. Current History. 48:281 (January 1965), 1-8.

Sternberg, Hilgard O'Reilly. Brazil: Complex Giant. Foreign Affairs. 43:2 (January 1965), 297-311.

Whitaker, Arthur P. Argentina: Struggle for Recovery. Current History. 48:281 (January 1965), 16-20.

Western Europe

The United Kingdom

Buck, Philip W. First-Time Winners in the British House of Commons Since 1918. American Political Science Review. 58:3 (September 1964), 662-68.

Butt, Ronald. What Sort of Reform? Crossbow. 8:29 (October-December 1964), 13-15.

Foxley-Norris. Future Command Organization. The Royal Air Force Quarterly. 4:4 (Winter 1964), 253-61.

Lakeman, Enid. Towards PR-STV? Contemporary Review. 206:6 (December 1964), 618-23.

Lindsay, Kenneth. Science and Parliament: A New Problem in Government. International Relations. 2:10 (October 1964), 635-50.

McKitterick, T. E. M. Radicalism After 1964. Political Quarterly. 36:1 (January-March 1965), Nairn, Tom. The Nature of the Labour Party. New Left Review. 6:28 (November-December 1964), 33-62.

Rustin, Michael and Michael Walzer. Labor in Britain. Dissent. 12:1 (Winter 1965), 21-31.

Shonfield, Andrew and others. Spectrum. Encounter. 23:12 (December 1964), 3-19.

France

Andrews, William G. The By-Election System of the Fifth French Republic. Western Political Quarterly, 17:1 (December 1964), 690-702.

Burin, Frederic S. Machtausübung und Rechtsstaatlichkeit in Der V. Französischen Republik.

Politische Vierteljahresschrift. 5:4 (December 1964), 390-409.

Clifford-Vaughan, M. Changing Attitudes to the Army's Role in French Society. The British Journal of Sociology. 15:4 (December 1964), 338-49.

Crabb, John H. The French Concept of Abuse of Rights. Inter-American Law Review. 6:1 (January-June 1964), 1-24.

Engel, Salo. Judicial Review and Political Preview of Legislation in Post-War France. Inter-American Law Review. 6:1 (January-June 1964), 53-72.

Hansen, Niles M. Indicative Planning in France: Model for the Future? Quarterly Review of Economics and Business. 4:4 (Winter 1964), 7-18.

Menard, Orville D. The French Army Above the State. Military Affairs. 28:3 (Fall 1964), 123-29.

Roche, Emile. Role et Avenir du Conseil Economique et Social. Revue Politique et Parlementaire. 66:750 (November 1964), 6-10.

West Germany

Behrendt, Günther. The Agrarian Problem in the Federal Republic of Germany. German Economic Review. 2:2 (1964), 111-23.

Braunthal, Gerard. Wirtschaft und Politik— Der Bundesverband der Deutschen Industrie. Politische Vierteljahresschrift. 4:4 (December 1963), 369-85.

Brems, Hans J. West German Problems: Price Discipline and Economic Integration. Quarterly Review of Economics and Business. 4:4 (Winter 1964), 51-58.

Eichler, Willi. Zur Aufgabe und Finanzierung der Parteien. Geist und Tat. 20:1 (January 1965), 1-4.

Gaus, Günter. Die Freien Demokraten. Monat. 17:194 (November 1964), 25-28.

Günther, Eberhard. Cartel Policy in Germany. German Economic Review. 2:1 (1964), 16-24.

Herbst, Josef. The New Model Bundeswehr—Army of the Federal Republic of Germany. Army Information Digest. 20:1 (January 1965), 40-51.

Molt, Peter. Wertvorstellungen in der Politik— Zur Frage der "Entideologisierung" der Deutschen Parteien. Politische Vierteljahresschrift. 4:4 (December 1963), 350-68.

Scholz, Günther. Macht Wohlstand Unpolitisch? Monat. 17:196 (January 1965), 36-40.

Varain, Heinz. Das Parlament im Parteienstaat. Journal Politische Vierteljahresschrift. 5:3 (September 1964), 339-48.

Italy

Barile, Paolo. Per un Ammendernamento Delle Strutture Democratiche Italiane. Ponte. 20:10 (October 1964), 1202-32.

LaPalombara, Joseph. Interessengruppen und Gesetzgebung in Italien. Politische Vierteljahresschrift. 4:4 (December 1963), 386-426.

Losano, Mario G. La Legislazione Antimonopolistica in Italia. Ponte. 20:11 (November 1964), 1345-64.

McLellan, David S. and Robert McLellan. The 1963 Italian Elections. Western Political Quarterly, 17:4 (December 1964), 671-89.

Silone, Ignazio. Ché Punto e il PCI? Tempo Presente. 9:11 (November 1964), 1-3.

Other

Allardt, Erik. Social Sources of Finnish Communism: Traditional and Emerging Radicalism. International Journal of Comparative Sociology. 5:1 (1964), 49-72.

Boissevain, Jeremy. Factions, Parties and Politics in a Maltese Village. American Anthropologist. 66:6 (December 1964), 1275-87.

Girod, Roger. Le Systeme des Partis en Suisse. Revue Française de Science Politique. 14:6 (December 1964) 1114-34.

Lacy, Frank R. Yugoslavia: Practice and Procedure in a Communist Country. Oregon Law Review. 43:2 (December 1963), 1-46.

O'Hanlon, Thomas. Ireland's Open Door to Europe. Dun's Review. 85:1 (January 1965), 47-48.

Rosenthal, Albert H. The Ombudsman—Swedish "Grievance Man". Public Administration Review. 24:4 (December 1964), 226-33.

Spagna Quando? A Symposium. Ponte. 20:12 (December 1964).

The Soviet Union and Eastern Europe

Berliner, Joseph S. Marxism and the Soviet Economy. Problems of Communism. 13:5 (September-October 1964), 1-11.

Bialer, Seweryn. How Russians Rule Russia. Problems of Communism. 13:5 (September-October 1964), 45-52.

Chrypinski, Vincent D. Poland's Parliamentary Committees. East Europe. 14:1 (January 1965), 16-24.

Dan, Anca. Rumania in the Communist Camp: Notes of an Observer. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. 12:1 (January 1965), 15-23

Fainsod, Merle. Khrushchevism in Retrospect. Problems of Communism. 14:1 (January-February 1965), 1-10.

The Fall of Khrushchev: A Symposium. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. 11:12 (December 1964), 3-27.

Galay, Nikolai. The Receding Frontiers of Soviet Internal Policy. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. 11:10 (October 1964), 3-17.

Haffner, Friedrich. Stadien der Politischen Willensbildung in der UdSSR. Osteuropa. 14:11 (November 1964), 814-24.

Helmreich, Ernst C. Kadar's Hungary. Current History. 48:283 (March 1965), 142-48.

Khakimov, M. Kh. The Development of National Soviet Statehood During the Present Period. Central Asian Review. 12:4 (1964), 251-64.

Kolkowicz, Roman. Conflicts in Soviet Party-Military Relations: 1962-1963. RAND Corporation. (Ita. Memorandum RM-3760-PR, 1963).

-----. The Impact of Technology on the Soviet Military: A Challenge to Traditional Military Professionalism. RAND Corporation (Ita. Memorandum RM-4198-PR, 1964).

Laird, Roy D., The Politics of Soviet Agriculture. Studies on the Soviet Union. 3:4 (1964), 147-59.

Lesage, Michel. Le Renouvellement des Dirigeants du Partis Communiste de l'Union Sovietique. Revue Française de Science Politique. 14:6 (December 1964), 1134-54.

Meier, Victor. In Soviet Russia—Search for Reality. Swiss Review of World Affairs. 14:12 (December 1964), 5-8.

Mueller, George and Herman Singer. Hungary: Can the New Course Survive? Problems of Communism. 14:1 (January-February 1965), 32-38.

Nove, Alec. Some Thoughts on Soviet Agricultural Administration. Studies on the Soviet Union. 3:4 (1964), 1-12.

Ollion, Général. Évolution de la Pensée Militaire Sovietique. Revue de Défense Nationale. 20:12 (December 1964), 1924-33.

Pruck, Erich F. Streitkräfte und Partei. Osteuropa. 14:12 (December 1964), 893-902.

Robson, William A. Russia Revisited. Political Quarterly. 36:1 (January-March 1965), 67-81.

Rogger, Hans. East Germany: Stable or Immobile. Current History. 48-283 (March 1965), 135-41.

———. Politics, Ideology and History in the USSR: the Search for Coexistence. Soviet Studies. 16:3 (January 1965), 253-75.

Rubinstein, Alvin Z. Yugoslavia's Opening Society. Current History. 48:283 (March 1965), 149-53.

Staar, Richard F. Retrogression in Poland. Current History. 48:283 (March 1965), 154-60.

Taborsky, Edward. Change in Czechoslovakia. Current History. 48:283 (March 1965), 168-74.

Veverka, Jindrich. Long-Term Measures of Soviet Industrial Output. Soviet Studies. 16:3 (January 1965), 285-301.

Vucinich, Wayne S. Whither Rumania? Current History. 48:283 (March 1965), 161-67.

Wädekin, Karl-Eugen. Soviet Agriculture and Agricultural Policy. Studies of the Soviet Union. 3:4 (1964), 52-67.

Wagenlehner, Günther. Das Nächste Programm der KPdSU. Osteuropa. 14:12 (December 1964), 877-92.

Middle East and North Africa

Ashford, Douglas E. Neo-Destour Leadership and the "Confiscated Revolution." World Politics. 17:2 (January 1965), 215-31.

Badeau, John S. The Clashing Paths to Modernization. Journal of International Affairs. 19:1 (1965), 1-7.

Childers, Erskine B. Palestine: the Broken Triangle. Journal of International Affairs. 19:1 (January 1965), 87-100.

Glubb, John. The Role of the Army in the Traditional Arab State. Journal of International Affairs. 19:1 (1965), 8-15.

Hahn, Lorna. North Africa: A New Pragmatism. Orbis. 8:1 (Spring 1964), 125-40.

Hayashi, Takeshi. On Arab Socialism. Developing Economies. 2:1 (March 1964), 78-90.

Hurewitz, J. C. The Politics of Rapid Population Growth in the Middle East. Journal of International Affairs. 19:1 (1965), 26-38.

Issawi, Charles. Social Structure and Ideology in Iraq, Lebanon, Syria and the UAR. Journal of International Affairs. 19:1 (1965), 39-46.

Lenczowski, George. The Objects and Methods of Nasserism. Journal of International Affairs. 19:1 (January 1965), 63-77.

Lewis, Geoffrey. Turkey 1962-4. The World Today. 20:12 (December 1964), 517-22.

Peretz, Don. Israel and the Arab Nations. Journal of International Affairs. 19:1 (January 1965), 100-11.

Rentz, George. Saudi Arabia: the Islamic Island. Journal of International Affairs. 19:1 (January 1965), 77-87.

Rondot, Pierre. Quelques Remarques sur le Ba'th. Orient. 8:31 (1964), 7-19.

Sharabitt, Hisham. Islam and Modernization in the Arab World. Journal of International Affairs. 19:1 (January 1965), 16-26.

Taylor, Alan R. Zionist Ideology: an Interpretive Analysis. Middle East Journal. 18:4 (Autumn 1964), 431-42.

Torrey, Gordon H. and John F. Devlin. Arab Socialism. Journal of International Affairs. 19:1 (January 1965), 47-63.

Weiss, Dieter. Nassers Arabischer Sozialismus. Schmöllers Jahrbuch. 84:4 (1964), 419-34.

Zitzewitz, Horst von. Die Türkesche Armee und das Erbe Atatürks. Aussenpolitik. 15:5 (May 1964), 338-47.

Africa

Alexandre, P. Marxisme et Tradition Culturelle Africaine. L'Afrique et l'Asie. 67:3 (1964), 8-25.

Blanchet, Andre. La Democratie Africaine.

Revue de Défense Nationale. 20:11 (November 1964), 1720-37.

Brown, Godfrey N. British Educational Policy in West and Central Africa. Journal of Modern African Studies. 2:3 (November 1964), 365-77.

Contini, Jeanne. Politics with a Difference. Africa Report. 9:11 (November 1964), 3-8.

De Kiewiet, C. W. South Africa's Gamble with History. Virginia Quarterly Review. 41:1 (Winter 1965), 1-17.

Elkan, Walter. Some Social Policy Implications of Industrial Development in East Africa. International Social Science Journal. 16:3 (September 1964), 390-400.

Gertzel, Cherry. Report from Kampala. Africa Report. 9:10 (October 1964), 3-8.

Godfrey, E. M. Ghana's New Plan. Banker. 114:11 (November 1964), 723-27.

Grundy, Kenneth W. The Class Struggle in Africa: An Examination of Conflicting Theories. Journal of Modern African Studies. 2:3 (November 1964), 379-93.

Hess, Robert L. and Gerhard Loewenberg. The Ethiopian No-Party State: A Note on the Functions of Political Parties in Developing States. American Political Science Review. 58:4 (December 1964), 947-50.

Iannettone, Giovanni. Zanzibar: Dal Sultanato Arabo Alla Republica Popolare. Rivista di Studi Politici Internazionali. 31:2 (April-June 1964), 199-209.

Institut Royal des Relations Internationales: La Politique Raciale de la Republique d'Afrique du Sud. Chronique de Politique Étrangère. 17:3/5 (May-September 1964).

Patel, Surendra J. Africa in Transition. Journal of Modern African Studies. 2:3 (November 1964), 329-49.

Post, K. W. J. Nigerian Pamphleteers and the Congo. Journal of Modern African Studies. 2:3 (November 1964), 405-18.

Mortimer, Molly. Voting in Nigeria. Contemporary Review. 206:1 (January 1965), 18-20.

Rai, K. B. Southern Rhodesia. India Quarterly. 20:4 (October-December 1964), 391-402.

Schneider, Harold K. A Model of African Indigenous Economy and Society. Comparative Studies in Society and History. 7:1 (October 1964), 37-55.

The Republic of Zambia. External Affairs. 16:12 (December 1964), 597-603.

Sharma, B. S. Federalism in Uganda. India Quarterly. 20:4 (October-December 1964), 421-28

Symonds, Richard. Reflections on Localism. Journal of Commonwealth Political Studies. 2:3 (November 1964), 219-34.

Vaughan, James H. Jr. Culture, History and Grass-Roots Politics in a Northern Cameroons Kingdom. American Anthropologist. 66:5 (October 1964), 1078-95.

South and Southeast Asia

Ackermann, Klause. Stille Revolution in Afghanistan. Aussenpolitik. 65:1 (January 1965), 33-41.

Bradley, C. Paul. Malaysia's First Year. Current History. 48:282 (February 1965), 82-88.

Caldwell, J. C. New and Old Malaya: Aspects of Demographic Change in a High Growth Rate, Multiracial Society. Population Review. 8:2 (July 1964), 29-36.

Cohen, Stephen P. Arms and Politics in Pakistan. India Quarterly. 20:4 (October-December 1964), 403-20.

Golay, Frank H. The Nature of Philippine Economic Nationalism. Asia. 1:1 (Spring 1964), 13-30.

Kaul, J. M. Split in the C. P. I. India Quarterly. 20:4 (October-December 1964), 372-90.

Kearney, R. N. and R. L. Harris. Bureaucracy and Environment in Ceylon. Journal of Commonwealth Political Studies. 2:3 (November 1964), 253-67.

Kroef, Justus M. van der. Indonesia: the Mystique of Permanent Revolution. South Atlantic Quarterly. 64:1 (Winter 1965), 1-14.

———. Singapore's Communist Fronts. Problems of Communism. 13:5 (September-December 1964), 53-61.

Palmer, Norman D. India Without Nehru. Current History. 48:282 (February 1965), 69-74.

Panglaykim, J. Worker-Management Councils in Indonesia. World Politics. 17:2 (January 1965), 243-56.

Pauker, Ewe T. Has the Sukarno Regime Weakened the PRI? RAND Corporation. (Ita. P-2708-1, 1964).

Far East and Oceania

Baerwald, Hans H. Japan: the Politics of Transition. Asian Survey. 5:1 (January 1965), 33-42.

Kallgren, Joyce K. Nationalist China: Problems of a Modernizing Taiwan. Asian Survey. 5:1 (January 1965), 12-17.

Mason, Bruce B. Local Government in Taiwan: Some Observations. Public Affairs Series No. 10. Bureau of Government Research, Arizona State University, Tempe, Arizona. (1964).

Park, Chung Hee. At the Threshold to Civilian Government. Koreana Quarterly. 5:3 (Autumn 1963), 11-17.

Modernization Process in Korea: A Symposium. Koreana Quarterly. 5:3 (Autumn 1963), 30-60.

Sang-Kyu, Rhi. The Structure of Government. Korean Affairs. 3:1 (April 1964), 29-44.

Willey, Richard J. Pressure Group Politics: the Case of Sohyo. Western Political Quarterly. 17:4 (December 1964), 703-23.

Worth, Robert M. Institution Building in the People's Republic of China: the Rural Health Center. East-West Center Review. 1:3 (February 1965), 19-34.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON COMPARATIVE PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION

NIMROD RAPHAELI The University of Michigan

General Works

Bicker, William, Brown, David, Malakoff, Herbert, and Gore, William J. Comparative Urban Development: An Annotated Bibliography. Papers in Comparative Public Administration. Special Series: No. 5. Comparative Administration Group, 1964.

Crozier, Michel. The Bureaucratic Phenomenon. London: Tavistock Publications, 1964.

Dubhashi, P. R. Bureaucrats: An Empirical Typology. The Indian Journal of Public Administration. April-June, 1964.

Henderson, Keith M. A Brief Guide to American Public Administration for Non-Americans. International Review of Administrative Sciences. No. 2 (1964).

Jones, Gerth N. and Robert N. Giordano. Planned Organizational Change: A Working Bibliography. CAG Occasional Papers, American Society for Public Administration, 1964.

Riggs, Fred W. Administration in Developing Countries; The Theory of Prismatic Society. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company, 1964.

United Nations. Remedies against abuse of administrative authority: selected studies. (mim) (1964. ST/TAO/HR/19).

Bureaucratic Systems

Awa, E. O. The Development of Administrative Machinery in a New State: The Case of Nigeria. International Review of Administrative Sciences. No. 2 (1964).

Danuredjo, L. S. Central Authority vis-a-vis Regional Autonomy in Indonesia. Ibid.

D'Eszlary, Charles. Les administrations camérales de Brandebourg et la monarchie des Habsbourg et leurs effets sur les administrations modernes. Ibid.

Dror, Yehezkel. Nine Characteristics of Governmental Administration in Israel. Public Administration in Israel and Abroad 1964. (Jerusalem, 1965).

Goodnow, Henry R. The Civil Service of Pakistan; Bureaucracy in a New Nation. Yale University Press, 1964.

Kozlov, Iu. M. The Relationships Between

Collegial and One-Man Management in Soviet State Administration at the Present Stage of Development. Soviet Law and Government. Fall, 1964.

Nairne, P. D. Management and the Administrative Class. Public Administration (London). Summer, 1964.

Sayre, Wallace S. Bureaucracies: Some Contrasts in Systems. The Indian Journal of Public Administration. April-June, 1964.

Schaffer, B. B. and K. W. Knight. Top Public Servants in Two States. University of Queensland Papers. University of Queensland Press, St. Lucia, 1963.

Siddiqui, M. Kaleem. Trends and Thoughts in Public Administration in Pakistan. NIPA Reporter. April-June, 1964.

Wright, Arthur F. Chinese Civilization and Bureaucracy. Yale University Press, 1964.

Personnel and Fiscal Management

Butt, S. M. Training in Pakistan—Role of the Secretariat Training Institute. NIPA Reporter. April-June, 1964.

Caiden, G. E. The Independent Central Personnel Agency: The Experience of the Commonwealth Public Service of Australia. Public Administration. Summer, 1964.

MacNeil, Robertson G. Canadian Federal Developments in Employer-Employee Relationships. Public Personnel Review. January, 1965.

Muhammad, Faqir. Public Budgeting in Pakistan. NIPA Reporter. April-June, 1964.

Nurock, Max. Fifteen Years of a Civil Service Examiner in Israel. Public Administration in Israel and Abroad 1964.

Stuart, John R. Personnel Developments in Canadian Cities. Public Personnel Review. January, 1965.

Local Government

Khera, S. S. District Administration in India. Bombay: Asia Publishing House, 1964.

Meghen, P. J. Why Local Government? Administration (Dublin). Autumn, 1964.

Seely, H. C. Local Government Development

Finance (Kenya). Journal of Local Administration Overseas. October, 1964.

Administrative Responsibility and Control

Baena del Aléazar, M. Los entes functionalmente descentralizados y su relación con la Administración Central. Rivista de Administración Pública (Madrid). Mayo-Agosto, 1964.

Bognetti, Giovanni, La responsabilità per tort del funzionario e dello Stato nel dirritto nordamericano. Milan: Giuffré, 1963.

Langrod, Georges, L'experience allemande du "ombudsman" militaire. Revue Administrative. No. 97 (1964).

Parker, R. S. Official Neutrality and the Right of Public Comment—II. Public Administration (Sydney). September, 1964.

Rosenthal, Albert. The Ombudsman—Swedish "Grievance Man." Public Administration Review. December, 1964.

Rowat, Donald C. Ombudsman for North America. Ibid.

Royo-Villanova, S. El concepto de funcionario y la relación de función publica en el nuevo Derecho español. Rivista de Administración Pública. Mayo-Agosto, 1964.

Sawer, G. Ombudsman. Melbourne University Press, 1964.

Vepa, Ram K. Safeguards in Panchayati Raj Administration. The Indian Journal of Public Administration. April-June, 1964.

Public Administration and Development
Chester, D. N. The British Treasury and Economic Planning. Indian Journal of Public Administration. April-June, 1964.

Diamant, Alfred. Bureaucracy in Developmental Movement Regimes: A Bureaucratic Model for Developing Societies. CAG Occasional Papers, American Society for Public Administration, 1964.

Emmerich, Herbert. Administrative Roadblocks to Co-ordinated Development, in: Social Aspects of Economic Development in Latin America. Vol. I, edited by Egbert de Vries and Jose Medina Echevarria. Paris: UNESCO, 1963.

Kochav, David. Administrative Aspects of Development Planning in Israel. Public Administration in Israel and Abroad 1964.

Reining, Henry, Jr. The Fourth Dimension: The Administration of Development and the University's Role. Comparative Administration Group. Special Series: No. 3 (1964).

Riggs, Fred W. The Ecology of Development. CAG Occasional Papers. American Society for Public Administration, 1964.

Stone, Donald C. (ed.) Education in Public Administration (A Symposium on Teaching Methods and Materials). Brussels: International Institute of Administrative Sciences, 1963.

Technical Assistance

Ibn-I-Shah. International Technical Assistance: Concepts and Principles. NIPA Reporter. November, 1963.

Weidner, Edward W. Technical Assistance in Public Administration Overseas: The Case for Development Administration. Public Administration Service, 1964.

INTERNATIONAL POLITICS, LAW, AND ORGANIZATION

The Democratic Civilization. By LESLIE LIPSON. (New York: Oxford University Press, 1964. Pp. xiii, 614. $7.50 and $10.00.)

Leslie Lipson has written a grand book in the grand manner. Bringing to bear a wide knowledge and understanding of political theory and comparative government he ranges across not only the United States and Great Britain but also such countries as Switzerland, Denmark, Canada, and New Zealand in his attempt to generalize about the character of modern democracy.

Some will of course be tempted to add that the book is written in the "old" style as well. There are no mentions of Talcott Parsons or David Easton; there are no four-cell tables or diagrams filled with boxes and arrows; there is no effort to adapt recent behavioral phrasings to his subject of study. While The Democratic Civilization is heavily comparative in its emphasis, in no sense at all does it try to do for the developed areas of the world what Almond and Coleman did for the developing.

What does emerge is a skilled synthesis of philosophy and institutions. The great ideas, from Plato and Pericles to Marx and Mill, are considered in tandem with parties, legislatures, and related agencies of government. References to Dickens, Shaw, Shakespeare, and Swift also catch the eye and are used to good purpose. There is, in short, a breadth and sweep of learning here that is bound to command respect. The author's imperviousness to recent methods and approaches is, in the final analysis, an asset. Each of us should do what he can do best. Those scholars reared in the earlier tradition who have tried to switch intellectual horses-or to straddle both at once-have more often than not ended up floundering in the stream. The point is that this book, by not seeking to be all things to all readers, comes forth as a study from which students of varied persuasions can profit.

This is a study of what might be called the traditions and institutions of civility. While much of the focus is on the modes and mechanisms of majority rule, the abiding concern is with social and political patterns which elevate the quality of human life. The assumption is that the United States and the United Kingdom, as well as some smaller countries, are not only democracies but are on their way to solving most of the problems that persist in their midst. The tone is optimistic, at times even to a fault, and there are occasions when one begins to wonder if there is much of anything left to worry about. At all events, there exists the premise that the philosophy of such writers as Aristotle, Locke, and Jefferson has been transmuted into prevailing democratic ideology. This philosophy, however, was as much aristocratic as it was democratic. While the principle of majority-rule was approved it was assumed that the populous would refrain from getting big ideas about itself. Thus the values of civility would prevail despite the growth in suffrage and the rise of leaders sprung from the people. These values call for the defense and encouragement of civil liberties and civil rights, of constitutionalism and liberal learning. They require an atmosphere of moderation, maturity, and self-imposed restraint. These social and intellectual underpinnings of democratic civility are examined in various national settings, and particularly impressive are the chapters showing how potentially explosive issues like language and religion have been resolved in diverse settings.

The conclusion is that on the whole the people have not overstepped their proper bounds. To the query whether democratic majorities have been prone to acts of tyranny, the answer is that fears of such excesses have seldom been realized. Yet it would have been interesting to have some reflections on a few of the current debates like the one over the quality of democratic culture: in art and literature, education, even entertainment. The consumers with the highest bidding power have been accused of driving serious matter from the air-waves and the classrooms. This is, in a sense that is both real and political, an act of a majority's tyranny over a minority. Alternatively advanced democratic societies are increasingly characterized by large corporate institutions which seem to be able to make plans and exercise power without having to ask for public permission. Neither Aristotle nor Rousseau knew of such institutions, and it may well be that the principles embodied in the traditional corpus of theory has less relevance today than might at first be thought. At all events the tendencies of a mass society and a corporate society are both inimical to the tradition of civility. Whether the public has too much or too little power, or even just about the right amount, there is reason for suspecting that forces making for civilized life have been weakening and are failing to be renewed.

One final query: Is The Democratic Civilization a textbook or isn't it? The publisher quotes two prices, for text and non-text use. Clearly the textbook appurtenances are there: frequent subheads, minimal footnotes, an all-tco-brief bibliography. There has been a tendency for serious thematic studies (in the field of political theory the recent works by Sheldon Wolin, Carl Friedrich, Roland Pennock and David Smith come to mind) to try to appeal to two markets at once: not only to one's professional colleagues but to bid for wide classroom adoptions as well. Whether such attempts can be successful is problematical. The books must be longer, more step-by-step, if they are to be used in undergraduate courses. This tends to put off the advanced reader, who is disinclined to sit down with a textbook-looking book of a leisurely evening. At the same time such volumes can only really be effective for a semester of teaching if the instructor is willing to recast his course outline to accord with the theme and content of the book. And this is unlikely to happen in many places. But just because this book is not likely to be successful as a text does not mean that its appearance should frighten away the serious student. Leslie Lipson has brought a fresh mind and wide learning to bear on a vital subject. Any political scientist can consider this book as part of his education.—Andrew Hacker, Cornell University.

Germany and Europe: Reflections on German Foreign Policy. By Heinrich von Brentano, translated by Edward Fitzgerald. (New York: Frederich A. Praeger, 1964. Pp. 224. $5.95.)

This volume is an abbreviated version of a book published 1962 in West Germany under the title Deutschland, Europa, und die Welt: Raden zur deutschen Aussenpolitik. It contains a collection of speeches given by the late Heinrich von Brentano during the formidable years of the Bonn Republic. The author commenced his political career after World War II as Landtag representative in Hesse, was elected to the Bundestag in 1949, became Chairman of the Parliamentary Group of the Christian Democratic Union in the federal legislature, and served as Foreign Minister from 1955 to 1961.

The speeches in this book cover a much broader field than the sub-title suggests, and extend, in terms of substance and time, from the economic and political consolidation of the three Western zones of occupied Germany to the problems of the Atlantic Community in the 1960's. The volume can be divided into four sections: the first collection of essays deals with issues and problems related to the establishment of the Federal Republic of Germany. Here the author discusses the political tasks of the Länder, the problem of de-nazification, and the Bonn Statute. The second part concerns European unification. It includes speeches on Franco-German understanding, the Schuman Plan, European political unification, and the future of the Atlantic Community. The third section features speeches on the German problem and West German foreign policy. The author speaks out on the issue of all-German elections and self-determination, discusses the German problem in connection with Western foreign policy, explains West German policy toward Eastern Europe, and elucidates cultural and economic considerations in foreign policy. The final part of the book contains some miscellaneous speeches and statements, among them an obituary for John Foster Dulles, a memorial address in honor of Gustav Stresemann, and Mr. von Brentano's resignation statement.

Some criticism might be made about the selection of the articles. The German original includes some speeches that might have been of interest to the student of German politics, but, unfortunately, have not been put into the publication under review. For example, Mr. von Brenatano's speeches endorsing West German accession to the Council of Europe, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and the European Economic Community should have been included. Also missing in the Praeger publication are the author's 1958 speech on the ardently debated topic of disengagement in Central Europe and some informative talks on West German foreign policy considerations in 1959 and 1960.

In general, the translation is quite satisfactory. Moreover, the English in this volume is less stilted than one encounters in a number of other translations. On the negative side, however, it should be said that the reviewer found the constant use of "Federal Landtag" (instead of Bundestag) slightly irritating. There are also some minor substantive errors in this volume which are not found in the German original. But despite these and a few other criticisms that might be made, the volume constitutes a desirable addition to the English-language sources on contemporary German politics. For, with the exception of Weymar's dated Konrad Adenauer: His Authorized Biography little is yet available in the English language that renders a primary account of the West German government's position on the issues that were widely argued between the spokesmen of the government and the Social Democratic leaders in the 1950's.—HERBERT R. WINTER, Rhode Island College.

The Two Viet-Nams: A Political and Military Analysis. By Bernard B. Fall. (New York: Praeger, 1963. Pp. xii, 493. $7.95.)

South Vietnam: Nation under Stress. By ROBERT SCIGLIANO. (Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co., 1963. Pp. ix. 227, Plus unbound insertion "Epilogue: The Coup d'Etat," 9 p. $3.50; $1.95 paper.)

Written by two scholars of different backgrounds, and appearing almost simultaneously. these two works achieve an amazing degree of analytical and evaluative convergence as to the events and personalities making up the story of Viet-Nam in the 1954-1963 decade. Scigliano's work is compact with well-organized and accurate information (except for the error on the beginnings of the Vietnamese press, p. 177). The main body of the analysis, consisting of Chapters 4 to 8, gives much emphasis to administrative behavior. His study of political personalities and party system in South Viet-Nam is perhaps the best short treatment available, even though the casual reader may find it quite hard to keep track of the numerous unfamiliar names mentioned. A good case-study of recent U.S. foreign relations can be found in the last chapter. Unequal to the main analysis are Chapters 2 and 3, as well as the hastily put together epilogue on the November 1, 1963 coup which toppled the Diem regime. Other factors favoring his book are its relative brevity and a stylistic restraint which takes the sting out of his critical comments.

Unlike Scigliano's book, Fall's The Two Viet-Nams is not his first major work on this topic in which he has specialized for about a dozen years. Even to this day he seems to be better known for his The Viet-Minh Regime and Street without Joy than for this impressive compendium in which the common background as well as the separate ways taken by North and South Viet-Nam since partition are treated. Despite some technical shortcomings, this work might well be the most important study of contemporary Viet-Nam since Philippe Devillers' Histoire du Viet-Nam de 1940 à 1952 and Jean Lacouture-Philippe Devillers' La fin d'une guerre (Paris: Editions du Seuil, 1952 and 1960 respectively). The best part of Fall's book is found in Chapters 8 and 9 dealing with political organization and social changes in North Viet-Nam, and Chapters 15 and 16 dealing with the revolutionary insurgency in South Viet-Nam. In these two chapters, Fall speaks his mind on the political and military miscalculations of both Saigon and Washington. His asperity on the subject has undoubtedly provoked negative reactions from Foggy Bottom and Pentagon men. This otherwise good book is also marred by the apparent haste in editing. For example, the complex events of 1945-1954 are fragmented by artificially dividing them between Chapters 6-7 and Chapters 10-11. Source indications are missing in several instances, notably in quotes of Dean Acheson (p. 61), François Mitterand (p. 221), and Ngo Dinh Diem (p. 237). Also scattered misspellings, and especially the randomized and partial use of some Vietnamese diacritical marks give the impression that the book was not proofread carefully. (In my opinion, diacritical marks are better left out completely in a publication of this kind, as is done in Scigliano's book.) These editing defects should not, however, detract the reader from the generally sound substance of both of these works.

Addressing themselves mainly to Americans, Fall and Scigliano devote a great part of their works to the past American involvement in Viet-Nam and to its future course. They remind the reader that the United States has in various ways been involved in Viet-Nam since 1940, and especially since the Dulles-Eisenhower's commitments first to help the all-but-defeated French before 1954 and the Ngo Dinh Diem regime thereafter. Yet U.S. dealings withthe Vietnamese and the French have been so confused and improvised that a network of mutual distrust now envelop all three governments. For both the U.S. and South Viet-Nam, the lack of a concerted overall policy except for a sterile anti-communist negativism has had the effect of a self-fulfilling delusion. Thus for example, the 1956-1962 "sink-or-swim-with-Diem" line had resulted in preventing the consolidation of any serious alternative to the Diem regime besides the Communist-led National Liberation Front which directed the anti-Saigon guerilla war. Fall emphasizes the fact that for too long the U.S. has engaged in "wildly wishful thinking" and indulged in "illusion[s] of victory" which were reinforced at dependable intervals by high-ranking executive, military, and Congressional spokesmen. For both authors, the U.S. has also for too long refused to recognized the nationalistic-revolutionary character of the anti-Saigon insurgents. At any rate, these were fast capturing peasant support, beginning at least as early as 1958, while the U.S.-backed Diem regime was shrinking steadily from contacts-except propped-up ones-with the people. Both Washington and Saigon were above all preoccupied with "security," unfortunately defined in almost exclusively negative, static, and military terms. Fall's description of the routinized outmaneuverings of Washington by Saigon (p. 270) is amusingly-or rather pathetically-apt. For both authors, South Viet-Nam appears to be the classic case of "a puppet who pulls the strings" (Scigliano, p. 216), a situation most frustrating to a superpower.

Much more solid substance is contained in these books than could possibly be reviewed in an article of this length. These works are to be recommended for those who seriously desire some indepth understanding of the Vietnamese problem. It is also recommended that they be read with self-restraint, for not only the reality they relate is often unpleasant, but also because Viet-Nam has been and continues to be a puzzle of bewildering complexity. And while there appeas to be no easy solution offered in these honestly written books, their contribution has been indeed substantial toward a better comprehension of the current situation.—Phan Thien Chau, University of Denver.

The Court of European Communities: New Dimensions in International Adjudication. By Werner Feld. (The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff, 1964. Pp. viii, 127. Guilders 13.50. $3.75.)

The Court of European Communities, replacing the Court of the Coal and Steel Community, is an institution novel in its scope and setting. Although the Court has been in existence for a relatively short period of time, it has achieved a stature and status in its work for the Common Market to cause the writer of this book to say, "If the United States of Europe should become a reality in the future, it is highly probable that the Court of Justice of the European Communities, now sitting in Luxembourg, will be transformed into the supreme court of the new federation" (p. vii). He thinks the Court has achieved this status because it handles conflicts both in the economic and in the political fields, and it has "developed a body of 'European' case law which, in time, is likely to have favorable implications for the eventual unification of Europe" (p. vii). The impact of the decisions of the Court has been felt and has been reflected in the public policy of the members of the Community.

The author makes no claim that his treatise is a legal study, in the narrow sense, but he does examine the legal problems which the Court of necessity must decide. He says, "These problems are not analyzed and evaluated in depth; rather emphasis is placed on the economic and political implications which some of these problems have within the context of the struggle for a new Europe" (p. 3). He coes describe, however, at some length and in depth the professional background and qualifications of the judges, the organization, procedure, and jurisdiction of the Court, and the factors and forces which affect the decisions of the Court.

The Court is one unit of the over-all governmental structure. There is an executive composed of four bodies: the High Authority of the ECSC, the Commission of the EEC, the Commission of Euratom, and the Council of Ministers. The legislature is the European Parliament composed of 142 delegates appointed by the legislatures of the six Members. "The Parliament is not authorized to legislate nor does it have full budgetary control" (p. 9). The structure of the Court is defined in the provisions of the treaty between its members (France, West Germany, Italy, Belgium, Luxembourg, and the Netherlands). It is composed of seven judges chosen by the six Member States for a period of six years, with election on a staggered basis. Only nationals of the Members are eligible to serve on the Court. One special feature of the Court is that its judges may be removed by the other judges if "in the unanimous opinion of the other members of the Court, they no longer fulfill the required conditions or meet the obligations of office" (p. 15). Access to the Court may be had by the Member States (the Court has exclusive jurisdiction over such cases and the treaty provides a Member State may not use the International Court of Justice in disputes under the treaty), by the major organs of the Community, by private persons and by private enterprises, and by the Board of Governors of the European Investment Bank. A unique feature of jurisdiction is that the Court itself may be sued in civil service matters. The Court finds its sources of law from: the Treaties between the Members, the acts and regulations of the institutions of the Community, municipal laws, and the Court's own jurisprudence. International law has played a minor role as a source of law before the Court.

In numerous instances the author compares and contrasts the work and function of this Court with that of the Supreme Court of the United States. A more important and apt comparison, however, is made with the success and effectiveness of this Court and the Central American Court of Justice. Although the latter Court had compulsory jurisdiction over cases between private persons and between states, it handled only 10 cases during the ten years of its existence, 1908 to 1918. "In contrast to the performance of the Central American Court, the Court of European Communities rendered during the first eleven years of its existence—specifically up to February 18, 1964-113 decisions and opinions and over 90 cases were pending on that date" (p. 106). The major litigations came from private persons, although a number of cases came from Member States, and a few came from organs of the Communities.

This book deserves careful reading and study by laymen and by students interested in the field of jurisprudence. It shows careful and intensive research on the part of the author. He not only describes what the Court is now, but he shows, from a realistic viewpoint, what the court might become. It is a work tinged with a high degree of imagination.—James A. Gathings, Bucknell University.

The Changing Structure of International Law. By Wolfgang Friedmann. (New York: Columbia University Press, 1964. Pp. xvi, 410. $8.75.)

Many books in this century dealt with change in international law. The present volume, from the learned and prolific pen of Columbia's professorial Director of International Legal Research, belongs to those which primarily describe rather than urge the development which the law has taken or ought to undergo. Using the sociological approach made popular in this country's legal writings by Roscoe Pound, the author first analyzes the profound horizontal and vertical changes which the last generation has seen in the structure and scope of international relations. their effect upon helpless individuals and sovereign states, and the conflicts of power, of interests, and of values or the co-operation generated by common or diverse objectives. Conflict and cooperation, he argues, demand and gave rise to two types of international law: the traditional "diplomatic" international law of co-ordination confirming sovereignty and aiming at the preservation of the status quo and the peaceful coexistence of states, and a new, modern, or progressive international law of co-operation, welfare, or reciprocity hostile to sovereignty and concerned with economic, social and cultural matters. Both of these laws move on a regional or universal, a transnational, supranational, or international level of structure, scope, and intensity. The author next inquires into the reality and validity, the sanctions and consensual basis, of international law, the principles and processes of procuring change in it, and the new fields-tentatively described as international constitutional, administrative, labor, criminal, commercial (including economic development), corporation, anti-trust and tax law-added by these methods to international welfare or co-operation law. Change, while leaving the state as the main, the only full, the only law-making subject of international law and the basic unit of international society, has also brought the recognition of international organizations, private corporations, and individuals as more or less limited, even only ad hoc, subjects of this law. Further, the forces behind change have created a complex pattern of international status quo or security and progressive or welfare organizations. These too move on a regional or universal level and have more or less intensive functions, powers, organization, and success depending on the conflict or harmony of the institutionalized human purposes. Change also poses the problem of the actual or potential universality of international law in the face of the political, economic, and ideological diversity of the world. On this we read that diversity leaves unaffected the conditions of coexistence of differing sovereign states, thus permitting a universal international law of coexistence, but that divergence restricts the international law of co-operation to homogeneous value groups. A summary and conclusions close the volume. There is a list of writings cited and an index.

The great merit of this book lies not so much in its originality as in its thorough, systematic, and readable survey of the more recent literature on the new trends in international law and organization and in its attempt to analyze these changes in their importance and interdependence. While primarily descriptive and analytical, the book, however, also provides intellectual stimulation. It bristles with suggestions for improvement or solutions of the problems encountered. Throughout discussion is objective and balanced even if sympathies on the side of law and order vs. conflict and anachronistic sovereignty orientate, as they always do, judgment regarding improvement and solution and construction regarding trends. The volume also tenders food to critics. Sometimes, breadth seems achieved at the expense of depth and historical accuracy. The division of international law and organization into coexistence and co-operation institutions, the claim regarding new fields of this law, and the arguments concerning its theoretical foundations. its sanction, sources, and subjects will not remain unquestioned. Some might criticize a few repetitious statements, a few errors of fact, a few logical contradictions, a few printer's misspellings and botched sentences, a reader's deficiencies in compiling the list of writings and the index, the author's English way of spelling. Few will, however, deny on any of these grounds the merits and usefulness of the book. It still makes very meaty, very interesting, very fluent, often eloquent, and always learned essential reading for the political scientist interested in or teaching international relations, organization and law .-- George Man-NER, University of Illinois.

In Pursuit of World Order: U.S. Foreign Policy and International Organizations. By Richard N. Gardner. (New York: F. A. Praeger, 1964. Pp. 263. $4.95.)

The basic theme permeating this analysis was expressed by Ambassador Adlai Stevenson, who wrote the Introduction: "... the most powerful nation in the world is less able to employ its power alone, in pursuit of national ends, than at any previous point in history." Building upon and elaborating this theme, Richard N. Gardner—who has been intimately involved in American foreign policy in the United Nations since 1961—discusses the evolution and future of the UN, as it relates to the fulfillment of the diplomatic goals of the United States.

Although the author does not say so, it seems clear that his appraisal is designed for the general public, rather than for the informed student. It appears to be aimed specifically at those groups who are apprehensive, dubious or otherwise uncertain about the United Nations. And this group in turn is composed of two antithetical schools of thought: those who regard the United Nations as an instrument inimical to, and potentially destructive of, America's global interests; and those who feel that the United Nations (owing largely to the failure of American leadership) has not reached the standards set in 1945 or measured up to its true potential.

It should occasion no surprise that Mr. Gardner belongs to neither school. If he freely admits the UN's limitations, he also is impressed with its accomplishments; and if he believes the organization has considerable potential for future growth, he is no less aware that Utopian expectations may impair its future as certainly as undisguised opposition. The author seems to be telling the reader something like this: "Many valid criticisms can be, and have been, made about the United Nations. Throughout the entire range of its activities-from involvement in the Congo, to disarmament proceedings, to the operation of UNESCO—there is room for much improvement. No one understands this fact better than American officials. Yet they are also aware-more aware than most members of the public-of the UN's achievements, of its expanding influence on the global scene, and of its capacity for continued growth. In the vast preponderance of cases, it is in the interest of the United States both to support the United Nations and to lend its influence to efforts directed at enhancing its powers."

In short, the author is endeavoring to dispel two conflicting myths: the idea that the UN is infringing upon national sovereignty—or the myth of UN usurpation; and the idea that it has no future—or the myth of UN impotency.

Mr. Gardner's qualifications for this assignment are impeccable. On the basis of first-hand experience at the UN, he obviously has command of his subject, familiarity with relevant documentary and secondary materials, and a perceptive grasp of the intricacies of the issues with which the UN is concerned. Most of the time, he is able to communicate his ideas smoothly, lucidly, and readably.

Yet occasionally his volume is also tedious; written like a guidebook describing the scope of UN activities; and content to reiterate official policy statements. In terms of space devoted to various aspects of his subject, the author suggests that the function of the United Nations as a peace-keeping agency is of equal importance with the achievement of international agreements on outer space; both topics receive approximately the same coverage. By the same standard, the UN "decade of development" is on a par with the Soviet Union's role in the organization. Put differently, out of a total of 263 pages, well over half is devoted to the non-political aspects of the UN's work.

Intrinsically, of course, there is nothing wrong with this division. In practice, however, it means that sometimes the author's discussion of bedrock political problems confronting the UN—and causing deep anxiety among some groups in American society—boils down to little more than assurances that all is well for American interests; the description of the operations of the International Monetary Fund, on the other hand, reaches a complexity of treatment fully understandable by, and of interest to, only expert economists.

In most respects, however, Mr. Gardner has written an informative, helpful, and provocative book which ought to contribute significantly to raising the level of American enlightenment about the United Nations.—Cecil V. Crabb, Jr., Vassar College.

Law and Politics of the Danube. By STEPHEN GOROVE. (The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff, 1964. Pp. xiv, 171. $5.80.)

In his introduction to Gorove's book Hans Kohn regrets that more attention has not been paid to the role of the Danube in international relations and law in recent years. Unfortunately this study does not fill the need.

More than half of the study is devoted to Soviet-American relations. While those relations have greatly influenced the status of the Danube after World War II they have also been covered in many books. Mr. Gorove adds very little that has not been known before and has consulted few original sources. The Danube is occasionally out of focus. When its problems reemerge clearly one looks in vain for an analysis in depth. The subtitle of the book is "An Interdisciplinary Study." One wonders what approach the author believes he has employed other than a somewhat traditional historical one?

The author does provide an adequate, though extremely brief (pp. 22–36), historical survey of the status of the Danube up to World War II. The main part (pp. 67–132) covers the 3 post-World War II years which culminated in the 1948 Belgrade Convention. It is in this section that the author rehashes alleged American policy failures in not preventing the consolidation by the Soviet Union of its control over Eastern Europe. While the author occasionally admits that power relationships were at the root of Soviet diplomatic successes, he cannot refrain from suggesting that the United States was bested in Eastern Europe because of our inability to recognize the nature of the Soviet challenge. The author does not support his allegations with any new documentary evidence.

While the last chapter (pp. 133-156) purports to bring the account up to 1962 it does this only in the most superficial manner by relating the announced accomplishments of the periodic meetings of the New Danube Commission. The relevant activities of the Council for Mutual Economic Assistance (COMECON) are referred to briefly in a footnote. The exciting history of the stresses and strains of the Eastern European satellites (aside from Tito's defection) is not even mentioned.

It would have been useful if some of the treaties and agreements regulating the Danube had been reproduced in an appendix. The bibliography is extremely brief, however the footnotes are useful guides for further research.—Curt F. Beck, University of Connecticut.

The Socialist Commonwealth of Nations: Organizations and Institutions. By Kazimierz Grzybowski. (New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1964. Pp. xvii, 300. $7.50.)

This volume is a chronology of the formal bodies which have been created in Eastern Europe primarily during the last decade in the hope of giving the so-called socialist commonwealth an institutional and legal basis. The author has reviewed the charters, agreements and communiques of the various bodies and given them a legal interpretation. The difficulty in using official Communist commentaries without weighing and interpreting them in the light of the overall political picture and other evidence available is that it is impossible to separate fact from fiction. Furthermore, the official works do not permit a penetrating analysis of even the legal questions to which the communists seem to want to give maximum publicity. For example, the author points out that Eastern European states consider the pattern of their trade relations to be unique because of its planned and unexploitive character and because governments are the sole trading partner under socialism. But except for a few superficial points of difference as shown in the basic agreements the author is unable to show how this special relationship has worked in practice, developed over the years, and how disputes in fact are resolved under the system.

From this survey of the formal relations among the members of the Soviet bloc the reader is struck by how undeveloped the institutions are compared to the West and how the bloc has borrowed extensively from its neighbors. Apparently this was done not only to retaliate against Western integration and defense moves as in the case of COMECON and the Warsaw Pact, but in the hope of copying the success of Western integration and economic development. Another incongruity of these formal institutions is that they have developed only as the solidarity of the Soviet bloc manifested so absolutely during the Stalin era is falling apart. Apparently the various forms of economic cooperation were conceived to replace the political and military coercion of the earlier period but it is questionable whether they can reverse the disentegration. Unfortunately the author does not deal with these questions. The volume, however, is a useful tabulation of the multilateral economic and military agreements within the Soviet bloc as they have developed thus far. - DAVID T. CATTELL, University of California, Los Angeles.

The Scientific Revolution and World Politics. By Caryl P. Haskins. (New York: Harper and Row, 1964. Pp. ix, 115. $3.50.)

The President of the Carnegie Institution is a research biologist of wide-angled perspective, at home in both science affairs and foreign affairs. In The Scientific Revolution and World Politics he discusses issues in which the two kinds of affairs intersect. It is not the dramatic scientific developments of the atomic age to which Caryl Haskins addresses himself in this slender volume of essays: the scientific revolution is for him the revolution in the search for truth which has flourished in Europe and the Europeanized world since the time of Isaac Newton. The world politics of which he writes is, on the other hand, defined narrowly; he is concerned with contemporary issues of American foreign policy as they affect or are affected by the uneven and unevenly growing acceptance of scientific ways of thinking in various parts of the world. One finds in this book no clarion call for the mobilization of American and "free World" science to "win" the cold war or to defeat the Soviet opponent in actual hostilities. Success in the Apollo Project will do little, he suggests, to solve problems which are his most immediate concern, those connected with the spread to the non-Western world of the West's scientific revolution.

Mr. Haskins is not insensitive to the Soviet threat and quotes approvingly a reference to the Soviet state as "the scavenger of transition." If the adoption of new scientific ways of thinking losens some of the ties that hold traditional societies together, it offers at the same time a new basis for binding them back together; it is for this "extremely vulnerable" transition period that the United States choices must be most carefully made.

Mr. Haskins differentiates the truly new nations in which, as one West African educator put it, the need is not for "prestige projects but the answers to our own witch doctors" from the intermediate nations whose educated élites already have some experience of the scientific revolution but have as yet no autonomous scientific tradition. In the new nations the problem is the absolute scarcity of men attuned to the modern world's scientific "style"; in such "intermediate" nations as Pakistan, Indonesia and Turkey available scientific talent is not yet organized and deployed to serve such nations effectively.

So far as Western Europe is concerned, Carvl Haskins is content to preach the gospel of Jean Monnet. The United States followed Europe's lead in basic science down to the Second World War: and it has since forged ahead, he thinks. largely because of the absence of intra-continental barriers to the free flow of ideas and men. As for the Soviet Union his estimate is guardedly optimistic; the scientists and technologists may be a liberalizing element, and the Soviet monolith may not be able to sustain scientific advance as evenly and on as broad a front as the pluralistic American system. The Soviet Union, however, in contrast with China, has been able to mount its scientific effort on the basis of a Western scientific tradition that antedates the Soviet regime.

It is no criticism of The Scientific Revolution and World Politics that it provides no answers to questions which its author does not ask, e.g.: How is the spread of the scientific revolution likely to affect the relative position of the powers in the coming decades? What are the political consequences of unequal rates of scientific change among various states and groups of states? Is the gap in scientific and technological achievement between the leading states and the others likely to widen or narrow? What may be the consequences for world politics of varying degrees of mobilization of science in the interest of national security? With arms control agreements to what extent would scientists be liberated to work on non-military problems and with what consequences? How is state behavior affected by the incorporation of scientists into the highest levels of national decision-making? Etc., etc.

What Caryl Haskins does do is to argue in a reasoned and humane way for a number of policyrelevant propositions such as the following. Zones of free inquiry need to be wider than the territory of most existing states, and especially some of the new states. The new states especially need 'crossnational co-operative training centers." The most relevant technologies for the new nations are not necessarily nuclear. The intermediate nations can be shown how to use the scientists they now have with much greater effectiveness. Scientists of North America and Western Europe need to organize advisory groups to offer policy counsel to the scientists of less advanced nations. Above all, the gains in winning races to the moon and in being first in other prestige projects are ephemeral as compared with the gains to be derived from ministering to the needs of nations on the threshold of the scientific revolution.—WILLIAM T. R. Fox, Institute of War and Peace Studies, Columbia University.

International Stability. EDITED BY DALE J. HEKHUIS, CHARLES G. MCCLINTOCK AND ARTHUR L. BURNS. (New York: John Wiley & Sons, Inc., 1964. Pp. xii, 296. $6.00.)

This anthology grew out of a study project originally undertaken by the author-editors for General Electric's Technical Military Planning Operation (TEMPO), "exploring the military, economic, and political nature of the future international environment and identifying possible alternative strategies for coping with various contingencies." Identifying it as a pragmatic approach, the small volume draws together a number of items that have been published elsewhere, woven around the central theme "International Stability" (or rather, the lack of it) and arranged according to the unsolved problems in underdeveloped areas, mutual deterrence, disarmament-arms control and international organization.

Robert C. Tucker joins the primary authors in a collegial introduction which asserts that the two overriding realities of our day are the "thermonuclear balance of terror" and the "social revolutions in the underdeveloped areas of the world." Stability is defined to assume constant change within and among the constituent elements of world society, but within a system that has the propensity to preserve its members "against destruction or elimination, not merely by resisting or precluding change, but by adjusting to it through rearrangement." The succeeding essays strive to identify threats to stability in the system and to suggest strategies and specific measures for promoting international order.

Lucian Pye's piece on underdeveloped areas (Ch. 3) is a good analysis of the slowly evolving realization in the United States public that the end of colonialism, even with technical and financial aid, was not an unmixed blessing. Indeed, it has added new challenges to our national security wholly unrelated to the Communist threat. The dimensions examined are (1) strain on the existing nation-state system, (2) strain between advanced and developing states, (3) rivalries among developing states and (4) uncertain controls within themselves. Pye forecasts growing tension through 1975.

Paul Rosenstein-Rodan joined Hekhuis in canvassing the most promising programs for alleviating instability in underdeveloped areas. Six suggestions in the technical assistance field seem to be the brightest prospects, but here it is noted the U.S. is particularly weak. Among 26 "Free World Nations" offering on-the-job training exchange programs the United States ranks 18th. Beyond this distinctly pragmatic method, the authors displayed a pronounced confidence in the efficacy of research itself.

Those familiar with the writing of Robert Osgood and Tom Schelling will already have seen their worthwhile contributions on nuclear deterrence and arms control. Arthur Burns' look at the Nth Country problem, however, is novel. He assumes a 4-power world in 1970-the USA, USSR, Europe and Communist China; or, alternatively, a bi-polar world with other blocs forced into dependence on the now-familiar East-West goliaths. While exploring rather thoroughly numerous alternatives, the assumptions and variables become so profuse as to produce a model containing too many "ifs" to be even mildly reassuring that stability is more than an accidental possibility. Sample reservation: "The Russians . . . might not share (in its entirety) the West's conception of rational behavior" (p. 129).

A common pattern throughout the book, both useful and disjunctive at times, is the opening of chapters with a set of hypotheses. This technique, so essential to scientific precision, often leads the student of politics into the employment of unstated assumptions or, a worse fault, the construction of a model that may have little recognizable similarity to reality. In Chapter 7, McClintock and Hekhuis excellently evaluate the merits of an independent European deterrent based on the assumptions that (1) current NATO deterrent strategy based on U.S. nuclear retaliatory capability is inadequate and inappropriate for strategic defense of Europe, and (2) formation of a European Community organization with independent strategic force is both desirable and feasible. However, one senses that the solution is dependent on the unstated assumption that historic nationalistic drives and rivalries that appear to defy logic will somehow succumb to this superior logical analysis.

Burns is somewhat more candid in this regard when in his chapter on "Problems of Disarmament" he opens by citing the argument that "the fortunate accident of a stable deterrent system or 'balance of terror' makes disarmament undesirable," and even if desirable currently impossible; but amid the evaluation of evidence observes, "It may turn out there is no way of arriving at stable disarmament. But if so, neither is there a substitute for it." As much as anything in the book, this is an admission that the facts with which we work are as unstable as they are alarmingly real.

Taken as a whole, the collection of writing that makes up this book would be most useful to the people least likely to read it—those who are inclined to oversimplify issues and plunge into easy solutions. The concluding chapter (U.N. as Peace-Preserving Force) is characteristic. In analyzing problems and contingencies the work is excellent. In providing solutions, or even fruitful methods for identifying solutions, there is apt to be more frustration than illumination. Although alluded to, none of the co-authors of this book ever comes to grip with the common element of destabilizing force that permeates most of their actual and assumed situations—the heterogeneity of value systems and inability to communicate among ideologies and cultures. For me, at least, there is something very incomplete about discussions of international stability in terms of "thermonuclear deterrence" in an age in which the greater number of world troublespots are inhabited by people who could not care less-even if they understood its significance.—James A. Riedel, State University of New York, Graduate School of Public Affairs.

The European Community and Its Role in the World. By Max Kohnstamm. (Columbia, Mo.: The University of Missouri Press, 1964. Pp. 82. $2.50.)

This slender book by Max Kohnstamm (former member of the Dutch Foreign Service, High Authority of E.C.S.C., and now Vice President of the Action Committee for the United States of Europe) constituted the John Findley Green Foundation lectures at Westminster College in March 1963, in which the author examined the philosophy behind the European Community, its relationship with Britain and the United States, and its prospects for the future. Because of events in 1963—especially the test ban treaty and the death of President Kennedy—Kohnstamm added an epilogue in January 1964, but the story is still anticlimactic, though he believes that the British entry has been only delayed.

Kohnstamm's basic assumption is that Europe can become a force for peace only if it is federalized. War had been a traditional necessity, to right the balance when disturbed, but when both economics and politics became aspects of nationalism, the law of the jungle applied to both. Only after World War II was it evident that economic nationalism and war were so catastrophic that the old system was unable to provide civilization with a framework in which it could continue. A common interest had to be created between peoples whose interests had heretofore been divided by national boundaries. "A common interest leads to a common view." The Coal and Steel Community was an appropriate beginning, and its institutions permit Community decisions, the essence of the new system.

In 1945 Britain reverted to its traditional role of being both in and out of Europe at the same time. Standing at the center of a group of interconnecting circles and not belonging completely to any one of them, Britain refused to join the Coal and Steel Community, EDC, and at first the Common Market. Although the United States had also withdrawn from Europe after World War I, it understood in 1945 that this could happen again only by accepting Soviet comination of Europe. The United States could escape from Europe only by helping Europe to unite, which she did, until Europe is now no longer a protege but a partner of America. Given this new situation, Britain moved to join the European Community.

Kohnstamm says that most of the British-Community problems were soluble, and were largely solved during the negotiations. The fundamental difficulty resulted from a French failure to recognize that the Community is a process and not a new bloc or a new Power. While trying to mold the Community into a 19th century coalition, France acted contrary to the spirit of the Community, which is that of common action collectively decided upon. The free nations will unite only if they can establish the necessary collective mechanisms. It is a clear phoice: states are condemned to remain in the jungle or they must build the institutions which permit collective action. They must choose between the 19th century and the 20th century.

Many Council decisions now requiring unanimity can be taken, after 1965, by majority decision. But the parliamentary influence within the Community's institutions must be strengthened. The procedure for nominating the Commission must be revised to give citizens a direct influence. A delegation of foreign policy and defense powers must be made, though unity here can be reached only gradually. The Community and America must be interdependent.

Little in this book is new. The student of contemporary affairs will not need to tarry long. The book provides, rather, a general knowledge of the European Community, told in a clear fashion that can be understood by the general public which, after all, is the type of audience for which it was intended.—Donald G. Bishop, Syracuse University.

The Management of Defense: Organization and Control of the U.S. Armed Forces. By John C. Ries. (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins Press, 1964. Pp. xviii, 228. $6.50.)

This provocative book by a member of the Department of Political Science at the United States Air Force Academy is an account of the continuing problems of armed services unification and defense organization. Essentially it is a thoughtful and spirited attack upon the "myth" that control can be established through centralization.

By analyzing the response to the lessons of the second World War, the debates leading to the National Security Act of 1947 and to amendments to the Act of 1949, and to the defense reorganizations of 1953 and 1958, Ries contends that "the folklore of organizational efficiency and control" have largely been unsuccessful. According to this folklore, efficiency and control are achieved by "the all powerful executive who sits at the apex of a tightly organized, tightly run organizational pyramid—the man who makes all decisions, the man who runs things from the top down." As a matter of fact, however, the efforts of defense reformers to create such a structure have brought about a vast, centralized bureaucracy that is beyond control.

The concept of control through centralization of authority is derived from the principle of hierarchical organization inherited from the United States Army. This principle, however, is based upon assumptions that are disproved by contemporary studies in organizational behavior. As the structure becomes larger, the executive at the top becomes increasingly removed from the operations he seeks to control. He is reduced to endorsing proposals from his subordinates, and he retains little real influence other than indicating general approval.

The prototype of Ries' ideal organizational model is found in the Operations Division of the World War II War Department. In this central command post, no attempt was made to separate policy and administrative functions. The flow of information and decisions was both upward and downward. By avoiding all operational and support responsibilities, OPD maintained control by dealing only with the broadest policy guidelines and by providing a link between goals and the instrumentalities to achieve these goals. It served as an agency by which the operators were brought into the policy process as a part of a two way continuum.

It is Ries' conviction that means and ends cannot be separated. The statesman's task does not end with a declaration of goals and the soldier's task is more than providing the means in terms of men, ships and planes. Each task shades off into the other. Thus both the statesman and the soldier must participate in policy-making. This being the case, control of defense organization is more a matter of political leadership than of administrative authority. Successive secretaries of defense have lost control when they have failed to recognize that the authority of the office depends not upon the degree of uniformity imposed upon the defense organization, but upon the agreement that can be developed among the various parties who, because of expertise, knowledge and responsibility, participate in the ends-means adjustment of policy-making. Ultimately the authority of the secretary depends upon skill in negotiation and ability to persuade others to accept a course of action by convincing them that it is in their interest to do so.

Although Ries retraces much of the ground covered by Hammong, Kintner, Schilling, Stanley and other students of defense organization, he brings to this material a fresh analysis derived from his critical use of recent contributions to the theory of organizational behavior. He is successful in this effort. Yet apart from conclusions developed in his analysis of experience between 1942 and 1958, he does not attempt to set forth recommendations for action. While recognizing that control of defense policy and organization depends more upon executive behavior than upon organizational structure, he does offer some general observations on administrative decentralization. Ries suggests only in bare outline how such decentralization might be achieved. He concludes with an almost wistful hope that Congress is the most likely source of initiative in this direction. Although not within the scope of this book. one wishes that Ries had applied his insights to the development of recommendations in the context of the administration of the Department of Defense by Secretary McNamara.-John W. MASLAND, Dartmouth College.

Problems of the Trusteeship System. Travaux de Droit, D'Economie de Sociologie et de Sciences Politiques, No. 24. By George Thullen. (Geneva, Librairie Droz, 1964.)

There are at least two good reasons why a scholar might rework a well plowed field. He may, on the one hand, uncover new data leading to a more complete or different description of a subject. Or, he might approach the same data with a new perspective, reorganizing the subject around different concepts. Professor Morgenthau's treatment of international politics, organized around the concept of power, comes to mind as an example of the latter.

The subtitle of George Thullen's, Problems of the Trusteeship System, "A Study of Political Behavior in the United Nations," offers the promise to treat in a new way a—by now—old subject. And, indeed, in his Introduction, while nodding politely in the direction of other works on trusteeship, he laments their failure to deal with "the political climate shaping the decisions taken during the different post-war phases" (p. 13). Unfortunately, the introductory promise is largely unfulfilled in the body of the work.

The book is divided into three distinct parts. Part I amounts to an unexceptional description of the formation of the trusteeship system, which adds nothing to the prior literature on the subject. Part II examines some of the procedural and substantive issues encountered by the Trusteeship Council and General Assembly, while Part

III is a case study of the Togoland issue, which is a well documented repetition and extension of James Coleman's work on the subject.¹

The most interesting chapter (V) in the book is to be found in Part II. Here the author attempts to relate developments in the trusteeship system to the changing international environment, as well as noting the contributions of members of the Secretariat to the working of the system. He indicates the connection, for example, between the shift in Soviet tactics after Stalin's death and the "package deal" of 1955, which expanded United Nations membership considerably, with the growing acceleration of anti-colonial sentiment in the General Assembly. These relationships are rather sketchily traced, however, and what might have been the basis of an interesting work on the politics of trusteeship is but a ten page essay of intriguing speculation.

The basic difficulty of the book, given its stated purpose, is that the author seems to be unclear about just what he means by politics. If one attempts a study of "political behavior," surely it ought to be clear to the reader just what is meant by that term. This is not to argue that the writer is obligated to survey completely the ever increasing mass of literature concerning concept and method in political science. But it is to assert that it is incumbent on him to make clear just what he means by "politics." The difficulties arising from a failure to do this are apparent throughout the book, especially in those parts which attempt to describe political behavior in the trusteeship system.

Consider the following paragraph concerning

¹ James S. Coleman, "Togoland," International Conciliation. No. 509 (September, 1956), pp. 1-91. the question of the Trusteeship Council's Annual Report to the General Assembly:

In essence, this long-winded dispute over the layout of the Council's report merely underlined a tendency to politicize issues brought before the Trusteeship Council, resulting from balanced membership of increasingly hostile groups and government [sic] rather than expert representation. Continuing insistence by nonadministering members that equal prominence be given majority and minority, administering and non-administering views grew out of this basic mistrust. If information supplied by administering powers were assumed to be a misrepresentation of facts, then naturally the only protection would lie in structuring the report to the advantage of the opposing group by giving equal weight to factual corrections-or counterpropaganda. Although all members claimed they were interested primarily in protecting the interests of trust territory inhabitants, this jockeying for position reflected the importance of Council members' own prestige considerations rather than of the search for a mutually acceptable objectivity. (p. 70.)

If this means anything it means: (1) politics involves conflict (a proposition to which we may all readily subscribe); but (2) something called "mutually acceptable objectivity" is a possible, indeed desireable, substitute for politics. This, to make a wild understatement, is not a widely held view among contemporary students of political behavior, whatever differences they may have.

In emphasizing the negative attributes of the book, I do not mean to imply that there is not considerable merit in it, especially in terms of thoroughness of description. But in any work purporting to contain political analysis, it is critical—particularly in the field of international organization—that the author go somewhat further than writing in terms of "politicizing" issues through conflict of policy, and "depoliticizing" them through "mutually acceptable objectivity." The point is too important for the study of international organization to pass unremarked.—James N. Murray, University of Ioua.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON

INTERNATIONAL LAW AND RELATIONS

RICHARD L. MERRITT Yale University

ARTICLES

INTERNATIONAL POLITICS

Theory and General

Adams, T. W., and Alvin J. Cottrell. The Cyprus Conflict. Orbis 8:1 (Spring 1964), 66-83.

Alonso Goméz, Gitta. La Energía Nuclear y las Relaciones Internacionales. Ciencias Políticas y Sociales. 10:36 (April-June 1964), 323-40.

Davis, Horace B. Nations, Colonies and Social Classes: The Position of Marx and Engels. Science & Society. 29:1 (Winter 1965), 26-43.

Ghosh, Oroon K. Some Theories of Universal

History. Comparative Studies in Society and History. 7:1 (October 1964), 1-20.

Hirai, N. Shinto and International Problems. World Justice. 6:2 (December 1964), 172-84.

Hoffmann, Stanley. La Roulette et la Cave: Le Risque dans les Relations Internationales. Esprit. 33:334 (January 1965), 49-75.

Horowitz, Irving Louis. Factores no Económicos en la Institucionalización de la Guerra Fría. Ciencias Políticas y Sociales. 10:35 (January-March 1964), 49-64.

Hudson, G. F. The Neutrals and the Afro-Asians. World Today. 20:12 (December 1964), 542-48.

Kirk, Grayson. World Perspectives, 1964. Foreign Affairs. 43:1 (October 1964), 1-14.

Kittrell, Edward R. The Development of the Theory of Colonization in English Classical Political Economy. Southern Economic Journal. 31: 3 (January 1965), 189-206.

Krippendorff, Ekkehart. Neo-Nationalismus und internationale Politik. Monat. 17:194 (November 1964), 9-15.

Lipson, Leon. Peaceful Coexistence. Law and Contemporary Problems. 29:4 (Autumn 1964), 871-82

Ono, Sokyo. Nationalism in Shinto: An Evaluation. Orient/West Magazine. 9:3 (May-June 1964), 39-42.

Schiller, Herbert I. International Resource Relationships in a Changing World. Social Research. 31:3 (Autumn 1964), 280-95.

Wohlstetter, Albert. Technology, Prediction, and Disorder. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. 20: 10 (October 1964), 11-16.

Political Sociology and Behavior

Alker, Hayward R., Jr. Dimensions of Conflict in the General Assembly. *American Political Sci*ence Review. 58:3 (September 1964), 642-58.

Barkun, Michael. International Norms: An Inter-Disciplinary Approach. Background. 8:2 (August 1964), 121-30.

Bernard, Jessie. Some Current Conceptualizations in the Field of Conflict. American Journal of Sociology. 70:4 (January 1965), 442-54.

Browne, Malcolm W. Viet Nam Reporting: Three Years of Crisis. Columbia Journalism Review. 3:3 (Fall 1964), 4-19.

Ekvall, Robert B. Peace and War Among the Tibetan Nomads. American Anthropologist. 66:5 (October 1964), 1119-47.

Fedder, Edwin H. Communication and American-Soviet Negotiating Behavior. Background. 8: 2 (August 1964), 105-21.

Kuroda, Yasumasa. Correlates of the Attitudes toward Peace. Background. 8:3 (November 1964), 205-14.

Leab, Daniel J. Cold War Comics. Columbia Journalism Review. 3:4 (Winter 1965), 42-48.

Merritt, Richard L. Distance and Interaction among Political Communities. General Systems Yearbook. Vol. 9 (1964), 255-63.

Munakata, Iwao. Pitirim A. Sorokin's Theory of Social Change—Centering on the Theory of War. Sophia Economic Review. 11:1 (June 1964), 9-26, 62-63.

Tanner, R. E. S. Conflict Within Small European Communities in Tanganyika. Human Organization. 24:4 (Winter 1964), 319-27.

War, Defense, and Arms Control

Bjelajac, Slavko N. Principles of Counterinsurgency, Orbis. 8:3 (Fall 1964), 655-69.

Black, Edwin F. Advisory Warfare vs. Sanctuary Warfare. U. S. Naval Institute Proceedings. 91:2 (February 1965), 34-42.

Boyer, Albert. Le Dépenses Militaires et l'Industrie. Revue de Défense Nationale. 20:12 (December 1964), 1944-54.

Coffey, J. I. A NATO Nuclear Deterrent? Orbis. 8:3 (Fall 1964), 584-94.

Doty, Paul. A Freeze on Strategic Delivery Systems. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. 21:2 (February 1965), 2-7.

Etzioni, Amitai. Strategic Models for a Policentric World. Centennial Review. 11:1 (Winter 1965), 1-20.

Flores, Xavier. Désarmement et Sous-développement. Esprit. 33:333 (December 1964), 950-69.

Gerstenmaier, Eugen. La Réforme de l'OTAN et le Système de Sécurité du Monde Libre. Politique Étrangère. 29:4 (1964), 345-58.

Glick, Edward B. The Nonmilitary Use of the Latin American Military: a More Realistic Approach to Arms Control and Economic Development. Background. 8:3 (November 1964), 161-75

Harrigan, Anthony. Conflict and Nihilism. Quarterly Review. No. 643 (January 1965), 26-32. Hayakawa, S. I. General Semantics and the Cold War Mentality. Etc. 21:4 (December 1964), 417-24.

Hinterhoff, Eugene. Problems along NATO's Flanks. Orbis. 8:3 (Fall 1964), 607-23.

Huddle, Franklin P. Political Acceptability of a Disarmament Inspection System: Its Influence on System Design Criteria and Operation. Background. 8:3 (November 1964), 175-87.

Intriligator, M. D. Some Simple Models of Arms Races. General Systems Yearbook. Vol. 9 (1964), 143-47.

Jordan, Alexander T. Political Communication: The Third Dimension of Strategy. Orbis. 8:3 (Fall 1964), 670-85.

Kerchove, Nicolas de. Feu la Force Multilaterale? Revue Générale Belge. 100:12 (December 1964), 79-86.

Malmgren, H. B. A Forward-Pause Defense for Europe. Orbis. 8:3 (Fall 1964), 595-606.

Methvin, Eugene H. Ideology and Organization in Counterinsurgency. Orbis. 8:1 (Spring 1964), 106-24.

Mulley, Frederick W. NATO's Nuclear Problems: Control or Consultation. Orbis. 8:1 (Spring 1964), 21-35.

Roth, Hellmuth. Sicherheitspolitik und die Aufgabe von Streitkräften. Wehr-Wissenschaftliche Rundschau. 14:11 (November 1964), 641-61.

Schelling, Thomas C. Signals and Feedback in the Arms Dialogue. *Bulletin of the Atomic Sci*entists. 21:2 (January 1965), 5-10. Strickland, Donald A. Scientists as Negotiators: The 1958 Geneva Conference of Experts. Midwest Journal of Political Science. 8:4 (November 1964), 372-85.

Talensky, N. Antimissile Systems and Disarmament. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. 21:2 (February 1965), 25-29.

Terfloth, Klaus. Die multilaterale Herausforderung. Aussenpolitik. 15:6 (June 1964), 379-85.

Wiesner, Jerome B., and Herbert F. York. The Test Ban and Security. Survival. 7:1 (January-February 1965), 13-21.

Young, Wayland. MLF—A West European View. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. 20:11 (November 1964), 19-22.

INTERNATIONAL COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT

Political Integration and Disintegration

Crowder, Michael. Colonial Rule in West Africa: Factor for Division or Unity? Civilisations. 14:3 (1964), 167-82.

Goodman, Elliot R. Von der Völkerverschmelzung zur Assimilierung in Nationalstaaten und Hegemonialmächten. Osteuropa. 14:11 (November 1964), 830-36.

Hickey, D. M. The Philosophical Argument for World Government. World Justice. 6:2 (December 1964), 185-210.

The Atlantic Community; and Western European Integration

Brown, Seyom. An Alternative to the Grand Design. World Politics. 17:2 (January 1965), 232-43.

Douguet, M. Consideration sur la Structure de l'Alliance Atlantique. Revue de Défense Nationale. 20:11 (November 1964), 1705-19.

Grewe, Wilhelm G. Die Zukunft der atlantischen Allianz. Aussenpolitik. 65:1 (January 1965), 5-19.

Haekkerup, Per. Europe: Basic Problems and Perspectives—A Danish View. International Affairs. 41:1 (January 1965), 1-10.

Hartley, Livingston. Atlantic Partnership—How? Orbis. 8:1 (Spring 1964), 141-52.

Heldring, J. L. Atlantic Partnership: European Unity. Survival. 7:1 (January-February 1965), 30-37.

Hoffmann, Stanley. Le Silence de l'Europe. Esprit. 32:332 (November 1964), 722-53; and 32:333 (December 1964), 915-44.

Lindberg, Leon N. Decision Making and Integration in the European Community. International Organization. 19:1 (Winter 1965), 56-81.

Merlo, Luciana. Aspetti della Politica Energetica nella Comunità Europea. Civitas. 15:9/10 (September-October 1964), 23-33.

Mirabile, Francesco, Alta Autorità della C.E.C.A.

e Fusione degli Esecutivi. Rivista di Studi Politici Internazionali. 31:3 (July-September 1964), 337-51.

Smith, Geoffrey. EFTA. Crossbow. 8:29 (October-December 1964), 39-42.

Snoy, Jean-Charles. L'Autriche et l'Integration Européenne. Revue Générale Belge. 100:11 (November 1964), 1-9.

Sommer, Theo. For an Atlantic Future. Foreign Affairs. 43:1 (October 1964), 112-26.

The Soviet Bloc

Avtorkhanov, Abdurakhman. Denationalization of the Soviet Ethnic Minorities. Studies on the Soviet Union. 4:1 (1964), 74-100.

Bird, Richard M. COMECON and Economic Integration in the Soviet Bloc. Quarterly Review of Economics and Business. 4:4 (Winter 1964), 37-49.

Crane, Robert D. The Sino-Soviet Dispute on War and the Cubar Crisis. Orbis. 8:3 (Fall 1964), 537-49.

Dan, Anca. Rumania in the Communist Camp: Notes of an Observer. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. 12:1 (January 1965), 15-22.

Degras, Jane. Changes in the Communist World. World Today. 20:12 (December 1964), 509-16.

Hsieh, Alice Langley. The Sino-Soviet Nuclear Dialogue. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. 21:1 (January 1965), 16-22.

Is Czechoslovakia Breaking Up? Contemporary Review. 207:1 (January 1965), 21-24.

Kecskemeti, Paul. After October. (RAND Corporation Paper P-2959, 1964).

Lowenthal, Richard. Has the Revolution a Future? Encounter. 24:1 (January 1965), 3-16.

-----. The Prospects for Pluralistic Communism. Dissent. 12:1 (Winter 1965), 103-43.

Meyer-Landrut, Andreas. Polyzentrismus und Wiedervereinigung. Aussenpolitik. 15:5 (May 1964), 304-12.

Montias, John Michael. Communist Rule in Eastern Europe. Foreign Affairs. 43:2 (January 1965), 331-48.

Sen, Mohit. Great Divide in Communist Ideology. India Quarterly. 20:4 (October-December 1964), 351-71.

Sterpellone, Alfonso. La Destituzione di Khrushcev e la Crisi del Sistema Intercomunista. La Communità Internazionale. 19:4 (October 1964), 527-45.

Stolte, Stefan C. The Economic Agreement between Yugoslavia and Comecon. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. 12:1 (January 1965), 33-38.

Triska, Jan F. Stanford Studies of the Communist System: The Sino-Soviet Split. Background. 8:3 (November 1964), 143-61.

Urban, George. Polycentrism and the Appeal of Communism. Virginia Quarterly Review. 41:1 (Winter 1965), 18-39.

Wädekin, Karl-Eugen. Nationalitätenpolitik und Lebenskraft der Völker in der Sowjetunion Heute und Morgen. Osteuropa. 14:11 (November 1964), 837-50.

Weber, Bernd. Die Kompetenzen in der Integration des Ostens. Aussenpolitik. 15:5 (May 1964), 313-24.

Other Regional Arrangements and Developments Cook, Ramsay. The French-Canadian Question. Political Quarterly. 36:1 (January-March 1965), 5-19.

Dooley, D. J. Quebec and the Future of Canada. Review of Politics. 27:1 (January 1965), 17-31.

Froelich, J. C. Les Nations Désunies. Revue Militaire Générale. (December 1964), 597-614.

Kearney, Robert N. Sinhalese Nationalism and Social Conflict in Ceylon. Pacific Affairs. 37:2 (Summer 1964), 125-36.

Morales Crespo, Eddie. Venezuela y la Integración Latinoamericana. Cuadernos de la C.V.F. 1:1 (April-June 1964), 17-27.

Romano, Alessandro. Il Movimento verso l'Unità nelle Relazioni tra gli Stati Africani. Rivista di Studi Politici Internazionali. 31:3 (July-September 1964), 395-455.

Saab, H. The Arab Search for a Federal Union. World Justice. 6:2 (December 1964), 147-71.

Sayeed, Khalid B. Pathan Regionalism. South Atlantic Quarterly. 63:4 (Autumn 1964), 478-506.

Smets, Paul F. Le Charte d'Addis-Abeba ou l'Afrique des Patries. Revue de l'Institute de Sociologie. No. 2 (1964), 311-50.

Wionczek, Miguel S. Latin American Free Trade Association. International Conciliation. No. 551 (January 1965).

Yamamoto, Noboru. The Possibility of Regional Economic Integration in Southeast Asia. Developing Economies. 2:1 (March 1964), 16-28.

INTERNATIONAL LAW AND ORGANIZATION

International Law

Crane, Robert D. Basic Principles in Soviet Space Law: Peaceful Coexistence, Peaceful Cooperation, and Disarmament. Law and Contemporary Problems. 29:4 (Autumn 1964), 943-55.

Friedmann, Wolfgang. Half a Century of International Law. Virginia Law Review. 50:8 (December 1964), 1333-58.

Ginsburgs, George. "Wars of National Liberation" and the Modern Law of Nations: The Soviet Thesis. Law and Contemporary Problems. 29:4 (Autumn 1964), 910-42.

Gross, Leo. Problems of International Adjudication and Compliance with International Law:

Some Simple Solutions. American Journal of International Law. 59:1 (January 1965), 48-71.

Karpov, Victor P. The Soviet Concept of Peaceful Coexistence and its Implications for International Law. Law and Contemporary Problems. 29:4 (Autumn 1964), 858-64.

Kucherov, Samuel. The USSR and Sovereignty in Outer Space. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. 12:2 (February 1965), 25-33.

Lerner, Warren. The Historical Origins of the Soviet Doctrine of Peaceful Coexistence. Law and Contemporary Problems. 29:4 (Autumn 1964), 865-70.

McWhinney, Edward. Changing International Law Method and Objectives in the Era of the Soviet-Western Detente. American Journal of International Law, 59:1 (January 1965), 1-15.

Triska, Jan F. Soviet Treaty Law: A Quantitative Analysis. Law and Contemporary Problems. 29:4 (Autumn 1964), 896-909.

The United Nations and Specialized Agencies

Brunner, Guido. Die Friedenssicherungsaktionen der Vereinten Nationen in Korea, Suez und im Kongo. Vierteljahrshefte für Zeitgeschichte. 12:4 (October 1964), 414-42.

Ewing, A. F. Industrialisation and the U. N. Economic Commission for Africa, Journal of Modern African Studies. 2:3 (November 1964), 351-63.

Gardner, Richard N. The Soviet Union and the United Nations. Law and Contemporary Problems. 29:4 (Autumn 1964), 845-57.

Grzybowski, Kazimierz. International Organizations from the Soviet Point of View. Law and Contemporary Problems. 29:4 (Autumn 1964), 882-95

Issues before the Nineteenth General Assembly. International Conciliation. No. 550 (November 1964).

Manno, Catherine Senf. Problems and Trends in the Composition of Nonplenary UN Organs. International Organization. 19:1 (Winter 1965), 37-56.

Vernant, Jacques. L'ONU et le Monde de 1965-1980. Politique Étrangère. 29:4 (1964), 359-69.

THE INTERNATIONAL ECONOMY

International Economic Problems and Policies

Cooper, Richard N. Tariff Dispersion and Trade Negotiations. Journal of Political Economy. 72:6 (December 1964), 597-603.

Kennan, George F. Der Ost-West Handel. Monat. 17:196 (January 1965), 13-19.

Kojima, Kiyoshi. A Proposal for International Aid. Developing Economies. 2:4 (December 1964), 337-57.

Massell, Benton F. The Distribution of Gains in a Common Market: The East African Case. (RAND Corporation Paper P-2956, 1964).

Mladek, J. V. Evolution of African Currencies— II: The Sterling Area and Unattached Currencies. Fund and Bank Review, Finance and Development. Vol. 1 (December 1964), 184-91.

Weintraub, Sidney. After the U.N. Trade Conference: Lessons and Portents. Foreign Affairs. 43:1 (October 1964), 37-51.

Economic Development

Belshaw, Cyril S. Social Structure and Cultural Values as Related to Economic Growth. International Social Science Journal. 16:2 (June 1964), 217-29.

Bicanic, Rudolph. Social Pre-Conditions and Effects of Moving Over the Threshold of Economic Development. International Social Science Journal. 16:2 (June 1964), 275-84.

Brandt, Karl. Economic Progress in the Developing Countries. Modern Age. 9:1 (Winter 1964-65), 7-17.

Griffin, Keith B., and Ricardo Fírench-Davis M. Comercio Internacional y Políticas de Desarrollo Económico. Cuadernos de Economia. No. 3 (May-August 1964), 83-118.

Hoselitz, Bert F. Social Stratification and Economic Development. International Social Science Journal. 16:2 (June 1964), 237-52.

Köllner, Lutz. Gesellschaftsstruktur und Finanzierung des Wirtschaftlichen Fortschrittes in Entwicklungsländern. Schmollers Jahrbuch. 84:4 (1964), 403-18.

Kollontai, V. M., and G. I. Mirsky. Social Development Indices in National Economic Programmes. International Social Science Journal. 16:2 (June 1964), 284-91.

Leff, Nathaniel. Economic Development through Bureaucratic Corruption. American Behavioral Scientist. 8:4 (November 1964), 8-15.

Manfra, Modestino R. Sviluppo Economico e Ruolo dei Movimenti Monetari: Alcune Ipotesi. Rivista Internazionale di Scienze Sociali. 72:5 (September-October 1964), 449-72.

Myint, Hla. Social Flexibility, Social Discipline and Economic Growth. International Social Science Journal. 16:2 (June 1964), 252-61.

Raynaud, Edgar. L'Étude du Problème du Sousemploi Rural dans les Pays en Voie de Développement. Social Sciences Information. 3:2 (June 1964), 7-21.

Strümpel, Burkhard. Preparedness for Change in a Peasant Society. Economic Development and Cultural Change. 13:2 (January 1965), 203-16.

Wolf, Charles, Jr. The Political Effects of Economic Programs: Some Indications from Latin America. (RAND Corporation Memorandum RM-3901-ISA, 1964).

NATIONAL POLICIES AND ISSUES

The United States

Alessi, Louis de. The Sale of Wheat to the USSR: A Change in US Policy? Kyklos. 18:1 (1965), 116-3.

Garbuny, Siegfried. Die Allianz für den Fortschritt im vierten Jahr. Aussenpolitik. 15:5 (May 1964), 325-37.

Hahm, Pyong Choon. Korea's Mendicant Mentality? A Critique of U.S. Policy. Foreign Affairs. 43:1 (October 1964), 165-75.

Korbonski, Andrzej. U.S. Policy in East Europe. Current History. 48:283 (March 1965), 129-34.

Letourneux, André. Vues sur la Défense Totale Americaine. Revue de Défense Nationale. 20:11 (November 1964), 1738-64.

Maldonado Denis, Manuel. Efectos de la Revolución Cubana en la Política Puertorriqueña. Rivista de Ciencias Sociales. 8:3 (September 1964), 271-78.

Riemer, Neal. Kennedy's Grand Democratic Design. Review of Politics. 27:1 (January 1965), 3-16.

Schneider, Ronald M. The U.S. in Latin America. Current History. 48:281 (January 1965), 1-8.

Stevenson, Adlai E. The Congo Question: The Position of the United States. Vital Speeches of the Day. 31:8 (1 February 1965), 231-36.

Survey Research Center, University of Michigan. The American Public's View of U. S. Policy toward China. (New York, Council on Foreign Relations, 1964).

Wriggins, William Howard. The Diffusion of World Power and Some Implications for U. S. Policy. Background. 8:3 (November 1964), 133-43.

Latin America

Alexander, Robert J. Outside Control of Latin American Communists. Thought Patterns. Vol. 12 (1964), 35-49.

Johnson, John J. The New Latin American Nationalism. Yale Review. 54:2 (December 1964), 187-204.

Reidy, Joseph W. Latin America and the Atlantic Triangle. Orbis. 8:1 (Spring 1964), 52-65.

Thomas, Alfred B. Latin American Nationalism and the United States. Journal of Inter-American Studies. 7:1 (January 1965), 5-13.

Whitaker, Arthur. Cuba's Intervention in Venezuela: A Test of the OAS. Orbis. 8:3 (Fall 1964), 511-34.

Western Europe

Altmayer, François. Das Deutsch-Französische Jugendwerk, Aussenpolitik. 15:5 (May 1964), 297-303.

Brentano, Heinrich von. L'Allemagne, l'Europe et le Monde. Table Ronde. No. 205 (February 1965), 62-71.

Cross, J. A. Whitehall and the Commonwealth. Journal of Commonwealth Political Studies. 2:3 (November 1964), 189-206.

Das deutsch-französische Verhältnis in der Krise: A Symposium. Dokumente. 20:6 (December 1964), 469-82.

Hinterhoff, Eugene. Germany and Nuclear Weapons. Poland and Germany. 8:4 (October-December 1964), 7-18.

Kelly, George A. The French Restoration of History. Orbis. 8:3 (Fall 1964), 641-54.

Low, D. A. Lion Rampant. Journal of Commonwealth Political Studies. 2:3 (November 1964), 235-52.

Mendl, Wolf. The Background of French Nuclear Policy. International Affairs. 41:1 (January 1965), 22-36.

Thomson, David. General de Gaulle and the Anglo-Saxons. International Affairs. 41:1 (January 1965), 11-21.

Tricot, B. Le Budget des Armées. Revue de Défense Nationale. 20:11 (November 1964), 1691-1704

White, John. West German Aid to Developing Countries. International Affairs. 41:1 (January 1965), 74-88.

Zartman, I. William. Les Relations entre la France et l'Algerie. Revue Française de Science Politique. 14:6 (December 1964), 1087-1114.

Soviet Union and Eastern Europe

Armstrong, John A. The Domestic Roots of Soviet Foreign Policy. International Affairs. 41:1 (January 1965), 37-47.

Brodie, Bernard. The Communist Reach for Empire. (RAND Corporation Paper P-2916, 1964).

Brzezinski, Zbigniew. Moscow and the M.L.F.: Hostility and Ambivalence. Foreign Affairs. 43:1 (October 1964), 126-35.

Carlisle, Donald S. The Changing Soviet Perception of the Development Process in the Afro-Asian World. Midwest Journal of Political Science. 8:4 (November 1964), 385-408.

Clemens, Walter C., Jr. The Soviet Militia in the Missile Age. Orbis. 8:1 (Spring 1964), 84-105. Ducoli, John. Soviet-Italian Relations, 1943-

1963. Studies on the Soviet Union. 4:1 (1964), 20-41.

Eissner, Albin. Militärbesiedlung der deutschen Ostgebiete. Aussenpolitik. 15:6 (June 1964), 386-05

Glejdura, Stefan. La Política Exterior de la U.R.S.S. (1962-1965). Revista de Política Internacional. No. 75 (September-October 1964), 67-109.

Kovner, Milton. Soviet Aid Strategy in Developing Countries. Orbis. 8:3 (Fall 1964), 624-40.

Mosely, Philip E. Soviet Policy in the Developing Countries. Foreign Affairs. 43:1 (October 1964), 87-99.

Ollion. Évolution de la Pensée Militaire Sovietique. Revue de Défense Nationale. 20:12 (December 1964), 1924-33.

Ra'anan, Uri. Moscow and the "Third World." Problems of Communism. 14:1 (January-February 1965), 22-31.

Wolfe, Thomas W. Some New Developments in the Soviet Military Debate. Orbis. 8:3 (Fall 1964), 550-62.

The Middle East

Ashford, Douglas E. Contradictions of Nationalism and Nation-Building in the Muslim World. Middle East Journal. 18:4 (Autumn 1964), 421-30.

Kimche, Jon. The Arab Boycott of Israel—New Aspects. Midstream. 10:3 (September 1964), 3-14.

Lenczowski, George. The Objects and Methods of Nasserism. Journal of International Affairs. 19:1 (January 1965), 63-76.

Longrigg, Stephen H. The Economics and Politics of Oil in the Middle East. Journal of International Affairs. 19:1 (January 1965), 111-23.

Africa

Good, Robert C. Changing Patterns of African International Relations. American Political Science Review. 58:3 (September 1964), 632-42.

Legum, Colin. What Kind of Radicalism for Africa? Foreign Affairs. 43:2 (January 1965), 237-50

Mackintosh, J. P. Nigeria's External Relations. Journal of Commonwealth Political Studies. 2:3 (November 1964), 207-18.

Manning, Charles A. W. South Africa and the World: In Defense of Apartheid. Foreign Affairs. 43:1 (October 1964), 135-50.

Mason, Philip. South Africa and the World: Some Maxims and Axioms. Foreign Affairs. 43:1 (October 1964), 150-65.

Patel, Surendra J. Economic Transition in Africa. Journal of Modern African Studies. 2:3 (November 1964), 329-49.

Post, K. W. J. Nigerian Pamphleteers and the Congo. Journal of Modern African Studies. 2:3 (November 1964), 405-18.

Quigg, Philip W. South African Problems and Prospects. Africa Report. 10:1 (January 1965), 9-14.

Stahn, Eberhard. Die Isolierung Kwame Nkrumahs in Afrika. Aussenpolitik. 15:6 (June 1964), 401-08.

South and Southeast Asia

Ayoob, Mohammed. The Indonesian Interpretation of Neutralism. East-West Center Review. 1:3 (February 1965), 35-54.

Bastian, Ludwig. Malaysia und Indonesiens Konfrontationspolitik. Aussenpolitik. 65:1 (January 1965), 42-49.

Black, Edwin F. Laos: A Case Study of Communist Strategy. Military Review. 44:12 (December 1964), 49-59.

Bobrow, Davis B. La Strategia di Pechino. Mulino. 13:145 (November 1964), 1104-19.

Bowman, Richard C. The Chinese Bomb: The Military-Political Implications. Air Force and Space Digest. 48:1 (January 1965), 32-34.

Brandon, Henry. The Dilemma of S. E. Asia. Survival. 7:1 (January-February 1965), 38-40.

Curtis, Robert. Malaysia and Indonesia. New Left Review. No. 28 (November-December 1964), 5-32.

Edwardes, Michael. Illusion and Reality in India's Foreign Policy. International Affairs. 41:1 (January 1965), 48-58.

Fall, Bernard B. The Second Indochina War. International Affairs. 41:1 (January 1965), 59-73. Fisher, Charles A. The Chinese Threat to South-East Asia: Fact or Fiction? Royal Central Asian Journal. 51:3/4 (July-October 1964), 251-67.

Gallois, Pierre M. Économie et Sous-développement Militaire. Revue de Défense Nationale. 20:12 (December 1964), 1901-08.

Griffith, Samuel B., II. Communist China's Capacity to Make War. Foreign Affairs. 43:2 (January 1965), 217-36.

Harrison, Selig. Troubled India and Her Neighbors. Foreign Affairs. 43:2 (January 1965). 312-30

Hsieh, Alice Langley. Communist China's Military Doctrine and Strategy. (RAND Corporation Memorandum RM-3833-PR abridged, 1964).

Kroesen, Frederick J. The Precarious Position of Thailand. Military Review. 44:12 (December 1964), 60-69.

Lansdale, Edward G. Viet Nam: Do We Understand Revolutions? Foreign Affairs. 43:1 (October 1964), 75-87.

Levi, Werner. Indian Neutralism Reconsidered. Pacific Affairs. 37:2 (Summer 1964), 137-47.

Lyon, Peter. The Foreign Policy of the Philippines: Continuity and Change. World Today. 20:12 (December 1964), 533-41.

Mackie, J. A. C. Inflation and Confrontation in Indonesia. Australian Outlook. 18:3 (December 1964), 278-98.

Mesa Garrido, Roberto. La Encrucijada del Viet-Nam. Revista de Política Internacional. No. 74 (July-August 1964), 7-55.

O'Ballance, Edgar. Neutral Burma. Quarterly

Review. No. 643 (January 1965), 33-40,

Pace, Eric. Laos: Continuing Crisis. Foreign Affairs. 43:1 (October 1964), 64-75.

Ray, Hemen. Peking und die Neutralisierung Vietnams. Aussenpolitik. 15:6 (June 1964), 409-18. Sandrin, Christian. Les Regroupements dans le Sud-Est Asiatique. Revue de Défense Nationale. 21:2 (February 1965), 276-89.

Sharma, Surya P. The India-China Border Dispute: An Indian Perspective. American Journal of International Law. 59:1 (January 1965), 16-47.

Townsend, James R. Communist China: The New Protracted War. Asian Survey. 5:1 (January 1965), 1-11.

Trager, Frank N. Vietnam: The Military Requirements for Victory. Orbis. 8:3 (Fall 1964), 563-83.

Tsou, Tang. Mao Tse-Tung and Peaceful Co-existence. Orbis. 8:1 (Spring 1964), 36-51.

Van Ingen, Glen T. China's Border Policy toward Nepal. East-West Center Review. 1:2 (October 1964), 33-56.

Zagoria, Donald S. Communism in Asia. Commentary. 39:2 (February 1965), 53-58.

Far East and Pacific

Hasluck, Paul. Australia and Southeast Asia. Foreign Affairs. 43:1 (October 1964), 51-64.

Kennan, George F. Japanese Security and American Policy. Foreign Affairs. 43:1 (October 1964), 14-29.

Kim, Doo Hun. The Problem of Korean Unification. Koreana Quarterly. 6:2 (Summer 1964), 11-33.

Kohtani, Etsuo. Japan and the Sino-Soviet Conflict. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. 11:12 (December 1964), 34-39.

Lee, Chong-Sik. Korea: Troubles in a Divided State. Asian Survey. 5:1 (January 1965), 25-32.

Lee, Oliver M. Communist China's Policy toward Japan. East-West Center Review. 1:2 (October 1964), 57-73.

Millar, Thomas B. Australia and the American Alliance. Pacific Affairs. 37:2 (Summer 1964), 148-60.

Seiichi, Töbata. Japan and the North-South Question. Japan Quarterly. 12:1 (January-March 1965), 17-26.

Shintarō, Ryū. Resetting the Course. Japan Quarterly. 12:1 (January-March 1965), 39-45.

Tsuru, Shigeto. The Future of Japan in the Modern World, Including Relations with the United States and China. Australian Outlook. 18:3 (December 1964), 247-65.

OTHER BOOKS RECEIVED

- Adrian, Charles R. and Press, Charles, The American Political Process. (New York: McGraw-Hill Book Company. 1965. Pp. xi, 756. $7.95.)
- ALLEN, H. C., The United States of America: A Concise History. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1965. Pp. 399. $8.95.)
- ALLEN, WILLIAM SHERIDAN, The Nazi Seizure of Power: The Experience of a Single German Town 1930-1935. (Chicago: Quadrangle Books Inc. 1965. Pp. 345. $6.95.)
- ALMOND, GABRIEL AND VERBA, SIDNEY, The Civic Culture. (Boston: Little, Brown and Co. 1965. Pp. 379. paper.)
- ARENDT, HANNAH, Eichmann in Jerusalem. (New York: The Viking Press. 1964. Pp. 312. $1.65, paper.)
- Arendt, Hannah, On Revolution. (New York: The Viking Press. 1965. Pp. 344. $1.65, paper.)
- AKZIN, BANJAMIN, Project of a Constitution for the State of Israel. (Tel-Aviv: B'nai B'rith in Israel. 1965. Pp. 66, paper.)
- Ballyn, Bernard, Ed. Pamphlets of the American Revolution: 1750-1776, Vol. I. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1965. Pp. xvi, 771.)
- Banton, Michael, The Policeman in the Community. (New York: Basic Books Inc. 1965. Pp. xiv, 276. $5.50.)
- Barker, A. J., Suez: The Seven Day War. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1965. Pp. 223. $5.95.)
- BARNET, FRANK R., MOTT, WILLIAM C., AND NEFF, JOHN C., Peace and War in the Modern Age. (Garden City: Doubleday and Co. 1965. Pp. xvi, 421. $1.45.)
- BARNETT, A. DOAK, Ed., Communist Strategies in Asia: A Comparative Analysis of Governments and Parties. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1963. Pp. ix, 293. $2.50, paper, $6.50, cloth.)
- BARRETT, RUSSELL H. Integration at Ole Miss. (Chicago: Quadrangle Books, Inc. 1965. Pp. 270. $4.95.)
- BAY, CHRISTIAN, The Structure of Freedom. (New York: Atheneum. 1965. Pp. 419. $2.75, paper.)
- BECKER, JOSEPH M., S. J., In Aid of the Unemployed. (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press. 1965. Pp. xi, 317. $8.95.)
- Belshaw, Cyrll S., Under the Ivi Tree. (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1965. Pp. xiii, 336. $6.00.)
- Bender, Richard N., Called to be Relevant. (The National Methodist Student Movement, 1964. Pp. 212. paper.)
- BERGER, CARL, The Korea Knot. (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press. 1964. Pp. 225. $6.00.)

- Boscaretti di Ruffia, Paolo, L'Amministrazione Locale in Europa. (Milano: Dell'Instituto per la Scienza dell'Amministrazione pubblica. 1964. Pp. xi, 644. cloth.)
- BISHOP, DONALD G. The Roosevelt-Litvinov Agreements. (Syracuse: Syracuse University Press. 1965. Pp. viii, 297. $7.50.)
- BISHOP, HILLMAN M. AND HENDEL, SAMUEL, Basic Issues of American Democracy. (New York: Appleton-Century Crofts. 1965. Pp. xviii, 603. paper.)
- BRAEMAN, JOHN, BREMNER, ROBERT H., AND WALTERS, EVERETT, Ed., Change and Continuity in Twentieth-Century America. (Columbus: Ohio State University Press. 1965. Pp 287. $6.25.)
- BRIDGMAN, JON AND CLARKE, DAVID E., German Africa. (Stanford: Hoover Institution Bibliographical Series XIX. 1965. Pp. ix, 120. $3.00.)
- BRUCHEY, STUART, The Roots of American Economic Growth, (New York: Harper and Row. 1965. Pp. xiii, 234. $3.50, text edition. $4.95, regular.)
- BYRNE, LEO GERALD, The Great Ambassador. (Columbus: Ohio State University. 1965. Pp. x, 383. $6.25.)
- CANNON, MARK W. AND MONSEN, R. JOSEPH, JR., Makers of Public Policy: American Power Groups and their Ideologies. (New York: Mc-Graw-Hill Co. 1965. Pp. x, 355. paper.)
- CAREY, JAMES C., Peru and the United States: 1900-1962. (Notre Dame: University of Notre Dame Press. 1964. Pp. xii, 243. $6.50.)
- CARROLL, E. MALCOLM, Soviet Communism and Western Opinion 1919-1921. (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press. 1965. Pp. xii, 302. $7.50.)
- CARTER, CHARLES HOWARD, The Secret Diplomacy of the Hapsburgs, 1598-1625. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1964. Pp. xiv, 321. $7.50.)
- CHAPIN, F. STUART JR., Urban Land Use Planning. (Urbana: University of Illinois. 1965. Pp. xii, 498. $7.95.)
- Christoph, James B. Ed., Cases in Comparative Politics. (Boston: Little, Brown and Co. 1965. Pp. ix, 502. paper.)
- CLENDENEN, CLARENCE C. AND DUIGNAN. PETER, Americans in Black Africa up to 1865. (Stanford: Hoover Institution Studies. 1964. Pp. vii, 109. $1.50.)
- COIL, HENRY WILSON, The History of Liberty. (New York: Vantage Press, Inc. 1965. Pp. 245. $4.50.)
- Cole, G. D. H., Chartist Portraits. (New York: St. Martin's Press. 1965. Pp. xvi, 378. $7.00.)

- COOK, ALICE H., Union Democracy: Practice and Ideal. (Ithaca: Cornell University. 1963. Pp. viii, 248. cloth.)
- COOKE, EDWARD F. AND JANOSIK, EDWARD G., Pennsylvania Politics, rev. ed. (New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, Inc. 1965. Pp. vi, 153. cloth.
- CORDIER, ANDREW W. AND FOOTE, WILDER, Eds., The Quest for Peace. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1965. Pp. xxiv, 390. $7.95.)
- CROSSCUP, RICHARD, Ed., Classic Speeches. (New York: Philosophical Library, Inc. 1965. Pp. xiii, 496. $10.00.)
- Curry, James E., Public Regulation of the Religious Use of Land. (Charlottesville: The Michie Company. 1965. Pp. xxii, 429. $12.50.)
- DE BEAUMONT, GUSTAVE, AND DE TOCQUEVILLE, ALEXIS. On the Penitentiary System in the United States. (Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press. 1964. Pp. xl, 222. $6.00.)
- Denno, Thomas, The Communist Millennium. (The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff. 1964. Pp. ix, 166. 16.75 guilders.)
 - DEPARTMENT OF LABOR: STATE OF NEW YORK, Annual Report of the State Advisory Council on Employment and Unemployment Insurance. (Albany: Department of Labor. 1964. Pp. ii, 118. paper.)
 - DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Documents on German Foreign Policy, 1918-1945. (Washington, D.C.: United States Government Printing Office. 1964. Pp. lxxx, 1035. $4.00.)
 - DIVINE, ROBERT A., The Reluctant Belligerent. (New York: John Wiley and Sons, Inc. 1965. xi, 172. cloth.)
 - DULLES, ELEANOR LANSING AND CRANE, ROBERT DICKSON, Detents: Cold War Strategies in Transition. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1964. Pp. x, 307. $5.95.)
 - EHRMANN, HENRY W., Democracy in a Changing Society. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1965. Pp. xi, 210. $6.50, cloth, $1.95, paper.)
 - FAGEN, RICHARD R., Cuba: The Political Content of Adult Education. (Stanford: Hoover Institution Studies. 1964. Pp. 77. $1.50.)
 - FEIS, HERBERT, The China Tangle. (New York: Atheneum. 1965. Pp. x, 445. $2.75, paper.)
 - FELT, JEREMY P., Hostages of Fortune. (Syracuse: Syracuse University Press. 1965. Pp. ix, 276. $6.95.
 - Foley, Charles, Ed., The Memoirs of General Grivas. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1965. Pp. 226. $4.95.)
 - FRANKFURTER, FELIX, Mr. Justice Holmes and the Supreme Court. (New York: Atheneum. 1965. Pp. 112. $1.25, paper.)
 - FREUD, ARTHUR, Of Human Sovereignty. (New York: Philosophical Library. 1964. Pp. v, 341. $6.00.)

- FREYMOND, JACQUES, Ed., Études et Documents sur la Premier Internationale en Suisse. (Geneva: Librairie Droz. 1964. Pp. xvi, 316. paper.)
- FRIEDEL, FRANK, F. D. R. and the South. (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press. 1965. Pp. x, 102. cloth.)
- GAILEY, HARRY A., A History of the Gambia. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1965. Pp. xi, 244. $7.50.)
- GALLAGHER, JOHN F., Apportionment in California Counties: The Impact of Judicial Decisions. (Davis: University of California. 1964. Pp. 41. paper.)
- Gallagher, Robert E., Ed., Byron's Journal of his Circumnavigation, 1764-1766. (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. 1964. Pp. lxxxii, 230. $7.50.)
- GATEWOOD, R. D., Some American Protestant Contributions to the Welfare of African Countries. (New York: National Council of Churches of Christ in the U. S. A. 1964. Pp. x, 88. $1.50, paper.)
- GATHERU, R. MUGO, Child of Two Worlds, (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1964. Pp. xiv, 215. $5.95.)
- GUNGWU, WANG, Ed., Malaysia: A Survey. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1964. Pp. 466. $12.50.)
- HACKER, ANDREW, Congressional Districting. (Washington, D. C.: The Brookings Institution. 1964. rev. ed. Pp. xi, 144. paper.)
- HAILE, PENNINGTON, The Eagle and the Bear. (New York: David McKay Co. 1965. Pp. vii, 175. $3.75.)
- HALPERIN, S. WILLIAM, Germany Tried Democracy. (New York: W. W. Norton and Co. 1965. Pp. viii, 567. $2.45, paper.)
- HAMILTON, WILLIAM B., Ed., The Transfer of Institutions. (Durham: Duke University Press. 1964. Pp. ix, 312. $8.00.)
- HAMMOND, THOMAS T., Soviet Foreign Relations and World Communism. (Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1965. Pp. xv, 1240. $25.00.)
- Hampsch, George H., The Theory of Communism. (New York: Philosophical Library. 1965. Pp. xiii, 245. paper.)
- HARRIS, BRUCE JR., The United States and the Italo-Ethopian Crisis. (Stanford: Stanford University Press. 1964. Pp. vi, 187. $5.50.)
- HARTENDORP, A. V. H., The Santo Tomas Story. (New York: McGraw-Hill Book Co. 1964. Pp. xvi, 446. $12.50.)
- HARTLEY, LIVINGSTON, Atlantic Challenge. (New York: Oceana Publications Inc. 1965. Pp. xii, 111. $3.95.)
- HICKMAN, BERT G., Investment Demand and U. S. Economic Growth. (Washington, D. C.:

- Brookings Institution. 1965. Pp. xv, 264. cloth.)
- Hirschman, Albert O., Journeys Toward Progress. (Garden City: Doubleday and Co. 1965. Pp. 397. $1.45.)
- HITCH, CHARLES J. AND McKEAN, ROLAND N., The Economics of Defense in the Nuclear Age. (New York: Atheneum. 1965. Pp. vii, 422. $2.75.)
- HORECKY, PAUL L., Russia and the Soviet Union. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 1965. Pp. xvi, 473. $8 95.)
- HOTTINGER, ARNOLD, The Arabs. (Berkeley: University of California Press. 1963. Pp. 344. $7.50.)
- HOSELITZ, BERT F., Economics and the Idea of Mankind. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1965. Pp. xv, 277. $6.95.)
- IBELE, OSCAR H., Introduction to Political Science. (New York: The American Press. 1964. Pp. 810. $7.50.)
- INGRAHAM, MARK H., The Outer Fringe. (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press. 1965. Pp. xii, 304. $7.50.)
- IWATA, MASAKAZU, OKUBO TOSHIMICHI, The Bismarck of Japan. (Berkeley: University of California Press. 1965. Pp. viii, 376. $7 00.)
- JACOBS, LOUIS, Principles of the Jewish Faith. (New York: Basic Books. 1964. Pp. xii, 473. $9.50.)
- JACOBY, NEIL H., Ed., United States Monetary Policy, rev. ed. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1964. Pp. viii, 243. $5.95, cloth. $2.25, paper.)
- JOHNSON, DONALD BRUCE AND PORTER, KIRK H., National Party Platforms 1840-1860. (Urbana: University of Illinois Press. 1964 supp. Pp. 58. $1.95.)
- JOHNSTON, CHARLES, The View From Steamer Point. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1964. Pp. 244. $5.95.)
- JONES, CHARLES O., Party and Policy-Making. (New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press. 1965. Pp ix, 174. $6.50.)
- KAPLAN, DONALD M. AND SCHWERNER, ARMAND, The Domesday Dictionary. (New York: McGraw Hill. 1965. Pp. 313. $2.95, paper.)
- KAPLAN, MORTON A., System and Process in International Politics. (New York: Science Editions. 1965. Pp. 283. $1.65, paper.)
- Kass, Alvin, Politics in New York State 1800-1830. (Syracuse: Syracuse University Press. 1965. Pp. xii, 220. cloth.)
- Kassof, Allen. The Soviet Youth Program. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1964. Pp. 206. $5.50.)
- Kelso, Paul, State Budget Preparation in Arizona. (Tucson: University of Arizona Press. 1964. Pp. 30. paper.)

- KLAPP, ORRIN E., Symbolic Leaders. (Chicago: Aldine Publishing Co. 1965. Pp. 272. $5.95.)
- KOEBNER, RICHARD. Empire. (New York: Universal Library Grosset and Dunlap. 1965. Pp. 393. $2.25, paper.)
- KOLKO, GABRIEL, Railroads and Regulation 1877-1916. (Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1965. Pp. vii, 273. $5.00.)
- KORWIN-RHODES, MARTA, The Mask of Warriors. (New York: Libra Publishers, Inc., 1964. Pp. 191. $4.95.)
- Kosa, John, Two Generations of Soviet Man: A Study in the Psychology of Communism. (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press. 1962. Pp. viii, 214. $5.00.)
- KRISHNAMACHARI, V. T., Fundamentals of Planning in India. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1964. Pp. xviii, 267. $6.50.)
- KURLAND, PHILIP B., Ed., Of Law and Life and Other Things that Matter: Papers and Addresses of Felix Frankfurter. (Cambridge: Harvard ; University Press. 1965. Pp. 257. $5.95.)
- LANGE, OSKAR, Political Economy, Vol. I. (New York: Pergamon Press Book. 1963. Pp. xiv, 355. $6.50.)
- LETICHE, JOHN M., Ed., A History of Russian Economic Thought. (Berkeley: University of California Press. 1965. Pp. xv, 690. $12.50.)
- LEVINE, LAWRENCE W., Defender of the Faith: William Jennings Bryan. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1965. Pp. ix, 386. $7.50.)
- LEWINSON, PAUL, Race, Class and Party: A History of Negro Suffrage and White Politics in the South. (New York: The Universal Library, Grosset and Dunlap. 1965. Pp. xxiv, 302. $1.95.)
- Lewis, Flora, Red Pawn: The Story of Noel Field. (Garden City: Doubleday and Co. Inc. 1965. Pp. 283. $4.95.)
- LONDON, KURT, The Making of Foreign Policy, East and West. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Co. 1965. Pp. 358. cloth.)
- McBride, James H. and Eales, John I. H., Military Posture: Fourteen Strategic Issues Before Congress 1964. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1965. Pp. iii, 234. $7.50.)
- MAICHEL, KAROL, Guide to Reference Books, Vol. II, (Stanford: The Hoover Institution. 1964. Pp. 297. $12.00.)
- Mantoux, Etienne, The Carthaginian Peace. (Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press. 1965. Pp. xvii, 236. $2.25, paper.)
- MASON, ALPHEUS THOMAS, Free Government in the Making. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1965. Pp. xix, 929. $7.50.)
- Marx, Karl, Edited by Dagobert D. Runes. A World Without Jews. (New York: Philosophical Library. 1960. Pp. xii, 83. paper.)
- MASSELMAN, GEORGE, The Cradle of Colonialism.

- (New Haven: Yale University Press. 1963. Rp. viii, 534. $10.00.)
- McColley, Robert, Slavery and Jeffersonian Virginia. (Urbana: University of Illinois Press. 1964. Pp. 227. $5,00.)
- MORGAN, H. WAYNE, America's Road to Empire: The War with Spain and Overseas Expansion. (New York: John Wiley and Sons. 1965. Pp. xii, 124. cloth.)
- MORGAN, R. P., The German Social Democrats and the First International 1864-1872. (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. 1965. Pp. xiii, 280. $8.50.)
- MORISON, SAMUEL ELIOT, The Oxford History of the American People. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1965. Pp. xxvii, 1150. $12.50.)
- Moussa, Arag, Diplomatic Contemporaine. (Geneva: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. 1964. Pp. 199. $2.75.)
- MYERS, HARBISON AND MYERS, CHARLES A., Ed., Manpower and Education. (New York: Mc-Graw-Hill. 1965. Pp. xiii, 343. $9.00.)
- NATIONAL AERONAUTICS AND SPACE ADMINISTRA-TION, Astronautics and Aeronautics, 1963. (Washington, D. C.: United States Government Printing Office. 1964. Pp. vii, 610. $2.00, paper.)
- NICOLSON, HAROLD, Peacemaking 1919. (New York: Universal Library, Grosset and Dunlap. 1965. Pp. 378. $1.95, paper.)
- Nomad, Max, Dreamers, Dynamiters and Demagogues. (New York: Waldon Press. 1964. Pp. 251. $5.00.)
- OETTINGER, MARTIN P., Collective Bargaining, Wage Restraint, and National Economic Policy. (Davis: University of California Press. 1964. Reprint. Pp. 233-255, paper.)
 - OPPENHEIMER, MARTIN AND LAKEY, GEORGE, A Manual for Direct Action. (Chicago: Quadrangle Books, Inc. 1965. Pp. xiii, 138. $1.95, paper, $3.95, cloth.)
 - OSSENBECK, FREDERICK J. AND KROECK, PATRICIA C., Open Space and Peace: A Symposium on Effects of Observation. (Stanford: Hoover Institution, 1964. Pp. 227, $6.00.)
 - Papadatos, Peter, The Eichmann Trial. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1965. Pp. x, 129. $4.50.)
 - Peterson, William, The Realities of World Communism. (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall. 1963. Pp. 222, $4.95.)
 - Pierce, Richard A., Russia's Hawaiian Adventure, 1815-1817. (Berkeley: University of California Press. 1965. Pp. xvii, 245. $5.50.)
 - Pope, Liston, Millhands and Preachers. (New Haven: Yale University Press. 1965. Pp. xlix, 369. $2.45, paper.)
- POSVAR, WESLEY, W., RIES, JOHN C., ET AL., American Defense Policy. (Baltimore: The

- Johns Hopkins Press. 1965. Pp. xvi, 471. $9.50.)
- PROCTOR, J. HARRIS, Islam and International Relations. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1965. Pp. viii, 221. paper.)
- RANDEL, WILLIAM PIERCE, The Klu Klux Klan: A Century of Infamy. (Philadelphia: Chilton Books. 1965. Pp. xvii, 300. $5.95.)
- REESE, TRAVOR R., Australia in the Twentieth Century. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1964. Pp. 239. $6.00.)
- REYNOLDS, EMILY BELLINGER AND FAUNT, JOAN REYNOLDS, Biographical Directory of the Senate of the State of South Carolina, 1776-1964. (Columbia, S. C.: South Carolina Archives Department. 1964. Pp ix, 358, $5.50.)
- RIGGS, ROBERT E., The Movement for Administrative Reorganization in Arizona. (Tucson: University of Arizona Press. 1964. Pp. 88. paper.)
- RIGGS, ROBERT E., Vox Populi, The Battle of 103. (Tucson: University of Arizona Press. 1964. Pp. 41. paper.)
- ROSENAU, JAMES N., National Leadership and Foreign Policy. (Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1963. Pp. xvii, 409, $8.50.)
- Ross, Arthur M., Ed. Employment Policy and the Labor Market. (Berkeley: University of California Press. 1965. Pp. viii, 406. $7.50.)
- RUPEN, ROBERT A., Mongols of the Twentieth Century. Part I and II. (Bloomington: Indiana University Publications. 1964. Pp. Part I, xxii, 510. Part II, xii, 167, Part I $10.00, Part II. $5.00.)
- RUBINSTEIN, ALVIN Z. AND THUMM, GAROLD W., The Challenge of Politics: Ideas and Issues. (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, Inc. 1965. Pp. xviii, 475. paper.)
- SANGER, EUGEN, Countdown for the Future. (New York: McGraw-Hill Co. 1965. Pp. 301. cloth.)
- SCHAFFER, COLONEL WILLIAM H., Shares. (New York: Vantage Press. 1963. Pp. 142. $3.00.)
- Schilke, Oscar G. and Solomon, Raphael E., America's Foreign Coins. (New York: The Coin and Currency Institute. 1964. Pp. xvii, 211. $7.50.)
- SCHOLZ, ALBERT A., Silesia Yesterday and Today. (The Hague: Martinus Mijhoff. 1964. Pp. x, 94. 10.75 guilders, paper.)
- SHAFFER, HARRY G., The Soviet System in Theory and Practice. (New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts. 1965. Pp. xxiii, 470. paper.)
- Sheridan, Richard George, Urban Justice. (Knoxville: Bureau of Public Administration. University of Tennessee. 1964. Pp. xi, 101. paper.)
- SHULMAN, MARSHALL D., Stalin's Foreign Policy Appraised. (New York: Atheneum. 1965. Pp. vi, 320. $1.95, paper.)
- SILVERT, K. H., Ed., Discussion at Bellagio. (New

- York: American Universities Field Staff, Inc. 1964. Pp. 191. $2.00, paper.)
- SINHA, SASADHAR, Indian Independence in Perspective. (New York: Taplinger Publishing Co., Inc. 1964. Pp. xi, 311. $9.50.)
- Sinnigen, William G., Ed., Rome. (New York: The Free Press of Glencoe. 1964. Pp. vi. 248. $1.95, paper.)
- SMAIL, JOHN R. W., Bandung in the Early Revolution, 1945-1946, (Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1964. Pp. xi, 169. $3.50, paper.)
- SMITH, GLADDIS, American Diplomacy during the Second World War, 1941-1945. (New York: Wiley and Sons. 1965. Pp. ix, 194. $4.95, cloth. $1.95, paper.)
- SMITH, PAUL H., Loyalists and Redcoats: A Study in British Revolutionary Policy. (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press. 1965. Pp. x, 199. $5.00.)
- SNIDER, CLYDE F. AND GOVE, SAMUEL K., American State and Local Government. (New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts. 1965. Pp. xii, 735. $7.50.)
- Spann, R. N., Ed., Constitutionalism in Asia. (New York: Taplinger Publishing Co. Inc. 1964. Pp. xii, 249. $8.75.)
- Taylor, A. J. P., Politics in Wartime. (New York: Atheneum. 1965. Pp. 207. $5.00.)
- TINT, HERBERT, The Decline of French Patriotism 1870-1940. (London: George Weidenfeld & Nicholson Limited. 1964. Pp. x, 272. 40s net.)
- TREVOR-ROPER, H. R., Archbishop Laud. (New York: St. Martin's Press. 1965. Pp. xii, 464. $7.50.)
- TREVOR-ROPER, H. R., Ed. Essays in British History. (New York: St. Martin's Press. 1965. Pp. x, 305. $7.00.)
- TRUMAN, DAVID B., The Congress and America's Future. (Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall Inc. 1965. Pp. 185. $3.95.)
- Van Chi, Hoang, From Colonialism to Communism: A Case History of North Vietnam. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1964. Pp xv, 252. $6.50.)

- VAZQUEZ, MODESTO SEARA, El Mundo en Transicion. (Cuadernos Americanos. 1964. Pp. 72. paper.)
- Von Stein, Lorenz, The History of the Social Movement in France 1789-1850. (Totowa: The Bedminster Press. 1964. Pp. 467. $10.00.)
- WAGGAMAN, JOHN S., Health Regulations and the Indiana Food Industry. (Bloomington: Institute of Public Administration. Indiana University. 1965. Pp. iv, 81. paper.)
- WAINHOUSE, DAVID W., Remnants of Empire. (New York: Harper & Row Inc. 1964. Pp. x, 153. $1.95, paper.)
- Webb, Colonal Lester A., Captain Alden Partridge and the U. S. Military Academy. (Northport, Alabama: American Southern Publishing Co. 1965. Pp. 224. $7.50.)
- WHEELER, GOFFREY, The Modern History of Soviet Central Asia. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1964. Pp xi, 272. $7.00.)
- WILKINSON, B., Constitutional History of England in the Fifteenth Century. (New York: Barnes & Noble, 1964. Pp. x, 418. $8.50.)
- WIONCZEK, MIGUEL S., Latin American Free Trade Association. (New York: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. Pp. 80. 50¢, paper.)
- WRIGHT, LOUIS B., The Dream of Prosperity in Colonial America. (New York: New York University Press. 1965. Pp. 96. $3.50.)
- YANAGA, CHITOSHI, Japanese People and Politics. (New York: Science Editions. 1965. Pp. 408. $2.25, paper.)
- ZETTERBERG, HANS L., On Theory and Verification in Sociology. (Totowa: The Bedminster Press. 1965. Pp. 177. $4.50.)
- ZINNER, PAUL E., Communist Strategy and Tactics in Czechoslovakia 1918–1948. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1963. Pp. xi, 264. $6.50.)
- ZUBER, RICHARD L., Jonathan Worth: A Biography of a Southern Unionist. (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press. 1965. Pp. 351. $7.50.)

NEWS AND NOTES

1965 ANNUAL MEETING AND SLATE OF OFFICERS FOR 1965-66

The 1965 Annual Meeting of the Association will be held September 8-11 at the Sheraton Park Hotel, Washington, D. C. Dr. H. Field Haviland, Jr., The Brookings Institution, is Chairman of the Program Committee.

At the Annual Business Meeting the Nominating Committee (comprised of James W. Prothro, University of North Carolina, Chairman; Bernard C. Cohen, University of Wisconsin; Alfred Diamant, Haverford College; Robert Horn, Stanford University; Avery Leiserson, Vanderbilt University; and Ruth Weintraub, Hunter College) will propose the following officers for 1965-66:

President Elect: Robert A. Dahl, Yale University

Vice Presidents: Manning J. Dauer, University of Florida William T. R. Fox, Columbia University

Rupert Emerson, Harvard University Secretary: John H. Kautsky, Washington University, St. Louis

Treasurer: Max M. Kampelman, Washington, D. C.

Members of the Council for two years:

James C. Davies, University of Oregon Alex N. Dragnich, Vanderbilt University Heinz Eulau, Stanford University Samuel Hendel, City College of New York Wallace Mendelson, University of Texas Laurence I. Radway, Dartmouth College William H. Riker, University of Rochester Victor G. Rosenblum, Northwestern University

PROGRAM COMMITTEE: 1966 ANNUAL MEETING

The 1966 Annual Meeting of the Association will be held in New York City at the Statler-Hilton Hotel, September 6-10. Early appointment of the Program Committee for the meeting makes it timely now to invite anyone having program suggestions for the occasion to convey them as soon as convenient, and prior to October, 1965, to the Chairman or an appropriate member of the Committee. Members of the Committee are:

Chairman, Ithiel de Sola Pool, Massachusetts Institute of Technology

American Government-Donald Matthews, University of North Carolina

Civil Order and Violence—Guy Pauker, Rand Corporation

Comparative Politics: Developed Systems-Lewis Edinger, Washington University, St. Louis

Comparative Politics: Developing Systems-Myron Weiner, Massachusetts Institute of Technology

Comparative Politics: Communist Systems-A. Doak Barnett, Columbia University

Data Bases for Political Science—Hayward Alker, Yale University

International Relations-James Rosenau, Douglass College, Rutgers University

Judicial Processes-Yosele Rogat, Stanford University

Operations Analysis in Government—James March, University of California, Irvine Political Modernization in the U. S.—Norton Long, Brandeis University Political Processes—Dwaine Marvick, University of California, Los Angeles Political Psychology—Herbert McClosky, University of California, Berkeley

Political Theory—David Spitz, Ohio State University

Public Administration—Herbert Kaufman, Yale University

State and Local Government-James Wilson, Harvard University

Strategic Studies-Albert Wohlstetter, University of Chicago

The Program Committee invites younger members of the Association to submit papers for consideration to the appropriate section chairman listed above. This procedure replaces separately organized selected-paper or volunteer-paper panels but is designed to afford the same opportunity. To be considered, papers should be submitted no later than December 1, 1965.

WASHINGTON OFFICE NEWSLETTER

Congressional Study Project.-In a statement appearing in the Congressional Record of May 21, Sen. Carl Hayden of Arizona described progress of the Association's Study of Congress project. The text of his comments follows:

Mr. President, a good many Members of Congress participated in the discussions that led to establishment by the American Political Science Association of its comprehensive Study of Congress. Supported by a grant from the Carnegie Corporation of New York, this project today is focusing the attention of more than 16 persons on various aspects of congressional organization and operations. The purpose of the study is to contribute to informed public discussion of the problems of Congressional reorganization—a timely thing, considering the current hearings by the Joint Committee on the Organization of Congress, established under S. Con. Res. 2.

As the report to the Senate said, "During the past several years there has developed an ever-increasing conviction among Members of Con-gress, reinforced by many expressions of opinion from the public at large, that a study and review of the present congressional machinery is a real necessity if Congress is to continue to be an effective co-equal partner in our tripartite system of government."

In coming to this conclusion, it was necessary that those within Congress communicate in a meaningful way with their constituents who share a meaningful way with their constituents who share the constituents who can be considered to the constituents where the constituents which is the constituents where the constituents who can be considered to the constituents where the constituents wher many viewpoints. And in turn, those in the outside community who wish to contribute to any changes must help to develop a better understanding of the unique qualities of this institution in order to successfully interpret it. As an out-standing journalist and student of Congress in a recent speech put it,

"The members of Congress have valid cause for reacting with suspicion to much of the intellectual community for a latent hostility toward Congress permeates the thinking of many leaders of public opinion outside Congress. It is evident in the books of political scientists, in newspaper editorials, and even in the witticisms of our humorists. It is most evident of all in many of the reforms of Congress that are suggested. Too often, proposed reforms smack of an obvious intent to reduce Congress from its status as a separate and independent branch of the federal government."

This does not seem to be the case with the Study of Congress. Its initiation and organization was the product of a cooperative effort between Members of both Houses on both sides of the aisle working with the Association's executive director, Evron M. Kirkpatrick, and his associate, Donald G. Tacheron.

In announcing the Study, which is being carried out under the direction of Ralph K. Huitt of the University of Wisconsin, Kirkpatrick said:

"The vitality of legislative bodies is essential to the preservation of individual freedom, to democracy and to the maintenance of social and economic viability.

Before considering drastic changes in Congress -an institution which has served this nation very well-we must first clarify various assumptions regarding the role of Congress in our system, identifying and analyzing major prob-lems of Congressional operation and explaining the character and probable consequences of realistic alternatives for structural or procedural change."

Mr. President, I feel that these are words of wise counsel in our present deliberations, and I want to take this opportunity to bring to the attention of my colleagues the names and aca-demic affiliations of the scholars who are engaged in this important undertaking, so that Members who are interested will find it convenient to contact them for their views and assistance:

Milton C. Cummings, The Brookings Institution Richard F. Fenno, University of Rochester Lewis A. Froman, Jr., University of California at Irvine

Charles O. Jones, University of Arizona John F. Manley, Syracuse University Roy E. Moor, George Washington University Kenneth G. Olson, formerly at Smith College,

Kenneth G. Olson, formerly at Smith College, and now a consultant David M. Olson, University of Texas Samuel C. Patterson, State University of Iowa Robert L. Peabody, Johns Hopkins University Nelson W. Polsby, Wesleyan University Randall B. Ripley, The Bookings Institution Leroy N. Rieselbach, State University of Iowa James A. Robinson, Ohio State University John S. Saloma, Massachusetts Institute of Technology

Technology Raymond E. Wolfinger, Stanford University

Committee Staff Assignment.-A political scientist, Nicholas A. Masters, of Pennsylvania State University, is participating directly in the activities of the Joint Committee on Organization of Congress. Masters' appointment as staff research consultant was announced April 14 by Sen. A. S. Mike Monroney (D., Okla.) and Rep. Ray J. Madden (D., Ind), co-chairmen of the committee. A former research fellow in Sen. Philip A. Hart's office, Masters has been granted temporary leave by the university for the duration of the Congressional assignment.

Congressional Staff Fellowship Program.—The Association on May 6 announced approval of grants totaling $99,000 for study and research projects planned by nine Congressional Staff members. The awards were made Association's Congressional Staff Fellowship Program, designed to encourage the further development of a permanent and highly professional staff system in Congress. Winners were selected by a bi-partisan Advisory Committee, composed of Vice President Hubert Humphrey, Senators Thomas Kuchel and Russell Long; Representatives Leslie Arends and Hale Boggs; and Donald Herzberg, director, Eagleton Institute of Politics, Rutgers University.

Competition for the awards, made possible by a grant from the Ford Foundation, was open to all professional House and Senate office and committee staff employees. Winners undertake study and research projects related to their professional responsibilities and goals at the college or university of their choice. The awards carry a stipend of up to $14,000 for a full year and up to $8,000 for six months of study. The 1965–66 Congressional Staff Fellows are:

- Samuel J. Archibald, staff director, House Foreign Operations and Government Information Subcommittee
- RICHARD L. BOWEN, Legislative Assistant, Senator Karl E. Mundt
- HAROLD F. EBERLE, Jr., Administrative Assistant, Representative Robert J. Corbett
- RICHARD W. C. FALKNOR, Professional Staff Member, Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs
- HUGH GREGORY GALLAGHER, Legislative Assistant, Senator E. L. Bartlett
- WILLIAM T. KENDALL, Administrative Assistant, Representative Peter Frelinghuysen
- WILL ERNEST LEONARD, Jr., Legislative Assistant, Senator Russell B. Long
- STANLEY L. NEWMAN, Legislative Assistant, Representative William F. Ryan
- KENT WATKINS, Staff Director, Senate Subcommittee on Standing Rules

Seminar in Legislative Operations.—The fifth in the series of Legislative Operations Roundtables, jointly sponsored by the Association and the Office of Career Development of the U. S. Civil Service Commission, was held May 10–14 for 20 Federal executives. The sessions were conducted at Georgetown University and at the Capitol. The program is part of a continuing effort to improve the federal career executive's knowledge and understanding of executive-legislative relations through an examination in depth of Congressional functions and processes. Discussion leaders and their subjects were as follows:

Max Kampelman, A.P.S.A. Treasurer and Counsel, "Congress and the American System"

- Nelson W. Polsby, Wesleyan University, and Robert L. Peabody, The Johns Hopkins University, "Congressional Organization: Leadership and Rules Changes in the 89th Congress"
- Richard M. Scammon, Director of Elections Research Center, Governmental Affairs Institute, "The Congressman and His Constituency"

- Stanley J. McFarland, Assistant Director, Federal Relations Division, National Education Association and Mary C. Gereau, Legislative Consultant, N.E.A., "External Pressures on Congress"
- Richard F. Fenno, Jr., University of Rochester, "The House Appropriations Committee as a Political System"
- Senator George D. Aiken, Vermont, "Representing and Informing the People: The Senate"
- D. B. Hardeman, Administrative Assistant to Majority Whip Hale Boggs, and Eugene Eidenberg, Congressional Fellow of the American Political Science Association, "The Legislative Process"
- Wilfred Rommel, Deputy Director, Office of Legislative Reference, Bureau of the Budget, "Central Legislative Clearance and Legislative Liaison"
- Robert Clark, Clerk, Committee on Appropriations, U. S. Senate, "Financial Policy Determination and the Appropriations Process"
- Francis J. Keenan, Administrative Assistant to Rep. Florence P. Dwyer and Kenneth Kofmehl, Purdue University, "Work behind the Scenes—The Congressional Staff"
- Carl B. Swisher, The Johns Hopkins University, "Congress and the Courts"
- Ralph K. Huitt, University of Wisconsin, "Legislative-Executive Branch Relations"

Social Studies Teachers' Seminars.-A group of Arlington County, Virginia, high school teachers explored the current state of political science and government during an eight-week series of seminars, which started March 29. Entitled "Political Science and the Social Studies," the seminars were co-sponsored by the Association and the Division of Instruction, Arlington County Public Schools. The sessions were conducted by leading members of the legislative and executive branches of the government, political scientists and other experts in the field of public affairs. About 50 of the Arlington Public School system's social studies teachers participated. Carried out as part of the Association's Social Studies Project, the seminar leaders and their subjects were as follows:

- Richard M. Scammon, Director of Elections Research Center, Governmental Affairs Institute, "The Electoral Process"
- Rep. Ken Hechler, Fourth District, West Virginia, "The Congress and the Presidency"
- William B. Prendergast, Director of Research, House Republican Conference, "Political Parties"
- Max Kampelman, A.P.S.A. treasurer and counsel, "The Judicial Process"

Norman Beckman, Assistant Director, Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations, "Local Government"

Field Haviland, Director of Foreign Policy Studies, The Brookings Institution, "Foreign Policy and International Relations"

Harold Seidman, Director, Office of Management and Organization, Bureau of the Budget, "Organization and Management"

Evron M. Kirkpatrick, A.P.S.A. Executive Director, "Political Science and the Social Studies"

Internship Evaluation Conference.—The Association sponsored a conference April 15–19 to consider implications of various forms of political internship for the educational process. Included among those attending the sessions, supported by a grant from the Ford Foundation and held near San Juan, Puerto Rico, were directors of all such programs involving more than a single campus. Seven of the participants presented papers on the potential—and problems—of political internship. They were:

Everett Cataldo, Ohio State University, "Evaluation of the Congressional Fellowship Program"

Bernard C. Hennessy, National Center for Education in Politics, "The Nature and Scope of College Political Internship Programs: Survey and Commentary"

Donald G. Herzberg, Eagleton Institute of Politics, Rutgers University, "The Care and Feeding of Interns"

Harold D. Lasswell, Yale Law School, "The Professional and Public Service Potential of Internship Programs"

James A. Robinson, Ohio State University, "Internships, Participant Observation, and Research"

John G. Stewart, Office of the Vice President, "The Intern Crisis: Some Thoughts on the Overextension of a Good Thing"

Sidney Wise, Franklin and Marshall College, "The Administration of an Internship Program"

Also attending the conference were the following:

Donald Bacon, Newhouse National News Service

Rep. John Brademas, of Indiana

Donald Balmer, Lewis and Clark College

Preston Edsall, North Carolina State College

D. B. Hardeman, Office of Democratic Whip, House of Representatives

Stephen Horn, Legislative Assistant to Sen. Thomas Kuchel

Victor Jones, University of California, Berkeley

Max Kampelman, A.P.S.A. treasurer and counsel

Evron M. Kirkpatrick, A.P.S.A. Executive Director

Malcolm Moos, The Ford Foundation Richard Neustadt, Harvard University

J. W. Peltason, University of California at Irvine

Donald G. Tacheron, A.P.S.A. Associate Di-

Paul N. Ylvisaker, Public Affairs Division, The Ford Foundation

PROFESSIONAL CONFERENCES

The Eighth Annual Conference of the District of Columbia Political Science Association was held on December 5, 1964, at the School of Advanced International Studies of the Johns Hopkins University in Washington, D. C. Panel I was chaired by Pio Uliassi of the State Department who presented four discussants on the "International Implications of the Sino-Soviet Dispute." They were Franz Michael, George Washington University; Cary Fisher, editorial staff of USIA's Problems of Communism; Eric Willenz, Department of State; and Samuel L. Sharp, American University. Panel II chaired by Edna Fluegel of Trinity College presented a discussion formally titled "Consensus and the Two-Party System." Discussants were Robert J. Corber, chairman of the Virginia Republican Party; Franklin L. Burdette, University of Maryland; and Wesley McCune, president of Group Research, Inc. Panel III chaired by Nathaniel Preston, American University, probed "Political Science, Public Administration and the Technological Revolution." Paul W. Howerton and Terence G. Jackson, Jr., of American University and Stanford Research Institute respectively, presented papers on "The New Technology and Its Application" and "Points of Impact between Technology and Political Science: Some Researchable Propositions." Outgoing president Richard M. Scammon presided over the business meeting which elected the following Association officers: president, Charles L. Clapp, Legislative Assistant to Senator Saltonstall; 1st vice president, Valerie Earle, Georgetown University; 2d vice president, Richard T. Greer, executive director of Operations & Policy Research, Inc.; council member (2 years), Hugh LeBlanc, George Washington University; and council member (2 years), Walter Kravits, Legislative Reference Service, Library of Congress.

The Midwest Political Science Association met at Indiana University April 22 and 23 and commemorated the fiftieth anniversary of the Department of Government there. John E. Stoner, Indiana University, president of the association, presided. The program arranged by John E. Turner, University of Minnesota, consisted of considerations of the following topics with the leader of each: political theory, Thomas L. Thorson, University of Wisconsin; national government, Philip Wilder, Wabash College; comparative government, J. B. Christoph, Ohio State University; state and local government, David Minar, Northwestern University; public law and judicial process, Sidney Ulmer, University of Kentucky; international relations and foreign policy, David Farnsworth, University of Wichita; political parties, Paul Smith, Grinnell College; political behavior, Kenneth Prewett, Washington University (St. Louis); and developing nations, J. Gus Liebenow, Indiana University.

Two special features were an applied demonstration of simulation arranged by Raymond Tanter, Northwestern University, and a panel arranged by graduate students.

The American Society for Political and Legal Philosophy held its annual meeting April 24–25, 1965 in Washington, D. C. Richard B. Brandt, chairman of the department of philosophy of the University of Michigan, was named president-elect. J. Roland Pennock, Swarthmore College, was appointed editor and John W. Chapman, University of Pittsburgh, associate editor of Nomos, the annual publication of the Society. Forthcoming volumes of Nomos will stress "Equality," the topic of the Washington meeting, and "Representation," the topic of the joint meeting with the American Political Science Association in September, 1965. The editors invite suggestions on potential contributors.

In the future, depending upon the topic selected for consideration at the Annual Meeting, the Society will meet in conjunction with the annual meetings of other social science disciplines.

Indiana and Purdue Universities served as hosts to the University-Federal Agency Conference held at Bloomington, Indiana, April 25 to April 28. The conference was sponsored by the U. S. Civil Service Commission and was attended by educators and government agency officials interested in the problems of career development and continuing education.

The Department of Government and the Division of University Extension of Indiana University, in cooperation with the Atlantic Council of the United States and the WFBM stations of Indianapolis, sponsored a conference on the United States and the Atlantic Community in February.

Rutgers—The State University sponsored a conference on International and Comparative Urban Studies and American Higher Education on June 6-8 in New Brunswick, New Jersey.

A conference on Liberty and Loyalty in a Free Society, sponsored by the Institute of Governmental Affairs and the Department of Political Science, was held March 27, 1965, at the University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee. Speakers included Supreme Court Associate Justice William O. Douglas, Wisconsin Supreme Court Justice Thomas Fairchild, David Fellman of the University of Wisconsin-Madison, Dean Reynolds Seitz of the Marquette Law School, Harry Kalven, Jr. of the University of Chicago Law School, Victor Rosenblum of Northwestern University, and Allan Dionisopoulos of Northern Illinois University.

OTHER ACTIVITIES

The National Institute of Social and Behavioral Science, in collaboration with the Section on Social and Economic Sciences of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, will hold sessions for contributed papers at the annual meeting of the A.A.A.S. in Berkeley, California, December 26-31, 1965.

Association members interested in presenting a paper at these sessions should forward titles and abstracts of some 300 words not later than September 1 to Donald P. Ray, Director, National Institute of Social and Behavioral Science, 863 Benjamin Franklin Station, Washington, D. C. 20044.

Papers should be based on research current or recently completed by the author. Subjects may concern any field of political science, and especially science and public administration, political sociology of semi-developed countries, and international relations and the political science of national security.

Selected materials of the sessions will be published by the National Institute. The annual meeting of the A.A.A.S. is the largest professional meeting in the world.

Harper and Row, Publishers, Inc., have announced the establishment of the John Fitzgerald

Kennedy Memorial Award of $10,000 for a "book of general interest which illumines the influence of an individual or individuals on his or their times and which fosters an understanding of this country or its role in the world." The publishers expect to make the first award to a manuscript received prior to December 31, 1965, and to make similar awards regularly in ensuing years. Judges for this year's manuscript will be Senator Robert F. Kennedy; McGeorge Bundy, Special Assistant to the President; and Allan Nevins, professor emeritus of American History at Columbia University. Interested persons should contact the publishers at 49 E. 33rd Street, New York, New York 10016 for further details.

The Weil Institute for Studies in Religion and the Humanities is offering eight 1966 summer fellowships, each yielding $1,200. Those eligible are faculty members working on publishable papers in the humanities (literature, art, history, philosophy, etc.) dealing with religion. The purpose of the grant is to enable the recipient to forego summer teaching in order to further his research or writing in connection with his paper, at a location of his choice. Preference in the past has been accorded to younger candidates in the lower academic ranks. While the project may ultimately be incorporated in a book, the essay should be an end in itself, and not a segment of a proposed book. Applications must be submitted by September 1, 1965, to the Weil Institute, 3101 Clifton Avenue, Cincinnati, Ohio 45220.

A seminar on State Politics in India was held at Massachusetts Institute of Technology on December 21–23, 1964. The seminar was sponsored by the South Asia Committee of the Association for Asian Studies and was organized and chaired by Myron Weiner of M.I.T. Papers were read by Wayne Wilcox of Columbia, Baldev Raj Nayar of McGill University, Hugh Gray of L.S.E., Lawrence Shrader of Mills College, Marcus Franda of the University of Chicago and Paul Brass of Bryn Mawr. These papers, along with several others, will be published in a volume on the comparative study of the Indian states.

The University of Pennsylvania has received a total of $545,000 in grants to initiate a five-year cross-cultural study of the social values which influence the community leaders of countries in the process of political development to make decisions whose effect is to pull the society together. The main focus of the study will be on the identification, comparison and measurement of those values held by community leaders which influence their policy decisions.

In order to secure cross-cultural comparisons, the study will be conducted along parallel lines in several countries and regions within countries. During the first year, it will concentrate on India, Yugoslavia and Poland as well as the United States, and on the basis of this experience extend it to other areas.

Philip E. Jacob, professor of political science at Pennsylvania and director of the University's Program of International Cooperative Research on Social Values and Political Behavior, will direct the international study. Operationally based at Pennsylvania, it will be conducted with the collaboration of political and social scientists from various American and foreign universities.

Indiana University has been chosen by the National Institute of Public Affairs to conduct special mid-career training for government officials in the field of Science, Technology and Public Policy. Universities now cooperating with NIPA in various program facets of government mid-career training are Harvard, Princeton, Stanford, Chicago, Virginia and Indiana.

The ninth annual Institute on United States Foreign Policy was held in the University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee Union on March 6, 1965. Speakers on the topic, "Break-up of the Bipolar World?" included Oliver E. Clubb, Jr. of Syracuse University; Alexander Dallin of Columbia University; James F. Leonard, Department of State; and Theodore C. Achilles, Atlantic Council, Washington, D. C.

BETTY BRAND BURCH, Tufts University, chaired the New England Regional Conference for the Association of Asian Studies held at Tufts last November.

ARDATH W. BURKS, Rutgers University, did field work in Japan during the first semester of 1965-66 on a grant from the Rutgers Research Council.

James L. Busey, University of Colorado, served as Fulbright professor of political science at the School of Sociology and Politics, University of Sao Paulo, Brazil, during the spring semester of 1964.

George Carey, Georgetown University, was on leave of absence during 1964-65 to do research with Charles Hyneman at Indiana University.

THOMAS H. CLANCY, S. J., Loyola University, New Orleans, has been awarded a cross-disciplinary postdoctoral fellowship by the Society for Religion in Higher Education of New Haven, Connecticut. He will study at Oxford University during the 1965-66 academic year. GORDON B. CLEVELAND, University of North Carolina, will spend the summer and fall in Italy conducting research.

George A. Codding, Jr., University of Colorado, has been granted a one-year faculty fellowship for 1965-66. He will take up research residence in Geneva.

Patrick J. Conklin, University of Missouri, was on leave of absence during most of 1964, serving as a staff member of the State Reorganization Commission of Missouri.

ROBERT T. DALAND, University of North Carolina, will spend the summer in Brazil at the request of the School of Administration of the University of Bahia. He will serve as a consultant on the research program of the School and assist in the program of the Institute of Public Service.

RAYMOND H. DAWSON, will return to his position in the department of political science at the University of North Carolina after one year on leave at King's College, University of London.

JOHN C. DONOVAN has returned to teaching (Bowdoin) after an absence of six years which he spent in Washington. During that time he served in several capacities: as Administrative Assistant to Senator Edmund S. Muskie; as Executive Assistant to the Secretary of Labor and during the past year as Manpower Administrator in the Department of Labor.

ARTHUR DOWELL, Indiana State University, was on sabbatical leave during the spring semester.

Marion Doro has returned to Connecticut College as a regular member of the staff. During 1963-64 she was a visiting professor at Makerere University College, Kampala, Uganda, on a University of Chicago Exchange Program supported by the Department of State.

Leo M. Egand, formerly of the New York City Planning Department, has been appointed Senior Management Consultant in the office of the Mayor of New York City.

Henry W. Ehrmann has been named Joel Parker professor of law and political science at Dartmouth.

AMITAI ETZIONI, Columbia University has been appointed to the editorial board of the Administrative Science Quarterly.

RICHARD R. FAGEN will be on leave from Stanford University for the academic years 1965-67 on a Ford Retraining Fellowship in Latin American politics.

STANLEY H. FRIEDELBAUM, Rutgers University, will be on research leave during 1965-66 on a grant from the Rutgers Research Council.

LAWRENCE H. FUCHS, Brandeis University, will be on leave during 1965-66 as a senior scholar at the East-West Center, University of Hawaii.

FEDERICO G. GIL returned in February to his position as chairman of Latin American Studies at the University of North Carolina.

HENRY F. GOOLNOW will spend 18 months at the University of Indonesia, Jakarta, to aid the university's public administration program.

GEORGE GRASSMUCK is serving as acting director of the Center for Near Eastern and North African Studies at the University of Michigan during the academic year 1964-65.

RICHARD I. HOFFERBERT, Williams College, has been awarded an NCEP fellowship and will serve from July 1, 1965 to June 30, 1966, as special assistant to Governor Lane of Colorado.

DAN N. JACOBS, Miami University (Ohio), has been awarded a university grant for summer research in the Soviet Union.

C. Herschel Jones, Bucknell University, directed a week-long Institute of Public Personnel Administration for New York State, February 15-19. The Institute is part of New York's Public Administration Internship and Trainee program.

JOSEF KALVODA, University of San Diego, College for Women, has been awarded a research grant by the Hoover Institution on Revolution, Peace, and War, Stanford University.

STEPHEN D. KERTESZ, Notre Dame, has received a research grant from the Rockefeller Foundation.

WILLIAM KINTER, University of Pennsylvania, received the annual award of the Assembly of Captive European Nations in February. Medals are awarded to journalists and political writers who have directed their concern toward Eastern Europe and the cause of freedom there.

Norman Kogan, University of Connecticut, spent his 1964-65 sabbatical leave in Rome, Italy.

DAVID KURTZMAN, University of Pennsylvania, is serving as a member of the Pennsylvania State Planning Board and of the Governor's Committee on Tax Administration by appointment of Governor Scranton.

HUGH L. LEBLANC, George Washington University, was on sabbatical leave during the spring semester of 1965.

Kurt L. London, George Washington University, has been invited to lecture on American foreign policy and the Sino-Soviet conflict at Keio University, the Imperial Japanese Defense Academy and the University of Kyoto in the fall of 1965.

H. Malcolm Macdonald, University of Texas, has been granted a research leave for the summer of 1965.

Daniel S. McHarque, formerly of the University of Michigan, has completed a two-year assignment as visiting professor of public administration with the University of South California's Public Administration project in Pakistan. He will now act in the same capacity for the University's Indonesian Public Administration project.

WARREN L. MASON, Miami University (Ohio), has returned from a month's study in India, sponsored by the Indian government.

CURTIS W. MARTIN has returned from a year's stay in Australia as Fulbright professor. In Australia he divided his time between the University of Sydney and the University of Tasmania at Hobart.

DONALD R. MATTHEWS has returned to the University of North Carolina after being on leave of absence at the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences, Palo Alto, California.

L. VINCENT PADGETT, San Diego State College, was on leave during the spring quarter. He will spend the academic year 1965-66 in Colombia under a Rockefeller Foundation grant.

CHARLES J. PARRISH, University of Texas, has resumed his post there following a year in Chile on research leave.

Howard Penniman, Georgetown University, combined a Fulbright research grant with sab-batical leave in southern France, during 1964-65.

EMMETTE S. REDFORD, University of Texas, will serve part time during the fall semester in the Graduate School of Business Administration.

DONALD R. REICH, Oberlin College, will spend the 1965-66 year as a fellow in the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Science at Palo Alto. JOHN P. ROCHE, Brandeis University, will be on sabbatical leave in 1965-66. He has received a research grant from the Rockefeller Foundation.

George K. Romoser, Connecticut College, received grants from the American Philosophical Society and the American Council of Learned Societies. He spent the 1964 summer in Berlin conducting research and lecturing at the Free University.

JOSEPH S. ROUCEK, University of Bridgeport, has been elected an honorary member of the Instituto de Ciencias Sociales of Spain.

DANKWART A. RUSTOW, Columbia University, is on sabbatical leave during the spring and fall terms of 1965. During the spring term he was NATO visiting professor in international relations at the London School of Economics and Political Science.

ROBERT SELTZER, Indiana State University has been on sabbatical leave.

JOSEF SILVERSTEIN, Rutgers University, will teach at Cornell during the summer of 1965 and while there will counsel a group of secondary school teachers in a special Cornell program.

Karl N. Snow, Brigham Young University, is currently on leave to complete his doctorate at the University of California.

JOHN E. STONER, Indiana University, has received a research grant from the National Safety Council.

MORTON J. TENZER has resigned his position as associate director of the U. S. Civil Service Commission's Executive Seminar Center to become a staff member of the Institute of Public Administration in New York.

EARL WALLACE, University of North Carolina, served on the Evaluation Panel for the Selection of Fellowships for the National Science Foundation in Washington in February, 1965. He also served as a member of a committee to study the feasibility of expanding the coverage of the advanced test of the Graduate Record Examination.

ARTHUR M. WILSON has been named Daniel Webster professor at Dartmouth College.

DAVID O. D. WURFEL, University of Missouri, is spending the current academic year in the Far East. Much of his time has been devoted to a Fulbright lectureship at the University of Singapore.

STAFF CHANGES

NEW APPOINTMENTS

DAVID B. ABERNATHY, assistant professor, Stanford University, September, 1965.

JOHN BATCHELDER, instructor, University of Iowa.

George D. Beam, assistant professor, Chicago Circle Branch, University of Illinois, September, 1965.

EDWARD M. BERSHTEIN, associate professor 3 and chairman of the department, University of Hartford, Connecticut.

LEWIS BOWMAN, assistant professor, University of Virginia, September, 1965.

PETER K. BREIT, instructor, University of Hartford, Connecticut.

WILLIAM BRILL, assistant professor, Georgetown University.

MILTON C. CUMMINS, associate professor, Johns Hopkins University.

JOHN C. DONOVAN, professor, Bowdoin College.

VLADIMIR REISKY DE DUBNIC, associate professor, University of Virginia.

Marion Doro, assistant professor, Connecticut College.

DAVID V. EDWARDS, assistant professor, University of Texas.

MORTON GORDON, assistant professor, Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Donald Hancock, assistant professor, University of Texas.

Harold C. Kinton, associate professor, George Washington University.

JAMES R. JENSEN, professor and coordinator of Instructional Television, University of Alabama, beginning February 1, 1965; formerly of the University of Houston.

Harold S. Johnson, assistant professor, Michigan State University, September, 1965.

JACK T. JOHNSON, professor and director of the Bureau of Government Research, Indiana State University.

WILLARD R. Johnson, assistant professor, Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

MELVIN A. KAHN, associate professor, Indiana State University.

Bradley Karan, instructor, Michigan State University.

WILLIAM KEECH, assistant professor, University of North Carolina.

ROBERT O. KEOHANE, instructor, Swarthmore College, September, 1965.

DAVID C. LEEGE, assistant professor, University of Missouri.

WILLIAM MATTHEWS, Indiana State University; formerly of the University of Vermont.

WILLIAM MAXAM, Indiana State University; formerly research analyst, Committee on Intergovernmental Relations.

Franz Michael, professor and director of the Institute of Sino-Soviet Studies, Georgetown University; formerly of University of Washington.

STANLEY MILLET, professor and chairman of the department, Adelphi University, September, 1965.

ROBERT A. PACKENHAM, assistant professor, Stanford University, September, 1965.

RENE PERITZ, Indiana State University.

JOHN M. PHELPS, assistant professor, University of Southwestern Louisiana.

THEODORE L. PUTTERMAN, instructor, University of Arizona.

BERNARD REICH, assistant professor, Georgetown University.

WILLIAM H. ROBERTS, professor and director of the Institute of International Law and Relations, the Catholic University of America.

Edward T. Rowe, instructor, University of Denver.

ROBERT S. SHARTLET, assistant professor, University of Missouri.

ROBERT H. SOLVEP (Col. U. S. Army, retired), associate professor, Brigham Young University.

HERBERT J. SPIRO, professor, University of Pennsylvania.

Newell M. Stultz, assistant professor, Brown University, July, 1965.

JOSEPH TANENHAUS, professor, University of Iowa; formerly of New York University.

PAUL WALLACE, assistant professor, University of Missouri.

WILLIAM O. WINTER, professor and chairman of the department, University of Colorado.

· JOHN C. WITHEY, lecturer, Whittier College.

PETER WALL, associate professor, Brandeis University.

STEPHEN WOOD, associate professor, Connecticut College, September, 1964.

PAUL DE YOUNG KAY, assistant professor, Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

JAY K. ZAWODNY, professor, University of Pennsylvania.

TEMPORARY AND VISITING APPOINTMENTS

BRUCE BORTHWICK, Georgetown University (1964-65).

HAROLD R. BRUCE, Dartmouth College: visiting professor, Scripps College.

ARDATH W. BURKS, Rutgers University: visiting lecturer, University of Hawaii, summer, 1965.

Heinz Eulau, Stanford University: visiting professor, Institute for Advanced Studies, Vienna, Austria, 1964-65.

ROBERT H. FERRELL, Indiana University: visiting professor, University of Connecticut, 1964-65.

HERMAN FINER, University of Chicago: visiting professor, Chicago Circle Branch of the University of Illinois, 1965-66.

LEE GREEN, visiting professor, University of Georgia, spring, 1965.

REVERDY GLIDDON, University of Missouri: visiting professor, University of Texas, summer, 1965.

HENRY F. GOODNOW, University of California: visiting professor, University of California.

ROBERT F. KARSCH, University of Missouri: visiting professor, Jadavpur University, Calcutta, India, 1965-66.

Wolfgang H. Kraus, George Washington University: visiting professor, University of Heidelberg, summer, 1964.

H. MALCOLM MACDONALD, University of Texas: William A. Johnson visiting professor, Pomona College and Claremont Graduate School.

EUGENE J. MEEHAN, Rutgers University: visiting professor, Brandeis University, 1965-66.

LINDA MILLER, instructor, Barnard Collège, 1965-1966.

RANDALL H. NELSON, Southern Illinois Uni- leversity: visiting professor, University of California, spring and summer, 1964.

CHESTER NEWLAND, North Texas State University: visiting professor, University of Texas, summer, 1965.

A. F. K. Organski, Brooklyn College: visiting professor, University of Michigan, winter, 1965.

ROLAND I. PERUSSE, University of Maryland: visiting associate professor, Texas Western College.

HERMAN C. PRITCHETT, University of Chicago: lecturer in American democracy, Stanford University, winter quarter, 1965.

CHARLES B. ROBSON, University of North Carolina: guest professor, University of Cologne, summer, 1965.

ROBERT A. RUPEN, University of North Carolina: lecturer, Naval War College, Newport, Rhode Island, July-December, 1965.

LALITA PROSAD SINGH, Australian National University: visiting assistant professor, University of Missouri, 1965-66.

Byron S. Weng, instructor, Miami University (Ohio), 1964-65.

PHILIP S. WILDER, JR., Wabash College: visiting lecturer, University of Illinois, second semester, 1964-65.

RICHARD B. WILSON, University of Colorado: visiting professor, University of California at Santa Barbara, spring, 1964.

OTHER APPOINTMENTS

CHARLES F. BALDWIN, Diplomat in Residence, Woodrow Wilson Department of Government and Foreign Affairs, University of Virginia, formerly Ambassador to Malaysia.

DEMETRIOS CARALEY, Barnard College: chairman of the department.

LEE W. FARNSWORTH, Bringam Young University: coordinator of the International Relations Program.

PAUL FOWLER, Indiana State University: Seting chairman of the department.

Louis G. Kahle, University of Missouri: chairman of the department beginning June 1, 1964.

NORTON E. LONG, Brandeis University: chairman of the department, 1965-66.

EDWIN B. MORRELL, Brigham Young University: coordinator of the newly established Russian Studies program.

RICHARD E. NEUSTADT (formerly of Columbia University): associate dean of the Harvard Graduate School of Public Administration and director of the new Institute of Politics to be connected with the John Fitzgerald Kennedy Library.

MAURICE K. TOWNSEND, Moorhead State College: academic dean.

JAMES R. WOODWORTH, Miami University (Ohio), chairman of the department, beginning February 1, 1965.

PROMOTIONS (with new rank)

MICHAEL A. ARMACOST, Pomona College, assistant professor.

WILLIAM ANDREWS, Tufts University, associate professor.

DEMETRIOS CARALEY, Barnard College: associate professor.

George Carey, Georgetown University: associate professor.

PATRICK J. CONKLIN, University of Missouri: associate professor.

HARVEY GLICKMAN, Haverford College: associate professor.

JACOB LANDYNSKI, The Graduate Faculty, The New School: associate professor.

HERBERT R. MARSHALL, Stanford University: professor.

DALE A. NEUMAN, University of Rochester:

assistant professor.

L. VINCENT PADGETT, San Diego State College: professor.

ROBERT L. PEABODY, Johns Hopkins University: associate professor.

GEORGE K. ROMOSER, Connecticut College: associate professor.

MARTIN SHAPIRO, Stanford University: associate professor.

JAN TRISKA, Stanford University: professor.

LLOYD M. WELLS, University of Missouri: professor.

MARVIN WEINBAUM, Colby College, assistant professor.

DAVID O. D. WURFEL, University of Missouri: associate professor.

RESIGNATIONS AND RETIREMENTS

JOSEPH E. BLACK has resigned from the chairmanship at Miami University (Ohio) to be director of Social Sciences and Humanities, Rockefeller Foundation.

GENERAL WILLIAM C. CHASE retired at the end of the spring quarter, 1965, as visiting lecturer at the University of Houston.

DAVID W. KEPPER retired at the end of the spring quarter, 1965, after twenty years as professor at the University of Houston.

Louis Mexer resigned from the University of Arizona to become administrative assistant to Governor Sam Goddard.

THOMAS P. PEARDON will retire from Barnard as of July, 1965.

JOHN SCHMIDHAUSER resigned his professorship at the University of Iowa to take over his new duties as U. S. Representative from the first congressional district of Iowa.

JACOB VAN Ex, University of Colorado, retired in June, 1965. He had served as dean of the College of Arts and Sciences from 1929 to 1959.

SSRC PROGRAMS, 1966

The Social Science Research Council's programs of Research Training Fellowships and Faculty Research Grants are currently under review, and it is not yet certain what form these may take for the coming year.

The Council will again offer grants to mature scholars, not candidates for degrees, on essentially the same basis as before, for research on American Governmental and Legal Processes, and for research on International Organization.

Under joint sponsorship of the Social Science Research Council and the American Council of Learned Societies, several programs of fellowships and grants for training and research on certain foreign areas will be continued; inquiries concerning these should be directed respectively to the offices indicated:

Grants to mature scholars for research on Africa, Contemporary China, Latin America, and the Near and Middle East are administered by the Social Science Research Council; for research in Asian Studies and in Slavic and East European Studies, by the American Council of Learned Societies (345 East 46th Street, New York, N. Y. 10017);

Fellowships for training in foreign area studies are administered by the Foreign Area Fellowship Program (444 Madison Avenue, New York, N. Y 10022).

Inquiries, and requests for a final announcement to be issued in late September, should be addressed to Social Science Research Council Fellowships and Grants, 230 Park Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10017

To avoid missing deadlines, prospective applicants should correspond with appropriate office by early October.

IN MEMORIAM

WILLIAM MONTGOMERY McGOVERN, professor of political science at Northwestern University, died December 12, 1964, at the age of 67. Born in Brooklyn, N. Y., he spent most of his childhood in the Orient. He obtained his Doctor of Philosophy degree from Christ Church College, Oxford, England, in 1922, and joined the faculty of Northwestern University in 1929. In 1937 he left the University to report the developing war in the Far East for the Chicago Times, returning in 1940 to lecture at Harvard University. Beginning in 1941 he served in the Navy as a special advisor to the Joint Chiefs of Staff. On his discharge from the Navy he held the rank of commander and received the Legion of Merit. He then returned to full time teaching duties at Northwestern and also participated actively in public affairs both in party politics and in various capacities in the national government.

Professor McGovern was the author of eleven books. Their range reflects the spectrum of his life's interest: Modern Japan, Colloquial Japanese, An Introduction to Mahayana Buddhism, Manual of Buddhist Philosophy, To Lhasa in Disguise, Jungle Paths and Inca Ruins, Growth of Institutions, Early Empires of Central Asia, From Luther to Hitler, Radicals and Conservatives, and Strategic Intelligence and the Shape of Tomorrow.

He is survived by his widow, two daughters and a son.—R. BARRY FARRELL

OFFICERS OF THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION

President DAVID B. TRUMAN

Columbia University

President-Elect GABRIEL A. ALMOND Stanford University

Vice Presidents

SAMUEL H. BEER Harvard University MARIAN D. IRISH Florida State University JAMES L. McCAMY University of Wisconsin

Secretary

MALCOLM E. JEWELL University of Kentucky

TreasurerMAX M. KAMPELMAN Washington, D.C.

Executive Director

EVRON M. KIRKPATRICK 1726 Massachusetts Ave., N.W. Washington, D.C., 20036

Assistant Director DON TACHERON

Managing Editor, APSR HARVEY C. MANSFIELD The Ohio State University COUNCIL

Above-named Officers ex officiis

BYRUM CARTER Indiana University FREDERIC CLEAVELAND University of North Carolina KARL W. DEUTSCH Yale University LEON EPSTEIN University of Wisconsin LAWRENCE J. R. HERSON Ohio State University ROBERT G. McCloskey Harvard University RICHARD E. NEUSTADT Columbia University LUCIAN PYE

MARVER H. BERNSTEIN Princeton University JAMES S. COLEMAN University of California, Los Angeles DAVID EASTON University of Chicago CHARLES D. FARRIS University of Florida ERNST B. HAAS University of California, Berkeley WARREN E. MILLER University of Michigan Joseph Tanenhaus New York University JOHN C. WAHLKE State University of New York, Buffalo

Massachusetts Institute of Technology

FORMER PRESIDENTS

Frank J. Goodnow ALBERT SHAW FREDERIC N. JUDSON JAMES BRYCE A. LAWRENCE LOWELL WOODROW WILSON SIMEON E. BALDWIN ALBERT BUSHNELL HART W. W. WILLOUGHBY JOHN BASSETT MOORE ERNST FREUND JESSE MACY MUNROE SMITH HENRY JONES FORD PAUL S. REINSCH LEO S. ROWE WILLIAM A. DUNNING HARRY A. GARFIELD JAMES W. GARNER CHARLES E. MERRIAM

CHARLES A. BEARD WILLIAM B. MUNRO Jesse S. Reeves JOHN A. FAIRLIE BENJAMIN F. SHAMBAUGH EDWARD S. CORWIN WILLIAM F. WILLOUGHBY ISIDOR LOEB WALTER J. SHEPARD FRANCIS W. COKER ARTHUR N. HOLCOMBE THOMAS REED POWELL CLARENCE A. DYKSTRA CHARLES GROVE HAINES ROBERT C. BROOKS FREDERIC A. OGG WILLIAM ANDERSON ROBERT E. CUSHMAN LEONARD D. WHITE

John M. Gaus WALTER F. DODD ARTHUR W. MACMAHON HENRY R. SPENCER QUINCY WRIGHT JAMES K. POLLOCK PETER H. ODEGARD LUTHER H. GULICK PENDLETON HERRING RALPH J. BUNCHE CHARLES McKINLEY HAROLD D. LASSWELL E. E. SCHATTSCHNEIDER V. O. KEY, JR. R. TAYLOR COLE CARL B. SWISHER EMMETTE S. REDFORD CHARLES S. HYNEMAN CARL J. FRIEDRICH C. HERMAN PRITCHETT

Professional Placement Service at 1965 Annual Meeting

(September 8-11, 1965)

A professional placement service will again be available to members of The American Political Science Association attending the Washington, D.C. meeting. The placement service will be provided by the U.S. Employment Service. The primary purpose is to provide an efficient means for employers to meet prospective employees and vice versa.

The Professional Placement Service is entirely separate from the APSA's Personnel Service and requires separate registration. There is no fee for use of the Professional Placement Service by employers or applicants at the Convention.

FOLLOW UP: Orders and applications will be returned to the local Employment Service Office after the Annual Meeting. The office will determine if a satisfactory placement occurred and, if not, will make further recruitment or placement efforts.

All State Employment Service local offices accept orders and applications in the field of political science on a year-round basis as a regular part of their professional service.

If you plan to attend the Conference and utilize the Placement Service, please mail the form below as soon as possible, but not later than August 5, 1965. Application and/or employer order forms will be forwarded to you upon receipt of the following information:

Name:	•••••
(Organization or Institution)
Address:	•
(City)	(State)
☐ Employer	☐ No. of Vacancies
(check either)	•
☐ Prospective Candidate	☐ No. of Area(s) of Specialization
Fill in appropriate blocks and mail to: Miss Wareteen Smith, USES-DC Professional Placement Center, 1000 16th Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036

JUST PUBLISHED

American Politics and Government

Essays in Essentials

Edited by STEPHEN K. BAILEY

Dean and Professor of Political Science

Maxwell Graduate School of Citizenship and Public Affairs, Syracuse University

OUTSTANDING in that it is an introduction both to American government and to political science, American Politics and Government brings together contributions by twenty-one authorities. They employ the concepts of political science to make the governmental process—on local, national, and international levels—intelligible to student and layman alike. In the process, they also introduce the reader to the dominant themes and methods of American political science today.

Their exposition is lucid, sophisticated in method, and engaging in its frank confrontation of the problems of American democratic government. The high level and quality of the contents speak for themselves. $5.00

CONTENTS

STEPHEN K. BAILEY Preface; ROBERT A. DAHL What Is Political Science?; STANLEY KELLEY, JR. The American Constitutional System; ALPHEUS T. MASON The Role of the Supreme Court; CLINTON ROSSITER The Presidency; HERMAN M. SOMERS The President's Office; JAMES MACGREGOR BURNS The United States Congress; JOSEPH F. HARRIS THE TWO HOUSES OF CONGRESS; HUGH DOUGLAS PRICE LEGISLATIVE POLICY-Making; E. E. SCHATTSCHNEIDER THE American Party System; DONALD HERZBERG Elections; EARL LATHAM

Interest Groups in the American System; pouglass cater Public Opinion; roscoe c. Martin Intergovernmental Relations; robert s. babcock State Government in the United States; charles r. adrian Local Government; roy c. macridis Comparative Government; hans j. morgenthau International Relations; gerard j. mangone United States Foreign Policy and the United States; avery leiserson Science and Government; merle fainsod Development Administration.

A CLASSROOM EDITION IS AVAILABLE IN PAPERBACK AT $2.95

BASIC BOOKS, INC., Publishers
404 Park Avenue South, New York, N. Y. 10016

PART/TIME WORK AVAILABLE

PH.D. preferred, M.A. considered, as a field interviewer for a market research organization specializing in interviewing "highly educated audiences."

In the course of an average year, Mendota interviewers see about one of ten of the nation's physicians and a large proportion of its lawyers, engineers, editors, administrators, business executives and school principals.

High interview rate plus bonus for complete assignments. Merit raises with experience. Work assignments adjustable to available time. Any location in the United States.

If you are interested and meet these qualifications, please write for application forms.

MENDOTA RESEARCH GROUP

31 Sylvan Avenue ENGLEWOOD CLIFFS, NEW JERSEY

JOURNAL OF SOCIAL AND POLITICAL IDEAS IN JAPAN

published April—August—December by

The Center for Japanese Social and Political Studies

English-language translations (condensed) of articles dealing with modern Japanese thought by prominent Japanese intellectuals.

Vol. I, No. 1, International Affairs; No. 2, Selected Articles of 1962; No. 3, Education in Japan; Vol. II, No. 1, Japanese Intellectuals; No. 2, Selected Articles of 1963; No. 3, Japanese Politics: Structure and Dynamics.

Free to Associate Members of the Center. Annual membership fee: $5.00, £1/15/8 or $1800. Yearly subscription: $5.00, £1/15/8 or $1800. Single copy price: $2.00, £0/14/3 or $700. Special rates for bulk orders will be arranged.

Address communications to the Center, Kuwano Building, 2-26 Yoyogi, Shibuya-ku, Toyko, Japan.

1965 Latin American Tour-Seminar Program

August 7 to September 1

Association members may still join the 1965 Latin American Tour-Seminar . . . twenty-four days in seven countries in this critically important region. Final arrangements for this unique travel-study opportunity are now being made by the Association, but a limited number may still make reservations to participate.

In addition to direct conversations with governmental leaders of the countries on the itinerary, tour-seminar participants will meet with members of the faculties of local universities, U.S. Foreign Service Personnel, foreign press representatives, etc. Opportunity will be provided for personal research and sightseeing. The entire trip is being planned with the cooperation and support of the U.S. Department of State and the U.S. Information Service.

TRANSPORTATION

The Latin American Tour-Seminar will be carried out on regularly scheduled jet flights of reputable International carriers.

EXPENSES

The cost of the APSA Tour-Seminar will be approximately $1092.00. The fare will include round-trip tourist air transportation, first-class hotel accommodations, numerous meal functions, baggage handling, airport transfers, entire schedule of meetings, interviews, briefings, and appropriate sightseeing activities.

On the basis of past experience, participants can expect that the cost of this educational activity will be accepted as a deductible expense on Federal income tax returns.

For further information concerning this educational, research, and travel opportunity, write immediately to: APSA 1965 Latin American Tour-Seminar, The American Political Science Association, 1726 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W., Washington, D. C. 20036. A brochure giving full details and reservation information will be mailed to you.

Notice

Resolutions at Annual Business Meeting

In accordance with ARTICLE VIII of the Constitution, this is to call attention of members of the Association to the provision of the APSA constitution that:

"All resolutions shall be referred to the Council for its recommendations before submission to the vote of the Association at its Annual Business Meeting."

The Council of the Association will meet all day September 7, 1965, in the Wilmington Room, Sheraton-Park Hotel, Washington, D.C.

INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION

the quarterly journal of the World Peace Foundation offering the most inclusive and up-to-date account of the recent activities of international organizations

Commemorating the UN's 20th Year Presents
A SPECIAL UN ANNIVERSARY ISSUE
Summer 1965

THE UNITED NATIONS: ACCOMPLISHMENTS & PROSPECTS

edited by Norman J. Padelford and Leland M. Goodrich

A comprehensive appraisal of the achievements, problems, and alternatives of the UN in the light of two decades of experience.

Articles by distinguished specialists in international relations:

Lincoln P. Bloomfield

Roy Blough

Daniel S. Cheever

Inis L. Claude, Jr.

Harlan Cleveland

Jean-Baptiste Duroselle

Rupert Emerson

Lawrence S. Finkelstein

Annette Baker Fox

Leland M. Goodrich

Geoffrey Goodwin

Leo Gross

H. Field Haviland, Jr.

Louis Henkin

J. C. Hurewitz

John Karefa-Smart

Arthur Lall

Minerya Morales M.

Philip E. Mosely

Norman J. Padelford

Shabtai Rosenne

Ruth B. Russell

Walter R. Sharp

Kenneth Thompson

Richard W. Van Wagenen

Francis O. Wilcox

Bryce Wood

Due to the length of this issue, the comprehensive summaries of the recent activities of international organizations which normally would have appeared will be published in the Autumn 1965 issue of International Organization.

$6.00 a year $16.00 for three years $2.00 a copy Student rate: $4.00 a year

WORLD PEACE FOUNDATION

40 Mt. Vernon Street Boston, Mass. 02108

AT LAST!

The True, Detailed, Historical-Analytical, Study of MINNESOTA'S 1962 GUBERNATORIAL RECOUNT

Written by RONALD F. STINNETT, Ph.D.

Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee and
CHARLES H. BACKSTROM, Ph.D.
University of Minnesota
ONLY $2.95

RECOUNT is the most comprehensive book ever written on the phenomenon of close elections and recounts. The Minnesota recount, with Governor Karl Rolvaag defeating Elmer L. Andersen by 91 votes or .007% of the vote, was the most comprehensive statewide recount undertaken in United States history. Together, the event and the book, serve respectively as landmarks in the making and in the recording of Minnesota history.

RECOUNT IS A BOOK EVERY MINNESOTAN SHOULD OWN

Send in your order today—Mail check p	ayable to:
RECOUNT • P. O. Box 1746, Washingt	on, D. C. 20013
Please send me copies of	the book entitled RECOUNT at $2.95 eac	ch, postpaid. I enclose $
Name
Address	City	State
NOTE: If you are ordering copies for sev	eral persons, use a separate sheet of pap	er to list their names and addresses.
Check here if you desire your copie	s autographed by the authors.

GUMULATIVE INDEX

to the AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW

Vols. 1-57: 1906-1963

Individual subscribers, political science departments, and libraries wishing to pinpoint information in their volumes of the American Political Science Review will find this Index indispensable. This is the first cumulative index of the Review in almost forty years, and it covers Vols. 1–57: 1906–1963. After completing a pilot study on the uses of KWIC indexing, Kenneth Janda of Northwestern University supervised this project which has produced a cumulative index and at the same time has increased our knowledge of the potential uses of KWIC indexing in political science.

NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY PRESS · Evanston, Illinois

THE LILLY ENDOWMENT RESEARCH PROGRAM IN CHRISTIANITY AND POLITICS

John Wild, Human Freedom and Social Order: An Essay in Christian Philosophy 1959 250 p. $5.00

"An unusually clear book on an important topic relevant to the contemporary intellectual situation...it deserves serious attention."

The Times Literary Supplement

Kenneth W. Thompson, Christian Ethics and the Dilemmas of Foreign Policy 1959 148 p. $3.50

"All students of power and values may find guidance and information in this challenging book."

The Western Political Quarterly

Francis P. Canavan, S.J., The Political Reason of Edmund Burke 1960 222 p. $5.00

"This is a scholarly, critical, and scrupulously fair examination of the rational basis of Burke's political thought."

Philosophical Studies

Paul Ramsey, War and the Christian Conscience: How Shall Modern War Be Conducted Justly? 1961 331 p. $6.00

"Altogether this is a fine, closely reasoned book: the product of intelligence, ingenuity, and dedication to Christianity."

The Review of Politics

Edgar H. Brookes, Power, Law, Right, and Love: A Study in Political Values 1963 84 p. $3.00

"This unusual little book presents the reflections of a mature and devout scholar and statesman."

Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science

Carl J. Friedrich, Transcendent Justice: The Religious Dimension of Constitutionalism 1964 118 p. $3.50

"There is evidence of a tremendous amount of scholarship in the pages of this slender volume."

North Dakota Law Review

John H. Hallowell, ed., Development for What? 1964 241 p. $6.00

"I find this an exceedingly valuable addition to the literature on economic development. It touches on problems largely ignored by students of the more technical aspects of the problem."

Kenneth W. Thompson, Vice-President The Rockefeller Foundation

DUKE UNIVERSITY PRESS

6697 College Station

Durham, North Carolina, 27708

INTERNATIONAL POLITICS IN A REVOLUTIONARY AGE

W. W. KULSKI, Duke University

Focusing on the tensions reshaping world politics in this century, the author analyzes the ideological conflicts, discordant national interests and the social and economic factors that underlie today's revolutionary transformations. Close attention is given to the problems of the underdeveloped nations—the "Third World"—and their role in today's power struggle. The problem of power as a factor in international relations is analyzed with skill and sophistication. Extensive bibliographies.

672 Pages

$6.95

THE MAKING OF FOREIGN POLICY: EAST AND WEST

KURT LONDON, George Washington University

The author scans the policy machinery of the main protagonists of the East-West conflict—United States, Russia, China, Great Britain, France—and shows how each power creates and implements its foreign policy in conformity with the basic elements that determine its course. Special emphasis is given to the vital roles of intelligence and propaganda in the making and implementation of policy, and the agencies and media employed are carefully defined.

368 Pages

Paperbound

$1.95

THE INTEGRATION OF POLITICAL COMMUNITIES

KARL W. DEUTSCH, Yale University; PHILIP E. JACOB, HENRY TEUNE, JAMES V. TOSCANO, WILLIAM L.C. WHEATON, University of Pennsylvania

Integrated political behavior at the metropolitan and international levels is explored in ten essays that result from an interdisciplinary seminar held at the University of Pennsylvania in 1961-62. Findings are based on empirical studies in a wide range of fields, including communications, international relations, planning and regional science, local government, social structure, social psychology and cultural anthropology.

220 Pages

Paperbound

$1.95

A CENTURY OF RUSSIAN FOREIGN POLICY, 1814-1914

BARBARA JELAVICH, Indiana University

From the highpoint of 1814 to the catastrophe of 1914 the remarkable continuity of the Russian course is traced as successive rulers developed and extended guidelines originally laid down by Peter the Great. An introductory chapter surveys the period from Peter through Napoleon, and a concluding chapter points to the survival of certain drives and objectives in the foreign policy of Soviet Russia today. Maps and bibliographies.

320 Pages

Paperbound

$1.85

JUSTICE AND THE SUPREME COURT

ROCCO J. TRESOLINI, Lehigh University

Majority or dissenting opinions in eight celebrated cases are skillfully measured against the minds and personalities of the justices who wrote them. Centers mainly on the civil rights aspects of the Court's work not covered by most texts. Clearly and simply written; excellent supplementary reading for courses in American Government, Constitutional Law and Civil Rights.

"Tresolini, in his eight cases, writes an entrancing story in terms of majority opinions and dissents as to the growth of our precious liberties."

—Morris L. Ernst

205 Pages

Paperbound

$1.45

Write for Examination Copies

J. B. LIPPINCOTT COMPANY

College Department, East Washington Square, Philadelphia, Pa. 19105

Please mention The American Political Science Review when writing to advertisers

A NEW NAME IN PUBLISHING, NOW SERVING POLITICAL SCIENCE

Douglas E. Ashford PERSPECTIVES OF A MOROCCAN NATIONALIST is a vital case history of political development in a non-Western setting that scrutinizes the careers and perspectives of the men who liberated and inherited a new nation. We learn the qualifications and attitudes that help and harm the formation and maintenance of a viable political system. Especially interesting is the author's pioneer analysis of the effect on party officials of participation in violence during the revolution. $6.

John Hanser

GUIDE TO DECISION: THE ROYAL COMMISSION

describes the structure and function of the highest bridge between men of knowledge and men of power that has been evolved by the British, and proposes an adaption of this organization to fit the United States. Fall 1965.

$6.50

Alf Ross

UNITED NATIONS: PEACE AND PROGRESS

presents a wise, merciless yet constructive analysis of the world body. The founding principles of the UN, its organizational structure, its actual practices in war and peace, its high official pronouncements, as well as the idealism of its supporting ideologies, are fully presented and put to an acid test of political realism. The accomplishments of the UN are candidly evaluated, and its future—much of which revolves around the role to be played by the Security Council—is discussed. Fall 1965.

Guenther Roth

THE SOCIAL DEMOCRATS IN IMPERIAL GERMANY is a widely acclaimed analysis of the integration of the working class into German society, developed with comparative perspectives and with full use of the sociological insights of Max Weber and others.

$8.50

Folke Schmidt and Stig Stroemholm LEGAL VALUES IN MODERN SWEDEN

is a brief introduction to Swedish law, chosing four aspects to illustrate its salient features: civil rights, the status of women, labor relations, and the administration of justice according to codified law. These topics illustrate a working synthesis of individual and collective interests, a balance between the rule of law and the practice of compromise. Of special interest is the discussion of the relation of law to the elaborate system of social welfare, illuminating an increasingly important problem: the nature of law in the welfare state.

THE BEDMINSTER VREELAND AVENUE, TOTOWA, NEW JERSEY, 07512, U.S.A.

PRESS INCORPORATED

EDITOR: HANS L. ZETTERBERG

Lorenz von Stein

THE HISTORY OF THE SOCIAL MOVEMENT IN FRANCE, 1789-1850

translated, introduced, and edited by Kaethe Mengelberg, is a classic work on early socialist theories and an inspiration to many reform movements. It develops a readable Hegelian theory of social change and (prior to Marx) coins such terms as "the proletariat" and formulates propositions about class struggles.

$10.

Leila Sussmann

DEAR FDR: A STUDY OF POLITICAL LETTER-WRITING

reviews the story of political mass-mail in the United States and how it was put to systematic use by Franklin D. Roosevelt. Introduction by Robert K. Merton. $6.

Herbert Tingsten

POLITICAL BEHAVIOR

is the classic work that gave name to a field. "Brilliant survey of voting statistics around the world," says S. M. Lipset. $7.50 is a truly superior and brilliant overview of democratic ideas, their history, their translation into practice, and their confrontation with changing social and historical realities. This book reveals democracy as a great historical experiment, whose outcome remains problematic. It reviews the historical instances of tension and ambiguity through which democratic principles have emerged with more definite meaning. Special attention is paid to the delicate balance between consensus and conflict, stability and vitality in democracies. Such familiar issues as the potential combination of democracy and socialism, and the relation of democracy to dictatorship are brought into renewed focus by Tingsten's extraordinary ability to cut through the web of speech habits and slogans and strike the core of the problems.

Herbert Tingsten

THE PROBLEM OF DEMOCRACY

Aaron Wildavski

LEADERSHIP IN A SMALL TOWN

presents a fast-moving account of men and issues in the political life of Oberlin, Ohio, showing who rules when, about what, how, and why. This town is not seen as dominated by a power elite, nor by long established families, but by a variety of interested persons and groups who are activated when issues emerge that concern them. This pluralist system works well and enriches the lives of those who participate. A realistic optimism about the potentials of active citizens in local communities sets this study apart from many others. Both those who wish to understand and to do something about conditions in their communities should welcome this book.

THE BEDMINSTER VREELAND AVENUE, TOTOWA, NEW JERSEY, 07512, U.S.A.

PRESS INCORPORATED . .

Significant Political Science Books from McGraw-Hill

AMERICAN POLITICS AND THE PARTY SYSTEM, Third Edition

By HUGH A. BONE, University of Washington. McGraw-Hill Series in Political Science. 700 pages, $8.95.

Provides the reader with both a theoretical and practical understanding of the role and significance of political parties, with special reference to the American system. Broad in scope, it covers every aspect of the party system—organization, activities, function, and finance.

POLITICS AND VOTERS

By HUGH A. BONE, University of Washington; and AUSTIN RAN-NEY, University of Wisconsin. Mc-Graw-Hill Series in Political Science. 144 pages, $3.50 (hard-cover), $1.50 (soft-cover).

Summarizes and analyzes the principle concepts relating to political and voting behavior, political parties, pressure groups, nominations, campaigns, and elections. Emphasizes the behavioral approach, but does not limit itself specifically to empirical or behavioral theory.

THE MAKERS OF PUBLIC POLICY: American Power Groups and Their Ideologies

By JOSEPH MONSEN, University of Washington; and MARK CANNON, Brigham Young University. 368 pages, $6.95.

Outlines and documents the position and ideology of the major power groups in this country that determine our public policy.

THE STUDY OF POLITICS

By ANDREW HACKER, Cornell University. Series in Foundations of American Government and Political Science. 112 pages, $3.50 (hard-cover), $1.50 (soft-cover).

A brief introduction to political theory, relating principles to the institutions by which men govern themselves.

THE STRUCTURE OF POLITICAL THOUGHT

By CHARLES N. R. McCOY, The Catholic University of America. 328 pages, $7.95 (Text Edition also available).

Shows the meaning of political ideas when measured by the principles and concepts of classical-mediaeval political philosophy.

MAJOR ASPECTS OF AMERICAN GOVERNMENT

By NORMAN J. POWELL and DANIEL P. PARKER, City College of New York. Mc-Graw-Hill Series in Political Science. 442 pages, $3.95 (paperback), $5.95 (cloth).

A collection of readings covering all major topics in American Government, arranged according to the logical and psychological utility of the subject matter.

Send for your examination copies today

McGRAW-HILL

BOOK COMPANY

330 West 42nd Street/New York, N. Y. 10036

Please mention The American Political Science Review when writing to advertisers

New Books on politics and policies

AMERICAN DEFENSE POLICY

Prepared by Wesley W. Posvar, John C. Ries, and other Associates in Political Science, U.S. Air Force Academy. A pioneering effort in treating national security as a distinct and coherent field of study. The policy-making process and the issues of national military strategy are discussed by Arnold Wolfers, Hans J. Morgenthau, W. W. Rostow, Robert E. Osgood, and others.

496 pages $9.50

FOREIGN POLICY IN THE SIXTIES

The Issues and the Instruments

Edited by Roger Hilsman and Robert C. Good

This book provides a clearer understanding of foreign affairs by concentrating on three aspects: the theory, the instrumentalities, and the specific issues. Topics discussed include the Sino-Soviet dispute, the problems of defense, foreign aid, the United Nations, and political morality vs. political reality.

336 pages $6.95

THE EXERCISE OF SOVEREIGNTY Papers on Foreign Policy

By Charles Burton Marshall

What does it mean for a nation to be sovereign today? This is the question that Charles Burton Marshall deals with in this book about the problems of conducting foreign policy in the present decade.

296 pages $6.50

THE DOMINION PARTNERSHIP IN IMPERIAL DEFENSE, 1870-1914

By Donald C. Gordon

Describes the growth of military and naval collaboration among the major self-governing parts of the British Empire during the decades prior to World War I. In showing how British military plans encountered political difficulties, Mr. Gordon treats an important aspect of the transformation of the British Empire into the Commonwealth of Nations.

376 pages $7.50

UNITED STATES POLICY AND THE PARTITION OF TURKEY, 1914-1924

By Laurence Evans

A detailed and thoroughly documented study of the phases through which American Middle East policy passed during and following World War I. Activities and events are analyzed from the point of view of the makers of American foreign policy. 424 pages $7.95

The Johns Hopkins Press BALTIMORE, MD. 21218

ANNOUNCING from the . .

THE THEORY AND METHOD OF POLITICAL ANALYSIS

By Eugene J. Meehan, Rutgers—The State University

This study of the impact of science on the methodology of political science places methodology in its philosophic context before examining the meaning of "being scientific" in terms of philosophy of science, and identifies the uses and limits of science in political science with particular attention to modes of explanation, epistemology, and methods and techniques.

THE DYNAMICS OF INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION The Making of World Order

By Philip E. Jacob and Alexine L. Atherton, both of the University of Pennsylvania

This timely and original study enables the student of international organization to understand the nature of the pioneering political institutions which have been fashioned to cope with the issues of world interdependence. Complete coverage is made of international non-political activities of regional and global organizations in which national states cooperate.

LATIN AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS The Dynamics of a Revolutionary Society

By Alexander T. Edelmann, University of Nebraska

Employing a sociological, topical approach, this new book provides the student with an understanding of the social forces whose influence and interplay underlie the politics of the Latin American region and largely determine the organization and operation of government.

COMPARATIVE POLITICS: Notes and Readings, Rev. Ed.

Edited by Roy C. Macridis and Bernard E. Brown, both of the State University of New York at Buffalo

Recently revised and widely adopted, this book examines both Western and non-Western Political systems and provides a complete study of the field. It is a functional comparative analysis for the undergraduate. This edition contains an expanded section on modern dictatorship and the politics of developing nations.

Write for Examination Copies Today

Published in: THE DORSEY SERIES IN POLITICAL SCIENCE

Consulting Editor: Norton E. Long, Professor, Department of Politics, Brandeis University, and member of the Joint Center for Urban Studies, Harvard and M.I.T.

The Dorsey Press • Homewood, Illinois

Please mention The American Political Science Review when writing to advertisers

POLITICS AND SOCIAL LIFE

An Introduction to Political Behavior

Edited by Nelson W. Polsby, Robert A. Dentler, and Paul A. Smith

This text and reader provides a systematic review of the scientific study of political behavior, emphasizing what we know now, not programs or promises. Each of the eight chapters contains an original essay integrating current knowledge on a topic of primary concern, plus eight to twelve outstanding recent studies of the topic.

879 pages

1963

$9.50

THE POLITICS OF REGULATION: A Reader Edited by Samuel Krislov and Lloyd D. Musolf

45 articles from scholarly journals, periodicals, and congressional transcript illustrate the reasons for and problems of the regulatory process. Taken together they provide a guide to the paths tread by the regulatory bodies among the executive branch, Congress, and interest groups.

261 pages

1964

Paperbound

$1.95

A SURVEY OF UNITED STATES-LATIN AMERICAN RELATIONS L. Howd Mochem

J. Lloyd Mecham

This analytical survey text is the first in ten years to trace the evolution of the Latin-American foreign policy of the United States from its beginnings in the days of independence to the present time. The book is organized both historically and topically, with adequate coverage of both United States policies of general application and United States relations with individual countries.

About 480 pages

Clothbound

An October 1965 Publication

Pertinent and perceptive . . . new books published by Prentice-Hall in 1965

The Politics of American Democracy, 3rd Edition, 1965

by Marian D. Irish, Florida State University and James W. Prothro, University of North Carolina. This widely adopted text, in its Third Edition, presents a realistic view of the American political scene with vitality and force, and integrates policy problems with the discussion of the political process. It covers the 1964 campaign and election, includes new chapters on "economic well-being" and "national defense and foreign policy." This edition also updates materials through December 1964, including Civil Rights Act of 1964, important judicial decisions on reapportionment, the new approach to cooperative federalism, and the "war on poverty." April 1965, 722 pp., $7.95

the two following texts offer A COMPLETE COURSE IN POLITICAL SCIENCE

The Great Issues of Politics, 3rd Edition, 1965

by Leslie Lipson, University of California at Berkeley. The new Third Edition of Leslie Lipson's widely-praised study of political organizations ranges from ancient to modern times. As in the popular previous editions, Lipson's goal has been to present permanent problems in an historical and philosophical perspective, emphasizing the varying solutions applicable to five great issues that have concerned mankind throughout the centuries. July 1965, approx. 432 pp., $6.95

The Challenge of Politics: Ideas and Issues, 2nd Edition, 1965

Edited by Alvin Z. Rubinstein, University of Pennsylvania, and Garold W. Thumm, Bates College. The revised Second Edition of this comprehensive volume contains an unusually wide selection of cross-cultural range readings, and offers the basis for a strong fundamental course in political science. It urges students to examine and confront the issues which have dictated the nature of political behavior from the time of Aristotle. January 1965, 480 pp., Paper $4.95

Law, Its Nature, Functions, and Limits

by Charles G. Howard, Emeritus, and Robert S. Summers, both of the University of Oregon. This new text presents law not as a body of rules to be learned but as man's chief means of political and social control. It explains through generous use of primary source materials how the legal system operates and what its main functions are. Designed primarily for undergraduate courses in law, this new book treats the roles of law and lawyers in society. March 1965, 480 pp., $8.95

An Author's Guide to Scholarly Publishing and The Law

by John C. Hogan, The RAND Corporation, and Saul Cohen, Attorney at Law, Member of the California Bar. Written for all candidates for advanced degrees, this book also is designed for teachers and professors who write and publish books and articles. It is the first volume to approach copyright and related problems from the standpoint of the scholar, and answers practical legal questions about publishing that most scholarly writers are confronted with in their work. March 1965, 128 pp. $5.50

For approval copies, write: Box 903

PRENTICE-HALL, ENGLEWOOD CLIFFS, N.J.

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

a flexible, comprehensive, scholarly new series in American government

SCOTT, FORESMAN AMERICAN GOVERNMENT

SERIES Edited by Joseph C. Palamountain, Jr., Wesleyan University

The Scott, Foresman American Government Series answers the need for continuity and flexibility in the American government course by offering interlocking books which cover broad basic topics and, to permit a choice of emphasis, auxiliary books which treat more specialized topics. Like our system of government, the series strikes a balance between unity and diversity. The rationale of democracy and the contemporary processes of American government receive special emphasis. Each book is written by a different author, thereby tapping the expertise and experience of distinguished scholars in the fields of their special competence.

American Government Series books available in 1965 are:

The Constitutional System, Arthur N. Holcombe, Harvard University

Official Makers of Public Policy, Louis W. Koenig, New York University

Judicial Policy Making, Glendon Schubert, Michigan State University

The People in Politics, John H. Fenton, University of Massachusetts

Foreign Policy and National Defense, Laurence I. Radway, Dartmouth College

Promoting the General Welfare, Lloyd D. Musolf, University of California—Davis

Local Government, Thomas A. Flinn, Oberlin College

Congress, Ralph K. Huitt, University of Wisconsin

The United States and the United Nations, Daniel S. Cheever, University of Pittsburgh

SCOTT, FORESMAN AND COMPANY

Chicago

Atlanta

Dallas

Palo Alto

Fair Lawn, N.J.

THE FALL OF STEIN

By RICHARD C. RAACK

Baron Friedrich von Stein was leader of the reform movement in Prussia during the early 19th century and Frederick William III's chief minister. This vivid description of his fall from power provides an enlightening reappraisal of the intricate domestic political situation during a critically important phase of German history. Harvard Historical Monographs, 58. $5.00

JOHN P. HALE AND THE POLITICS OF ABOLITION By RICHARD H. SEWELL

This is the only biography of John P. Hale of New Hampshire, the first outspoken antislavery advocate elected to the U. S. Senate during the widespread realignment of political loyalties in the 1840's. The author traces the rise of the movement and examines in detail Hale's role as one of its early leaders. $6.50

THE SPIRIT OF AMERICAN GOVERNMENT

By J. ALLEN SMITH Edited by CUSHING STROUT

The first major American critique of the Founding Fathers and the Constitution, this book, originally published in 1907, became an influential tract on behalf of the reform movement of the Progressives. Its vision of American history as a polar conflict between liberalism and conservatism flourished in American scholarship for nearly fifty years. The John Harvard Library. $5.95

THE COOPERATIVE COMMONWEALTH

By LAURENCE GRONLUND Edited by STOW PERSONS

Originally published in 1884, this book was the first general exposition in English of Marxian socialism. Gronlund indicted the putative evils of a rapidly developing American industrial society and attempted to demonstrate why a socialized society, described in glowing terms, would be the inevitable outcome of the impending crisis of capitalism. The John Harvard Library. $4.95

DEMOCRACY IN GERMANY

By FRITZ ERLER

Foreword by FRANKLIN L. FORD

Is the new German state really more stable than the Weimar Republic between the two world wars? In a thoughtful and eloquent book one of Germany's most prominent political leaders, the Deputy Chairman of the Social Democratic Party, discusses the history, present condition, and prospects of the forces making for democracy in his country. $3.75

THE UNITED STATES AND THE ARAB WORLD By WILLIAM R. POLK

"This readable book is an objective appraisal of the Arabs in the Middle East."—Senator J. William Fulbright. "a valuable introduction to the Middle East... contains worthwhile ideas and information for any person involved in determining American policy toward that vital area."—Senator Frank Church. American Foreign Policy Library. $5.95

THE UNITED STATES AND ITALY

Revised Edition

By H. STUART HUGHES

In a revised and enlarged edition of his clear and coherent picture of modern Italy, Professor Hughes provides much new material on politics, economics, and Italy's current international and ideological situation, and includes a completely new chapter on the postwar cultural renaissance. American Foreign Policy Library. $5.95

TOTALITARIAN DICTATORSHIP AND AUTOCRACY

By CARL J. FRIEDRICH and ZBIGNIEW K. BRZEZINSKI Second Edition, Revised by Carl J. Friedrich

Completely revised and up-dated by Professor Friedrich, this provocative book, called "solid in its scholarship, full of novel ideas, and stimulating," by The Christian Science Monitor, identifies the essential aspects of the totalitarian state and discusses the durability and further evolution of totalitarian systems. $9.95

The European Right

A Historical Profile. Edited by HANS ROGGER and EUGEN WEBER. The first book to cast some light on the origins, ideology, and nature of the Right, and to study it in a number of European settings: England, France, Belgium, Spain, Italy, Germany, Austria, Hungary, Finland, Russia, and Romania. In addition to discussing the relations of rightwing movements with the conservative or moderate supporters of the established order, and also with the left-wing and liberal critics of that order, an attempt is made to offer a clarification of certain terms and slogans (such as nationalism, socialism, national-socialism, action, order, etc.) frequently employed in political discourse by both sides.

Minobe Tatsukichi:

Interpreter of Constitutionalism in Japan. FRANK O. MILLER. Minobe Tatsukichi's theories of state deeply influenced the Japanese bureaucracy during his lifetime (1873-1948). Professor Miller's careful analysis of Minobe's thought clarifies the constitutional history of prewar Japan, and his sophisticated relating of the Minobe legacy to the currents of constitutional interpretation in the 1960's adds a new dimension to the contemporary scene as well. "Mr. Miller's study of Minobe will immediately become a standard work on constitutional thought in twentieth-century Japan . . . required reading for all students of modern Japan."—MARIUS JANSEN

A Publication of the Center for Japanese and Korean Studies $7.50

Tunisia Since Independence

The Dynamics of One-Party Government. CLEMENT HENRY MOORE. With a Foreword by Roger Le Tourneau. Can single-party regimes cope with the gigantic problems that modernization is creating in the new states? Mr. Moore seeks an answer to this question in his account of post-independence politics in Tunisia, the arena for one of the oldest and most politically mature of the new single-party regimes in Africa. He offers not only a strikingly perceptive analysis of the local and national politics of the country, but also a suggestive theory relating to the internal dynamics of a one-party system. $6.00

Parties and Politics in Contemporary Japan

ROBERT A. SCALAPINO and JUNNOSUKE MASUMI. "Within the compass of a seemingly modest little book, the authors succeed in presenting an outstanding interpretation of the nature of party politics in contemporary Japan. The number of questions raised, the complexity of the factors analyzed, the wealth of evidence adduced, and the astuteness of the hypotheses advanced—all without clutter, confusion, or overcrowding—are remarkable for a work of this size."—American Political Science Review

Paper, Cal 108 $1.75

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA PRESS

Berkeley 94270

GOOD NEIGHBOR

Community leader. Independent merchant. This General Motors dealer is both.

He's a good neighbor in many ways. Such as providing automobiles for driver training classes or making his facilities available for civic meetings. He's active in community affairs, youth activities and other worthwhile projects. More than likely, he's a church member, club member, participator—the kind of man you'd like to have living next door.

His business is service . . . and he knows his business. He wins customers by selling good products. He keeps customers by servicing those products. Customer good will is his primary asset. He earns it by his continuing efforts to make owning a General Motors car a truly satisfying experience.

He's a good man to know.

General Motors Is People...

making better things for you

Forced Labour and Economic Development

The Experience of Soviet Industrialization

By S. SWIANIEWICZ, St. Mary's University, Nova Scotia. This well-documented study analyzes the economic factors which led to coercion on so vast a scale during the industrialization of Soviet Russia; it points up the relevance of Soviet experience for underdeveloped countries, especially in Asia. Concerned chiefly with the 1928-41 period, the author shares ideas germinated during his imprisonment in Moscow in 1940-41, when he had a unique opportunity to discuss the problems of totalitarian economics with administrators who were victims of Stalin's purges. 25 tables. R.I.I.A. $7.20

The Congo Since Independence

January 1960-December 1961

By CATHERINE HOSKYNS. In this comprehensive survey of the Congo crisis, the complex problem is viewed as a whole and its various aspects are related, to provide a balanced and objective appraisal. The subject is treated chronologically, beginning with the decision to grant Congolese independence. The author describes the mutiny of the Force Publique, the appeal to the U.N., the Katanga secession, the Hammerskjöld-Lumumba dispute, the role of Conor Cruise O'Brien, and the Kasavubu and Mobutu coups. R.I.I.A. $8.80

What Kind of Europe?

The Community Since de Gaulle's Veto

By MIRIAM CAMPS. This work examines the process of integration in the European Economic Community as it evolved in 1963-64, after the French veto of Britain, and speculates on the Community's future course. Varied aspects of EEC development are considered in chapters focused on the year after the veto, the Community today, and political union. In a final chapter, Miss Camps explains why developments of the next decade should favor the continuation of the present mixed system, rather than a move to federation or disintegration. R.I.I.A.

Paper, $1.70

Venezuela

Second Edition

By EDWIN LIEUWEN, University of New Mexico. Revised and updated, this book describes in detail the social revolution that has been sweeping Venezuela since World War II, resulting in the alteration of the class structure, redistribution of wealth and property, transformation of the economy, and drastic changes in traditional political processes. The study includes a description of the land and the people, an outline history, an up-to-date survey of the economy, and a chapter on international relations, as well as a new chapter on the Betancourt administration. 3 maps. $4.00

Oxford University Press / New York

Bell System engineers are finding that because it can carry your voice so well, it's good for a lot of other uses, too!

Telephone lines carry both the deep tones of men and the lighter tones of women with fidelity. This is why you can always recognize a familiar voice over the phone.

Your telephone's wide tonal range offers other communications possibilities as well.

One of these is a portable unit which doctors can use to transmit an on-the-spot electrocardiogram of the heart from a patient's home phone. The "E-K-G" signals are converted to tones which are sent over the phone line to a hospital for study by a specialist. The diagnosis can then be telephoned back to the doctor.

Another probability is that someday you may pay bills by phone. You will simply insert special plastic cards into a telephone set that dials automatically, and then detail the dollars and cents by pushing numbered Touch-Tone® buttons. In this way you will ring your bank's computer, identify your account with a code number, and tell the computer whom to pay and how much. Your bank will do the rest.

In fact, the things your phone can do for you, just by basically being a phone, are still not fully explored.

Its ability to transmit the tones essential to such data communications as the "E-K-G" and the bill payment suggests many remarkable new uses for your telephone line.

Our engineers are working on them. As its future unfolds, day by day, your telephone line will surely become more personally yours than it is even now ... one of your most useful aids.

Outstanding Summer Paperbacks

PAN-AFRICANISM A Short Political Guide

REVISED EDITION

By COLIN LEGUM. Africa Report called the 1962 edition "a tightly knit, highly accurate . . . eloquent essay on Pan-Africanism viewed as thought-style and politico-cultural movement." Now thoroughly updated, with a new chapter and new appendixes.

PPS-82/$2.50

FIFTY YEARS OF CHINESE PHILOSOPHY, 1898-1948

By O. BRIÈRE, S.J. Edited and with an Introduction by DENNIS J. DOOLIN. Father Brière's classic study of the history of Chinese thought—invaluable for students of political theory and Chinese history and politics—has been newly edited and now contains an interpretive Introduction and an expanded bibliography.

U-581/$1.95 (July)

EDUCATION AND NATION-BUILDING IN AFRICA

Edited by L. GRAY COWAN, JAMES O'CONNELL, and DAVID G. SCANLON. This truly pioneering work is a study of the crucial relationships between education—the basic component in nation-building—and African political and economic developments.

U-571/$2.95 (September)

THE PERMANENT REVOLUTION

Totalitarianism in the Age of International Civil War (SECOND EDITION)

By SIGMUND NEUMANN. With a new Introduction by HANS KOHN. The long-awaited paperback edition of a classic study.

U-540/$2.50 (August)

AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY SINCE WORLD WAR II SECOND REVISED EDITION

By JOHN W. SPANIER. This major revision of our most widely adopted and enthusiastically praised text will include comprehensive analysis of events from 1962 through the 1964 elections.

U-503/$2.25 (August)

THE ORGANIZATION OF AMERICAN STATES

AN INTRODUCTION

By O. C. STOETZER. Traces the development of the Pan-American movement to its culmination in the creation of the OAS. An invaluable text for all students of the political and organizational viability of Latin American policy.

U-582/ca. $2.25 (August)

111 Fourth Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10003

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

Fourth Printing!

THE COLD WAR AND IT'S ORIGINS 1917-1960

By D. F. Fleming

Professor Fleming's monumental work is being used by many readers today as a basic guide in understanding the hot war in Asia and the dangers of World War III. Described in this country as "a work of permanent importance" (South Atlantic Quarterly), "Enthralling and disturbing . . . a monumental and courageous work" (Journal of Politics), and "a book which needed to be written" (American Political Science Review), THE COLD WAR AND ITS ORIGINS, 1917-1960 has now also been published to unusual acclaim in London, Milan, Athens, and Tokyo. In two volumes, $15.00

DOUBLEDAY

LOOKING FOR A BOOK PUBLISHER?

It is no secret that publication is regarded as the foundation stone of a scholar's career. In order to gain recognition, prestige, and advancement, the scholar must seek publication.

Here at Exposition Press, we offer scholars a complete publishing service, under our special academic imprint, "Exposition-University Books." Though the proportion of scholarly publications in the lists of the trade houses is shrinking, due to economic pressures, many of our recent titles in the academic fields have gained popular reviews, professional recognition and steady sales. These books are the result of a publishing plan that is bringing a steady flow of scholarly writers to Exposition Press. They reflect the high editorial standards and quality of design and production which have won the respect of libraries, schools, booksellers and critics. Ask for free catalogs.

FREE! The behind-the-scenes story of book publishing revealed in two fact-filled, illustrated brochures, containing a detailed description of our subsidy plan including a breakdown of contract terms and typical costs (in print for the first time). Copies are available on request. Your inquiries and manuscripts are invited. An editorial appraisal will be furnished promptly without obligation. References upon request.

Please write to Dept. 93J

EXPOSITION PRESS, Main Office, 386 Park Ave. So., New York 16, N.Y. California office: 9172 Sunset Blvd., Los Angeles 69, Calif.

Looking for Your Best Buy in Life Insurance?

ticle announces . .

New Lower Life Insurance Rates

Plus "QUANTITY SAVINGS" DIVIDENDS, which reflect the economies of issuing larger policies.

For example,

A $50,000 POLICY COSTS ONLY $98

at age 30. Here's how:

$50,000 20-Year Home Protection Policy
Age at Issue	25	30	35	40
Annual Premium (Including Disability Waiver)	$134.00	$159.00	$206.50	$290.00
Cash Dividend End of First Year*	55.50	61.00	70.50	88.00
First Year Net Premium *These dividends are based upon the 1965 dividend	$ 78.50 I scale and	$ 98.00 are, of course	$136.00 , not guaran	$202.00 teed.

This is a plan of level premium Term insurance which provides its largest amount of protectic initially, reducing by schedule each year over a 20-year period to recognize decreasing insurance needs. Premiums are payable for only 16 years. There are several other insurance periods meet any need that requires a great deal of life insurance coverage at very low cost. Home Pr tection policies are available at all ages under 56.

ARE YOU ELIGIBLE FOR TIAA? Yes, if you are employed by a college, university, private school, or oth nonprofit educational or scientific institution that qualifies for TIAA eligibility.

Send the coupon for the new Life Insurance Guide and a personal illustration of TIAA policies for your age. TIAA is nonprofit and employs no agents.

TEACHERS INSURANCE AND ANNUITY ASSOC 730 Third Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10017	CIATION G
Please send the new Life Insurance Gu	ide and personal illustrations.
Name	Date of Birth
Address
Dependents' Ages
Nonprofit Employer
college, university	y, or other educational or scientific institution

A PERIL AND A HOPE

The Scientists' Movement in America, 1945-1947

Bu alice kimball smith

A chronicle of scientists' dramatic change in attitude toward public affairs following the release of atomic energy. The study focuses on the year after the end of World War II when scientists, foreseeing the dangers of a nuclear arms race and the need for international control, formed the Federation of American Scientists and enlisted the necessary citizens' support for legislation to organize a civilian Atomic Energy Commission.

656 pages $10.00

THE SUPREME COURT REVIEW

Edited by PHILIP B. KURLAND

The Review is published annually to provide a forum for critical discussion centering on cases from the recent Court term. "It is this kind of stock-taking analysis—a look at where a series of case-by-case decisions is taking the court and us—that will be the greatest service this publication can render to the Court and through it to society."—American Bar Association Journal. $6.50

From our backlist . . .

ELEMENTS OF JUDICIAL STRATEGY

By WALTER F. MURPHY

An analysis of judicial behavior which outlines the political system within which a Supreme Court Justice must operate and which describes the strategic and tactical alternatives open to him. The author draws examples from the unpublished papers of several Chief Justices and of Presidents Coolidge, Franklin Roosevelt, and Truman.

288 pages $7.50

THE COMMUNISM OF MAO TSE-TUNG

By ARTHUR A. COHEN

Cohen, a student of Chinese affairs, uses both Chinese and Russian sources to document this detailed account of Mao's development as a new kind of politician. He suggests that the Chinese Communist party is striving to impose Mao's version of communism as the accepted practice, and Mao's works as the new bible of revolutionaries in underdeveloped countries.

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS

Chicago and London

Security in Disarmament

Edited by RICHARD A. FALK and RICHARD J. BARNET. The ambition of this volume is to stimulate a more fruitful discussion of the obstacles to further disarmament and to suggest means for overcoming the traditional stumbling blocks. It comes at a moment when the first concrete steps have been taken toward disarmament in the nuclear age.

450 pages. $10.00

Populists, Plungers, and Progressives: A Social History of Stock and Commodity Speculation, 1890-1936

By CEDRIC B. COWING. From marketer memoirs, newspapers, financial journals, and congressional hearings and debates, the author has fashioned a narrative describing for the first time the political and social as well as the economic adjustment of the American people to the speculative machinery that developed between 1890 and 1936.

288 pages. $6.50

Opposition to Louis XIV, The Political and Social Origins of the French Enlightenment

By LIONEL ROTHKRUG. In the seventeenth century France attempted to become the first power in Europe, on sea as well as on land. Such policy required more than a large navy: to establish a sea based economy, to organize the largest portion of France's industrial endeavor for foreign trade, there was needed an elaborate state apparatus of intervention, subventions and controls. This book explains how many of the intellectual themes traditionally associated with the French Enlightenment were originally developed in the movements of resistance to this policy.

464 pages. $12.50

The League of Arab States, A Study in the Dynamics of Regional Organization

By ROBERT W. MACDONALD. One purpose of this study is to discuss three major questions that face the league and are held to be typical of all regional organizations: the role of functional integration in cultural, economic, social, and scientific affairs; the problems of regional security and peaceful settlement of disputes among member states; and the importance of interaction between the League and the United Nations. Other topics of primary concern to the area and the League are analyzed, including the techniques of cooperation with the United Nations and its specialized agencies, neutralism and nonalignment, and the boycott of Israel.

407 pages. $8.50

Political Culture and Political Development

No. 5, "Studies in Political Development"

Edited by LUCIAN W. PYE and SYDNEY VERBA. This volume presents a major first attempt to deal comparatively with the political cultures of nations in a large part of the world. Specialists writing on ten nations relate the political culture of the country to the historical pattern by which the political culture itself developed.

616 pages. $10.00

Gaon, Conflict and Cohesion in an Indian Village

By HENRY ORENSTEIN. The author reveals the way social change has affected village bonds, and how conflict, unequal power, and caste interaction have shifted with the weakening of village cohesion. Rich data about village organization and politics in a region of India that has received little recent attention are presented. The author's conclusions indicate that a certain kind of solidarity in villages is now disintegrating because of the formality and secularization that are part of the general movement toward social cohesion in the larger units of region and nation.

350 pages. $8.50

Christian Missionaries and the Creation of Northern Rhodesia, 1880-1924

By ROBERT I. ROTBERG. This book is an attempt to provide a case-study of the contribution made by Christian missions to the formation of Northern Rhodesia. Individually and collectively, they exercised a powerful influence over scattered villages and whole tribes. The author focuses on the tensions between Christian authority and secular power, follows the growth of a secular initiative, traces the beginnings of an educational system and of an indigenous church. 256 pages. $6.50

PRINCETON PAPERBACKS

THE PRESS AND FOREIGN POLICY by Bernard C. Cohen. "A valuable and occasionally startling study."—Saturday Review. $2.95

POLAND BETWEEN EAST AND WEST, Soviet and German Diplomacy toward Poland, 1919-1933 by Josef Korbel. "An excellent work, well organized, lucidly written, and based on ample documentation."—Polish Review. $2.95

STRESEMANN AND THE POLITICS OF THE WEIMAR REPUBLIC by Henry Ashby Turner. "A valuable contribution to our understanding of a complex and controversial personality."—Hans W. Gatzke. $2.95

Princeton University Press

INDEX TO ADVERTISERS

American Telephone & Telegraph Co	577
Basic Books Inc.	557
Bedminster Press, Inc
University of California Press	574
University of Chicago Press
Cornell University Press	ı III
Dorsey Press	568
Doubleday & Co., Inc	579
Duke University Press	562
Exposition Press, Inc.	579
General Motors Corporation	575
Harper & Row, Publishers Inc.	317
Harvard University Press572,	573
Johns Hopkins Press	567
Houghton Mifflin Company	569
International Organization	560
Journal of Social and Political Ideas in Japan	558
J. B. Lippincott Company	563
McGraw-Hill Book Company	566
Macmillan Company	320
Mendota Research Group	558
Northwestern University Press	561
Oxford University Press	576
Frederick A. Praeger	578
Prentice-Hall, Inc	570
Princeton University Press	583
Rand McNally & Company318,
Scott, Foresman & Co	571
Teachers Insurance & Annuity Assn	580
D. Van Nostrand Co., Inc	IV

Vol. LIX

September, 1965

No. 3

The Transformation of Alliance Systems	Herbert S. Dinerstein	589
Dimensions of Political Systems: Factor Analysis of A Cross-Polity Survey	Phillip M. Gregg and Arthur S. Banks	602
A Scale Analysis of the Voting Records of Senators Kennedy, Johnson and Goldwater, 1957-1960	Charles H. Gray	615
An Appropriations Subcommittee and Its Client Agencies: A Comparative Study of Supervision and Control	Ira Sharkansky	622
Consensus and Cleavage in British Political Ideology	James B. Christoph	629
Sources of Administrative Behavior: Some Soviet and Western European Comparisons	John A. Armstrong	643
Ideological Correlates of Right Wing Political Alienation in Mexico	Kenneth F. Johnson	656
Making the Japanese Constitution: A Further Look	Justin Williams	665
Reason and Revelation in Hooker's Ethics	Robert K. Faulkner	680
Communications to the Editor		691
Book Reviews, Notes and Bibliography	Austin Ranney (ed.)	694
Doctoral Dissertations in Political Science	William C. Seyler (comp.)	771
Name and Notes	Ing R Latt (ad)	707

(For list of book reviews, see page 694)

Published quarterly by **=

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION

Recent Research Projects

Conducted at the request of Federal, state and local government agencies,
universities, and foundations:

Community Renewal Planning Planning Action for Public Housing Integrated Housing Longitudinal Study of School Districts Attitudes toward Negro Demonstrations Transportation Planning Study Poverty & Social Isolation Fertility and Family Planning Manpower Needs of New York City Reasons non-Federal Scientists Remain non-Federal Longitudinal Study of Consumer Expenditures Retail Food Pricing Practices Food Consumption Behavior Motivations and Beliefs of Mutual Fund Investors High School Graduates: Four-Year Follow Up Attitudes & Aspirations of Teenagers Voting Referenda on Fluoridation Community Opinions about Cancer Attitudes toward Smoking & Health Community Knowledge of Communicable Diseases

METHODOLOGICAL RESOURCES:

Trained Interviewers . . . Probability Sample: Efficient Questionnaires . . . Coding and Tabi Computer Programming . . . Research Design

For information write: Aaron J. Spector, P Vice President and Director, Social Science I

NATIONAL ANALYSTS

1015 CHESTNUT STREET PHILADELPHIA, PA. 19107

The Nation's Leading Social Science and Marketing Res Founded 1943

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertis

Harper & Row

The Metropolis: Its People, Politics, and Economic Life JOHN C. BOLLENS • HENRY J. SCHMANDT

Here is a comprehensive analysis of the metropolis as a dynamic system of interacting relationships among people, organizations, and institutions. The text covers the basic aspects of the metropolitan community: government and politics, social characteristics and trends, economic developments, and physical and land use considerations. The authors utilize a broad range of empirical investigations into metropolitan and urban phenomena and the relevant theory that has emerged. They analyze problems of metropolitan growth and efforts being made to solve them, and appraise the complex whole of metropolitan life and its future. Just published. 643 pp. $8.95

An Economic Theory of Democracy ANTHONY DOWNS

This is a reprint, in paper, of a widely acclaimed book which presents a theory of how governments arrive at decisions in a democratic society. The author bases the theory on the assumption that politicians act in their own self-interest, and he uses economic methodology to derive a deductive model of the behavior of governments, voters, pressure groups, and other political agents, in an environment where information is generally unavailable to the voter. The book explores the logic of decision-making and voter behavior under conditions of certainty and uncertainty. 310 pp. $2.75

The American Chief Executive JOSEPH KALLENBACH

A scholarly study of the offices of President and state governor, with major attention given to the presidency. Using the comparative-analytical technique, the author deals with the historical origins and constitutional foundations of the offices, the process of selection and tenure, and the powers and functions of the chief executives. The approach is eclectic, including the historical, institutional, functional, and behavioral, depending upon which is most appropriate. Coming this winter.

Harper's Comparative Government Series MICHAEL CURTIS, EDITOR

The first three volumes—all paperbacks

LATIN-AMERICAN POLITICS AND GOVERNMENT • Robert J. Alexander Just published WESTERN EUROPEAN INTEGRATION • Michael Curtis Just published GOVERNMENTS OF THE COMMONWEALTH • Josephine F. Milburn October

HARPER & ROW, PUBLISHERS • 49 EAST 33d ST., NEW YORK 10016

Please mention The American Political Science Review when writing to advertisers

1966-67 CONGRESSIONAL FELLOWSHIPS

The deadline for submitting applications for the 1966-67 Congressional Fellowship Program is December 1, 1965. Preference will be given applicants between the ages of 23 and 35.

Qualifications:

- For Political Scientists— Completion or near completion of Ph.D. in political science. Preference will be given to persons who are teaching or who intend to teach.
- For Journalists

 Bachelor's degree and at least two years of professional experience in newspaper, magazine, radio or television work.
- For Law School Faculty— LL.B. degree and at least one year's teaching experi-Members LL.B. degree and at least one year's teaching experience in an accredited law school.

Further information and application blanks may be obtained from:

The American Political Science Association 1726 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W. Washington, D.C. 20036

1966 African Tour Seminar Program

DATES (APPROXIMATE)—AUGUST 10 TO SEPTEMBER 10

- Because of the success of past Tour-Seminar programs, the Association is offering another in its series of travel study opportunities during the summer of 1966, in Africa.
- As was the case with the 1965 Latin American Tour-Seminar, this program will be carried out on regularly scheduled jet flights of reputable international carriers.
- The cost to Association members will be substantially less than it would be for a similar trip arranged on an individual basis. Included in the fare will be round-trip tourist air transportation, first class hotel accommodations, numerous meals, baggage handling, and airport transfers. (On the basis of past experience, participants can expect that the cost of this educational activity will be accepted as deductible expense on Federal tax returns.)
- In cooperation with the governments of the nations on the itinerary and the relevant U. S. departments and agencies, the Association will arrange meetings and interviews with top level local governmental officials, members of university faculties, U. S. Foreign Service Personnel, foreign press representatives. Opportunities also will be provided for individual research and appropriate sightseeing activities.
- For further information concerning this educational, research, and travel opportunity, write to: APSA 1966 African Tour Seminar, The American Political Science Association, 1726 Massachusetts Avenue, N. W., Washington, D. C. 20036.

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW

Published quarterly by The American Political Science Association

EDITORIAL BOARD

HARVEY C. MANSFIELD, Managing Editor, Ohio State University

Otto Kirchheimer, Columbia University

Andrew Hacker, Cornell University

J. Roland Pennock, Swarthmore College

HAROLD STEIN, Princeton University
ROWLAND EGGER, Princeton University
STANLEY HOFFMANN, Harvard University

ROBERT E. LANE, Yale University

EDITORIAL ASSOCIATES

Austin Ranney, Book Review Editor, University of Wisconsin

LEO B. LOTT, News and Notes Editor, Ohio State University

Franklin L. Burdette, University of Maryland

S. Sidney Ulmer, University of Kentucky
Isaac Kramnick, Harvard University
Richard L. Merritt, Yale University
Corinne Silverman, Philadelphia
Nimrod Raphaeli, University of Michigan

EDITORIAL OFFICE

Managing Editor, APSR 216 N. Oval Dr., Columbus, Ohio 43210

EXECUTIVE OFFICE

Executive Director, APSA 1726 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W. Washington, D.C. 20036

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW, published quarterly during the months of March, June, September, and December, is supplied to all APSA members. Individual and institutional memberships are $15.00 a year ($6.00 for graduate and undergraduate students). Foreign currency at the official exchange rate will be accepted for foreign subscriptions and foreign membership fees. The equivalent of $1 for additional postage should be added for foreign subscriptions.

Current issues are priced at $3.75 per copy; for back issues address Johnson Reprint Corp., 111 5th Ave., New York, N.Y. 10003.

Applications for membership, orders for the Review, and remittances should be addressed to the Executive Director, The American Political Science Association, 1726 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036. Notices of change of address should be received in the Washington office by the 5th day of the month of publication.

Address correspondence about contributions to the Review to Austin Ranney, North Hall, University of Wisconsin, Madison, Wis.; books intended for review, to James W. Prothro, Department of Political Science, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, N.C.; News and Notes items, to Leo B. Lott, 216 N. Oval Drive, Columbus, Ohio 43210; advertising, reprint and circulation correspondence, to the Executive Director at the Washington office.

Articles and notes appearing in the Review before the June, 1953 issue were indexed in The Reader's Guide to Periodical Literature. The International Index to Periodicals indexes current issues. Microfilm of the Review, beginning with Volume 46, may be obtained from University Microfilms, 313 North First Street, Ann Arbor, Michigan. A Cumulative Index of the Review, Volumes 1-57: 1906-1963, may be obtained from Northwestern University Press, 816 University Place, Evanston, Illinois.

Office of publication: Curtis Reed Plaza, Menasha, Wisconsin.

Foreign Agent: P. S. King and Staples, Ltd., Great Smith Street, Westminster, London.

Second class postage paid at Menasha, Wisconsin. Acceptance for mailing at special rate of postage provided for in Section 1103, Act of October 3, 1917, authorized May 12, 1926.

Printed in the United States of America by George Banta Company, Inc., Menasha, Wisconsin.

Copyright, 1965, by The American Political Science Association

NEW AND RECENT TITLES FROM THE MACMILLAN PROGRAM IN POLITICAL SCIENCE

A NEW PAPERBACK SERIES OF ORIGINAL WORKS GOVERNMENT IN THE MODERN WORLD

General Editors, Paul Y. Hammond, the Rand Corporation and Nelson W. Polsby, Wesleyan University

ALKER MATHEMATICS AND POLITICS

by Haywood R. Alker, Jr., Yale University

Professor Alker demonstrates how mathematics is used to describe, analyze, and predict the principal facts and processes of politics. Assuming the student's knowledge of elementary algebra, he pursues his subject from historical backgrounds to contemporary political affairs. 1965, 160 pages, paper, $1.50.

JONES
THE REPUBLICAN PARTY IN AMERICAN POLITICS

by Charles O. Jones, The University of Arizona

This critical analysis of the Republican Party provides a vivid depiction of what the party is, how it developed, how it is organized, and what its future holds. Concerned largely with problems of the present, the text includes results of the 1964 National Convention and discussion of conservatives, moderates and liberals within the party. 1965, 160 pages, paper, $1.50.

RUSSETT TRENDS IN WORLD POLITICS by Bruce M. Russett, Yale University

Focusing first on NATO, then on the United Nations, this study delineates the changes affecting modern international relations. Through recently compiled data, the book provides a basic outline of trends and an example of how modern quantitative methods are used in social science. 1965, 160 pages, paper, $1.50.

KRISLOV THE SUPREME COURT IN THE POLITICAL PROCESS by Samuel Krislov, University of Minnesota

The political nature of the Court is the basis of this text, as Professor Krislov examines the nature of the office, recruitment of judges, selection of cases, and the controversies which surround decisions. Discussions of civil rights, reapportionment, and civil liberties are outstanding. 1965, 160 pages, paper, $1.50.

Other titles to be announced as they are ready

RIKER DEMOCRACY IN THE UNITED STATES, Second Edition

by William H. Riker, University of Rochester

In the revised edition of this interpretative introductory text, the author develops a theoretical definition of democracy from which he examines specific government institutions. 1965, 416 pages, paper, $3.50.

TRESOLINI CONSTITUTIONAL DECISIONS IN AMERICAN GOVERNMENT by Rocco J. Tresolini, Lehigh University

This volume contains some of the most important cases brought before the Supreme Court, including Marbury v. Madison, Gibbons v. Ogden, and Dartmouth College v. Woodward—with Court pronouncements on current problems—civil rights, school prayer, national security. It contains both concurring and dissenting opinions. 1965, 186 pages, paper, $1.95.

SCOTT AND WALLACE POLITICS U.S.A.:

Cases on the American Democratic Process, Second Edition by Andrew M. Scott and Earle Wallace, both of the University of North Carolina

The second edition of this highly successful supplementary book of readings offers about 70% new material, plus new chapters on "The Context of American Politics" and "Political Parties." Each selection represents the study of a given case in the democratic process providing the student with insight into the actual workings of American politics, and the dynamic and controversial nature of politics. 1965, 576 pages, paper, $3.95.

Write to the Faculty Service Desk for examination copies

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY, 60 Fifth Avenue, New York 10011

The American Political Science Review

CUTTY OF OFFICE OF STATE OF ST

VOL. LIX

SEPTEMBER, 1965

NO. 3

THE TRANSFORMATION OF ALLIANCE SYSTEMS

HERBERT S. DINERSTEIN*
The RAND Corporation, Santa Monica, California

The pattern of international relations has always been in flux. The further we are removed from a period, the easier it is to discern its most salient features. So the fifteenth century now emerges as the time of the birth of the nation-state which was to become the key factor in international relations. Yet the supra-national church was not successfully challenged until the next century. Today it is clear that the French revolution completed the conversion of dynastic states into national states. In retrospect the 18th and particularly the 19th centuries are seen as the high point of the world expansion of Europe and the extension of its system of international relations. Now we realize that the Japanese victory over Russia in 1904-1905 marked the beginning of the counter-offensive against Europe. But what emerges sharply now was obscured then by a welter of incident.

Is the twentieth century the century of the ideological polarization of politics, or will it be the century of the end of ideology? At the end of the twentieth century will its first half seem to have been the period of world wars and its second half the period of peace? Fifty years from now it will be much easier to discern which features of the present international scene were transient, which permanent; now it is only possible to peer at the mass of events and try to make out some of the pattern. The hypothesis of this paper is that, first, the increased destructiveness of world war and the very small likelihood of its occurrence and, second, the establishment and expansion of a Communist state system have transformed the nature of international relations.

* Any views expressed in this paper are those of the author. They should not be interpreted as reflecting the views of the RAND Corporation or the official opinion or policy of any of its governmental or private research sponsors.

I. WAR AS AN INSTRUMENT OF POLICY

The investigation will begin with an examination of the change in the conception of war as an instrument of policy, treating separately the periods before the First and Second World Wars and the period since the Second World War.

A. Pre-World War I

Before World War I statesmen believed, on the whole, that war could be profitable. Political leaders initiated wars, expecting gains commensurate with costs. The classic case comprised Bismarck's three wars against Denmark, Austria, and France, which achieved the unification of Germany at a cost probably no greater than expected.

The corollary to this assumption that some wars were worth the price was that some were not. Price was calculated not only in terms of prospective gain but also in terms of avoiding losses. Thus Great Britain reluctantly entered World War I pursuant to the guiding principle that no single nation—Germany in this case should be permitted to dominate the European continent. Had any of the major powers before World War I foreseen its consequences, each would probably have been willing to accept greater shifts in the balance of power before engaging in war. The low tolerance for political loss in the European capitals of 1914 was a function of their underestimate of the cost of a general war.

B. Pre-World War II

For the victorious powers, the terrible, unexpected destructiveness of World War I produced a conception of war midway between that of 1914 and that of the present. Clausewitz's remark, made in a different context, 1 that "a conqueror is always a lover of peace," also applied to the Entente powers, since after 1918 a new war could bring them no great benefits. A profound anti-war spirit permeated all levels of British and French society. Consequently, in contrast with their position before World War I, Great Britain and France were willing to tolerate great and unfavorable changes in the balance of power before judging war to be necessary.

¹ Karl von Clausewitz, On War (Modern Library, New York, 1943), p 332.

The defeated powers, on the other hand, in particular Germany after 1933, were too absorbed in the consequences of defeat to worry much about the possible hollowness of victory in a new war. The harsh, punitive nature of the Treaty of Versailles had outraged practically all Germans who felt, at the very least, that guilt for the war was not exclusively theirs. (Increasingly this judgment on war guilt was shared outside the country, especially in Great Britain and the United States.) The more moderate elements in German society expected an eventual voluntary modification of the terms of defeat. The German right wing, however, scorned concessions from the victors and proposed to get, by an aggressive policy, and quickly, what they believed to be their due. The great depression that hit Europe in 1931 greatly enlarged the dissatisfaction and frustration in German society and two years later helped bring Hitler to power. Hitler promised radical solutions for Germany's external and internal problems. The Nazis were convinced and acted upon the conviction, that the Versailles Treaty should be revised only by force, or the threat of its employment. Hitler continued and hastened the rearmament of Germany begun, in part secretly, during the Weimar Republic. Finding himself unopposed by the West, he became more bold in throwing off the hampering restrictions of Versailles. Since Britain and France felt that war could only produce further national decline, while Germany felt that only the threat of war, and perhaps war itself, could restore the nation, retreat followed upon retreat until London and Paris were driven to choose reluctantly between the two extremes: to acquiesce in Hitler's aims—which was tantamount to complete defeat in war, though without fighting-or to face up to him, with ostensibly inferior armaments, at the grave risk of highly destructive general war. Either course seemed to promise only disaster, but war was finally accepted as the lesser evil.

In the 1930s Germany viewed war as an instrument of policy, as "have-not" nations have traditionally done. Hitler's strong desire for German expansion was coupled with a belief that his enemies could be beaten one by one. Had he foreseen how many, how powerful, and how united his enemies would be, he might have been slower to provoke war. Between the two world wars Great Britain and France followed the traditional policy of victors: they upheld the status quo established by the last war, eschewed agression for themselves and deplored its practice by others. Their attitude toward war as an instrument to prevent losses had become more cautious since 1914, for they feared that air bombing would make the next war a cataclysm of destruction. Consequently, they tolerated great defeats in Europe before resorting to war and exposed themselves to further defeats in the early years of the armed conflict.

C. Post-World War II

Today, neither the Soviet Union nor the United States has any goals commensurate with the expected cost of a nuclear war. Hence, given the present balance of military power, the initiation of total war is unacceptable. With the development of nuclear weapons, both major powers have now all but ruled out large-scale nuclear war as an instrument of policy.

In the past the initiator of a war seldom thought it would be a total war; he always hoped to control the arena and intensity of war so as to maximize his chances of victory. Today it is commonly believed that a possible consequence of a direct military confrontation between the two super-powers would be a rapid transition to total war accompanied by unprecedented destruction. Both sides now say they will, and presumably intend to, retaliate with nuclear weapons if attacked with them on a large scale; but it is quite uncertain what lesser assaults, if any, would move them to nuclear war. Obviously both sides want to avoid such difficult decisions, and this is the basis of whatever mutual understanding exists. What differentiates the present situation from that preceding the outbreak of World War II is that both sides rather than one have rejected total war as an instrument of policy. Furthermore—in contrast to the situations preceding both world wars—the Soviet Union and the United States now have a very low tolerance for any changes in the balance of power in Europe. Since 1948 no changes comparable to those that took place in the periods 1904-1914 and 1933-1939 have occurred. The comparative rigidity of the present arrangements in Europe is to be explained, first, by the mutual awareness of the consequences of a nuclear war and, second, by the fear on both sides that any shift in the balance of power would cause the losing side to suffer further losses in rapid succession. Dominoes falling, has been the favored image. As early as December 1953, when the United States still enjoyed what was practically a monopoly in nuclear weapons, President Eisenhower stated the conviction that has dominated American attitudes ever since. By asserting that a nuclear war would mean the end of civilization, he implied that only the gravest threat to American interests could justify a decision to launch nuclear war. By maintaining American superiority in weapons, he reduced the likelihood that such threats would emanate from the Communist world.

² Chamberlain, particularly, and even Churchill, expected that aerial bombing would produce far more casualties than it actually did. However, 50,000 British civilians died in German air raids, a figure that would have seemed horrible enough to the statesmen of 1938.

In the Soviet Union, as early as 1954, Malenkov said that a nuclear war would mean the destruction of world civilization. Khrushchev, who was soon to replace him as the head of the Soviet government, rejected that view. As long as the Soviets had no significant nuclear capabilities of their own, the victorious Khrushchev faction insisted that a nuclear war, undesirable as it might be, would mean the destruction of the capitalist part of the world, not of the whole of civilization; and that Communism would rise like a phoenix from the ashes. The Soviets probably feared that if they accepted a cataclysmic view of nuclear war, while only their opponents had the means to wage it, they would be inviting pressure from the West to yield political positions under the threat of such a war. However, after the Soviet Union itself gained acceptance for its claim to possess substantial nuclear capabilities, Khrushchev moved to Malenkov's position that a nuclear war would be a common disaster for all mankind. In fact some Soviet writers, referring to nuclear war, now deny the validity of Clausewitz's doctrine, adapted by Lenin, that war is the continuation of politics. In simple terms, they mean that nuclear war does not pay.

At present, the public Chinese Communist position is similar to that taken by the Soviet Union down to about 1958 or 1959, although somewhat more stridently expressed. The Chinese apparently are reluctant to admit that nuclear war would mean the end of the world while their enemies are the only ones in a position to wage such a war. The Soviet Union, they charge, has become a status quo power that sees more advantage in freezing present arrangements by agreement with its opponents than in a forward policy that entails some risk of conflict with them. Since the Chinese are willing to risk conflicts between the Communist world and its enemies—as an essential condition for altering the status quo—they cannot say that a total nuclear war would mean the end of mankind. The Chinese argue that the opponent is a "paper tiger;" that an aggressive joint Communist policy would produce concessions, not war, but that if capitalism initiated a war, it would be the tomb of that system. Communism, however, would survive. But the Soviet Union, with fewer unfulfilled aspirations than the Chinese, has put forward a much more apocalyptic view of nuclear war than the Chinese and has been less willing to take risks, especially to promote the objectives of Chinese foreign policy. The Chinese have recommended that the whole Communist camp combine in pursuit of their objectives, but they have failed to impose their view on the others. In their consequent isolation, the Chinese have scrupulously avoided actions that might have provoked the United States to employ its nuclear weapons against them. Whether Communist China's policy will become bolder as it develops nuclear weapons, only time can tell.

Meanwhile, the two super-powers have rejected war as an instrument of policy because of their fear of its consequences. How this has influenced international affairs we shall shortly see.

II. IS WAR LIKELY?

Before World War I, wars were more frequent than today. More than a dozen regular wars were fought between 1870 and 1914, almost all bilateral, and many of them could have expanded into larger wars.³ In addition, many international crises, almost all multilateral, threatened war. Since some of the wars of this period, including the two largest, the

- 3 The following is a partial list:
- a. Franco-Prussian War, 1870.
- b. Serbo-Montenegrin War against Turkey, 1876.
- c. Russo-Turkish War, 1877-1888.
- d. British-Afghan War, 1878.
- e. The Zulu War, 1879.
- f. War of the Pacific, 1879-1883.
- g. British-Egyptian hostilities, 1882.
- h. Serbo-Bulgarian War, 1885.
- i. Sino-Japanese War, 1894-1895.
- j. Italo-Ethiopian War, 1896.
- k. Greco-Turkish War, 1897.
- 1. Spanish-American War, 1898.
- m. The Boer War, 1899-1902.
- n. The Russo-Japanese War, 1904-1905.
- Tripolitan War between Italy and Turkey, 1911-1912.
- p. The First Balkan War, Bulgaria, Serbia, and Greece against Turkey, 1912-1913.
- q. Second Balkan War, Bulgaria against Serbia, Greece, Rumania, and Turkey, 1913.

Franco-Prussian War and the Russo-Japanese War, 1 yielded benefits to the victor that were apparently commensurate with the sacrifices, the recurrence of similar wars was not "unthinkable."

At present the chances of a large-scale war with the most modern weapons seem small, certainly very much smaller than in say, 1913 or 1938. But the awful realization that the human race could be in jeopardy often dominates the imagination, obscures the reduced likelihood of war, and produces the emotionally based conviction in times of crisis, that war is likely, or inevitable in the long run unless radical changes are made in the international system. The truth, however, is that statesmen in the competing camps share a catastrophic view of the consequences of nuclear war, and this has made warfare less likely.

Not only general war, but apparently also wars on a smaller scale, with or without the employment of nuclear weapons, have become less likely. Only a few years ago it was generally expected that limited wars would become more likely when the Soviet Union had acquired nuclear parity. With both sides in possession of nuclear weaponry, the reasoning went, either side, trading on the common fear of a general nuclear war, might conduct war on a lower scale with relative impunity.

The validity of this prediction has not undergone a genuine test, since the United States has maintained nuclear preponderance. Although the Soviet Union has disposed of a substantial nuclear capability for some years now, the United States has enjoyed a mutually recognized superiority. In this situation both sides have been concerned about the escalation of local conflicts and have sought to avoid them. Whether local wars would be more likely if and when the Soviet Union achieved rough nuclear parity, or when China achieves a real nuclear capability, can only be a matter for speculation.

III. THE NATURE OF THE ALLIANCE SYSTEMS

A. Pre-World War I

The great powers before World War I were organized in a balance of power system first systematically described by Machiavelli. A power shifted from one alliance to another, either to "balance" another power or a coalition which had become too strong, or to place itself in a position to gain territory at the expense of a former ally. In the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, nations sought territorial alterations within Europe, competed for empire in Asia and Africa, jockeyed for positions of advantage in the expected demise of the Ottoman Empire. Some, but not all, of their goals were interchangeable. Thus Italy, by alliance with the Central Powers, increased its chances of getting the territories it claimed on the French Riviera, but thereby relinquished claims to irredenta in the Austro-Hungarian Empire. And Bismarck tried, but failed, to compensate France for the loss of Alsace-Lorraine by holding out opportunities in Africa. But it was not only the prospect of gains that caused nations to shift from one alliance to another. Fear of loss could be equally, or more impelling. Thus, the German naval program of the turn of the century played a major role in persuading France and Great Britain that they had more to fear from Germany than from each other.

⁴ It is not generally appreciated that the Japanese, despite their naval victories, were staggered by the extent of their losses and probably would have soon taken the initiative in suing for peace, had not Russia done so because of the revolutionary situation in the latter country. I am indebted to Paul Langer for this realization.

In contrast to the present, ideology was not an inhibition to diplomatic realignments (renversements des alliances). The ideological differences between Imperial Russia and Republican France and Liberal England were residual; for neither the Russians on the one hand, nor the French on the other, were intent on a political revolution within the other country (unlike the period from 1791–1815). These nations formed an entente which survived the crisis preceding the war, three years of war, and the democratic revolution of February 1917, only to collapse after the victory of the Communists in October 1917.

Great powers shifted their alignments rapidly and radically. For example, in 1898 in the Fashoda crisis, Great Britain and France were on the brink of war over competing ambitions in Africa. The crisis that erupted brought the two countries closer to war than they had been for many years. The French, for a combination of domestic and foreign policy reasons, yielded and war was avoided. The name applied to this easement was détente. Several years later, largely because of a changed perception of the danger from Germany, the two powers formed an entente-practically an alliance-first settling territorial disputes between themselves on a basis of give and take. Thus, they proceeded from the brink of war immediately to a détente and eventually to an entente. A détente sometimes developed into an entente; enemies sometimes became friends. How much, or how little, this has changed we shall examine shortly.

Remaining outside the alliance system was only possible for countries without territorial ambitions and against whom others did not have territorial claims. Even so, in time of war or imminent war, another power might invade for strategic reasons: Of course, distant and powerful nations separated by oceans, like the United States, could remain outside the system of alliances.

B. Pre-World War II

By World War II the character of the system had begun to change in that the status quo and the revisionist groups were more firmly fixed in their positions. France, Great Britain, and the new states of Eastern Europe, created in part at the expense of Germany and of Russia, supported the status quo. Germany, especially after Hitler's rise to power, was revisionist, and the Soviet Union shunted between the two positions, although it was basically revisionist.5 Neither the Soviet Union nor any other major power was able to remain neutral. Small powers like Austria, the Baltic States, and Finland, outside the major alliance systems, or secured only by bilateral nonaggression pacts, lost their independence to the revisionist powers. Even within the status quo alliance system, weaker powers did not enjoy genuine security. Although the great powers never formally renounced their obligations to Czechoslovakia, in essence they abandoned her to Germany. Before the First World War neutrality would not necessarily survive the outbreak of war; before the second, even membership in an alliance did not protect weaker powers from absorption before the inception of general war. How different the position of the weak and unaligned has become!

In the interwar period, the threat of internal revolution inhibited the formation of alliances. For example, the Franco-Russian treaty of mutual assistance signed in 1935 was never implemented by joint military arrangements as in the case of the Franco-Russian alliance whose negotiation was completed in 1894. Although the alliance proved abortive for more reasons than the ideological tension between Republican France and the Communist Soviet Union, ideology did play a major role.

⁶ The Soviet Union was revisionist when Germany was weak, a defender of the status quo after Hitler came to power, and revisionist again in 1939 when it seized the opportunity to gain territory and remain neutral in a war between its foes. The status quo position of the Soviet Union at various times must be distinguished from that of Great Britain and France, for unlike them it had great expectations of radical favorable chances in the future. The Soviet Union favored the status quo when its relative weakness permitted no other course, but was prepared to shift when opportunities for aggrandizement offered themselves. Professor Vernon V. Aspaturion suggested this and other formulations.

C. The Present

1. General Character

Alliances now differ in three large respects: (1) political goals have superseded military; (2) the relative power and the number of participant states have altered significantly; and (3) ideology has become a major factor.

a. The primacy of political goals. The determination of the major powers to avoid war, noted above, has caused a qualitative change in international relations. The expectation that war can be avoided makes the primary purpose of alliances deterrence of war rather than preparation for its conduct. Although success in the former purpose is dependent on the latter, the primacy of deterrence is of great consequence. The great questions of war and peace are the almost exclusive concern of the Soviet Union and the United States; the secondary powers in both alliances benefit, or suffer, from the military balance produced by the rivalry of the two greatest powers. But the influence of secondary powers on the balance of power in comparison with their influence in earlier alliances is modest. The relations between the two greatest powers are increasingly conducted on the assumption that outstanding issues will be resolved only by political means. The secondary members of both alliance systems pursue their particular goals in the confidence that there will be no world war. Thus conflicts with the hegemonic power within each alliance involve only political and economic costs. The question of isolation and abandonment in a world war need hardly be considered. The Chinese Communists would hardly have permitted relations with the Soviet Union to deteriorate to the point of withdrawal of Soviet military aid if they had expected war with the United States; de Gaulle would not have presumed to challenge the American position in Western Europe if he expected a world war. Hence secondary powers, while less influential in alliance military arrangements, enjoy more freedom of action within the alliance. The consequences of this increased freedom of action are quite different for each system. They will be examined at the point where intra-alliance arrangements are discussed.

b. The increase in the number of participants in the international system and the change in their relative power. Since the Second World War the distribution of power within the international system has changed significantly. Earlier there were greater powers (more than two); secondary participants in alliances who, at the lower end of the power spectrum, merged with client states protected by a major power and without a genuinely independent foreign policy; and finally a great fraction of the world's population, largely non-European, lived in colonies or semi-independent political entities.

At present there are two super-powers, the Soviet Union and the United States. In time, probably, Communist China and, possibly, a united Western Europe will join the ranks of the super-powers. But now the gulf in power between the largest power in each alliance and the next largest is greater than ever before. Consequently, the very magnitude of the power of the two greatest states creates, despite their rivalry, some common concerns and common interests not shared by their allies.

By now almost all the former colonies and semi-independent states have become independent and have largely remained unaligned. The reduced likelihood of world war makes it possible for them to contemplate continued existence without becoming minor members of a diplomatic system. They no longer worry that their independence would constitute the victor's spoils in a new world war. From being the objects of international politics they have become active participants, adjusting and readjusting their relationships with each other and with the major powers. And client states, especially in Eastern Europe, as we shall see, are increasingly asserting some control over their own foreign policy.

c. Ideology. Soon after the conclusion of the Second World War it became a truism that ideology was the major determinant in international relations. But like many truisms it turned out to be a half-truth. As early as 1948 Yugoslavia, after ejection from the Communist camp, was able to survive as an "unaligned" nation. The Soviet Union failed to gobble up weak nations on its periphery and communize them on the model of the Eastern European nations largely because, both before and after it acquired nuclear weapons, the Soviet Union feared a large war that might result from aggression against a small country protected within the American alliance system. The American system of guarantees and alliances of the 1950s has been much criticized of late on the ground that the Soviet Union was really unaggressive and that the system extended American commitments beyond American strength and willingness to play a world role. But the success of the policy of the containment of Soviet expansion by superior military strength does not prove that containment was unnecessary. It was just because some countries joined in the effort to contain the Soviet Union that other countries could afford non-alignment and enjoy the freedom of a position between the two main antagonists. But whatever the origin of the present security of the smaller powers, the present reality is that both diplomatic and ideological non-alignment are realistic policies for the weaker nations in the international system.

After 1947 it was widely believed, on both sides, that the passage of a particular country from one camp to the other, regardless of its size, would precipitate a series of such changes. In the West this fear rested on the over-facile assumption that Western European nations. which had not been occupied by Soviet troops. were as much in danger of communization as the Eastern European countries had been. In the Soviet Union, on the other hand, it was feared that the successful departure of Yugoslavia from the Soviet satellite system would be emulated. This fear lay at the basis of the brutal imposition of strict police controls in all the satellite states after 1948. Since then in Europe both sides have felt that any alteration of the status quo would produce a chain reaction.

But the very stability, caused in part by the mutually shared apprehension of the consequences of change, has produced a measure of relaxation. The conversion of some of the satellite states of Eastern Europe into client states with incipient independent foreign policies has been an embarrassment, and may presage serious losses; but it has not been a disaster for the Soviet Union. Castro's personal conversion to Communism, which (given his position) meant the communization of Cuba. caused great agitation in the United States. But it is now tolerated largely because of Castro's failure to spread the revolution, the relatively minor importance of Cuba, and the frustration of the Soviet attempt to make a major strategic change on the basis of a political victory in a small country.

In the overall balance of power, new Communist states, ideologically much diluted and little controlled by the largest Communist state or states, may become important. If, again, modernizing dictators adopt Communism and impose the new faith on their people like the pagan princes converted to Christianity, will it be an extension of the international power of Communism or a dilution of its strength? It all depends on what happens to such states. If some stumble and founder, then the pattern maintained since 1920 when Hungary ceased being a Communist state will have been broken—communization will no longer be irreversible, and each case can be separately assessed on its own terms. If on the other hand, each new regime consolidates itself (and no established regimes abandon Communism), then forceful measures to prevent what will seem to be permanent losses can be expected. Thus, ideology will play a greater role in international relations or a reduced role; the present situation seems to be transitional.

Very likely the importance of ideology in foreign policy calculations will persist longest in areas vital to the interests of the greatest powers. For example, it is difficult for the near and proximate future to imagine political changes in Europe in which ideology would not figure largely. Reckoning on the basis of power politics alone, the Soviet Union would have much to gain from the abandonment of the Communist regime in Eastern Germany. A serious proposal to Western Germany for reunification on the basis of demilitarized neutrality would have good chances of acceptance and at the very least would precipitate a major political crisis in Western Germany. Such a settlement, presumably including the settlement of the Polish (and Czech) western borders, would constitute a political settlement in Europe which would probably bring in its train major modifications of NATO and the Warsaw Pact. The enormous saving in money would greatly ease the dilemma of resource allocation within the Soviet Union. This projection of future events seems unrealistic only because the ideological value of Eastern Germany cannot be exchanged for other values. But the reconversion of Castro, or the collapse of his regime would probably not be viewed as fraught with disaster by the Soviet Union.

2. Inter-Alliance Relations

a. As between the United States and the Soviet Union. Earlier the familiar point was made that the Soviet Union and the United States have a common interest in avoiding nuclear war. But beyond that common interest, rivalry is the keynote of the relationship. In that rivalry, relative military strength is crucial. At present both sides accept United States superiority in nuclear weapons, but Soviet acceptance followed upon efforts to create a balance more favorable to the Soviet Union. The Soviet Union failed to convert its priority in ballistic missiles into a superiority in intercontinental forces, largely, probably, because of its industrial and economic inferiority. It also failed in its effort to alter the military balance by the expedient of putting medium and intermediaterange missiles into Cuba in the fall of 1962. For the Soviet Union, a test-ban treaty promised to, and has tended to, stabilize the weapons balance at roughly the present level, namely an inferior Soviet position in intercontinental nuclear weaponry. The Soviet Union probably accepted such a state of affairs for the interim, at least, because the alternatives might be worse. A continuation of the arms race at a faster pace might well produce no relative advantage. The economic cost, which the Soviet Union can ill afford, might well be paid without military and political improvements relative to the United States, perhaps even with a decline in the Soviet Union's relative position. The United States, on the other hand, enjoying a military superiority which it believes has contributed to the frustration of Soviet aims in Cuba, West Berlin, and elsewhere, is willing to continue the present situation. It is uncertain, of course, whether opportunities, especially in the technological sphere, to alter the weapons balance will emerge and be exploited by the Soviet Union. But at present the United States and the Soviet Union seem to accept roughly the present balance because the former finds it satisfactory and the latter can see no way to alter it significantly for the better.

An unusual feature of the treaty, and significant for the altered nature of international relations, was that both the Soviet Union and the United States knew that a major ally of each would refuse to sign it. The leading powers of the rival alliances thus agreed on a major issue concerning which, one differed with France and the other with Communist China-both disagreements being between allies. Furthermore, the conclusion of the treaty legally bound the signatories to resist their allies' demands for assistance in developing nuclear weapons. Whatever political costs were involved in opposing the wishes of their alliance partners the United States and the Soviet Union were ready to bear. Both major powers opposed the further proliferation of nuclear weapons, and the treaty represented a common resolve not to assist in such proliferation. It was generally recognized, however, that even without help France and Communist China could acquire nuclear weapons by their own efforts.

The corollary of the Soviet and American determination to reduce the danger of war by controlling nuclear weapons as much and as long as possible by themselves is the determination to avoid small-scale conflicts which could grow into larger ones, eventually threatening war. Most often this has meant the frustration of a secondary ally's desire to use force to his own advantage. The two super-powers, in a sense, have a tacit pact to keep the peace even if it frustrates an ally's ambitions. Thus the United States vetoed the Anglo-French-Israeli adventure in Suez, with the Soviet Union adding menace from the sidelines. Whatever the extent of Chinese desires in India in the fall of 1962, the joint—though not concerted—United States and Soviet support of India set limits on Chinese objectives. In both cases it was a non-aligned nation that was protected against an ally. As a consequence, the United States and Soviet partnership in keeping the peace reduces the policy alternatives traditionally enjoyed by secondary members of an alliance. Thus, not only the nuclear powers, but their weaker allies, also must pursue their foreign policy objectives with much less reliance on military force as an instrument to attain desired goals.

The recognition of an area of common Soviet-American interest, symbolized by the test-ban treaty, has been referred to as a détente. But unlike the traditional détente, the present arrangements cannot be converted into an entente, i.e., the alliances cannot be reshuffled because several essential features are lacking.

First, the present situation is essentially bipolar, since as has already been remarked, the difference between the power of the strongest member of each alliance and the next strongest is unprecedentedly great. Traditionally, great powers shifted from one alliance to another because another power of the same size was perceived as threatening. Thus the British Entente cordiale with France in 1904 required the existence of a Germany. At present the Soviet Union and the United States have no peers in power.

Second, in most reversals of alliances at least one partner was revisionist, that is, considered territory held by another power as rightfully belonging to itself. Thus the Anglo-French entente cordiale of 1904 eventually brought Alsace-Lorraine back to France; the Italian shift from the Triple Alliance to the Triple Entente brought them Fiume, etc. Now both the Soviet Union and the United States, having been victorious in the last war, are essentially status quo powers. This generalization requires serious modification only when the present arrangements for Germany are challenged, but hardly at any other time.

Concerted action to keep the peace between two powers is not equivalent to common action to ward off a common threat from a third power, or to gain something at the expense of third powers. Unless and until the Soviet Union and the United States perceive a threat from a third power of equal rank, or both develop aggrandizing goals which can be achieved only at the expense of third powers of equal rank, the necessary basis for the conversion of détente to entente, for the reversal of alliances, does not exist.

Thus even if the ideological tension between the Soviet Union and the United States diminishes rather than intensifies, they can only become more friendly; they cannot become friends.

But from the point of view of secondary allies, this partial accommodation between the two super-powers has some of the features of a reversal of alliances, especially if the accommodation is in an area of vital interest to the secondary power. Thus, in the Chinese view, the Soviet accommodation with the United States on the peace issue has deprived the Chinese of practically every advantage which the alliance had afforded. But unlike the classic reversal of alliances, the Chinese do not find themselves in another diplomatic constellation. The improvement in the relations between the two superpowers does not lead to the reshuffling of alliances but to alterations within each alliance which will be considered subsequently.

b. As between a super-power and a secondary power in a rival alliance. On several occasions the United States and the Soviet Union have given limited support to a secondary power in the rival system in order to increase the leverage of that power in relation to the hegemonic power, with the object of reducing the cohesion of the rival system. American aid to Yugoslavia was an example of such a tactic—after the fact to be sure, but relevant nonetheless. After the increase in Poland's independence in 1956, United States aid to Poland was offered in the hope of consolidating that independence rather than out of any farther reaching community of Polish and American foreign policy interests. Recently, Rumania has taken first steps toward similar arrangements. Other East European Communist states may well follow suit. Thus far these measures have not caused departures from the Warsaw Pact, but have rather contributed to the process of desatellitization in Eastern Europe.

Similarly in Cuba, the Soviet Union offered Castro, then not yet a Communist, limited political and economic assistance with the purpose of reducing the cohesion of the American diplomatic system in the Caribbean. Castro, a modernizing caudillo, deemed it necessary to provoke sharp conflict with the United States in order to demonstrate that he was not merely another dictator, who after eloquent promises of reform would relapse into corruption. In order to guarantee continued Soviet support and also to control his own Communist Party, Castro declared himself and Cuba to be Communist. If Paris was worth a mass to Henry IV, Cuba was worth a party card to Castro. In contrast to the Russian and Chinese revolutions, which derived largely from internal impulses with subsequent effects on foreign policy alignments, the basic impulse in Cuba was in the realm of foreign policy with subsequent effects on domestic policy.

Attempts by both the United States and the Soviet Union to weaken the rival coalition by approaches to some of its members seem to be a permanent rather than a transitory phenomenon.

c. As between secondary members of rival alliance systems. The main purpose of cross-alliance relationships between secondary alliance members is to gain leverage as against the alliance hegemon, often on issues which are of secondary importance to the hegemonic power but of primary importance to the weaker power. For the United States, relations with Pakistan are important, but no more important than relations with a dozen other powers. For Pakistan nothing is more important than the Indian problem. Hence Pakistan's arrangements with China have as their main motive the improvement of her position vis-à-vis India.

The Franco-Chinese exchange of courtesies (rapprochement would describe more than has occurred), was motivated by considerations of lesser urgency than the Pakistani-Chinese gestures of friendship. The French desire a larger voice in allied policy in general, and in Southeast Asian policy in particular, but their national interest in that area can only be residual and sentimental. It is more a case of, "I will be heard." For the Chinese it represents a symbolic escape from the diplomatic isolation caused by the Sino-Soviet breach.

Recently, both the French and the Germans have sought to improve their relations with some of the Eastern European countries. In part the motive resembles that of the United States in seeking to stimulate the growth of the independence of these states from the Soviet Union, but in part it expresses the rivalry of France and Germany for dominance in Europe.

In these cases, to greater or lesser extent, the approaches of second-rank members of one alliance to second-rank members of another alliance have been un-ideological and represent an effort to satisfy desires thwarted by the hegemonic power. Thus Pakistan wants a settlement of the Kashmir dispute which the United States will not support; France wants to be the first power in Western Europe; the countries of Eastern Europe want to improve their bargaining power with the Soviet Union by establishing better relations with France and especially West Germany.

Since only the hegemonic power can satisfy the demands represented by these cross-alliance overtures between secondary powers, these overtures do not lead to switching alliances. After all, it is the United States, not China, to whom Pakistan must look for effective pressure for its solution of the Kashmir question. France wants American acceptance of its claim to primacy in Europe; Soviet or Chinese assent is meaningless. Poland and Rumania require Soviet acceptance of their desire for greater freedom in foreign policy. West Germany or France cannot satisfy that wish, they can only serve as instruments for its accomplishment. Therefore, these approaches to members of the rival alliance are really methods of improving negotiatory power against the hegemonic power. The basic impulse is from within the alliance, not from without.

d. As between non-aligned powers and alliance members. (1) Competition between members of rival alliances for influence with the non-aligned. In the immediate postwar period, only the Western alliance system drew non-aligned states to itself. These states fell into several categories: first, states against whom the Soviet Union or China had territorial claims or was presumed to have territorial ambitions (Turkey and Iran in the Near East). In the Far East, South Korea and South Vietnam were under threat when not under attack.

A second category of states entering the American mid-eastern and far eastern alliance systems comprised those who wanted American economic or political aid but were under no immediate threat from either the Soviet Union or China. Iraq, Pakistan, and the Philippines are the obvious cases. Most new states, however, perceiving no threat from the main Communist states, and hoping for economic support from both systems, have remained unaligned.

When it was realized that the Soviet Union had abandoned the policy of the absorption of contiguous states out of fear of the consequences, states in the tier beyond those immediately bordering on the Soviet Union and China dropped whatever ideas they had had of joining a Western defense system, thus putting a term to the Western process of alliance building.

Furthermore, beginning in 1955, the Soviet Union began to furnish military, and sometimes economic, support, especially to former colonies who were at odds with their former imperial masters. Indonesia and Egypt are the two most important in this category.

For the great majority of the non-aligned countries, national interest is best served by joining neither alliance system and being wooed by both. Above it was argued that the international tension produced by the communization of new states (the unaligned or underdeveloped, or both, being the most likely candidates) would not remain at its present level. It would either increase or decrease. If concern increases, efforts to draw unaligned countries into alliance systems would resume, with the leaders of the unaligned countries seeking to exploit the advantages of the middle position. In a period of intense rivalry for their allegiance, the leaders of non-aligned countries could combine appeals to magnanimity with the threat or promise to move from one camp into another. But this is a threat of limited utility, because all concerned know that the first choice for the unaligned is the medial position.

If fears for the definitive passage of presently unaligned (or loosely aligned) powers to one of the systems decline, the bargaining power of the unaligned will be sharply reduced. They will be reduced to a position commensurate with their power. They can appeal to the magnanimity of the great powers, but they cannot negotiate effectively because they have little to give or withhold.

The super-powers in their rivalry and mutual fear of war have permitted the birth of a host of new nations and have protected their independence. These now act on the international stage, but the political importance of any single one of these nations becomes a multiple of its true power only when it becomes an object of rivalry between the two super-powers.

(2) Competition between members of the same alliance system for influence among uncommitted states. The first area of Sino-Soviet rivalry for influence in underdeveloped countries has been Southeast Asia. By the time of the Bandung Conference at the latest, it was clear that Sino-Soviet rivalry for the adherence of the unaligned was at least as important as Communist-capitalist rivalry.

Since the Soviet signature of the test-ban treaty, the Chinese have challenged Soviet influence wherever they could: in Africa, in the Near East, in Latin America, and even in Europe. This competition is really a function of intra-alliance dissension, to the examination of which we shall now proceed.

Competition within the non-Communist alliance for influence among the unaligned, by contrast, is of slight significance, because no conflict comparable to the Sino-Soviet conflict exists. Greek-Turkish rivalry in Cyprus, however sharp, is consequently localized; and French oil interests in North Africa, as against other European powers are not the occasion of NATO's troubles.

a. The non-Communist alliance system. The purpose of the non-Communist alliance system or, more correctly, systems, is the containment of the Communist states, This is a familiar goal in international diplomacy, namely, not allowing an opponent to grow too strong. Two novelties characterize this effort: its geographical scope and its duration. The French Revolution, in its time, also presented a threat to the established political order, but it was essentially confined to Europe, and conclusively contained in 1815, only a quarter century after its beginning. The Communist Revolution is almost half a century old and still presents challenges in many parts of the world.

The ideological character of the Communist system has impelled a search in the non-Communist alliance for a suitable ideological label for its system, but none has been found, for the internal regimes of the member nations are based on different principles. Outside of Western Europe, only in countries populated by settlers from Northwestern Europe, and in Japan, are societies based on a broad consensus. In most of Latin America, the Near and Middle and Far East, ruling strata are too narrow and middle classes too small to make representative democracy a genuine possibility at present. Although frequently deplored, this political diversity in the non-Communist alliance is a source of strength rather than weakness, as we shall presently see.

The non-Communist alliance system truly deserves the appellation of polycentric because it is a congeries of alliances with different purposes suited to the different threats posed by Communism in various parts of the world. In each of these alliances the hegemonic power, the United States, plays a different role.

In the NATO alliance, after setting into motion the economic and political restoration of Western Europe, the United States by the maintenance of nuclear military superiority has limited the options open to Communist expansion. Since 1948 when Czechoslovakia became a Communist country, the Communist state system has made no progress in Europe. Hence the anti-Communist purpose of the NATO alliance has receded into the background, and NATO's main task is to maintain a credible deterrent against the Soviet Union. Since this task has been successfully accomplished, its importance tends to be forgotten, except when the Soviet Union offers a challenge such as the Berlin crisis, or even more dramatic, the Cuban missile crisis.

With security against both internal and external threats seemingly assured, the nations of Western Europe can and do devote much of their energies to jockeying for favored positions, as against each other, and as against the hegemonic power of the United States. France has put herself forward as the claimant for leadership in Europe. Western Germany cannot compete for this position despite her greater economic resources, because the unresolved problem of unification makes her politically dependent on the United States. The issues on which the NATO allies differ are well publicized: the sharing of nuclear control in NATO, the terms of economic integration, support for Western Germany's position on the Berlin issue and what lies behind it—the political future of all Germany. Yet despite these very genuine differences, the system is not disintegrating, but is rather rearranging the relationship of its parts. After all, the economic integration of part of Western Europe goes forward; economically Western Europe and the United States are growing closer rather than apart. The basic stability of the NATO alliance can be explained on two grounds. First, no claimant for second place presents a genuine challenge to United States power. China may someday be a greater power than the Soviet Union, but neither France nor Germany can challenge the preeminence of the United States. Thus de Gaulle is claiming the position of the first among the secondary powers in the alliance, rather than the position of first in the alliance. Since goals are limited, the conflict does not pass beyond a certain point. Second, the modesty of NATO's goals makes of it an alliance which can withstand a great deal of turbulence. Since its main purpose is to prevent the spread of Communism and Soviet power in Europe, differences which do not threaten the accomplishment of that objective are not really subversive. If the purpose of NATO encompassed a common political direction of all Western Europe, or a common economic policy directed from the center, then NATO would be even more disrupted than the Soviet system in Eastern Europe. It is because the true purpose of NATO is merely anti-Communist that the alliance is capable of accommodating so much change.

A striking feature of the NATO alliance system is the limited power of the hegemonic partner. The Cyprus issue illustrates the increased independence of the weaker power within the alliance. In a traditional alliance system, both Greece and Turkey would have had to consider the consequences of defying the wishes of the hegemonic partner for peace in Cyprus. The Turks would have had to calculate that bad relations with the United States might encourage the Soviet Union to press its claims once again for irredenta in Eastern Anatolia. The Greeks, for their part, would have had to worry that bad relations with the United States would encourage Yugoslavia or Bulgaria, or both, to renew claims for Greek Macedonia. But neither Greece nor Turkey need concern themselves overmuch about such contingencies, because in a common desire to avoid territorial conflicts which might cause even greater conflicts, the Soviet Union and the United States have consistently avoided territorial conflicts in Europe in which both alliances were involved. The consequence has been to make territorial conflict within alliances easier.

The problems of the hegemonic power in the CENTO and SEATO alliances are very different from those in NATO. In the band of territory stretching from the Bosporus to the China Sea, the economic base for political institutions of the Western European type does not exist. Unresolved internal, political, and economic problems of varying intensity characterize every member of the CENTO and SEATO alliances. And in Vietnam, a situation exists which the Communists expected would be common to the majority of the former colonies.

The speed and relative ease of decolonization since World War II has come as a surprise to all. Communist theorists expected that the imperial powers and the colonies would have been involved in long armed conflict, during which the national liberationist movement would have been captured by Communist parties. However, only in Indo-China is the Communist Party engaged in active combat to become the successor to a colonial regime.

In Vietnam, therefore, the United States is trying in the midst of a civil war to create the political conditions in which democracy might be able to grow, and it is not an easy task. Had the British been as reluctant to face the necessity of liquidating empire as the French, Burma today might be in the position of Vietnam, rather than an independent and unified country.

In the CENTO and SEATO alliances the hegemonic power has two tasks: first to create the conditions for economic growth, which it is hoped will permit the establishment of broadly based governments of the West European type in which the internal threat is practically nonexistent; and second, as in Vietnam, to aid a regime actually engaged in a civil war with Communists.

The role of the United States as the hegemonic power in Latin America is again very different. Opposition to the extension of the Communist state system is a very different task in Latin America than in Europe or Asia. The geographical proximity of part of Latin America enables it to play a role in the military relationship between the two super-powers. The United States' successful opposition to the emplacement of missiles in Cuba was in pursuit of the goal of maintaining strategic superiority over the Soviet Union. As pointed out earlier, Soviet acceptance of this relationship is the condition of the existing détente between the super powers.

A second United States purpose in Latin America is to prevent the establishment of Communist regimes in these countries. The hegemonic position of the United States in this alliance is complicated, first, by the circumstance that the danger from Communism is internal rather than external. The United States and Latin America are in a very uneasy relationship because of their different assumptions about the nature of their relationship. Although Latin American countries display a very wide variety of stages of development, they share the belief that the United States plays a dominant role in the affairs of each country. For each country of Latin America the United States is the most important foreign power; for the United States, each Latin American country is only one of many. The natural consequence is resentment at neglect.

Second, the belief is almost universal in Latin America that United States policy toward Latin America is largely determined by American private investors in Latin America.

Third, any United States involvement in the internal affairs of Latin American countries awakens the suspicion that North American imperialism is again active.

Yet the very formulation of the problem necessitated active North American involvement in Latin American internal affairs. The operative theory in the United States is that the unresolved developmental problems of Latin America may create good opportunities for Communism, and that therefore it is in the interests of the United States to help Latin American countries develop their economies.

In Latin America, however, the danger of Communism from within is not perceived as so great, and the dominant feeling is that the United States owes Latin America assistance because of the profits that American business has made in the last century. Moreover, the United States, it is believed, owes such a debt even if the businesses of its citizens are confiscated.

The situation is further complicated by vacillations in the United States judgment as to the danger of Communism in Latin America. The Cuban conversion to Communism, at first seen as a pattern for the future, is now increasingly perceived both by the Soviet Union and the United States as unique. As the danger of Communism is perceived to diminish, quite naturally United States interest in Latin America declines.

The Rio Pact is not, then, a traditional alliance against a foreign threat but an agreement about United States economic and military assistance against internal threats, variously perceived by the signatories of the pacts. Is this a transitional or a permanent feature of the international scene? The answer seems to depend very much on the future prospects of Communism discussed above. If Communism loses as well as gains, then new variants of syncretic Communism in Latin America, if they emerge, will probably be viewed as reversible phenomena which might do world Communism more harm than good in the long run. If on the other hand, Communism continues to gain, the pressure for intervention before and after the fact of conversion will be high.6

b. The Communist alliance system. The members of the Communist alliance system share with the members of the non-Communist alliance system the security from war which results from the common interests of the two super-powers in keeping the likelihood of war low. But beyond this the resemblance ceases. The major distinguishing features of the Communist alliance are the following: (1) It is a fragmented system meant to be universal. (2) It is divided into revisionist and status quo powers. (3) Its members have territorial and economic claims against each other.

The greatest difficulty in the Communist alliance system to is establish a common agreement on its goals. As we have seen in the non-Communist alliance system where the purpose is essentially to contain Communism, the alliance system is divided into different parts in accordance with the nature of the task, with the United States being the hegemonial power in each of the sub-alliances. No such satisfactory solution is possible in the Communist alliance because its goals go far beyond containing the opponent; they encompass, eventually, overwhelming him. It has not been possible to reach agreement on how to do so safely in a world full of nuclear weapons.

For a long time the Communist camp could preserve the fiction of the existence of a correct political and military strategy to be discovered by divination from the entrails of Marxism. While the pontifex maximus was established in Moscow, the question of variant interpretations never arose. But just as the United States and the Soviet Union finally succeeded in establishing the security of their respective allies from attack, the primacy of Moscow was challenged from within the Communist alliance system by China, and the leadership of the United States within the Atlantic Alliance was sharply disputed by de Gaulle. The protected secondary powers challenged the hegemon, but the consequences were much more serious for the Communist system.

⁶ These lines, like the rest of the paper, were written in March 1965. No changes have been made in the text to accommodate subsequent events like the Dominican crisis.

For one, the main challenger, Communist China, was potentially a greater power than the Soviet Union, which lent a special bitterness to the conflict. Second, the problem of mutual economic aid is much more severe in the Communist camp than in the other. In the non-Communist system, in each of the sub-alliances, economic demands have been made only on the hegemon, that is, the United States. In Western Europe economic assistance is no longer necessary; in other areas the extent of economic assistance is under continous assessment. But in the Communist camp the direction of demands has been reversed. The Soviet Union at one time exploited Eastern Europe. but since 1956 it has responded to demands upon itself from Eastern Europe. The Soviet Union also exploited China by reasserting Tsarist rights in the Treaty Ports and on the Manchurian railroad. Moreover, as has been revealed since, the Chinese Communists had to pay for Soviet military aid during the Korean War. After Stalin's death the flow of demands was reversed until 1960, when the Soviet program of military and economic assistance came to an end.

These reversals in the flow of economic wealth are profoundly disturbing to the Communist camp because a critical goal for all its members, including the hegemonic power, is the attainment of the standard of living of the advanced Western capitalist countries. Since the United States has already attained this goal, offering assistance to its allies does not mean postponing the achievement of the aim of an adequately fed and clothed population.

A further cause for division in the Communist alliance is the existence of status quo and revisionist powers. These claims are not only against members of the non-Communist alliance, but against each other.

The Soviet Union, being a victor in the last war, is essentially a satisfied power territorially. Communist China is not, having active claims to Taiwan and inactive but not abandoned claims in Southeast Asia. A common policy of pressing these claims would produce gains for China, not the Soviet Union, and what is more, the costs to the Soviet Union are higher. Soviet support of Chinese territorial claims could cause conflict with the United States, but even if that were avoided it would most probably produce a new phase of the arms race with the attendant economic embarrassment of the Soviet Union. Since China is too far behind the United States in weapons to be in competition, this cost does not enter into her calculations.

Thus in the Communist alliance, agreement cannot be reached on a common policy of promoting the expansion of Communism, nor on some scheme for sharing economic resources to build Communism in each country. The frustration produced by these differences is so high that Communist China has raised her territorial claims against the Soviet Union and Outer Mongolia and has encouraged Rumania to raise the question of Bessarabia obliquely. Poland, Czechoslovakia, and East Germany have not claimed the territory they lost to the Soviet Union, but these demands are just beneath the surface.

Originally, in the Communist system the tendency was for each country's internal institutions to be pressed into conformity with those of the Soviet Union; but since Stalin's death diversification rather than Gleichschaltung has been the trend. This aggravates internal political problems in the Soviet Union. For example, the freedom of action of Soviet leaders in domestic agricultural policy is limited by the existence of a Poland without collective farms.

Within the Western system the necessity to maintain uniformity in the political regimes of all its members has never been felt, and centrifugal tendencies do not create pressures for domestic reforms. As the originally looser system becomes more so, there is little feedback in internal politics. As the rigid system loosens, however, the feedback is significant and, what must be deeply disturbing, of dimensions difficult to foresee and assess.

Thus it is hard to imagine Eastern Europe as anything but much altered ten years from now and Western Europe as remaining essentially the same. Paradoxically, it seems that the cohesion of the Communist alliance system, once pressed into a rigid mold, will suffer much greater disintegration than the always loose non-Communist system. And the multiplication of ideological variants of Communism probably will eventually attenuate the ideological force of Communism.

Perhaps the second half of the twentieth century will indeed be the time of the end of ideology and a time of peace.

DIMENSIONS OF POLITICAL SYSTEMS: FACTOR ANALYSIS OF A CROSS-POLITY SURVEY*

PHILLIP M. GREGG AND ARTHUR S. BANKS Indiana University

Since the publication of David Easton's The Political System,1 it has become increasingly common for political scientists to speculate as to the basic factors which may be common to all political systems and which, in their varying manifestations, determine the unique styles of political behavior within each. Efforts to identify the basic political phenomena and their complex relationships have generated a variety of cross-national conceptual schemes and propositions. Some authors speak of structural and functional requisites, some refer to equilibrium conditions for system maintenance.2 Others, employing more traditional concepts. refer to power, legitimacy, ideology, instability, consensus, influence, and bargaining. Regardless of the form these efforts assume, they all posit the existence of factors or dimensions which are common to all political systems.3 Such attempts at cross-national theory raise two questions. If basic dimensions can be said to underlie the complex behavior within political systems, how can the dimensions be identified? And, what set of concepts have the greatest empirical relevance for describing the dimensions?

1. THE EMPIRICAL SEARCH FOR BASIC "DIMENSIONS"

This kind of theory construction and these questions are not a unique outgrowth of political science. Psychologists began grappling with similar problems sixty years ago. Anthropolo-

- * We are indebted to Professor Karl F. Schuessler for commenting on an earlier draft of this paper.
 - ¹ New York, 1953.
- ² For an attempt to integrate the structural and functional approaches with the systems approach, see Almond's introductory essay in Gabriel A. Almond and James S. Coleman (eds.), The Politics of the Developing Areas (Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1960), pp. 3-64.
- ³ The terms "factor" and "dimension" are here used as equivalent, non-technical concepts. Henceforth the former will be employed in reference to the mathematical result (the columns of variables' loadings in the factor matrix) of the factor analytic calculations; the latter will refer to the phenomena of the real world which the factor delineates.

gists, sociologists, economists and political scientists, who are plagued by more complex units of study, have been struggling along behind.

What is unique to political science is the near absence of systematic empirical tests of the many propositions about basic dimensions. In addition to entertaining such propositions, the other social sciences have begun testing them. The psychologists, led initially by Spearman and later by Thurstone, have developed a statistical technique, factor analysis, for testing hypotheses as to the basic dimensions of intelligence and personality. In discussing the particular relevance of factor analysis for identifying basic dimensions and organizing concepts in the social sciences, Thurstone says:

A factor problem starts with the hope or conviction that a certain domain is not so chaotic as it looks. . . . If no promising hypothesis is available, one can represent the domain as adequately as possible in terms of a set of measurements of numerical indices and proceed with a factorial experiment. The analysis might reveal an underlying order which would be of great assistance in formulating the scientific concepts covering the particular domain. . . .

The exploratory nature of factor analysis is often not understood. Factor analysis has its principal usefulness at the border line of science. It is naturally superseded by rational formulations in terms of the science involved. Factor analysis is useful, especially in those domains where basic and fruitful concepts are essentially lacking and where crucial experiments have been difficult to conceive.⁵

In spite of this ground work by psychologists the broader potential of the method was largely ignored until 1949, and even then a psychologist led the way. In a seminal article, the psychologist Cattell adapted the technique to the measurement of common dimensions of

- ⁴ For a brief history of factor analysis, see Harry H. Harman, Modern Factor Analysis (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1960), pp. 3-11.
- ⁵ L. L. Thurstone, Multiple Factor Analysis: A Development and Expansion of the Vectors of the Mind (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1947), pp. 55-56.

cultural organization. Subsequently, Berry introduced geographers and economists to factor analysis.

Rummel's 1963 study, "Dimensions of Conflict Behavior Within and Between Nations," was the first cross-national application of the technique in political science. A year earlier, Schubert had published a factor analysis of Supreme Court voting patterns. More recently, Alker has published a similar analysis of voting in the UN General Assembly. Both Rummel and Russett are currently conducting factor analyses which in part replicate Cattell's measurement of the dimensions of cultural organization within nations. 11

Even though a growing number of political scientists are employing factor analysis, none have used the technique to address the questions: "What are the basic dimensions of political systems and what concepts best describe them?" One major obstacle has been a lack of variables with which to tap the phenomena of political institutions across all nations. Publication of A Cross-Polity Survey represented, in part, an effort to remedy this deficiency. 12

- ⁶ Raymond B. Cattell, "The Dimensions of Culture Patterns by Factorization of National Characters," Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, Vol. 44 (October, 1949), pp. 443-469.
- ⁷ Brian J. L. Berry, "Basic Patterns of Economic Development," Allas of Economic Development, ed. Norton Ginsburg (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1961), pp. 110-119 and "An Inductive Approach to the Regionalization of Economic Development," Essays on Geography and Economic Development, ed. Norton Ginsburg (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1960), pp. 78-107. For a collateral, but less ambitious study by a sociologist, see Leo F. Schnore, "The Statistical Measurement of Urbanization and Economic Development," Land Economics, Vol. 37 (August, 1961), pp. 229-245.
- ⁸ Rudolph J. Rummel, in General Systems Year-book, Vol. 8 (1963), pp. 1-50.
- ⁹ Glendon Schubert, "The 1960 Term of the Supreme Court: A Psychological Analysis," this REVIEW, Vol. 56 (March, 1962), pp. 90-107.
- ¹⁰ Hayward R. Alker, Jr., "Dimensions of Conflict in the General Assembly," this Review, Vol. 58 (September, 1964), pp. 642-657.
- ¹¹ Rudolph J. Rummel, Harold Geutzkow, Jack Sawyer, and Raymond Tanter, Dimensions of Nations (forthcoming); Bruce M. Russett, "Delineating International Regions" Empirical Studies in International Relations, ed. J. David Singer (New York, the Free Press, forthcoming).
 - ¹² Arthur S. Banks and Robert B. Textor, A

The Survey data are particularly relevant to questions about the common dimensions of political systems and their organizing concepts because the variables operationalize many of the concepts and categories used in recent attempts at cross-national theory. The authors, after canvassing the existing literature, "attempted to select and adopt—experimentally at least—every possible raw characteristic that gave promise of being workable and analytically powerful." 13

II. THE RESEARCH PURPOSE

Given a relevant domain of data and an appropriate statistical technique, this paper seeks to answer the following questions:

- (1) What factors emerge when the Survey data are factor analyzed?
- (2) What dimensions can be inferred from these factors?
- (3) What relevance have these dimensions for cross-national study?
- (4) What specific propositions about conflict behavior are suggested by the findings?

The first question is straightforward and is answered with the factorial results. The second question is answered by inferring from the factors the existence of dimensions or "latent variables" which give rise to the intercorrelation of variables within the independent clusters.

The third question is more complex and requires elaboration. Once a dimension is identified and named, the label used becomes a concept which is operationalized by the factor. In this sense the labels are highly significant concepts, for theoretical purposes, because of their lawful (statistical) relationships with all the other variables included. Thus the interrelationships among all the variables are explained by their relationships to a limited number of concepts. In other words, the factor labels comprise a set of concepts with high generalizing power for cross-national study.

The fourth question is answered by examin-

Cross-Polity Survey (Cambridge, The M.I.T. Press, 1963). A somewhat related effort is Bruce M. Russett, et al., World Handbook of Political and Social Indicators (New Haven, Yale University Press, 1964). The compilers of the Handbook, however, set themselves the task of assembling a large number of interval-scaled data series which are ecologically relevant to political research, but which are not, in the main, substantively political in character.

13 Banks and Textor, op. cit., p. 6.

ing the factorial results for the relationships of the conflict variables with the factors.

III. THE DATA

The present study is based on a factor analysis of the political component of A Cross-Polity Survey. The input data comprise 68 variables, all but five of which were derived from the 57 polychotomous characteristics of the Survey. We omitted 16 Survey characteristics of an essentially ecological characteristics of an essentially ecological characteristics we wished to analyze relationships within the political domain itself, rather than between the political system and its environment. 15

In addition to the 16 non-political characteristics, three additional characteristics, 41 (Party System: Qualitative), 47 (Vertical Power Distribution), and 56 (Character of Legal System), were deleted from the factor analysis for distributional reasons.

Of the remaining 38 Survey characteristics, 27 were ordinal-scaled and 11 were nominal-scaled. Each nominal-scaled characteristic was "decomposed" according to its attribute components, as may be seen in Table I. 16 In order to examine the relationship of conflict to other political phenomena, we included five non-Survey ordinal variables: System Stability, Demonstrations, Domestic Killed, Expulsion of Ambassadors, and Foreign Killed. All but the first of these are taken directly from Rummel's work in conflict behavior. 17

The System Stability variable is of a composite character. Standard scores were calculated for the domestic conflict factor scores

¹⁴ Since each of the Survey variables is discussed in the Survey itself, it seems unnecessary to provide a set of definitions for purposes of the present article. For those unfamiliar with the Survey, one variable that appears in Table I may, however, require specification. "System Style" refers to the degree of "mobilization" (to attain political or social objectives) present in the system.

polychotomous characteristics of the Survey and an eleven-factor solution, four non-political factors ("Economic Development," "Size," "Population Density," and "Religion") emerged. The remaining seven factors closely resembled those reported on below. The four nonpolitical factors correspond to factors identified by Berry, op. cit.; Rummel et al., op. cit.; and Russett, op. cit.

¹⁶ The numbers in parentheses in Table I indicate the Survey raw characteristics from which the variables have been derived. Thus variables 22–24 are all derived from Survey Raw Characteristic 26 (Constitutional Status).

17 Rummel, op. cit.

appearing in Rummel, and then weighted on the basis of his figures for percent of common variance. Standard scores were also calculated for an "Executive Stability" index derived largely from data appearing in the World Handbook of Political and Social Indicators. 18 The latter scores were weighted on the basis of twice the mean of the weights assigned to the Rummel-based scores. The four weighted scores were then summed into a composite stability index which, for present purposes, was dichotomized into "high" and "low" components.

The range for each of the ordinal variables is either 2 or 3. The range for each nominal variable component (as it appears in Table I) is, of course, 2.

IV/ THE STATISTICAL TECHNIQUE: FACTOR ANALYSIS

Technically speaking, factor analysis is "that branch of multivariate analysis which deals with the internal structure of matrices of covariances and correlations." More simply, it is a technique by means of which a large number of variables may be clustered on the basis of their intercorrelations, each set of which is presumed to reflect a single dimension which is "causing" the association within the set of variables. In the context of the Survey data, the factors which emerge summarize the major components of variation among the 68 variables.

Scoring and Correlation Procedure. The first step in the factor analysis was to construct a correlation matrix of the Survey data. The original data were in the form of polychotomous characteristics. For this study they were collapsed into two and three place variables which were then correlated using the product moment coefficient. This procedure, which, in effect, consists of assigning interval values to non-interval data for correlation purposes, is not wholly orthodox. We adopted it on the pragmatic ground that it provides a measure of the relationships among the Survey variables from which the major clusters can be factored out.

The suitability of various scoring and correlation techniques in factor analysis has been extensively debated by the psychologists. Thurstone advances the following argument corroborating our position:

The factorial methods are sufficiently powerful

- 18 Russett et al., op. cit., pp. 101-104.
- ¹⁹ D. N. Lawley and A. E. Maxwell, Factor Analysis As a Statistical Method (London, Butterworths and Co., 1963), p. 1.

		Factor
		I	II	III	IV	v	VI	VII	h²
1.	East European Areal Grouping (1)	58	.22	.26	06	.36	.00	24	.64
	Advanced Western Areal Grouping (1)	.45	.25	.66	13	11	17	01	.70
	Latin American Areal Grouping (1) Asian Areal Grouping (1)	.21	.31	59	~.49	.17	.12	14 00	.73
	Asian Areal Grouping (1) African Areal Grouping (1)	16 05	.13 90	24 .02	.55 05	06 10	.22 .06	.00 16	.40
	North African, Middle Eastern Areal Grouping (1)	06	.17	08	.31	20	25	.50	.4
	Freedom of the Press (13)	.80	22	.17	17	.08	. 13	13	.7
	Date of Independence (19)	.06	.66	.29	36	33	05	27	.8
	Westernization (20)	.32	.60	.50	30	.16	12	13	.8
	Ex-British Dependency (21) Ex-French Dependency (21)	39	.14 51	.35	.69	.01	01	14 $.49$.7
	Ex-Spanish Dependency (21)	.10	.54	.10 47	13 71	15 .09	04	24	1.0
	Early European Political Modernization (22)	.37	.17	.45	.07	19	.06	06	.4
14.	Later European Political Modernization (22)	04	.46	07	67	.32	16	22	.8
	Non-European Political Modernization (22)	17	.21	02	.12	50	.15	13	.3
	Developed Tutelary Political Modernization (22)	09	.14	26	.70	.06	.01	.39	.73
	Undeveloped Tutelary Political Modernization (22) Political Modernization—Periodization (23)	01 .03	93 .76	01	11	.03	.07 15	05 .18	.89
	Developmental Ideological Orientation (24)	.00	83	25	10 02	.16 .12	.07	.29	.8
	Conventional Ideological Orientation (24)	.73	.46	.29	20	.02	01	10	.8
	System Style (25)	74	.11	.13	.14 ·	.37	.14	.19	.7
	Constitutional Regime (26)	.93	.02	.11	08	.28	.04	.05	.9
	Authoritarian Regime (26)	32	18	36	.13	÷.70	06	.04	.7
	Totalitarian Regime (26) Governmental Stability (27)	81	.21	.26	07	.39	.05 .07	18	.8
	Representativeness of Regime (28)	.15 .85	.10 .15	.89 .05	01 .02	.01 .27	02	03 08	.8
	Electoral System (29)	.94	.22	01	.12	.04	08	15	.9
	Freedom of Group Opposition (30)	.92	.16	04	.00	01	11	04	.8
29.	Political Enculturation (31)	.33	.21	.54	08	.13	.22	02	.5
	Sectionalism (32)	.02	09	07	.41	23	01	15	.2
	Articulation by Associational Groups (33)	.63	.54	.27	13	.06	04	.09	.7
	Articulation by Institutional Groups (34) Articulation by Non-Associational Groups (35)	83	01	36	.21	03	10 .05	.02	.8 .8
	Articulation by Anomic Groups (36)	28 43	58 17,	33 51	.52 .35	24 16	08	.06 10	.6
	Articulation by Political Parties (37)	.68	.20	16	.00	.03.	55	16	.8
36.	Aggregation by Political Parties (38)	.06	10	.34	.12	.01	.82	.20	.8
	Aggregation by Executive (39)	.19	48	.15	.00	.18	.46	.61	.9
	Aggregation by Legislature (40)	.73	.38	.28	07	.08	32	.05	.8
	One-Party System (41) One Party Dominant System (41)	77 .14	23 24	26 24	14 02	.13 .08	.23 .15	02	.8
	Two-Party System (41)	.43	.20	.15	.17	.00	.50	19	.5
	Multi-Party System (41)	.47	.22	18	09	.08	69	06	.7
43.	Stability of Party System (43)	12	.14	.84	03	.19	.28	.08	.8
	Personalismo (44)	.00	08	66	22	34	12	09	.6
	Elitism (45)	70	.41	18	.03	17	01	41	.9
	Charisma (46) Horizontal Power Distribution (48)	33	37	04	.20	21	.29	.44 08	.6
	Presidential System (49)	.86 .01	.29 26	.19 59	.02 47	.20 03	07	.21	.7
	Parliamentary-Republican System (49)	.27	.04	.20	.13	.08	35	.15	.2
	Parliamentary-Royalist System (49)	.47	.01	.28	.33	.01	.02	35	.5
	Status of Legislature (50)	.87	.01	.29	.02	.10	01	.03	.8
	Unicameral Legislature (51)	49	51	03	11	.28	19	.04	.6
	Bicameral Legislature (51)	.49	.51	.03	.11	28	.19	04	.6
	Status of Executive (52) Modern Bureaucracy (53)	82 .52	18 .22	11 .65	C3 O1	21 10	25	.13 ,06	.8 .8
	Semi-Modern Bureaucracy (53)	29	.54	46	10	.47	.22	.01	.8
	Post-Colonial Transitional Bureaucracy (53)	.00	92	05	.01	.05	.00	06	.8
58.	Traditional Bureaucracy (53)	22	.11	10	.21	80	02	04	.7
	Military Interventive (54)	03	.18	60	06	15	28	.04	.5
	Military Supportive (54)	77	.19	.16	.12	12	.00	08	.6
	Military Neutral (54) Role of Police (55)	.73 75	32 06	.34	07	.21	.20 — 11	.05	.8 .8
	Communist System (57)	75 71	06 .25	45 .26	11 .06	16 .40	11 .04	.10 16	.8
	System Stability	.20	.03	.82	09	02	.05	09	.7
	Demonstrations	.24	.00	39	05	11	21	.06	.2
66.	Domestic Killed	.05	06	62	.21	,06	.06	01	.4
	Expulsion of Ambassadors	06	.09	.03	12	.20	.00	.51	.3
o 8. .	Foreign Killed	.00	.01	33	.21	03	.06	.49	.4
	Percent of Total Variance	24.6	13.5	13.2	6.4	5.4	4.7	4.3	72.
	Percent of Common Variance	34.1	18.7	18.3	8.9	7.4	6.6	6.0	100.0

that one can take considerable liberties with the raw scores without seriously affecting the results. If we take a factor analysis in which several fundamental and meaningful factors have been clearly identified, it would be instructive to subject the factor methods to a severe test by radical changes in the original raw scores. . . . The correlation coefficients to be analyzed would then be markedly different from those used in the original analysis, but it seems quite likely that the same basic factors would be identified. This demonstration has not been made,* but it probably would be successful in showing the power of the factorial methods in isolating the underlying order among the test variables and the basic factors that determine the individual differences.20

In the context of the present study, this position is substantiated by correspondence between our factors and those identified by Berry, Rummel, and Russett in three independent factor analyses. (See the section below, entitled "Interpreting and Naming the Factors.")

Factorial Procedure. The next step was to factor analyze the product moment correlation matrix. Unities were inserted in the principal diagonal of the matrix. The principal-factor (or principal-component) technique was selected over competing methods on the ground that it yields a mathematically unique solution in which the first factor accounts for the maximum amount of variance within the data, while each succeeding factor extracts the maximum of the remaining unexplained variance.²¹

In order to identify the most invariant factor structure, we rotated the principal-factor solution. Using the inflection point criterion for practical significance, we selected the first seven factors for rotation. Each of these factors accounted for more than 4.0 per cent of the total variance, and the seven, when summed, accounted for 72.0 per cent of the variance. The factors were rotated to an orthogonal and to an oblique solution using Kaiser's varimax and Carroll's oblimin biquartimin criteria respectively.²² The orthogonal solution best fulfilled

²⁰ Thurstone, op. cit., pp. 66-67. The asterisk refers to the following footnote in the revised edition of Thurstone's original work: "Since this chapter was written, the demonstration has been made, and is described in Chapter XV."

²¹ This technique is explained by Harman, op. cit., in ch. 9, "Principal-Factor Solution."

²² Henry F. Kaiser, "The Varimax Criterion for Analytic Rotation in Factor Analysis," Psychometrika, Vol. 23 (September, 1958), pp. 187– 200; John B. Carroll, "Biquartimin Criterion the simple structure criteria and was selected for presentation. 23

Interpreting and Naming the Factors. The interpretation and naming of the factors involve further methodological considerations. However, by including the entire population of nations in the factor analysis, we have avoided one issue. We are not faced with the problem of estimating the significance of inferences from a sample to a larger population.

One important consideration is whether to adopt the descriptive or the inferential approach in interpreting the meaning of the factors. ²⁴ The former considers a factor to be a set of coefficients which conveys only descriptive information about the clustering of variables on a factor. The inferential school takes one step further and assumes that the factor indicates the presence of a basic dimension or "latent variable" which "causes" the array of variables along the factor. The composition of the variables loaded by the factor and the percent of total variance which the factor explains determine the appropriateness and strength of the inferential interpretation.

In the light of these criteria, we first employ the descriptive and then, when appropriate, the inferential approach for interpreting the Survey factors. Thus, in the discussion that follows, we first present the extreme clusters of each factor (all are bimodal) and interpret them descriptively as opposite types. We then consider what basic dimension might be inferred. When each variable's rank can be interpreted as representing more or less of a phenomenon common to all of the variables in the extremes, we label the factor with the appropriate ordinal concept. The inferences implied by the labels are, of course, weaker when the factors account for small portions of the total variance.

The next consideration is the validity of the factors. If our factors identify basic phenomena operating within political systems, they will also be delineated by other factor analyses. Even though no comparable political study has for Rotation to Oblique Simple Structure in Factor Analysis," Science, Vol. 126 (29 November, 1957), pp. 1114-1115.

²³ Calculations were performed by the Indiana Research Computing Center's IBM 709. The MESA-3 program employed was developed by John B. Carroll at Harvard, coded by R. A. Sandsmark at Northwestern, and revised by Norman Swartz with the assistance of Gary Flint at Indiana.

²⁴ Sten Henrysson, Applicability of Factor Analysis in the Behavioral Sciences (Stockholm, Almquist and Wiksell, 1960), pp. 86-88.

been completed, we found partial correspondence between our factors and those of independent studies by Rummel, Russett, and Berry. Rummel's and Russett's factor analyses of social, economic, and political variables yielded the following five factors: "Economic Development," "Communism," "Intensive Agriculture" or "Density," "Size," and "Catholic Culture" or "Religion." ²⁵ These factors correspond to five of eleven which we calculated in an earlier factor analysis of the social and economic in addition to the political variables of the Survey. The remaining six factors closely resemble the political factors reported on below. Berry's study of economic data identified three factors ("Technology, Demography," and "Size"), which also correspond to factors calculated from the Survey data.26

From this convergence, we conclude that the earlier Survey factors are valid measures of the dimensions suggested, including one that is political in character. More importantly, the earlier results encourage the expectation that future factorial studies will add to the validity of the political factors yielded by the present study.

A further consideration is raised by the communality value 1.08 for the variable "Ex-Spanish Dependency" in Table I. This high communality (the normal range is zero to one) was caused by missing data.27 We did not estimate values for missing data, therefore the number of cases entering into each correlation is not the same. As a consequence, the correlation matrix does not exhibit Gramian properties, and the variances and communalities in the factor matrix are slightly inflated. With this consideration in mind, we rely on the relative, rather than absolute, values of the factor loadings and communalities in interpreting the factors. Also, we adopt a high value, ±.50, for identifying the significant variable loadings. This value is safely above the $\pm .30$ generally suggested by factor analysts.

V. THE RESEARCH FINDINGS

Before examining Table I in detail, the single most important implication of the factor matrix should be noted, viz., that the Survey data are highly structured along factors largely independent of each other.

The seven factors account for 72 per cent of the total variance among the 68 variables, i.e., an average of 72 per cent of the variance of each variable. Of the 68 variables, only seven failed to be loaded higher than \pm .50 by at least one factor, while only three were loaded higher than \pm .50 by more than one factor. Hence, except for three overlapping variables, the solution employed yields mutually independent factors.

These findings indicate that the political phenomena measured by the data do not occur randomly from one polity to the next; they occur in highly associated patterns or dimensions. In other words, basic dimensions do underlie the complex behavior within political systems.

In the following sections these factors are interpreted and the dimensions are inferred. It must be remembered, when hypothesizing with regard to dimensions, that the inferences are made with varying degrees of confidence. The large proportions of total variance accounted for by each of the first three factors (24.6%, 13.5%, and 13.2%) support strong inferences. The smaller amount of variance explained by the last four factors (6.4%, 5.4%, 4.7%, 4.3%) sustain successively weaker inferences.

Factor I: Access. Table II displays the highly loaded variables comprising the extreme portions of Factor I, which accounts for a large portion, 24.6 per cent, of the total variance. In examining these variables, the following dichotomies emerge: hierarchical as opposed to competitive bargaining processes; consolidated as opposed to distributed authority and force; executive and single-party politics as opposed to legislative and group politics; totalitarian restrictions as opposed to institutionalized openness of political channels. The dichotomies refer generally to restrictive as opposed to permissive institutions and interaction. Or, to use Truman's concept, Factor I reflects the degree of access to political channels.28

This conclusion is further substantiated when we examine the rank order of the areal groups on the factor (Table III). The high loadings of the Western, Latin American, and East European groups correspond to documented fact. The low loading of the African group reflects political channels which, due to their variety, absence, lack of differentiation, and newness are randomly rather than systematically distributed in terms of access. For ²⁵ Rummel et al., op. cit. and Russett, op. cit.

²⁶ Berry, op. cit.

²⁷ Due to an artifact of coding procedure taken over directly from the Survey, the variable "Ex-Spanish Dependency" exhibits an unusually high missing data component. For this variable, in addition to normal missing data attrition, only excolonial dependencies were assigned substantive codings, some 40 countries being regarded as "irrelevant" to the coding category.

²⁸ David B. Truman, The Governmental Process (New York, 1955), p. 264 ff.

TABLE II, FACTOR I: ACCESS

TABLE IV. FACTOR III DIFFERENTIATION

Factor Loading	Variable	Factor Loading	Variable
.94	Electoral System	.76	Political Modernization—Periodiza-
.93	Constitutional Regime		tion
.92	Group Opposition	.66	Date of Independence
.87	Status of Legislature	.60	Westernization
.86	Horizontal Power Distribution	. 54	Articulation by Associational Groups
.85	Representativeness of Regime	.54	Semi-Modern Bureaucracy
.80	Press Freedom	. 54	Ex-Spanish Dependency
.73	Aggregation by Legislature	. 51	Bicameral Legislature
.73	Military Neutral	.46	Later European Political Moderniza-
.73	Conventional Ideological Orientation		tion
.68	Articulation by Parties	.46	Conventional Ideological Orientation
.63	Articulation by Associational Groups	.41	Elitism
.52	Modern Bureaucracy	.38	Aggregation by Legislature
	•		•
	•		•
	•
58	East European Areal Grouping	37	Charisma
70	Elitism	48	Aggregation by Executive
71	Communist System	51	Ex-French Dependency
74	System Style	51	Unicameral Legislature
75	Role of Police	58	Articulation by Non-Associational
77	One-Party System		Groups
77	Military Supportive	83	Developmental Ideological Orienta-
81	Totalitarian Regime		tion
82	Status of Executive	90	African Areal Grouping
83	Articulation by Institutional Groups	92	Post-Colonial Bureaucracy
		93	Undeveloped Tutelary Political Mod- ernization similar reasons, the random distribution of North African and Middle Eastern nations is not surprising.

Specialists in political development, consensus, and conflict will note that these phenomena are not highly associated with degree of political access.

Factor I yields empirical evidence supporting the widespread use of measures of constitutionalism, authoritarianism, totalitarianism, and representation in comparative and theo-

TABLE III. DISTRIBUTION OF AREAL GROUPING VARIABLES ALONG THE ACCESS FACTOR

Factor Loading	Variable
.45	Advanced Western Areal Group
.21	Latin American Areal Group
05	African Areal Group
06	North African, Middle Eastern Areal Group
16	Asian Areal Group
58	East European Areal Group

retical work. In addition, the factor suggests a need for more precise measurement of the quantity and quality of restrictions imposed on competition for control of political channels.

Factor II: Differentiation. Table IV rank orders the variables loaded heavily by Factor II, which accounts for 13.5 per cent of the total variance. The extremes of the factor contrast late stages of modernization against undeveloped tutelary modernization, conventional against developmental ideology, semi-modern against post-colonial bureaucracy, and aggregation by legislature against aggregation by executive. Note that the extremes do not contrast the westernized democracies with traditional monarchies. The factor does not, therefore, measure the full range of phenomena which could properly be interpreted as "political development." In the light of these findings, we interpret the factor to reflect a dimension of differentiation of political institutions within former colonial dependencies.

Factor II lends empirical support to the comparative and theoretical focus on measures of institutional differentiation and specialization within the ex-colonial nations. It also indicates the need to develop more sophisticated typologies than presently exist for the classification of transitional political systems. For example, the two polity groups most directly involved in the variable extremities of this factor (the Latin American and the African) are classified according to quite different sets of typological criteria in Almond and Coleman.29 Thus, while the negative loadings might be regarded as according with one or more components of the "Almond-Shils" schema (e.g., "Tutelary Democracy" or "Terminal Colonial Dependency"), it is evident that no element of the same typology applies to the set of high positive loadings for Factor II.

The latter extreme loads characteristics of older ex-colonies whose political institutions have at least in a structural sense been substantially westernized. The other extreme loads characteristics of recently dependent territories which have yet to become accommodated to other than rudimentary institutions of self-government. While one might expect polities exhibiting high positive scores for this factor to be more democratic, more stable, and more consensual than those exhibiting high negative scores, variables indexing these phenomena are, by and large, conspicuous by their absence.

We hypothesize, therefore, that this factor measures what may be termed the political counterpart to social differentiation. This is to suggest that if a large number of variables indexing social structure had been included in the present study, a "social differentiation" factor would undoubtedly emerge and many of the high loading Factor II variables might also be expected to load heavily on such a factor.

Certain of the positive loading Factor II variables may also represent, or suggest, necessary (but not sufficient) conditions for a stable democratic political system in a highly differentiated social and economic milieu. Indeed, the presence of a moderate degree of elitism, when coupled with articulation by associational groups and legislative aggregation does not appear to be inconsistent with this hypothesis when viewed in the context of Kornhauser's theses as to the preconditions of democracy and totalitarianism, respectively.³⁰

Factor III: Consensus. The extreme loading variables of Factor III, which accounts for

TABLE V. FACTOR III: CONSENSUS

Factor Loading	Variable
.89	Governmental Stability
.84	Stability of Party System
.66	Advanced Western Regional Grouping
.65	Modern Bureaucracy
.54	Political Enculturation
. 50	Westernization
	•
	•
	•
51	Articulation by Anomic Groups
59	Latin American Areal Grouping
 59	Presidential Legislative-Executive Structure
60	Military Interventive
66	Domestic Killed
66	Personalismo

13.2 per cent of the total variance, are presented in Table V. Examination of the variables reveals the following dichotomies: personalistic party politics as opposed to party system stability; governmental stability as opposed to military intervention; overall system stability as opposed to domestic killed; political enculturation as opposed to articulation by anomic groups. These dichotomies reflect agreement as opposed to dissent with regard to the basic channels and institutions of political participation. Factor III seems to tap the degree of consensus and cooperation among participants as to the rules governing political activity. Note that the negative pole of the factor reflects not only dissent and opposition, but direct, physical

The rank order of the areal groups on the factor (Table VI) adds further substance to this interpretation. The positive loadings of the Western and East European nations are as

TABLE VI. DISTRIBUTION OF AREAL GROUPING VARIABLES ALONG THE CONSENSUS FACTOR

Factor Loading	Variable
.66	Advanced Western Areal Grouping
.26	East European Areal Grouping
.02	African Areal Grouping
08	North African, Middle Eastern Areal Grouping
24	Asian Areal Grouping
59	Latin American Areal Grouping

²⁹ Almond and Coleman, op. cit., pp. 522-567.

²⁰ William Kornhauser, The Politics of Mass Society (Chicago, 1959).

expected. The low correlation of the African nations reflects a widespread lack of consensus as to the structure of political institutions in the area. However, this lack of consensus is not typically accompanied by a high incidence of open conflict (domestic killed and military intervention) between opposing groups. Lack of consensus in Latin American and Asian countries, on the other hand, gives rise to open dissent, coups, and conflict. This contrast raises the question, "What are the forms and causes of open opposition when political consensus is absent within a nation?"

The emergence of this dimension supports the comparative and theoretical use of concepts bearing on agreement, consensus, cooperation, dissent, opposition, and conflict. Most of these phenomena fall within that area of the discipline now focusing on political culture and attitudes. The findings suggest that in addition to measuring attitudes of consensus and dissent researchers should more systematically explore the overt behavior resulting from these attitudes. 31

TABLE VII. FACTOR IV: SECTIONALISM

Factor Loading	Variable
.70	Developed Tutelary Political Modernization
. 69	Ex-British Dependency
.55	Asian Areal Grouping
. 52	Articulation by Non-Associational Groups
.41	Sectionalism
.35	Articulation by Anomic Groups
	· ·
36	Date of Independence
47	Presidential Legislative-Executive Structure
49	Latin American Areal Grouping
67	Later European Political Moderniza- tion

³¹ Rummel has initiated an examination of "causes" of domestic conflict but has encountered a lack of relevant survey data. See Rudolph J. Rummel, "Testing Some Possible Predictors of Conflict Behavior Within and Between Nations," Proceedings of the Peace Research Society, Vol. 1 (1963). A useful pilot study in this regard is Gabriel A. Almond and Sidney Verba, The Civic Culture: Political Attitudes and Democracy in Five Nations (Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1963).

TABLE VIII. FACTOR V. LEGITIMATION

Factor Loading	Variable
.47	Semi-Modern Bureaucracy
.40	Communist System
.39	Totalitarian Regime
.37	System Style
.36	East European Areal Grouping
.32	Later European Political Modernization
	•
	•
	•
50	Non-European Political Moderniza- tion
70	Authoritarian Regime
80	Traditional Bureaucracy

Factor III also serves to substantiate the usefulness of typologies delineating clusters of characteristics that contrast "stable" with "unstable" political systems.

Factor IV: Sectionalism. The fourth factor, accounting for 6.4 per centof the total variance, is only one-fourth as strong as the first and one-half as strong as the second and third, and therefore provides a weaker basis for inference. For this same reason, inferences based on factors five, six, and seven cannot be made with the high degree of confidence earlier expressed.

The extremes of the factor (see Table VII) contrast colonial developmental characteristics in much the same manner as does Factor II. An important difference is that the earlier set of ex-French, African characteristics is here replaced by an ex-British, Asian configuration. The extreme loading variables are, however, less amenable to interpretation than in the case of Factor II. The ex-British dependencies are, in certain respects, more "developed" than their ex-French counterparts, yet the internal developmental cleavages between social sectors are obviously more pronounced. This is reflected in the loadings of sectionalism and anomic group activity. For want of a better term, we therefore interpret this factor as tapping a specific pattern of institutional differentiation occurring in a political system exhibiting high sectionalism.

Factor V: Legitimation. The extremes of Factor V, as exhibited in Table VIII, contrast totalitarian regimes against authoritarian regimes, semi-modern bureaucracies against traditional bureaucracies, and later European political

TABLE IX. DISTRIBUTION OF VARIABLES REFLECT-ING PHENOMENA OF LEGITIMATION AND AUTHORITY ON THE LEGITIMATION FACTOR

Factor Loading	Variable
.47	Semi-Modern Bureaucracy
.40	Communist Regime
.39	Totalitarian Regime
.37	System Style
.28	Constitutional System
.27	Representativeness of Regime
.21	Military Neutral
.20	Horizontal Power Distribution
.12	Developmental Ideological Orientation
02	Conventional Ideological Orientation
12	Military Supportive
15	Military Interventive
16	Role of Police
17	Elitism
21	Charisma
24	Articulation by Non-Associational Groups
34	Personalismo
70	Authoritarian Regime
80	Traditional Bureaucracy

modernization against non-European political modernization.

Most of these variables reflect the source and distribution of authority within political systems. More specifically, they refer to the means by which political authority is legitimized. As demonstrated by the rank order of variables in Table IX, they can be construed as falling along a continuum between the classical Weberian ideal types of rational-legalistic legitimation and traditional legitimation. In examining the variable positions, the characteristics of rational and legalistic authority fall at one extreme, while the characteristics of traditional and charismatic authority occupy the other.³²

Factor VI: Interest. The extreme loading variables of Factor VI are exhibited in Table X. In addition to contrasting two-party and multi-party systems, this factor identifies the role which political institutions assume in patterns of interest circulation. It should be stressed that this factor is typological in that it contrasts patterning rather than the amount of

TABLE X. FACTOR VI: INTEREST

Factor Loading	Variable
.82	Aggregation by Political Parties
. 50	Two-Party System
.46	Aggregation by Executive
	•
	•
	•
32	Aggregation by Legislature
35	Parliamentary-Republican
55	Articulation by Political Parties
69	Multi-Party System

interest circulation. The Access factor, which contrasts systems with large numbers of interest articulation points against systems with few access institutions, measures the volume of interests processed by the system.

Also, it is significant that this factor does not measure all components of the Almond-Coleman articulation-aggregation schema,³³ It identifies only the distinctly political institutions for handling interests injected into the system, rather than the full range of interest-bearing groups.

This factor highlights the importance of the channels of interest circulation in the political process. It also provides support for the generalizing power of typologies of party systems.

Factor VII: Leadership. Factor VII loads only 4.3 per cent of the total variance and does not exhibit the pronounced bimodal configuration of the others. The positive extreme of the factor loads variables which reflect strong executive leadership in both domestic and foreign affairs.

TABLE XI. FACTOR VII: LEADERSHIP

Factor
Loading	Variable
.61	Aggregation by Executive
. 51	Expulsion of Ambassadors
.50	North African, Middle Eastern Areal Grouping
.49	Foreign Killed
.49	Ex-French Dependency
.44	Charisma
	•
	•
	•
41	Elitism

³³ Almond and Coleman, op. cit., p. 33 ff.

³² Cf. Leonard Binder's neo-Weberian typology in *Iran: Political Development in a Changing Soci*ety (Berkeley and Los Angeles, University of California Press, 1962), pp. 44-45.

This dimension calls attention to the need for systematic studies of executive roles and leadership style in both comparison and theory. The random distribution of other leadership variables along this factor indicates the complexity of the phenomena in question. The relatively low strength of the factor indicates that its typological value is limited.

Unexplained Variables. The factor structure accounts for less than 50 per cent of the communalities (h²) of the variables exhibited in Table XII. However, as indicated by the factor loadings in parentheses, six of these variables correlate above .50 with one of the factors. In other words, at least one major source of variation for each of these six variables is identified by the factor matrix. We conclude, therefore, that only five exhibit variation substantially independent of the factors identified.

Of the regional groupings, the North African, Middle Eastern and the Asian display considerably less explained total variance than do the others. In short, political phenomena in these countries are not highly structured along the dimensions discovered. These areas may, of course, exhibit characteristics that structure themselves along other dimensions, possibly religious or cultural, that the present study is not designed to tap.

VI. CONCLUSIONS: RELEVANCE OF THE FINDINGS FOR CROSS-NATIONAL STUDY

In the preceding sections, we have proposed the following answers for the first two research questions: the Survey data are highly correlated along a relatively limited number of factors; these factors provide evidence for inferring seven basic political dimensions—Access, Differentiation, Consensus, Sectionalism, Legitimation, Interest, and Leadership.

Theory and Research. The third question asks. "What is the relevance of these dimensions for cross-national study?" The dimensions have impact in the following areas: theory and research, comparison, and typology construction. First, they suggest a basic set of concepts around which theory construction and research should proceed. According to our findings the seven underlying dimensions are systematically related to ("cause") a wide variety of manifest political behavior. In this sense, the concepts naming the dimensions are theoretically significant; they are lawfully related to much political behavior and therefore can be used as basic concepts within a large body of interrelated generalizations. And this is the first step toward empirical theory. However, to facilitate their use in theory and research, the concepts need to be operationalized by simple definitions rather than by elusive factors. This is done by devising variables which correlate highly with each of the factors. If future factor analyses vield similar factors and a set of corresponding variables is devised, theoreticians and researchers will have advanced an enormous step toward an important goal—empirical theory.

Comparative Study. Second, the seven factors can be used as composite scales for comparing political systems.³⁴ For example, the political system of Great Britain has a higher score on Factor I (which measures the degree of political access) than does that of Poland.³⁵ By ³⁴ Russett, op. cit., develops a very useful method for applying the factors as comparative scales.

³⁵ We have not actually calculated factor scores in order to compare nations on the factors. The loadings of the areal grouping variables do, of course, provide insight as to what nations might

TABLE XII.	VARIABLES	LEAST	EXPLAINED	$\mathbf{B}\mathbf{Y}$	THE	SEVEN	FACTORS

Highest F. L.	Variable	Communality
24	One Party Dominant System	.16
.41	Sectionalism	.26
39	Demonstrations	. 27
35	Parliamentary-Republican System	.28
(.51)	Expulsion of Ambassadors	.32
(.55)	Non-European Political Modernization	.38
(.51)	Foreign Killed	.40
.45	Early European Political Modernization	.42
(62)	Domestic Killed	.44
(.55)	Asian Areal Grouping	.46
(.50)	North African, Middle Eastern Areal Grouping	.49

knowing the scores of a nation on all seven factors, we are in a position to make statistical predictions as to the probabilities with which phenomena measured by the 68 variables of Table I will occur within the political system in question. This capability seems especially useful with regard to phenomena indexed by variables such as government stability, articulation by anomic groups, stability of party system, military intervention, demonstrations, and the like.

Typology Construction. The findings have import in a third area of cross-national studytypology construction.36 The latter approach seeks a middle ground between the powerful but scarce results of theory and the multitudinous but mundane yields of comparison. Instead of focusing on the dimensions common to all systems, it involves the construction of a small set of categories which will adequately describe the range of relationships across a variety of systems. Generally, the elements of a typology are a set of definitions mixed with propositions, each of which is assumed to describe a cluster of phenomena that is highly recurrent (predictable) in each of the system types specified.

The usefulness (generalizing power) of a be expected to correlate most strongly with the various factors. However, the loadings of the areal grouping variables lose their meaning when the nations are quite heterogeneous with respect to the dimension that the factor taps. On this point, see Lawley and Maxwell, op. cit., pp. 88-92.

²⁵ For an excellent discussion of the methodological status of typologies in the social sciences, see the remarks of Carl G. Hemple in "Symposium: Problems of Concept and Theory Formation in the Social Sciences," Science, Language, and Human Rights (Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1952), I, 65 ff.

typology depends on the number of characteristics and political systems which it can explain. For example, Aristotle's three-type classificatory scheme (monarchy, aristocracy, democracy) seems to have described adequately all political systems of the classical Greek period with reference to a single set of characteristics having to do with authority structure. In a somewhat similar manner, Almond and Coleman's basic typology (traditional, transitional, modern) is useful as a means of categorizing contemporary political systems with reference to a set of characteristics centering on specialization of political structure.³⁷

The objective of the approach is to develop the most parsimonious set of categories that will serve as the basis of generalization about the greatest number of political systems. Success depends on delineating the most frequently recurring types which are mutually independent and not simply disguised mutations. In this sense, the underlying assumptions and criteria of typology construction and factor analysis correspond. Both endeavor to delineate sets of variables which are highly associated across many cases. When only the highest loading variables on each factor are considered, they reflect a small cluster of phenomena occurring simultaneously in a specific set of nations. The simple structure criterion guarantees that the cluster and the set are mutually exclusive of all others along their respective factors. In this way, factor analysis utilizes systematic methods for identifying sets of variables that are analogous to typological constructs.

Therefore, the results of this factorial study provide information as to what clusters of characteristics will yield types of greatest inclusiveness and generalizing power. Table ³⁷ Almond and Coleman, op. cit., p. 33 ff.

TABLE	XIII.	MAJOR	CLUSTER	TYPES	\mathbf{or}	SURVEY	VARIABLES

Survey Factor	Loading	Cluster Type
I	Positive	Polyarchic System
I	Negative	One-Party Totalizarian System
II	Positive	Westernized Democratic System
II	Negative	Undeveloped Democratic System
III	Positive	Stable System
III	Negative	Unstable System
\mathbf{V}	Negative	Traditional Authoritarian System
VI	Positive	Two-Party System .
VI	Negative	Multi-Party System
VII	Positive	Modernizing Authoritarian System

1.64

XIII displays the cluster types suggested by the Survey factors.³⁸

These categories, inductively derived from the Survey data, provide confirmation for many types which political scientists currently employ. For example, the Survey-derived type, "One-Party Totalitarian System," exhibits the same characteristics that Friedrich and Brzezinski label "Totalitarian Dictatorship."39 The types "Two-Party System" and "Multi-Party System" substantiate many of the propositions that Duverger sets forth in his party system typology.40 The Survey types "Westernized Democratic System," "Undeveloped Democratic System," "Traditional Authoritarian System," and "Modernizing Authoritarian System" add support to Shils' and Almond's types, "Political Democracy,"
"Tutelary Democracy," "Traditional Oligarchy," and "Modernizing Oligarchy."41 "Polyarchic System" encompasses most of the characteristics which Dahl subsumes under the label "Polyarcal."42

Conflict Propositions. The final research question posed asks, "What specific propositions about conflict in political systems are suggested by the findings?" Examination of the conflict variables (Demonstrations, Domestic Killed,

- ³⁸ We have not named those factor clusters which are not readily interpreted or which duplicate other clusters.
- ³⁹ Carl J. Friedrich and Zbigniew K. Brzezinski, Totalitarian Dictatorship and Autocracy (Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1956), pp. 9-10.
- ⁴⁰ Maurice Duverger, Political Parties: Their Organization and Activity in the Modern State (New York, 1963), p. 203 ff.
 - 41 Almond and Coleman, op. cit., pp. 53-55.
- ⁴² Robert A. Dahl, A Preface to Democratic Theory (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1956), p. 63 ff.

Expulsion of Ambassadors, and Foreign Killed) leads to the following propositions:

-30 to 1

- (1) The political dimension, leadership, which accounts for foreign conflict does not account for domestic conflict.
- (2) The presence of strong executive leadership is frequently accompanied by both diplomatic and violent foreign conflict.
- (3) Access to political channels, differentiation of political institutions, sectionalism within developing systems, kind of legitimation, and type of interest circulation tend to be unassociated with violent and diplomatic foreign conflict.
- (4) The political dimension, consensus, which accounts for most of the domestic conflict does not account for diplomatic conflict, but is moderately associated with violent foreign conflict.
- (5) An absence of political consensus is associated with violent domestic conflict.
- (6) An absence of political consensus is moderately associated with non-violent domestic conflict.
- (7) The degree of differentiation of political institutions, kind of legitimation, and type of leadership tend to be unassociated with violent and non-violent domestic conflict.

These propositions, in large measure, substantiate those advanced by Rummel and Tanter in their conflict research.⁴³ In addition, they identify the two political phenomena (lack of consensus, strong executive leadership) which are most frequently associated with domestic and foreign conflict, respectively.

⁴³ Rummel, "The Dimensions of Conflict Behavior Within and Between Nations," p. 24; Raymond Tanter, "Dimensions of Conflict Behavior Within Nations, 1955-60: Turmoil and Internal War," Proceedings of the Peace Research Society, Vol. 3 (1964).

A SCALE ANALYSIS OF THE VOTING RECORDS OF SENATORS KENNEDY, JOHNSON AND GOLDWATER, 1957–1960

CHARLES H. GRAY

University of Canterbury, Christchurch, New Zealand

This article reports the results of a scale analysis of the votes cast by three prominent senators, two Democrats and a Republican, on legislative measures pending during the second term of the Eisenhower administration. My method employed the Guttman scaling technique1 to identify the ideological issues presented in the roll calls and to rank the senators according to the positions they took on these issues, looking separately at their records in the 85th and the 86th Congresses. My purpose was twofold: first, to distinguish objectively the differences in the public postures the three men assumed as they voted; and second, to look for movement in the stance of each as the 1960 campaign approached.

. 8

John F. Kennedy, Lyndon B. Johnson and Barry Goldwater came to the Senate at different times, with different backgrounds, by different routes, from different constituencies; they held different committee assignments and stood in different relationships to both the formal and informal structures of the Senate. Since 1960 their fates have taken equally diverse paths. Nevertheless, during the interval from 1957 to 1960 they had at least two relevant things in common: as senators together they were called upon to vote on the same succession of bills, amendments and motions; and they had their eyes on a nomination for the presidency.² Hence, their selection for this study. Of the three, Johnson, as majority floor leader, had the largest party responsibility for the legislative record on which-or against which—the presidential race would be run.

Guttman scaling, applied to a sufficient number of cases, enables a student to sort a set of roll call votes so as to eliminate systematically those that are only ambiguously related—or not related at all—to one or more governing ideological variables. And it identifies the variables at the same time that it produces a rank ordering of the senators' overall positions with respect to each. Accordingly, it is possible to delineate individual combinations of stands on distinct issues, as well as to note shifts that may occur with the march of events, as purposes or strategies alter.

¹ For Guttman scaling, refer to Samuel A. Stouffer et al., Measurement and Prediction (Princeton University Press, 1950).

² So did Nixon, the Republican nominee in 1960, as the event proved, but he could not make a voting record in the Senate over which he presided; so did Humphrey, but he had not the resources to put hinself in the same league with Kennedy and Johnson as aspirants.

The study on which this report is based analyzed all roll call votes in the Senate during the 85th and 86th Congresses covering the four years from 1957 through 1960.3 Of the 729 roll calls, 171 were dropped because of near unanimity, leaving 558. Of these, 393, or 70.4 per cent, were sufficiently clear in their ideological meaning to form items of twenty scales, ten for each Congress.

The number of scales is in itself significant. If American politics revolved around a single major cleavage, for instance a liberal-conservative cleavage, then roll call votes would by definition form one single scale or rank ordering of the senators from the most consevative to the most liberal. Analysis would be easier but life would be different. The senator who is pro-foreign aid, however, is not necessarily prolabor or pro-civil rights. Consequently, an accurate estimate of the ideological positions of any senator requires analyzing his position on each of a number of scales.

Of particular interest for comparing Kennedy, Johnson and Goldwater are the scales that represent continuing conflicts in American politics. Five such scales in the 85th Congress, and five also in the 86th, form pairs covering very similar content. Together they contain roughly two-thirds of the scale data. These continuing issues are: (1) Domestic Economic Welfare; (2) Agricultural Price Supports; (3) Civil Rights; (4) Military Foreign Aid; and (5) Internationalism.

Where did Kennedy, Johnson, and Goldwater stand on these persistent questions, and how did they rank in relation to each other and the rest of the Senate? Did their positions remain the same from one Congress to the next?

Ι

The Domestic Economic Welfare Scale of the 85th Congress deals predominantly with ³ Charles Howard Gray, Coalition, Consensus and Conflict in the United States Senate (1957-1960), Ph.D. thesis, University of Colorado, 1962.

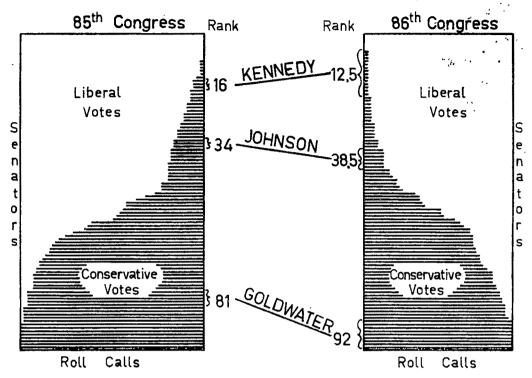

FIGURE 1. Domestic Economic Welfare Scales

issues that have separated economic liberals from economic conservatives since the days of Franklin Roosevelt, especially labor regulation and public housing. Their importance can be seen in the fact that sixty roll calls, more than the next three largest scales combined, fit this scale. The major labor issue (culminating in the passage of the Landrum-Griffin Act in 1959) was the effort of the conservatives to turn the reports of union corruption into legislation that would restrict union officials in the management of union funds and the conduct of union elections. Kennedy and Johnson both voted consistently with the liberals against such restrictions while Goldwater was equally consistent on the side of the conservatives. On one issue of interest to labor, Kennedy and Johnson differed: Kennedy voted for the extension and liberalization of the Unemployment Compensation Act while Johnson opposed it. On one public housing vote, an effort to increase the number of low-rent housing units, Johnson also favored the conservative position in opposition to Kennedy. Their differences on these two votes were sufficient to place Kennedy on the edge of what might be called the strong liberals and Johnson among the moderate liberals. From the pro-labor, pro-housing, liberal end of the scale Kennedy ranked 16th among the 96 senators, Johnson 34th and Goldwater 81st.

These relative positions on the major liberalconservative scale changed only slightly in the 86th Congress. Issues of interest to labor were again dominant though of somewhat different content: minimum wage, unemployment compensation, aid to depressed areas and jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board. Housing loomed as somewhat more important than in the 85th Congress, with numerous votes on public housing and urban renewal. The relatively new issue of medical care joined the list that marked the traditional liberalconservative split.

In the overwhelmingly Democratic Senate of the 86th Congress, Kennedy, if anything, became more liberal while Johnson moved closer to the middle, and Goldwater voted with the most extreme conservative group. These small changes put Johnson and Kennedy further apart. Though Johnson voted on the liberal side over 80 per cent of the time, he broke with Kennedy and the liberals on four roll calls that dealt with a withholding tax on income from interest and dividends, an increase in welfare authority of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, a limit on the investigating powers of the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice, and an increase in funds for urban renewal. In addition, it seems plausible to infer from the scale pattern that his absence from a vote on the unemployment compensation act could have been politically motivated. These differences produced a voting pattern placing Johnson at rank 38.5 in contrast to Kennedy's 12.5 and Goldwater's 92.

Johnson's relatively stable pattern as a liberal moderate is in sharp contrast to the marked shift of most Southern Democrats between the 85th and 86th Congresses. While twenty of the twenty-two Southern Democrats voted at least as liberally as Johnson in the 85th Congress, fourteen voted much more conservatively in the 86th Congress.

This extreme shift on a scale representing the major cleavage in American politics—corresponding as it does with a change from Republican to Northern Democratic pressure on civil rights—suggests that a sizeable portion of the Southern Democrats were modifying their votes on labor, housing, and welfare measures according to who supported their opposition to civil rights. This tactical switch does not apply to Lyndon Johnson who held to a moderately liberal position in both Congresses.

FIGURE 1 shows the scales indicating the liberal-conservative rank of the three senators relative to the rest of the Senate. The voting pattern as shown is simplified in that neither the absences nor the approximately 5 per cent of the votes that were inconsistent with the major pattern are included. Following statistical custom, when a number of senators had equal voting patterns, their ranks were averaged and the average was assigned to each. The number of senators whose ranks were so averaged is indicated in each case by a bracket.

 \mathbf{I}

A much smaller but persistent economic issue in the Senate which does not fit the liberal-conservative continuum is the question of agricultural price supports. On this scale Kennedy voted with those favoring high supports, Johnson took a moderately pro-position, while Goldwater voted with those seeking to cut or eliminate the program. Though this is not true of the Senate as a whole, the relative positions of the three senators are quite similar to their positions on the labor-housing-welfare scales. Figure 2 indicates their ranks on the ¹ Space does not permit a detailed description here of the roll calls fitting this or subsequent scales used in this report. Such a description, and the ranks of all senators, may be found in the study cited in the previous footnote.

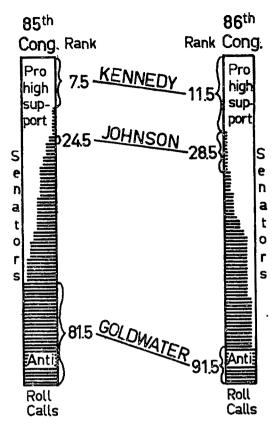

FIGURE 2. Agricultural Price Support Scales

Agriculture scales in the 85th and 86th Congresses.

Ш

The growing battle over civil rights produced the second largest set of scales, accounting for 18 roll calls in the 85th Congress and 38 in the 86th. Contrary to popular belief, a senator's voting position on civil rights bears no strong relationship to his position on the liberal-conservative continuum; i.e., laborhousing-welfare issues will not form a common scale with civil rights. Striking evidence of this fact is seen in the 85th Congress where most Republicans, including Goldwater, ranked closer to the apparent pro-civil rights end of the scale than either Kennedy or Johnson. Actually, Kennedy's position seemed somewhat ambiguous. On one vote he deviated from his general pattern by trying to save the provision of the Civil Rights Bill that would have allowed the Attorney General to institute civil actions for preventive relief in civil rights cases under the 14th Amendment. In general, however, he joined a majority of the Northern Democrats in shunning any but the mildest civil rights proposals. His position may have been part of a strategy aimed at getting votes for a cloture motion. The civil rights issue was entangled with the filibuster issue.

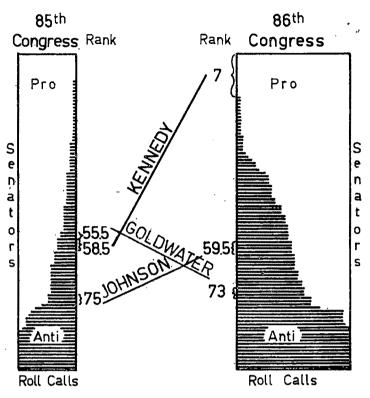

FIGURE 3. Civil Rights Scales

Goldwater was only slightly less hostile to strong measures. He did not join the Republican leadership in championing civil rights and so found himself temporarily in the odd company of Northern Democrats, his usual enemies.

Johnson, perhaps because of his anxiety to get a bill that could pass against a filibuster, took the most anti-civil rights stand of the three, though he broke with the hard core of the South and voted for the much weakened final bill and against Southern efforts to prevent its consideration.

The passage of the 1957 Civil Rights Act was only the opening round for the great civil rights debate of 1960 which consumed more hours of Senate time than any issue since the Smoot-Hawley Tariff of 1930. The major issue was the extension of the federal government's authority to guarantee voting rights. The influence of this major question probably produced the highly correlated voting pattern on some of the other issues which also fit the common scale—election reforms, the cloture rule, and Hawaiian statehood. A civil liberties issue, the loyalty oath required of students seeking funds under the National Defense Education Act, also fits the Civil Rights scale—whether by accident or because of an underlying ideological unity, cannot be determined by scale analysis.

⁵ For a detailed account of the struggle over the Civil Rights Act of 1957, and the strategies of the contestants, see the I. C. P. case study, Eisenhower, Brownell and the Congress (University of Alabama Press, 1964).

Positions of the parties and of the three senators changed more radically on this scale than on any other between the two Congresses. In the campaign year of 1960 the Northern Democrats took over as the champions of civil rights while most Republicans moved into the position just above the Southern Democrats.

The most dramatic shift was made by Kennedy, who with twelve other senators voted pro-civil rights on every roll call. While Kennedy moved from a moderately anti position to a strong pro position, Goldwater moved, from about the same starting point but in the contrary direction, to a spot just above the most die-hard Southerners. He differed from them by favoring statehood for Hawaii and in opposing efforts to block consideration of civil rights completely. Johnson, on the other hand, moved up the scale to the lukewarm position from which Kennedy and Goldwater had departed in opposite directions. Though voting in favor of the milder civil rights proposals, Johnson opposed most efforts to strengthen the federal government's hand in protecting voting rights. He also opposed invoking the cloture rule, and he differed from Kennedy on the lovalty oath question by opposing efforts to free students from the requirement of filing effidavits that they did not belong to specified subversive organizations. In all, Johnson ciffered from Kennedy on seventeen of the thirty-eight votes on the Civil Rights scale. The average ranks of the three senators and the changes between the two Congresses can te seen in Figure 3.

TV

Like civil rights, foreign policy votes do not fit the liberal-conservative scale. In fact, within the foreign policy field quite different voting blocs are produced when the issue shifts from foreign trade to military aid to support for international organizations. The latter two issues formed separate scales in both Congresses. The larger scale in both cases was one embracing primarily military foreign aid programs and to some extent reciprocal trade extension, the U. S. Information Agency, and the Antarctic and international atomic energy treaties.

On these issues Kennedy and Johnson took identical stands in both Congresses. They were moderately pro-foreign aid in the 85th Congress and both moved toward a stronger proposition in the 86th. Goldwater, on the other hand, generally favored large cuts in aid. He also voted against extension of the reciprocal trade program, thereby placing himself at the extreme anti-aid end of the scales.

In both Congresses most Republicans backed the Eisenhower Administration on foreign military aid, and in both Congresses most Southern Democrats opposed it; the 86th Congress alliance of Southern Democrats and Republicans on labor and civil rights issues did not extend beyond domestic affairs. The Military Foreign Aid scales are shown in Figure 4.

V

Forming distinct scales, separate from the military aid program, were various votes concerning the American commitment to internationalism. In the 85th Congress this scale was composed of roll calls on the Food for Peace program, a permanent U. N. police force, the U. N. emergency force in the Middle East, an international development authority, and an ambassadorial nomination. Kennedy supported the internationalist position on every vote and Johnson deviated from this pattern only on the seemingly peripheral issue of Scott McCleod's nomination as ambassador to Ireland. In contrast, Goldwater's straight nationalist stand was modified only by the fact that he was absent from three of the votes.

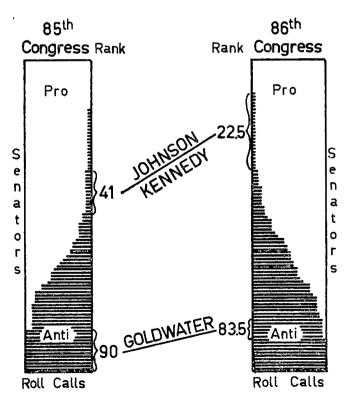

FIGURE 4. Foreign Military Aid Scales

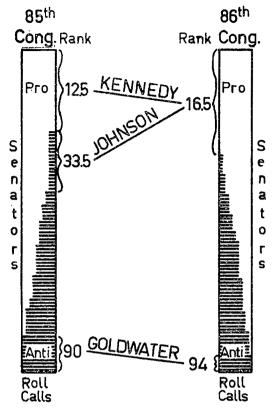

FIGURE 5. Internationalism Scales

The content of the internationalism scale in the 86th Congress varied somewhat from that of the 85th, though the Food for Peace program was common to both. Other items included contributions to the World Bank, international development funds, support of a convention of private citizens of NATO countries, and military support aid to Spain. The internationalists on this scale voted against aid to Spain, a stand consistent with the long association of anti-fascist and internationalist movements.

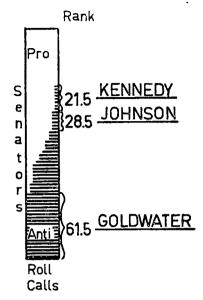

FIGURE 6. Public Power Scale, 83d, 84th, 85th Congresses

In the 86th Congress Johnson joined Kennedy to support the internationalist position on every vote, while Goldwater voted with equal consistency for the nationalists. Figure 5 shows the senators' ranks on these scales.

VI

Thus far we have dealt only with ideological issues that were prominent in both the 85th and 86th Congresses. An issue which, though not salient in both these Congresses, has frequently recurred in American politics is the controversy over private or public power development. Using somewhat similar scaling techniques, Francis Carney has obtained a Public Power scale covering the 83d, 84th, and 85th Congresses. This scale included votes on TVA, and the Niagara, Hell's Canyon, and Columbia River power projects. Of the 71 senators who served throughout this period. Kennedy had an average rank of 21.5 from the pro-public power end of the scale; Johnson, differing from Kennedy on one vote, ranked 28.5; and Goldwater, voting against public power on every occasion when he was present, ranked 61.5. These ranks are shown in Fig-URE 6.

⁶ Francis M. Carney, "Ideological Groupings in the United States Senate, 1953–1958, as Indicated by Scale Analysis," unpublished monograph, University of California, Riverside. From the foregoing analysis John Kennedy as a senator emerged as a strong supporter of liberal labor, housing, and welfare programs, a moderately strong backer of public power programs, an advocate of high agricultural price supports, an active though recent convert to civil rights legislation, a moderately strong backer of foreign military aid, and a firm incernationalist.

Barry Goldwater appears the exact antithes:s to Kennedy on the labor-housing-welfare scale, and on the farm price support, public power, and internationalism scales. He also strongly opposed the foreign military aid program. On civil rights he moved from a moderate negative position to one just slightly above the hard-core Southerners.

Lyndon Johnson, though between Kennedy and Goldwater on the domestic economic scales, was much closer to Kennedy, emerging in 1960 as a moderate liberal. In the area of foreign policy, Johnson moved from a moderate to a strong internationalist position equal to Kennedy's. In the area of civil rights, however, Johnson was closer to Goldwater though he moved toward a moderate position in the 86th Congress.

In the role of president, Kennedy seems to have acted quite in accord with the positions he adopted in his last two years in the Senate. This does not justify a prediction that any other senator, if he became president, would necessarily do the same. The vastly different demands on the president, his national responsibilities and constituency could easily modify the ideological image he developed as a senator. It is an old adage that a platform is something to get in on, not to stand on; and an ideological posture may be adopted calculatingly as well as compulsively. The scaling and ranking data presented above indicate pretty clearly that the lure of the presidency exerts a magnetism. as the time for nominations approaches, capable of altering the public stands that senators, qua senators, have previously taken on issues with an ideological content.

AN APPROPRIATIONS SUBCOMMITTEE AND ITS CLIENT AGENCIES: A COMPARATIVE STUDY OF SUPERVISION AND CONTROL

IRA SHARKANSKY Florida State University

This paper presents an effort to adapt techniques of content analysis and measurement to the study of relations between a House appropriations subcommittee and the agencies whose budget estimates it reviews. Since Arthur Macmahon's pioneering work on the topic observers have depended on interviews and impressionistic readings of the published record for their evidence.1 They have identified a variety of attitudes on the part of the committee members, ranging from the obsequious to the pugnacious. And they have noted various techniques of committee control and agency compliance or evasion. They have also expressed varying opinions about the efficacy and utility of congressional oversight.

The existing literature leaves at least one question partially unanswered: how does the subcommittee divide its supervisory and control efforts among the agencies within its jurisdiction? This study deals with this question, and illustrates a method that may have wider application in the systematic study of legislative-executive relations. Limitations of my own confine it to a sample consisting of a single subcommittee—headed by Congressman Fogarty (D., R.I.)—four agencies under its jurisdiction, and a span of budget years from 1949 to 1963.²

¹ Arthur W. Macmahon, "Congressional Oversight of Administration: The Power of the Purse," Political Science Quarterly, Vol. 58 (June and September, 1943), pp. 161-190; 380-414. See also Warner Schilling, "The Politics of National Defense: Fiscal 1950," in Schilling et al., Strategy, Politics and Defense Budgets (New York, Columbia University Press, 1962), pp. 1-266; Edward Banfield, "Congress and the Budget: A Planner's Criticism," this REVIEW, Vol. 43 (December, 1949), pp. 1217-1228; Elias Huzar, The Purse and the Sword (Ithaca, Cornell University Press, 1950); Seymour Scher, "Conditions for Legislative Control," Journal of Politics, Vol. 25 (August, 1963), pp. 526-551; Aaron Wildavsky, The Politics of the Budgetary Process (Boston, 1964); Richard Fenno, "The House Appropriations Committee," this REVIEW, Vol. 56 (June, 1962), pp. 310-324.

² Calendar years 1948 to 1962. A given budget (or fiscal) year (e.g., 1963) begins for the subcom-

I. SUBJECTS

Experience with an earlier study identified the Fogarty Subcommittee as a body that shows a high regard for compiling a "complete public record" about its annual review of agency budget requests. Although the subcommittee members do not rely solely on the hearings for their information about agency operations, they try to collect for the record all the information they consider pertinent to their budget decisions.3 In this way, they say, they hope to make it relatively easy for other congressmen and interested members of the public to evaluate the subcommittee's budget recommendations. Much of the information the members elicit at the formal hearings they have already reviewed independently. Moreover, the members also show some genuine dependence on the annual hearings as a source of information. Subcommittee and agency staff aides report that members generally confine their administrative-oversight activities to the period of the hearings. Between the passage of one appropriations act and the next year's hearings there is little direct contact between subcommittee members and agency officials. The subcommittee staff maintain contact with the agencies during the year, but much of this is in preparation for the formal hearings. Because most of the data for this study come from the published record, the "records orientation" of the Fogarty Subcommittee was an important factor in its selection.

The Fogarty Subcommittee has a reputation for being generous in granting funds to the agencies within its jurisdiction,⁴ but this may not bias the relationships with the agencies that are the subject of this study. There is no necessary connection between generosity in appromittee with the opening of hearings in the early months of calendar 1962. Dates in this study are in terms of budget years.

² For a member's comment to this effect, see House Appropriations Subcommittee on the Departments of Labor and Health, Education and Welfare, Departments of Labor and Health, Education and Welfare Appropriations for 1959: Hearings, 85th Cong., 2d sess. (Washington, G.P.O.), p. 201.

4 Wildavsky, op. cit., p. 87.

priations, and a posture of laxity or severity in the subcommittee's supervision and control over agency operations. Also, a comparison of Fogarty subcommittee members with other members of the Appropriations Committee over the 1949-63 period indicates that the subcommittee members are not atypical in two respects that might affect their supervisory and control efforts. Their skills for the tasks of supervision and control—as measured by their pre-congressional occupations and length of service both in congress and on the Appropriations Committee—and their positions on political issues—as measured by their voting record on the New Republic's index of domestic liberalism5—score much the same as those for the Appropriations Committee as a whole.

The four agencies that provided the sample for this study are the Children's Bureau (CB), the Office of Education (OE), the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) and Howard University (HU). These agencies have remained within one administrative unit (at first, the Federal Security Agency, then the Department of Health, Education and Welfare) over the 1949-63 period, and they represent various phases of H.E.W. activity. CB and OE are disseminators of grants-in-aid, concerned with

⁵ See Donald R. Matthews, U.S. Senators and Their World, (New York, 1960), pp. 276-78.

⁶ On the basis of pre-congressional occupations, the members of the Fogarty subcommittee appear somewhat less able, on the average, to deal with ecmplex technical and political matters than other members of the Appropriations Committee. During the 1949-63 period, only 70 per cent of the subcommittee members came from occupations that would suggest a high level of relevant skills (i.e., law and other professions, journalism and politics), while 81 per cent of all Committee members came from these fields. The difference in skill-potential disappears, however, if long experience in Congress or on the Appropriations Committee can make up for an unimpressive occupational background. Subcommittee members have had more experience in both areas: 78 per cent of them in the 1949-63 period entered Congress before 1950, while only 63 per cent of all Appropriations Committee members entered so early; and 60 per cent of the subcommittee members joined the Appropriations Committee before 1950, in ecmparison to only 51 per cent of the entire comm_ttee.

During the period of the study, subcomittee members voted in accord with the New Republic's conception of domestic liberalism 48 per cent of the time, while the full committee voted that way 42 per cent of the time.

health and welfare, and education respectively. FDA is a regulatory agency concerned with health. HU is one of the units in the Department that has special status as a "Federally Aided Corporation." The sample agencies also differ greatly in the amounts of their recent appropriations requests, in increases in requests over the past decade, and in demonstrations of independence toward the supervisory and control efforts of the subcommittee. Each of these characteristics may have an impact on subcommittee-agency relationships.

The sample agencies are entirely civilian. Secrecy was not a significant obstacle to an observer's reliance on published records, as it might be in the case of agencies involved with military or international activities.

II. MEASUREMENTS

This study relies almost exclusively on an analysis of subcommittee hearings, subcommittee Reports and agency budgets. Interviews served only a secondary role, as a means for clarifying and checking relationships perceived in the published records. Some distinct benefits derive from such a heavy reliance on published materials. The raw data are widely available in federal depository libraries for any student who wishes to test the findings on the same data, or on similar data about the behavior of other actors. Furthermore, problems of rapport between interviewer and informant do not bias the data collection. Although faulty schemes of classification may bias the use of published records, the basic materials remain unmarred, and the student can reclassify them as he proceeds.

The primary task in analyzing quantitatively the contents of published documents is their reduction to units that "make sense" as valid indicators of certain behavioral traits. This may be a formidable task. The records relevant to the present study include monetary data, workload data, prose statements, questions and answers. No single codification could meet all the analytical needs. The literature on content analysis provides some guidance in the development of techniques, but it contains little beyond some general principles, and highly specialized operations useful only in a limited number of problem areas. Since one of the cardinal principles states that the nature of the research problem and the available data are crucial in determining the techniques that are fruitful and feasible, a great deal is left to the inventiveness of the student.⁸

⁷ In the last year of the study's time span, the agencies' requests were: OE, $598 million; CB, $80 million; FDA, $28 million; HU, $13 million. Over the period 1951-63, the percentage increases in budget requests were: OE, 2120; FDA, 565; CB, 335; HU, 280. A comparative study of the agencies' budget strategies vis à vis the subcommittee revealed that OE was generally the most aggressive toward the subcommittee, HU was generally least aggressive, while CB and FDA fell in the middle range. See Ira Sharkansky, "Four Agencies and An Appropriations Subcommittee: A Comparative Study of Budget Strategies," Midwest Journal of Political Science (forthcoming).

The concept of "administrative oversight" has many facets and it is necessary to devise measures that will accommodate its components. Subcommittee supervision may vary in the attention paid to agency operations, in the thoroughness of supervision and in its incisiveness. Variations may also be observed in the efforts of subcommittee members to make independent investigations of agencies—as opposed to inquiries that rely on the cooperation or cues of agency officials. Among types of formal control efforts—publicly recorded—subcommittee adjustments of appropriations may be distinguished from the directives written into committee Reports. Measures can be defined that indicate the variation in each of these factors shown by subcommittee behavior vis à vis particular agencies. The product of the analysis accordingly will be a profile of overt administrative oversight, showing the relative severity of supervisory and control efforts directed at each agency.

(1) A count of individual questions directed at witnesses from each agency provides a gross measure of the attention the subcommittee members devote to the affairs of each agency. A "question" is defined here as a unit of discourse that includes one inquiry. At times, a sentence ending in a question mark may include several inquiries. In making this analysis, each distinct inquiry was regarded as a separate question. Also, some statements not followed by a question mark were so defined when they seemed to be treated as such by the participants in the hearing, e.g., when they elicited a reply from a witness, or when a following statement indicated they were meant to be inquiries.

⁸ See Bernard Berelson, Content Analysis in Communications Research (Glencoe, 1952); Robert C. North, Content Analysis (Evanston, Northwestern University Press, 1963); Harold Lasswell, ed., Language of Politics (New York, George Stewart Press, 1949); and Ithiel de Sola Poole, ed., Trends in Content Analysis (Urbana, University of Illinois Press, 1959).

The score for each agency in Table I represents the mean number of questions asked by subcommittee members during hearings in the odd years from 1949 to 1963.

(2) The proportion of agency activities covered by subcommittee questioning provides a measure of the thoroughness with which the subcommittee supervises each agency. Making this measure operational involved two complex tasks: (a) defining the field of activities encompassed by each agency; and (b) defining a level of questioning that is "minimum coverage" of an activity.

The Annual Reports of the agencies, budget statements read at the opening of each year's hearings and New York Times articles about the agencies provided a list of their activities. A preliminary effort to code the members' questions into their subject-matter categories resulted in a redefinition of this list. It became evident that some closely related categories could be combined, while some additional categories were necessary to accommodate distinctions in the minds of legislators and administrators.⁹

Plainly, Congressmen cannot question thoroughly every agency activity during each year's hearings. In measuring "coverage," therefore, it is necessary to use a double standard that considers an item to be covered if it receives either frequent attention at a fairly low level of intensity, or less frequent attention at a higher level of intensity.¹⁰

While coding the questions, it became evident that individual inquiries may have a latent, as well as a manifest content. That is, the context of some questions suggests that they might have several meanings to either the interrogator or the respondent. Congressmen frequently leave qualifying nouns or adjectives out of their verbiage, making it necessary

⁹ For a list of the categories used, see Ira Sharkansky, "Four Agencies and An Appropriations Subcommittee: A Comparative Study of Budget Relations," unpublished Ph.D dissertation, University of Wisconsin, 1964, ch. 3.

10 This study defines an item as "covered" if it received mention in 5 per cent of the questions directed at the agency over the odd years 1949-63, or in at least 10 per cent of the questions in one year's hearings. Admittedly, "coverage" of an activity is a rough measure of thoroughness. It does not mean that the subcommittee members give their attention to every issue and ramification related to an item.

¹¹ See Alexander L. George, "Quantitative and Qualitative Approaches to Content Analysis," in Ithiel de Sola Poole, ed., op. cit., pp. 7-32.

TABLE I, AGENCY SCORES ON MEASURES OF SUBCOMMITTEE SUPERVSION AND CONTROL

Measure		Agency Score
Measure	OE	СВ	FDA	HU
1. Subcommittee attention:
Mean number of questions asked each agency, odd years 1949-63	321	159	123	104
2. Subcommittee thoroughness:
Percentage of items receiving "minimum coverage," odd years 1949-63.	45	58	57	64
3. Subcommittee incisiveness:
(a) Percentage of questions asking witnesses to justify activities, odd years 1949-63	. 39	29	37	22
(b) Percentage of questions asking witnesses about cost, odd years 1949-63	21	24	18	44
4. Independence of supervision:
(a) Difference between mean percentage of questions about items highlighted in cues and the mean percentage of questions about all agency activities, 1951, 1957, 1963	+3	+6	+8	+10
(b) Ratio of questions asked department to questions asked agency, 1961, 1963	1:4	1:6	1:8	1:9
5. Control over expenditures:
Median difference between original agency requests and subcommittee recommendations, 1959-63 (in millions)	-$31	-$1	-$9	$5
6. Control via Committee Report:
Number of directives about agency affairs in Committee Reports of 1951, 1957, 1961	17	5	2	9 to infer their referents from the surrounding context. Questions that could refer to several items accordingly were coded into as many categories as their contents—manifest and latent—seemed to require. This appeared safer then attempting the doubtful procedure of deciding what was "uppermost" in the minds of the actors.

i3) The frequency with which subcommittee members ask agency witnesses to justify their activities, and the frequency with which they ask about the cost of agency operations provice two crude measures of the relative incisiveness with which the members supervise agencies. Each of these question-types are probes. Justification questions call on agency officials to go beneath the surface to explain the need or utility of specific budget requests, while cost questions impose the discipline of calculation on administrators. The data in Table I represent the percentage of questions asked in odd years 1949-63 that were "justification questions" and "cost questions."

(4) Two measures provide indices of the relative independence with which the subcommittee supervises each agency: (a) the frequency with which members avoid a reliance on agency cues while fashioning questions at the annual hearings; and (b) the frequency of questioning about agency affairs directed at witnesses outside the agency itself. The significance of an inquiry into the subcommittee's independence derives from the realization that members are hard pressed for time and staff assistance to be used for administrative oversight. Because of this, they frequently rely on the agencies themselves to provide cues about the items worthy of questioning. The items that tend to attract members' attention are those highlighted in agency budget documents, and in the opening statements read by the lead-off agency witness. By questioning an item that is expensive, or that has changed markedly in cost from the previous budget, or one that is featured in an oral statement, 12 subcommittee members can

¹² Agency officials as well as subcommittee members perceive these as cues that will elicit Congressional questioning. Agency budget officers write the opening statements for the hearings, knowing that these are the final communications legislators will receive before questioning agency witnesses. And they know that large items, or items showing a marked change from the previous budget tend to attract attention. One of the considerations in requesting funds for an activity feel they are examining something that is "important" in some sense. An index of subcommittee non-reliance on agency cues to items worthy of questioning should stand as an indication of the members' independence in going beyond a superficial examination of the agency's presentation. In order to construct this index, it was first necessary to list the activities given prominence in the agency presentations.13 The difference between the mean percentage of questions referring to the items highlighted in agency statements or budgets, and the mean percentage of questions asked about all activities was then computed. The greater the incidence of questions directed at items emphasized in the agency's presentations, the less is the subcommittee's independence.14

An index of the subcommittee's attention to non-agency sources of information about agency affairs gives another indication of the legislators' independence in going beyond a superficial examination of the agency's presentais, "How will it look?" If a request might appear out of place, it may be postponed in part, or divided into smaller pieces and distributed among inconspicuous budget headings. See Wildavsky, op. cit., ch. 3.

13 This study considers an item to be emphasized in the opening hearing statement of an agency if it is mentioned in at least 10 per cent of the statement's lines. An item is of "large absolute magnitude" if it is at least 20 per cent of the agency's total request. An item has shown "significant change" if it has shown an absolute increase or decrease of $200,000 since the last budget, or a percentage change amounting to 10 per cent of the total change in the agency's budget.

14 For example, suppose that the items emphasized in the budgets and statements of each of two agencies received mention in a mean 10 per cent of the subcommittee's questions, and that in the case of one agency, all its activities-both those emphasized and unemphasized-received mention in a mean 5 per cent of the questions. The index of subcommittee non-reliance would then be 10 minus 5, or 5. If in the second agency's case all activities received mention in a mean 8 per cent of the subcommittee's questions, the index of subcommittee non-reliance would be 10 minus 8, or 2. The congressmen would be showing less reliance on the cues of the second agency. The data for this analysis came from the hearings of 1951, 1957 and 1963, chosen because they fall near the beginning, middle and end of the period studied.

tion. While it is not practical to measure the subcommittee's attention to each non-agency source of information, it is possible to gauge the relative attention to non-agency witnesses who testify at the annual hearings. These include the Department Secretary and his aides, interest group spokesmen and other congressmen not members of the subcommittee. The best available measure of subcommittee attention to outside sources of information is the ratio of questions about each agency directed at the Department Secretary and his aides, to the questions directed at the agency witnesses during the same year's hearings. This measure is suitable because subcommittee members have an opportunity to question the Secretary and his staff at length about each agency. In contrast, the members have little opportunity to question interest group spokesmen, or non-subcommittee congressmen about the agencies that attract few or none of these witnesses.15

(5) A comparison of each agency's request for funds, and the appropriation recommended by the subcommittee provides a measure of the legislators' attempts to impose controls over agency operations by means of adjusting the level of expenditures. In this study, the measure is defined by the median difference be-

15 Because the Department Secretary and agency officials share an identity with the Administration, it might be said that the Secretary and his staff are not sufficiently independent of the agencies to be considered "non-agency" sources of information. Yet there are significant budget disputes between agency and departmental personnel. Department officials report in formal hearings and in interviews that agencies typically demand more funds than the department can allow them. From the agency view, the department is a brake against desirable expansion. Over the 1959-63 period, the department budget office reduced the requests of our sample agencies by $290.8 million, or 11 per cent of the agencies' original requests. In the hearings, departmental witnesses have been critical of agency operations. In contrast, none of the interest groups or non-subcommittee congressmen testifying in the odd years 1951-63 criticized agency operations. They either supported agency requests, or urged the replacement of budget cuts made by the department Budget Office or the Bureau of the Budget. The data for the analysis of subcommittee questioning of non-agency witnesses came from the hearings of 1961 and 1963, chosen because it has only been in recent years that the legislators have paid significant attention to non-agency witnesses.

TABLE II. AGENCY RANKINGS ON MEASURES OF SUBCOMMITTEE SUPERVISION AND CONTROL

Measure	Agency ranking
	OE	СВ	FDA	HU
1. Subcommittee attention	1	2	3	4
2. Subcommittee thoroughness	4	2.5	2.5	1
3. Subcommittee incisiveness
(a) Justification questions	1	3	2	4
(b) Cost questions	3	2	4	1
4. Independence of supervision
(a) Non-reliance on agency cues	1	2	3	4
(b) Questioning non-agency sources	1	2	3	4
5. Control over expenditures	1	4	2	3
6. Control via Committee Reports	1	3	4	2
Mean ranking	1.6	2.6	2.9	2.9

tween the agency's request and the subcommittee's decision over the years 1959-63.16

(6) The subcommittee includes in its Reports directives about each agency's operations. A count of these provides a measure of control efforts by means of verbal instructions. The Reports used for this analysis are those written in 1951, 1957 and 1963.17

Table I provides the raw scores for each agency on the measures covered in the foregoing discussion. Table II provides the rankings for each agency on the various measures. In each case, the top rank of (1) indicates that an agency has been the subject of the most severe supervisory or control efforts.

Table I demonstrates the substantial differences in severity that mark the supervision and control efforts of subcommittee members toward agencies within their jurisdiction. However, Table II suggests that the subcommittee is not consistent in the degree of severity it maintains with respect to each agency. For instance, the Office of Education tends to receive a generally more severe treatment than the others dealt with—as defined by the mean ¹⁶ It was only in these years that information about the agencies' original budget request to the Department Budget Office was included in the hearings record.

¹⁷ These years were chosen because they fall near the beginning, middle and end of the research span.

rankings—but this is the only distinction among the agencies that is prominent across several measures. Somewhat less prominent is the finding that the Children's Bureau is treated more severely than the Food and Drug Administration and Howard University.

The Office of Education may receive greater attention than the others because its budget is substantially greater and has increased more rapidly. Or, the attention paid to OE may come as a result of its record of being more adventurous than the others in its disregard for subcommittee directives. A comparative study of agency behavior established that OE, among those covered, was most likely to evade questions asked by subcommittee members at the hearings, and most likely to disobey specific prohibitions that Committee Reports and appropriations acts imposed on policy. The subcommittee devoted a secondary level of supervisory and control efforts toward CB, and this agency scored second to OE in budget magnitude and aggressiveness vis à vis the subcommittee.18

The greater attention shown to OE and CB may not represent a conscious decision by the subcommittee members, so much as a subtle attraction to the affairs of agencies that are more prominent than others in the public eye. Just as the legislators are most likely to question items that are salient in the agencies' budgets or their witnesses' statements, so they may gravitate without design to more severe supervisory and control efforts for prominent agencies that spend much money and receive much political attention. My comparative study of agency activities demonstrated that more interest groups and non-subcommittee congressmen testify on behalf of OE than the other sample agencies, and that budget statements of the Department Secretary and the President devote more space to OE activities than to those of other units. CB was in second place on each of these measures. An analysis of representative news media might also reveal that they pay more attention to the affairs of OE and CB than to the others.19

¹⁸ Sharkansky, "Four Agencies and an Appropriations Subcommittee: A Comparative Study of Budget Strategies," op. cit.

19 Ibid.

Another finding indicated by Table II is that each of the sample agencies receives the brunt of rather severe supervision on some dimension of subcommittee activity. The Children's Bureau scores second highest in the average number of questions and cost questioning; the Food and Drug Administration scores second highest in justification questioning, and Howard University scores highest in the proportion of items covered by questioning, and in cost questioning. This may suggest that subcommittee members try to probe all agencies in at least some respect. They may be "fishing" for instances of errant administrative behavior, or trying to put the fear of discovery into the minds of any administrators who might contemplate a deviation from subcommittee wishes.

III. CONCLUSIONS

This study provides some systematically collected data about the behavior of an appropriations subcommittee in its dealings with four agencies. Evidently, the legislators vary their oversight activity among agencies. They devote more than the average amount of supervisory and control efforts to the agencies that spend the most money, whose requests have increased the most rapidly, and whose behavior toward the subcommittee has deviated most frequently from subcommittee desires. In a sense, they allocate their time and staff assistance to agencies most "in need" of supervision and control. If disproportionate attention to this type of agency is typical of legislative-executive budget relations, then it may be said that the legislators maximize their resources for oversight.

Beyond these specific conclusions, the study has shown the practicality of using content analysis of appropriations hearings to devise indexes of Committee behavior—crude indexes, to be sure, but sufficient to support objective rankings along various measures of attitudes and activities.

CONSENSUS AND CLEAVAGE IN BRITISH POLITICAL IDEOLOGY*

JAMES B. CHRISTOPH The Ohio State University

One of the most perplexing questions to students of politics since the mid-1950s has been whether western societies are now approaching, or have reached, a condition called 'the end of ideology." Numerous answers have been propounded, both by those who regard such a development as desirable and by those who view it with disquietude. But difficulties have arisen because exponents of one view or the other have had recourse to markedly different, and often shifting, concepts of the terms "ideology" and "end." If this important controversy is to be saved from sterility, social scientists must both reflect more upon the nature of the terms employed and descend from the level of sweeping cultural generalizations to examine the condition of ideology in particular political settings.

It is my purpose here to try to shed some light on the debate by surveying the state of political ideology in present-day Britain from the standpoint of two different uses of the term. My position is that if we adopt one view of ideology, we find that British politics are profoundly non-ideological; but if we define the concept in different but still meaningful terms, we discover that in fact it does play an important role in the British system. In other words, by compressing extant concepts of ideology into two distinct molds we may be able to fashion tools for judging the ideological condition of countries such as Britain. These I will designate the Weltanschauung and the "attitude structure" versions of the term.1

The first refers to the more traditional meaning of ideology, the alleged decline of which has occasioned the debate of the past decade. It has been characterized as a "comprehensive, consistent, closed system of knowledge, to which its adherents turn to get answers to all their questions, solutions to all their problems." Its connotations are familiar: commitment (both intellectual and emotional), orientation toward action, distortion or simplification of reality, hostility to critics and opponents, and goal-orientation (often of the millennial variety). Perhaps its best-known paradigms are classical Christianity and classical Marxism.

* A paper delivered at the annual meeting of the American Political Science Association, Chicago, September, 1964.

¹ For discussion of the varieties and uses of the concept, see David W. Minar, "Ideology and Political Behavior," Midwest Journal of Political Science, Vol. 5 (November, 1961), pp. 317-31, and Robert E. Lane, Political Ideology (New York, 1962), ch. 1.

² Herbert J. Spiro, Government by Constitution (New York, 1959), p. 180.

The conception of ideology as attitude structure is more difficult to set forth because it falls short of the total belief system and tight logic of a "world view." Like a Weltanschauung, it partakes of a generalized view of man; it has moral and normative content; it "places" the individual in relation to his fellows; and it calls forth commitment and points to desirable actions. It consists of many separate but related attitudes which function to relate, and give meaning to, the different political events experienced by the individual. On the other hand, this concept of ideology is less apt to provide its holders with a total explanation of life or a full vision of human destiny. It is more earthbound, culture-bound and diffused, both in its sources and its scope. Ideology in this sense refers to a more or less institutionalized set of beliefs about man and society.3 It is likely to be a composite of prevailing generalized views of man, the goals that he does and should seek, the means he uses to achieve them, the outlook for progress under present or alternative institutions, and so forth. Because such an ideology may have many sources, it is less likely than the "big" world views to be intellectualized, comprehensive, systematic or consistent, and more likely to be fragmentary, limited, even inconsistent. Yet when political man operates with reference to this organized bundle of views, he may derive from it some of the certainty and security that accompany a commitment to fuller, better articulated ideologies. While undoubtedly many would reject this use of the term, it is noteworthy that most of those who have attempted to measure the presence and effects of ideology in the Anglo-American polity have favored this definition, or one similar ³ Milton Rokeach et al., The Open and Closed Mind (New York, 1960), p. 35.

⁴ Among them Angus Campbell, Philip E. Converse, Warren E. Miller, and Donald E. Stokes, The American Voter (New York, 1960), ch. 9; Herbert McClosky, "Consensus and Ideology in Without attempting here to defend my preference for viewing ideology in this two-fold way, I would assert that an awareness of the distinction is necessary for any exploration of the state of ideology in Britain today. In addition, I make two other assumptions that need to be stated explicitly. First, I am assuming that the pertinent kind of ideology for this discussion is one with a fairly direct political implication, i.e., one which relates to questions involving the relations of rulers and ruled and the principles of governnce. While these aspects of ideology may be torn from a larger context (general belief systems), no attempt will be made to delve into such related problems as the psychological functions served by the holding of ideologies. 5 Second, I proceed on the assumption that a country's ideology is not wholly concentrated among its intellectuals and political leaders, but in a participant political culture like the British also operates in and is expressed by the lives of "average people." For this reason, it will be necessary to examine (in Lane's terms) both forensic ideologies—the articulated, differentiated, well developed political arguments put forth consciously by the elite and latent ideologies—the loosely structured and often unreflective statements of the common man-and to see how they relate to each other.

I. THE REJECTION OF TOTAL IDEOLOGY

The kind of ideology associated with a complete world view emerged and flourished under certain historical and social conditions. Many of these conditions were indeed present during the period from the seventeenth to the nineteenth centuries, the so-called "age of ideology," just as they appear to be present today in a number of the new developing countries.

American Politics," this Review, Vol. 58 (June, 1964), pp. 361-82; Robert E. Lane, op. cit.; and S. E. Finer, H. B. Berrington, and D. J. Bartholomew, Backbench Opinion in the House of Commons, 1955-59 (Oxford, 1961), chs. 2-3. Cf. Bernard Crick, In Defense of Politics (Chicago, 1962), p. 50: "Politics is an activity and so cannot be reduced to a system of precise beliefs or to a set of fixed goals. Political thinking is to be contrasted to ideological thinking... the idea of an ideology of freedom is a contradiction in terms."

⁸ For an example, see M. Brewster Smith et al., Opinions and Personality (New York, 1956).

⁶ Frederick M. Watkins, The Age of Ideology—Political Thought, 1750 to the Present (Englewood Cliffs, N. J., 1964).

⁷ Paul E. Sigmund, Jr., The Ideologies of the Developing Countries (New York, 1963).

Ideology in this sense seemed to flourish especially in societies that experienced the upheavals of modernization in violent and concerted forms—that pitted classes and religious groups against each other in passionate struggle, that aroused a strong sense of deprivation among underdogs and losers, and that fragmented the community into subcultures alienated from the value patterns of the dominant political system. Put another way, total ideologies were most likely to gain ground in societies with political systems that failed both the test of effectiveness (success in solving the problems put onto them) and the test of legitimacy (widespread agreement on their propriety).8 Where these conditions are lacking, or disappearing, it has been argued, ideology of this variety cannot really flower. Recent critics have extended the argument to read that when a society achieves modernity (seen as a matter of industrialization, urbanization, secularization, economic prosperity, middle class expansion and working class access to political power), then the passionate attachment to total ideology not only subsides, but becomes dangerously dysfunctional to the system.9

I have no desire to put an oar into the choppy seas of this latter controversy. My point is simply that Britain has not provided the conditions favoring the growth of this kind of ideological thinking. The British have shown a marked disinclination to take up total ideologies for a host of reasons, many of which are familiar and only a few of which can be mentioned here. ¹⁰ In the past three hundred years

⁸ Seymour Martin Lipset, Political Man (Garden City, 1960), chs. 2-3.

Notable examples are Daniel Bell, The End of Ideology (Glencoe, 1960); S. M. Lipset, "The Changing Class Structure and Contemporary European Politics," Daedalus, Vol. 93 (Winter, 1964), pp. 271-303, and Political Man, pp. 403-17; Otto Kirchheimer, "The Waning of Opposition in Parliamentary Regimes," Social Research, Vol. 24 (1957), pp. 127-56; and Mark Abrams, "Party Politics After the End of Ideology," in E. Allardt and Y. Littunen, Cleavages, Ideologies and Party Systems (Helsinki, 1964), pp. 56-63.

10 "The term 'ideology' is not in very good odour in serious political discussion in this country, except in purely historical or descriptive connections. The grounds of the distaste for the term centre around the feeling, perhaps, that an ideology is something totalitarian in tendency, or at least involves an uncompromising fanaticism inappropriate to liberal democracy of the British type." Bernard Williams, "Democracy and Ideology," Political Quarterly, Vol. 32 (Oct.-Dec. 1961), p. 374.

Britain has avoided, or seriously blunted, the traumatic revolutions that many other countries have undergone, and the main changes in its political, economic and social systems have cccurred gradually. The mounting demands of cisadvantaged groups have been met in a piecemeal way, with the result that with the exception of the Irish (whose fate was finally settled by truncation) no major group has failed to be integrated in some way into the political systam. As is well known, neither the communists nor the fascists have gained substantial followings or political leverage. The non-revolutionary character of the British working class is equally well known; and while a distinct working class subculture may exist, as Williams and Hoggart have argued, it does not involve working class alienation from the values of the poltical system. 11 Social mobility in Britain may not be as great as elsewhere, but it has always been present and visible, and with the postwar changes in the educational system and the rapid expansion of white collar occupations, most Britons see it as increasing.

Another explanation for the lack of enthusiasm for total ideologies is imbedded deep in British political culture: it is the much-cited attechment to precedents and usage in preference to the logic of rational blueprints. In a system where there is widespread agreement on fundamental institutions and on a considerable range of current policies, it is possible to operate without continual reference to eternal verities, large schema, or articulated belief syst∈ms. The tendency to settle issues on the basis of accepted usages and through the means of implicit "understandings" is indeed great, to the frustration of those who plump for a fuller rehearsal of arguments or an enlightening confrontation of basic doctrine. Whether the scurce of this political style is the common law tradition, the evolutionary character of the British constitution, the norms of parliamentary and bureaucratic behavior, or the social homogeneity of the ruling elite is impossible to ascertain, and really beside the point. Political styles develop from many sources. They are bound to be both causes and effects of other phenomena. What can be asserted is that British political leaders have become habituated to thinking in terms of concrete problems and familiar responses; and that this-when coupled with a general complacency toward the outputs of such behavior-serves as a barrier, a disincentive, to the adoption of total ideologies. Thus, however circular the logic may seem, the British tend to be immune to extreme ideological views because they have not been used to thinking along these lines, and they have no strong motivation to abandon the habit.

The point can be put more strongly. Pragmatic norms in Britain have been elevated into something approaching a national cult—so much so, I would argue, that we can speak without sophistry of an ideology of pragmatism, which serves as a foil to the ideology of total ends. For many Britons pragmatism is not simply a descriptive term for the way they approach or grapple with political problems; it is also a particularly British virtue and an object of pride, which they would not trade for what they consider to be the inflexible, irrevocable, and inhumane (in the sense of denving the variety of human nature) qualities of this or that "world view." Thus pragmatism easily becomes imbued with nationalistic affect, and preference for it is supported by other values into which Britions are socialized. The content of this socialization is both positive and negative in character: positive in the sense that Britons learn, both from formal teaching and from informally picking up the views of those around them, that the success and stability of the British parliamentary system is due in large part to the pragmatic frame of mind displayed by its practitioners; and negative in the sense that they also learn that the turbulent, unstable and often grotesque pattern of Continental politics derives from the European habit of looking at the world through the distorting spectacles of total ideologism. What they have learned may be a caricature, but it has had consequences. It has, for example, affeeted the British Labour Party's relationship with the European socialist movement; it has been partly responsible for the lack of enthusiasm for venturing too fully into experiments in European integration, and undoubtedly it has helped strengthen Britain's relationships with the United States and the older Commonwealth—peoples reputed to be fellow pragmatists under the white skin.

These conditions, and many more, add up to a general climate in which the total ideological structuring of politics is difficult to achieve. The skeptic might counter that the case has yet to be proved, that these generalizations are no more than the accumulated clichés of historians and journalists, who have selected their examples to suit their preconceived case. Fortunately, political scientists have begun to amass more empirical data bearing on the subject and tending to confirm these assertions. Thus far, to be sure, no one has made a comprehensive, systematic exploration of the distribution of ideological propensities among the British people or the political elite. We have, for example, no British counterparts of the extensive surveys of political attitudes made by the Michigan Survey Research Center and by McClosky, Prothro and Grigg, or of the intensive psychoanalytical probing by Lane into the political ideologies of a handful of east coast residents. Nevertheless, in the past several years a small number of rigorous empirical studies of the character and distribution of British political attitudes have appeared, and in an indirect way they offer evidence as to the role of ideology in contemporary British political thinking, both at the mass level and among political activists.

¹² Raymond Williams, The Long Revolution (London, 1961); Richard Hoggart, The Uses of Literacy (London, 1957).

If it can be shown that the mass of Britons are not alienated from the system in which they live, that they look tolerantly on those who hold different political beliefs, and that they tend not to be polarized on policies presumed to be highly charged with ideological affect, then we can reasonably conclude that total ideology has not taken hold of them. And if we can demonstrate further that this same pattern prevails among the political elite as well, we will have further confirmation of the generalization.

Data on Alienation. In an ambitious crossnational survey carried out in 1959, Almond and Verba found that the British ranked comparatively low on social and political alienation and high on willingness to trust and cooperate with other people. For example, 84 per cent of the British sample agreed with the statement, "Human nature is fundamentally cooperative," compared to 80 per cent of the Americans, 58 per cent of the Germans and 55 per cent of the Italians. Another query designed to measure generalized trust ("Most people can be trusted") drew affirmative replies from 49 per cent of the British, 55 per cent of the Americans, 19 per cent of the Germans, and five per cent of the Italians.13 Almond and Verba not only find in the United States and Britain a widespread belief that people are basically cooperative, trustworthy and helpful; they also show that in these countries social trust is translated into politically relevant trust, thus reducing the alienation of people from the system. From spontaneous and unstructured responses to another survey question designed to test emotional attachment to certain aspects of the nation, the same investigators found that the features mentioned as objects of pride most frequently by Britons were their country's governmental and political system (46 per cent), its social legislation (18 per cent), and its position in international affairs (11 per cent). (Only three, one and two per cent, respectively, of the Italians who were asked the same question named these areas as objects of pride. They chose instead the physical attributes of their country [25 per cent], contributions to the arts [16 per cent], and "nothing" [27 per cent].)14 These are admittedly fragments of indirect evidence, but they seem to point to the presence in Britain of the kind of social and emotional climate in which total ideologies are not apt to flourish.

¹² Campbell et al., op. cit.; Herbert McClosky, op. cit.; Herbert McClosky, Paul J. Hoffman and Rosemary O'Hara, "Issue Conflict and Consensus Among Party Leaders and Followers," this Review, Vol. 54 (June, 1960), pp. 406-27; James W. Prothro and Charles M. Grigg, "Fundamental Principles of Democracy," Journal of Politics, Vol. 22 (May, 1960), pp. 276-94; Lane, op. cit.

¹³ Gabriel A. Almond and Sidney Verba, The Civic Culture (Princeton, 1963), p. 267, Table 4.

Intensity of Partisanship. A related consideration is the strength of partisan feeling that runs through a country. If we assume that in the modern state the political party is likely to be a major channel for the expression of ideological thinking, then one would expect to find in countries characterized by Weltanschauung politics a high degree of hostility among one party's followers toward rival partisans. Here again, recent surveys of British attitudes show this to be far from the case. While the images of their own and the opposite party's supporters held by Britons are somewhat sharper and more polarized than in the United States, they fall far short of intense hostility. Almond and Verba did find that 28 per cent of Conservative party supporters, and 29 per cent of Labour party supporters, believed that "selfish people" support the opposite party; that nearly one-fourth of the Conservative respondents viewed Labourites as "ignorant and misguided," and that 10 per cent of the Labour respondents characterized Conservatives as "militarists and imperialists." On the other hand, almost no followers of either party (three per cent in each case) accepted the view that the followers of the other were "betrayers of freedom and welfare."15 Furthermore, when asked the hypothetical question, "How would you feel if your son or daughter married a supporter of the Labour (Conservative) party?"; only 12 per cent of Conservatives and three per cent of Labourities expressed displeasure at the thought of intermarriage, and 87 and 97 per cent, respectively, professed indifference.16

¹⁴ Ibid., p. 102, Table 1.

¹⁵ Ibid., p. 126, Table 2.

¹⁶ Ibid., p. 136, Table 8.

An even stronger indication of the tolerance of the British electorate toward political opponents is found in the results of the survey made in 1960 by Mark Abrams for Socialist Commentary magazine. On the basis of that poll, Abrams reported that ... between 40 per cent and 50 per cent of Labour supporters thought that the Conservatives could dc as well as their own party in standing for the nation as a whole, in giving fair treatment to all races, in respecting British traditions, and in working for world peace and against nuclear war. Of those who opposed Labour, at least 40 per cent were prepared to describe Labour as equally qualified with the Conservatives in giving fair treatment to all races, working for peace, and opposing nuclear war.¹⁷

The same survey revealed that supporters of both parties, as well as uncommitted voters, when asked to choose the characteristics they looked for in a good party leader, picked identical traits in the same order and nearly the same degree—the top three being strong leadership, willingness to make unwelcome decisions, and honesty and sincerity.¹⁸

Policy Attitudes. This tendency toward doctrinal flexibility within the electorate can also be demonstrated by referring to policy attitudes which, in view of their historical importance to the parties, are apt to be imbued with considerable ideological affect. Consider the concept of nationalization, which for many years was linked by the Labour movement with the ideas of economic rationality and social equality, and which was painted by Conservatives as the epitome of economic tyranny and socialist inefficiency. The Socialist Commentary poll found "no homogeneous, blanket attitude toward public ownership," and concluded that "views on this subject are apparently not the outcome of either blind faith or blind rejecticn."19 When asked to assess the condition of the nationalized industries, Conservative and Labour voters made practically identical judgments, discriminating mainly on the grounds of performance rather than ideology. For example, among Conservatives favorable attitudes toward public ownership exceeded unfavorable ones for four of the industries (electricity, gas, atomic energy and the airlines), while more Labour supporters termed the nationalization of coal and the railways a failure than a success. Eighty-four per cent of Conservatives and 58 per cent of Labourites expressed themselves as opposed to any further nationalization. Finally, when asked more generally how much government regulation of industry they thought was necessary, 10 per cent of the Conservatives and only 18 per cent of the Labourites chose "a good deal," while at the other pole 25 per cent of the Conservatives and 10 per cent of the Labourites replied "practically none." Majorities in both parties accepted the need for a fair amount of regulation, and within each there was goodly support for the "wrong" ideological position on this issue.²⁰

Low tension between party supporters also tends to characterize foreign policy attitudes. This is borne out by the analysis made by Davis and Verba of British mass opinions during the period 1947-56 on selected foreign policy issues, many of them presumed to be vested with ideological affect. The polls they examined dealt with respondents' orientations toward the following issues: internationalism, armament, colonialism, the choice between the United States and the Soviet Union, European alliances, the Far Eastern policy.21 On only 13 per cent of the questions was there a low degree of interparty agreement, as compared with 59 per cent high agreement; and had the Suez crisis not been included, the interparty differences would have virtually disappeared. Davis and Verba conclude that "for the most part adherents to any one political party generally express the same sorts of opinions on international issues as adherents to another party; and a high degree of unity within a party is not so much evidence that the party tends to unify the sentiments of its supporters as that it expresses the sentiments of a highly unified nation."22

Insofar, then, as the attitudes of the mass public reveal the extent of ideological modes of thinking, these varied data show not only that a good deal of pragmatism does prevail, but also that the conditions associated with the politics of total ideology—distrust of and hostility to opposing views, a considerable alienation from societal values, and marked polarization on policy questions—are not characteristic of contemporary Britain. It is still conceivable, of course, that these attitudes are not shared by the elite among political activists, and we must

¹⁷ Mark Abrams, Richard Rose, and Rita Hinden, Must Labour Lose? (Harmondsworth, 1960), p. 19.

E8 Ibid., p. 25.

¹⁹ Ibid., p. 31.

²⁰ Ibid., pp. 31, 35-36.

²¹ Morris Davis and Sidney Verba, "Party Affiliation and International Opinions in Britain and France, 1947–1956," Public Opinion Quarterly, Vol. 24 (Winter, 1960), pp. 590–604.

² Ibid., p. 601.

now turn briefly to an examination of this possibility.

Again it must be noted that full and systematic data on the basic beliefs of British political leaders are lacking.²³ Nevertheless, several important studies of elite opinion in Britain have appeared recently. They indicate that ideological views at this level too, while more substantial and coherent than within the general public, are not especially prevalent and tend to keep conflict within manageable bounds. The studies that I shall cite here are those of constituency party attitudes and backbench opinion in the House of Commons.

For some time it has been assumed that the real seat of ideologism in the British political system is the parties' constituency associations. The argument runs something like this: while the top parliamentary leaders of the major parties must blunt any ideological tendencies they might have, for electoral reasons as well as because they are dealing with the realities of governing, the activists who man the local parties are not under these constraints and thus are more likely to be involved in politics for reasons of ideological principle. They work zealously for their party not to advance their own careers, but to further the abstract principles in which they believe passionately. They are more likely to be purists or extremists, more reactionary than the national leadership if they are Conservatives, more radically socialist than the national leadership if they are Labourites. Several demonstrations of this pattern appeared in the 1950s, notably the continuing support for Bevanism in the constituency Labour parties and the stiff punishment meted out to leftward deviating Conservative M.P.s by Conservative associations when their Members failed to support the government on issues such as capital punishment and Suez.24 These gave the impression that the constituency parties are apt to be composed of die-hard, dogmatic, irresponsible ideologues, who are neither representative of grassroots partisan thinking nor, unless they are kept at arm's length from policy-making, assets to responsible party leadership.

²³ Herbert McClosky's studies of the ideological differences between political leaders and the electorate in the United States, for example, have no British counterpart. "Consensus and Ideology in American Politics," loc. cit.

²⁴ Leon D. Epstein, Britain—Uneasy Ally (Chicago, 1954), chs. 5-7; Epstein, British Politics in the Suez Crisis (Urbana, 1964), ch. 6; and Nigel Nicolson, People and Parliament (London, 1958).

This argument has some validity, although a closer look at the local parties shows it to be quite exaggerated. In a painstaking study of resolutions sent by local parties to the annual conferences from 1955 to 1960, Rose has shown that the image of local parties "as a force constantly pressing extremist views upon national leaders" is overdrawn.²⁵ He found, for example, that the total proportion of resolutions containing ideological elements was 54 per cent, while the remaining 46 per cent dealt with nonpartisan questions of little ideological content-expressing mainly views derived from general cultural values or specific interest group demands. Furthermore, most of the resolutions Rose classifies as ideological were simply in line with the standard programs of the parties (e.g., concerning support for or opposition to the present organization of secondary education, the need for or danger of more economic planning, and so on) and were a far cry from the categories of total ideology. Rose also analyzed the resolutions for their "extremism" content, i.e., whether they deviated markedly from the prevailing doctrine of the party in the direction of purism. He found that in the period in question 66 per cent of Conservative and 38 per cent of Labour associations had submitted no extremist resolutions whatever; while in 11 per cent of Conservative and 18 per cent of Labour associations, over half the submitted resolutions were of this variety.26 Rather than finding these attitudes to be geographically concentrated in a few constituency parties, however—which might function as party subcultures—Rose determined that they were randomly distributed around the country. So he concluded that there is much less hot partisanship in the local parties than has been thought, and that the supposed doctrinal differences between these parties on the one hand, and either rank and file party voters or parliamentary leaders on the other, are really not great.

We have also recently been given a glimpse of the attitude structure of the House of Commons in the research of Finer, Berrington and Bartholomew of Keele University.²⁷ Recognizing that strict party discipline and caucus decision-making have made it virtually impossible to penetrate behind the unified ranks of the Division List into the real attitudes of individual M.P.s, the Keele group turned instead to an analysis of another expression of parliamentary opinion—the Early Day Motion which is both publicly available and amenable to statistical treatment. Motions of this type can be made by any M.P. and customarily are signed by those who agree with their expressed sentiments-occasionally as many as 300 Members. They are rarely debated, and support for them is not subject to the party whip. By tradition they are never signed by the Government or its Whips, and seldom by members of the Opposition front bench; hence their description as "spontaneous unwhipped backbeach manifestoes." Obviously any study of these motions is subject to the difficulty that these expressions are often casually made and ar∈ not always representative of total parliamentary attitudes. Still, when examined in quantity they afford a rough-and-ready profile of one type of leadership attitudes.

²⁵ Richard Rose, "The Political Ideas of British Party Activists," this REVIEW, Vol. 56 (June, 1962), p. 364.

²⁶ Ibid., p. 366.

²⁷ S. E. Finer et al., Backbench Opinion, op. cit.

The Keele study focused on nearly 300 Early Day Motions signed by Labour and Conservative M.P.s from 1955 to 1959. They included 111 cross-bench motions and 178 motions signed by members of a single party, again revealing the absence of watertight exclusiveness among dedicated partisans. On the Labour side, the study showed—both in the subject of the motions and in the extent of their support -a fairly unified set of concerns and positive correlations between different attitudes. Thus on the seven sets of attitudes which the authors group as "the syndrome of socialism"—humanitarianism, civil liberties, foreign policy, welfare, cost of living, health and education-all attitudes were correlated, on the average, to the degree of .267.28 But when examined separately, as pairs, these attitudes showed marked differences in their distribution among various types of M.P.s (such as trade-union sponsored, cooperative sponsored, and constituencyparty supported Members). In particular, a group of about fifty Labour M.P.s consistently supported all the motions with maximum zeal, forming "the permanent core of the otherwise fluctuating Left." In the judgment of the Keele group, the data from the Early Motions bear out the view that British socialism, at least as represented by Labour backbenchers, does not repose on a single coherent universalistic body of coctrine but instead is better described as "a set of propositions or attitudes, which when all or many of them are simultaneously held, constitute socialism."29

The Keele group's data for the Conservatives tend to confirm the impression that it is extremely difficult to find clear-cut ideology or even persistent left-center-right factions in this party. While positive correlations were established among a few issues (e.g., attitudes toward Suez policy and penal reform, social progressivism and concern for civil liberties, devotion to national sovereignty and attachment to the Commonwealth), numerous ideological inconsistencies emerged: e.g., many Conservatives displayed enthusiasm for both social reform at home and militant policies abroad, for both world government and intervention in Suez. In contrast to the attitudes of Labour backbenchers, those of the Conservatives did not scale statistically and could only loosely be termed a syndrome. If these data are persuasive, then apparently the average Conservative M.P. does not approach his tasks from a prepared emotional or intellectual position, but rather, as the Keele group has put it, "the Conservative party acts or thinks as unrelated, ad hoc groups of Members, groups whose members join together to contend for one specific objective, and then fall apart once the goal has been attained or has been by-passed by events."30

II. THE EQUILIBRIUM OF CONSENSUS AND CLEAVAGE

If Britain lacks the normal concomitants of the politics of total ideology, she is not altogether free of the pull of ideology in the second sense that I have used the term. The British political system manifests certain important beliefs which, though they do not add up to a Weltanschauung, nevertheless embody values and principles of action connected to larger views of man, society and the state. These attitudes, however general, affect the functioning political institutions, and substantial changes in them, when they occur, are likely to be reflected in the balance of the political order. I have mentioned a few of them in the preceding section, in the context of an effort to deny the grip of sterner doctrines on the British people. For example, it seems quite clear that two ideological elements which facilitate democratic politics—a relatively optimistic and trusting view of human nature, and a measure of toleration of political opponents—have a firm place in present British attitudes. In this section I will discuss briefly several more of these elements and show not only some of their consequences for politics, but also some recent additions to more firmly established, historic beliefs. Finally, I will attempt to give the character and flavor of various recent challenges to this bundle of attitudes. No attempt can be made here to present a comprehensive inventory of such beliefs, or to offer empirical evidence of their distribution, salience or intensity.

²⁸ Ibid., pp. 56-58.

²⁹ Ibid., p. 48.

My argument is not only that certain attitudes in Britain fulfill the functions of an ideology; it is also that they serve as forces making for a balance between consensus and cleavage in the political system. Obviously these attitudes may be deeply held by some Britons and only casually by others. But the overall effect is the maintenance of a moving balance between general agreement on some values and well distributed disagreement on others—the conditions Parsons refers to as a "limited polarization of society."³¹

Consensus. To illustrate both the persistence and changing character of the political belief system, four ideological elements will be cited as fundamentally consensual in nature: the conception of governmental leadership, devotion to procedures, "pragmatism," and the "new feudalism." The first three have been constants in British thinking for many decades, while the last-named has entered the consensual stage only recently.

Britons are widely agreed that the principal duty and task of government is to govern: however important it may be in this age to couple the authority of government with a substantial measure of mass participation, the more populistic elements should not be allowed to paralyze the powers of the Crown. This attitude is a mixture of predemocratic attachment to the notion of a natural ruling class and a recognition that democratic government requires stable and responsible leadership, on the one hand, and a commitment to mass participation and the control of governmental experts and elites by amateurs and non-elites, on the other hand. Its importance as an attitudinal underpinning of political behavior cannot be overestimated. Perhaps the most striking characteristic of the modern British parliament is its provision and maintenance of a stable majority that permits the government to rule legitimately. Numerous informal institutions which facilitate the conduct of parliamentary business, such as Cabinet hegemony, party discipline and the circumscribed powers of backbench M.P.s, can be linked directly to a general acceptance of the need for strong leadership. This is not simply the ideology of the political elite, for the norm pervades British society in a wider sense. For example, respondents to Socialist Commentary's 1960 poll, when presented with a list of 15 possible characteristics of a good party leader, opted most for "strong leadership" (56 per cent) and "strength to make unwelcome decisions" (47 per cent). Conservative and Labour supporters showed no significant difference in their preference for these qualities.³² No evidence suggests any weakening in this attitude in recent years; on the contrary, if anything it seems to be increasing in its pervasiveness.

³¹ "Voting and the Equilibrium of the American Political System," in E. Burdick and A. J. Brodbeck, American Voting Behavior (Glencoe, 1959), p. 92.

The flavor of ideological commitment attaches also to the place of procedures in the British polity. Whereas they may display flexibility and a willingness to bargain over the content of public policy, the British often show an unbending dogmatism in regard to the process by which policy is established. As Eckstein has aptly observed, "... the British invest with very high affect the procedural aspects of their government and with very low affect its substantive aspects; they behave like ideologists in regard to rules and like pragmatists in regard to policies."33 Numerous examples of this disposition might be cited. The intricate fabric of rules, formal and informal, that bear on the conduct of Parliament has shown amazing resistance to reform, despite the enlarged scope of governmental activity and the agitation for more efficient methods coming from both inside and outside Westminster. Many of them have developed their own mystique and are approached by M.P.s of almost every stripe as akin to absolute values. Interest groups are likely to refuse to accept policies affecting them if they have not been consulted during their formulation. The parties have shown themselves willing to examine critically, and often to abandon, a number of their historic policies; but almost invariably they have held firm in their attachment to time-honored procedures, which are seen as fundamental agencies of legitimation. Thus, the closer it came to actual power, the more the Labour Party divested itself of its radical system-reformers and stressed its adherence to the traditional rules of the game. Conceivably it was their acceptance of the ideology of parliamentarism as much as their growing middle class character that made Labour leaders palatable to large numbers of non-socialists in the electorate.

When important procedural questions on occasion become mixed with arguments over the substance of policy, the temperature of politics r_ses appreciably; or, alternatively, disputes over procedure tend to elbow out those over content. The heated Commons debates at the time of the Suez crisis are a case in point. A sitting of the House had to be suspended by the Speaker because of an uproar caused by the refusal of the Prime Minister to answer what Labour M.P.s believed to be a legitimate parliamentary question (whether the country was or was not at war with Egypt),34 and almost as much criticism was leveled at Eden for allegedly not consulting with his own parliamentary supporters and the leader of the Opposition on government plans as was directed against the wisdom of his decision to take military action.35 A concentration and fixity of dogmatic concern tend to attach to this one aspect of the political system, then, even if they do not carry over into other areas equally.

³² Must Labour Lose?, op. cit., p. 25. These were multiple responses.

³³ Harry Eckstein, A Theory of Stable Democracy (Princeton, 1961), pp. 30-31.

A third component of this ideological structure, also deeply embedded in British political culture and high in affect, is the concept of pragmatism, already noted. It has come to be shorthand for the belief that sweeping change is unnecessary and dangerous, that effective change is that which comes gradually and builds on, rather than obliterates, previous forms and practices. The test of any institution or any policy, accordingly, is not its esthetic form or logical consistency but its success in performing the fairly immediate task for which it is designed. Anomalies and loose ends are no problem. The rhetoric of British politics is filled with tributes to this mode of thinking (e.g., "Britain is ruled not by logic but by Parliament" [Disraeli]; "Logic is a poor guide compared with custom" [Churchill]), and no description of the working of basic institutions, from the City of London to the University Grants Committee, seems complete without the proffered explanation that "It may seem ocd to you, but it works."36 Pragmatism is bred into the bones of modern Britons by a self-conscious celebration of its virtues and an insistence that it serve as the most suitable guide to political decision-making.

³⁴ 558 House of Commons Debates 1620-25 (Nov. 1, 1956). For more discussion of the significance of the procedural aspects of the crisis, see Richard Rose, Politics in England (Boston, 1964), pp. 232-33.

³⁵ Epstein, British Politics in the Suez Crisis, op. cit, ch. 5; Robert T. McKenzie, British Political Parties, 2d ed. (London, 1963), pp. 585-89.

³⁶ Anthony Sampson, Anatomy of Britain (London, 1962), passim.

The attachment to larger principles may often be modified or supplemented by an equally intense belief that translation of these principles into practice should take pragmatic form. The policies adopted by the two major parties toward nationalization and colonialism are illustrative of this tempering. Not only did Labour go slow in implementing the social ideal of public ownership when the party came to power in 1945; it also devoted much of the 1950s to a reappraisal of the place of nationalization in its program, with the resultant deemphasis-but nct extinction-of the older ideal. Conversely, traditional Conservative opposition to nationalization did not prevent the party when in power from retaining in the public sector most of the industries nationalized by its predecessor. Again, though dedicated to ending colonialism and raising the remaining outposts of empire to self-governing status, the Labour Government began gradually by concentrating on the Asian flank, and left to succeeding Conservative governments the continuation of the process, step by step, in Africa and the Caribbean. The defense of these actions, as with nationalization, has been largely in terms of the kind of pragmatic outlook that Britons understand and approve.

Pragmatism, then, is closely related to other basic beliefs—in stability, in peaceful solutions in mixed institutions, and in the legitimating effect of gradual change. It serves as a brake on rapid, root-and-branch societal transformation. In practice, it may also have the effect of reinforcing a preference for amateurs (who are presumed to be more pragmatic in their outlooks) over specialists and technicians (who are thought more likely to be narrow dogmatistsin Keynes's famous jibe, "slaves of some defunct economist"). As I will show very shortly, critics may be found to argue that pragmatism has been raised into a dangerous cult which the country can no longer afford to perpetuate; but of the pervasive hold of pragmatism on British political thinking there can be little doubt.

These three elements of consensus—belief in leadership, attachment to procedures, and pragmatism—have been present in British political culture for many years. Nevertheless, the composition of the bundle of attitudes that comprise the ideology is not static or immutable. As society changes and the role of government is modified, basic attitudes are also likely to undergo transformation. One of the most important recent ideological adjustments involves changing attitudes toward the private and public spheres of British life. These newer attitudes, sometimes referred to as "the new feudalism," parallel ideologically the development of the welfare state and the highly controlled economy. They are attitudinal adjustments to the new balance of social forces created by corporatist developments in the polity, which have given to many private groups what amounts to veto power over public policy. The vast responsibilities now thrown onto government can be carried out only if important affected groups in society agree to go along. By withholding capital, talents or cooperation such groups could make a shambles of any government's program. The requirements of this quasi-corporatism evoke the danger that Britain might reach what Samuel Beer has called the point of "pluralistic stagnation."37 One reason why this has not yet materialized is that, as Beer has noted, the Keynesian revolution in economics succeeded after the Second World War in altering popular ideas about the role of government and the pursuit of unlimited private gain. In particular, the almost complete acceptance of the neo-mercantilism associated with Keynesian doctrine, which gives to government the role once played by Adam Smith's "invisible hand," provides new standards for judging group values, demands and behavior. In a sense the ethic of bargaining has displaced what has remained of the ethic of competition, and personal acquisitiveness has given way in large measure to the search for security guaranteed by the community. Put another way, despite the powers of blackmail inherent in the position of interest groups in British society today, the potentialities of this power have generally been held in check by a consensus derived in part from the recognition of governmental responsibility for maintaining the economic equilibrium and in part from the decline of acquisitiveness in favor of the more medieval standard of just rewards. The acceptance of a national incomes policy, for example, depends upon the pervasiveness of this attitude.

Cleavage. Along with these consensual elements, other basic attitudes divide the British community and foster some degree of ideological tension. Some of the forces making for cleavage are built into the political party system; others are less organized and function as generalized outside pressures. Broadly speaking, this constitutes the distinction between party competition on the one hand and intellectual criticism on the other. I shall deal first that the country has gone so far as to reach the point of moving with unanimity or not at all." Samuel H. Beer, "Pressure Groups and Parties in Britain," this REVIEW, Vol. 50 (March, 1956), pp. 15-16.

with ideological differences between and within the two main parties and second with the challenges to the prevailing ideology from the outsiders.

In spite of the growing trend toward interparty agreement on many policies, the Conservative and Labour parties continue to espouse somewhat different conceptions of human nature, society and the state. Their ideological centers of gravity are distinct, and to the extent that activists and supporters are socialized into the historic norms of the parties, significant differences between them will remain. Even when they are forced to support similar programs, it is often for basically different reasons. The ideologies of the parties do not function solely as symbols and myths; they are potentially operative (so long as they have not atrophied completely), and on occasion they fix the boundaries and direction of policy decisions. For Conservatives, the belief in the naturalness and usefulness of inequality, the inevitability of hierarchy, and the positive values of nationalism and empire may have been muted by the necessities of Britain's contemporary situation, but it has not been abandoned in favor of a wholly different value system. Similarly, Labour's attachment to the values of equality, social democracy, classlessness and pacifism, while also tempered by the exigencies of the moment, has remained fairly fixed. As a motivation and a standard for political action, it has not declined to the level of cynical rhetoric. So long as this ideological gap between the parties continues to be perceived by their partisans—and I believe that at the moment it still is-talk of the politics of Tweedledum and Tweedledee is premature.38

In addition, each party has within its ranks militant individuals and groups concerned with preserving the party's doctrinal purity and historic values. The persistence of such forces, which may or may not take the form of factions, cannot be disregarded as strictly of nuisance value, for they often represent ideological cleavages within the electorate as well. As ideological pressure groups within the party's structure they may serve to set limits beyond which the leadership ventures at its peril. The Labour Party has long been beset by internal doctrinal cleavages, which not only affect the struggle for leadership but create an image with the electorate. During the 1950s and early 1960s, for instance, the party was almost constantly engaged in internecine disputes between left-wing factions and the dominant right-wing leadership. The splits that occurred over the Bevanite view of socialist priorities, over German rearmament, over the status of the commitment to nationalization, and over nuclear disarmament are familiar examples. In each case the disagreement turned at least in part on the question of how strictly the party should adhere to the historic body of doctrine known as "socialism" and "socialist foreign policy." And while the Attlee-Gaitskell forces were usually successful in fending off the leftwing accusations that they had betraved the fundamental tenets of the Labour movement, the leadership could not afford to be wholly impervious to the substantial body of opinion represented by the Beavanites and their successcrs. Nor, as the disputes over the party's constitution and over nuclear weapons revealed, was the moderate leadership able to subjugate the radical wing so completely as to foreclose the possibility of a resurgence of doctrinaire opinions within important sections of the party. When Gaitskell attempted after the 1959 election defeat to persuade the party to amend Clause IV of its constitution in the direction of virtually eliminating the commitment to nationalization, he was set upon not only by the left but also the center of the party, and forced to beat a hasty retreat. The controversy over Clause IV showed convincingly that the ideological reflexes of the party are not atrophied, and that electoral calculation has nct completely replaced them as the mainsgring of Labour's program.39

³⁸ One study asserts that only a decided minority of the electorate seems to be able to appraise the ideologies of the parties in any meaningful way. Donald E. Stokes, "Ideological Competition of British Parties," paper given at the annual meeting of the American Political Science Association, September, 1964.

The Conservative Party is much more homogeneous than Labour in its social composition, its relation to outside groups, and its public loyalty to its leadership. But it is not altogether free of ideological dissension. It has its stalwart and reformist elements, who occasionally succeed in moving the party in one direction or the other, often on the basis of very different views of man and society. These forces are apt to take a rather different form from their counterparts or the Labour side. Whereas in the Labour Party the usual instrument of ideological dissension is the faction, a stable set of politicians organized for political activity, the more common form among the Conservatives is what Rose refers to as a "tendency," a stable set of attitudes expressed in Parliament by less organized, more fluctuating groups of politicians. Thus as the Keele study of backbench opinion made clear, the Conservative leadership has encountered significant internal party opposition on a number of issues invested with ideological affect, such as crime and punishment, colonialism, and the maintenance of free enterprise (e.g., public vs. private television). However, the M.P.s who pressed dogmatic views on these issues did not form a stable group but tended to fall apart and regroup along different lines when other controversies arose. Single issues, such as the Suez crisis, may split Conservatives into right, left and center groups, with strong ideological disputation between the extremes; but continuing factionalism, with the risk of intra-party polarization, runs counter to the traditional Conservative belief in loyalty to the chosen leadership. The Conservative Party, like Labour, shows both consensus and cleavage on ideological questions. Unlike the pattern in the Labour Party, the Conservative balance is skewed strongly in the direction of consensus, with ideology generally secondary to more tangible interests.

The overall picture of the condition of ideology in Britain shows, therefore, a continuing mixture of consensus and cleavage, of attitudes making for stability and attitudes fostering change. These attitudes are not distributed uniformly through the population or within the political system; but neither are they polarized in separate groups, and they coexist at almost every important level of political structure. In sum, the process of government rests upon a combination of strong commitment and lowtemperature pragmatism. "If too much principle can kill a government," Eckstein has observed, "so can the lack of principle at all . . . what is wanted is 'programmatic' government, and this must of necessity blend principle with pragmatic adjustment."40 The prevailing distribution of attitudes in Britain goes some distance to satisfy this condition.

Critics. The content of British political attiudes has not escaped criticism, especially in the era of the Common Market. If the 1950s were the heyday of the angry young men of letters, the early 1960s spawned a number of critics concerned with the condition of the nation's political values. Some of them, notably the so-called "New Left" and the marching and squatting foes of nuclear weapons, are in the long tradition of radical protest in Britain. Although their targets are contemporary, their moral and social values are not markedly different from those of the 1930s.41 Rather than focusing on this fairly familiar pattern of outgroup protest, I shall concentrate on another group of critics whose concern is less singleminded and whose methods are less spectacular than the "angries" of the traditional left, but whose belief that the nation's values are dangerously outdated is equally strong. I refer to those intellectuals who are devoted to exposing the alleged loss of Britain's élan vital and to pleading for the modernization of basic attitudes as well as institutions.

⁴⁰ Harry Eckstein, op. cit., p. 33. In a sophisticated analysis bearing on this point, Harvey C. Mansfield, Jr., has distinguished between parties and compromises based upon the concepts of consensus and program. "Party Government and the Settlement of 1688," this Review, Vol. 58 (December, 1964), pp. 933-46.

³⁹ For further examples, see Richard Rose, "Farties, Factions and Tendencies in Britain," Pclitical Studies, Vol. 12 (February, 1964), pp. 33-46.

This unorganized group of critics, whom Henry Fairlie has termed disdainfully "State of England" writers, is difficult to fit into ready-made political categories. It numbers, among others, several right-wing Labour M. P.s, a couple of leftish Oxford economists, a few mildly left-of-center journalists, a professor of government known mainly for works on France, the industrial editor of the Financial Times, and Arthur Koestler. 42 What they have in common is a reformist outlook, born of disillusionment with the tenacity of certain historic British attitudes in the postwar world. This has led them to strike out without discrimination against left and right alike-in Crosland's phrase, "the conservative enemy," wherever found. Because they share this motivation, their chief ideas can be lumped together for convenience without serious distortion, so long as it is remembered that what follows is a composite of themes scattered in many writings.

⁴¹ For the views of these groups see Norman Birnbaum, "Great Britain: The Reactive Revolt," in Morton A. Kaplan (ed.), The Revolution in World Politics (New York, 1962), pp. 55-68, and Henry J. Steck, "The Re-emergence of Ideological Politics in Britain," Western Political Quarterly, Vol. 18 (March, 1965), pp. 87-103.

⁴² Thomas Balogh, "The Apotheosis of the Dilettante," in Hugh Thomas (ed.), The Establishment (London, 1962), pp. 72-115; Brian Chapman, British Government Observed (London, 1963); C. A. R. Crosland, The Conservative Enemy (London, 1962); "Suicide of a Nation?," Encounter, July, 1963, especially the articles by Albu, Altrincham, Cole, Shanks, and Shonfield; Anthony Sampson, op. cit.; Michael Shanks, The Stagnant Society (Harmondsworth, 1961); and John Vaizey, Britain in the Sixties: Education for Tomorrow (Harmondsworth, 1962).

Underlying these critics' attack is the non-Marxian assumption that what ails Britain is not so much its material conditions or its new place in the world as its cultural attitudes. "We are faced," Koestler writes, "with a 'functional' rather than a 'structural' disorder. Structural diseases have objective, material causes, functional diseases have subjective, psychological causes."43 It is a lack of dynamism, of incentives (in more than the pecuniary sense), of social discipline bred by a sense of community, that lies at the root of the malaise. The aftermath of empire, the decline of Britain's power in world affairs, the effects of the welfare state, the challenge of new Europe-all are but proximate causes; the real sources of the present difficulties lie deeper, in attitudes toward society and government which stretch back into British history. Paradoxically, it is said, it has been the almost unbroken character of British development, its vaunted evolutionary stability, that now holds back the creation of the types of modern attitudes so badly needed. Having been spared the upheavals of radical social revolution, the interruption of its political regime, the destruction of its land and economy, and the psychological trauma of invasion and alien rule, Britain has not been forced to agonize over, or to reconstruct, its fundamental values. In the view of many of these critics, the very traits so much admired by outside observers-the blending of the pre-industrial and the modern, the conscious preservation of aristocratic institutions, the taste for new wines in old bottles-have unfitted the country for the tasks of survival in a rapidly changing world.

It is hardly surprising that one of the targets of this line of criticism is the alleged historicism of the British, their compulsive fixation, as one writer has put it, on either the glories or the miseries of the past. The consequence in both cases is a retreat into unreality, frustration and passivity. All too many Britons remain, it is asserted, who hanker after the day when Britannia was top-dog and could solve any problem by sending a gunboat. While Suez was supposed to be their lesson, they have refused to hearken to it. More important, others refuse to believe that Britain can learn anything from the rest of the world, in particular from the political and economic experiments now under way in western Europe. Thus Henry Fairlie:

I am extremely doubtful whether we have anything to learn from either the Fifth Republic in ⁴³ Arthur Koestler, "The Lion and the Ostrich," Encounter, July, 1963, p. 8.

France or the Federal Republic in West Germany about the manner of ordering and sustaining a free society; I am not even sure whether we have much to learn in the matter from the French and Germans as peoples... for the moment, I am prepared to wager fairly heavily that our own social and political arrangements will outlast theirs. Any takers?

Still others, it is maintained, are mesmerized by the ancient rituals and dominant values of Oxford and Cambridge—"fairylands in the heart of modern Britain"—the essence of whose magic is that it is pre-industrial.

This satisfied, even complacent, immersion in the British past is coupled, usually at the other end of the social scale, with the equally corrosive tendency of Britons to view the presert in terms of the miserable and insecure days of the 1930s, the period when so many leaders of the Left came of age. Here the prime target is usually the trade unions: their restrictive practices, their security-mindedness, their suspizion of innovation, their unwillingness to acopt business unionism and provide their leaders with adequate powers, their division of the industrial world into "Them" and "Us," and their "I'm All Right, Jack" response to their own rising affluence. Again, though the causes of this malaise are recognized as partly structural, it is argued that at the base of the problem are attitudes derived from situations and days long past. The result of conservatism in this major area of British life is that the unions are proving themselves "the natural allies of the forces of stagnation and conservatism in industry-and not those of expansion and dynamism."45

From this target it is but a short step to another: the alleged cult of amateurism and pragmetism. These seemingly valuable traits, it is argued, have been transformed into fetishes in contemporary British usage. The amateur has become not the curious and adaptable allrounder, but the dilettante; and pragmatism, rather than being synonymous with the experim∈ntal outlook, has shrunk to cautious, narrow tinkering. Teleology has given way to functionalism, the spirit of inquiry to the norms of adjustment and conciliation. Not surprisingly, the institutions most under fire for the inculcation of these attitudes are the educational system and the civil service, which at their higher levels are seen as extensions of each other. Hence the claim that the dominant humanist tradition of the top public schools and Oxbridge, while perhaps suitable for the days of laissez-faire and empire, is now hopelessly out of keeping with the requirements of industrial society and positive government. The defense of the prevailing values of British education in terms of training the generalist for the tasks of policy-making is really a deception. In the civil service, as in industry and Parliament, the domination of those possessed of (in Balogh's phrase) the "crossword-puzzle mind, reared on mathematics at Cambridge or Greats at Oxford," is inimical to the kind of rational, comprehensive, long-range planning that British society now requires.

The prevailing low esteem for science, technology and business enterprise particularly agitates the critics, who attribute to it much of Britain's slow economic growth, the "brain drain," and the nervous ambivalence toward the Common Market. This attitude, they argue, is one of the negative residues of aristocratic values in a democratic age. Whereas in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries the progress of technology and the promise of economic growth were the special ideology of the business class in its struggle with the land-owning aristocracy, over time the ideology faded out as the rising masters of technology and entrepreneurial power gave in to the tempting possibility of emulating the life of the landed squire. "The combination of a sharply divided class society—and the possibility of rising from one class to another held in greater esteemmeant that the ambition of the sons of many manufacturers was to leave their family businesses and to become landowners (or, at least, 'professional men')."46 Business, manufacturing and applied science continue to exist, but top creative talent refused to associate with these activities, and their controllers became increasingly docile, unadventurous and apologetic.In the view of the non-socialist wing of this school of critics, the reforms needed to achieve greater efficiency and expanded production have been stymied by the unwillingness of Britons to put these values above those of short-run group security and "fair play." "We are unwilling to advance if it means that anybody is going to get hurt. . . . This is in many ways an admirable trait, but it is a sure recipe for national decav."47 What these writers call for, then, is a reorientation of basic values in the direction of recognizing that whatever may have been the

⁴⁻ Henry Fairlie, "On the Comforts of Anger," ibid., p. 12.

⁴³ Michael Shanks, op. cit., p. 93.

⁴⁶ Austen Albu, "Taboo on Expertise," ibid.,

⁴⁷ Shanks, "The Comforts of Stagnation," Encounter, July, 1963, p. 31.

contributions in the past of aristocratic, unspecialized and humanistic standards of performance, the new Britain requires the upgrading of those attitudes which will foster technological innovation and organizational efficiency. Such a reorientation hinges upon the ability of Britons to sublimate, and finally eliminate, the class-bound attitudes of the past, which have stood as barriers not only to a democratic life, but also to national growth.

These cries are also echoed by critics of the process of government, especially those who view with misgivings the increased corporatism of policy-making. A notable example is Brian Chapman, whose slashing broadside, British Government Observed, significantly is subtitled "Some European Reflections." Although Chapman is critical chiefly of what he believes to be the archaic, nineteenth century character of the machinery of government-its "rich Byzantine structure"-he attributes much of this condition to the lack of doctrinal value attached to the concept of public service in Britain. In contrast to the trends in Continental countries, he asserts, British government remains in the grips of the luxuriant amateurism of centuries past and has not developed a genuine pluralism based upon the sentiment that public office carries with it public responsibility. Its pragmatism is a mask for weak-kneed, expensive abdication to whatever pressures happen to be brought to bear. Thus public policy is "simply equated with finding the least controversial course between the conflicting interests of vociferous private groups. It is not a doctrine of government; it is a doctrine of subordination."48 Other critics sharing these views have added the argument that a system that acts as much on the basis of "understandings"—unarticulated, unstructured, implicit responses to new situations—does not encourage bold solutions or positive action.

⁴⁸ Chapman, op. cit., p. 61. For a challenge to this interpretation, see D. N. Chester, "British Government Observed," Public Administration, Vol. 41 (Winter, 1963), pp. 375-84.

This small sample of the expanding literature of discontent testifies to the survival of ideological concern in Britain today. True, these particular critics are not of a single mind, and few of them present fully drawn prescriptions for reform (aside, perhaps, from a common emphasis on the need to reconstruct the educational system). But they do share two strong interests that have influenced their analysis and their prescriptions. First, they are impressed by many of the recent developments occurring on the Continent, and they would shake Britain out of its traditional belief that nothing positive can be learned from that quarter. Thus they would seem to pin their hope of change in part on the prospects of closer union with Europe, if only because this might jolt the country out of its complacent ways. Second, they believe that the primary force making for attitudinal change will be the rising power of the newer, more modern and classless elements in British society—the managers, scientists, technicians and white collar workers—who have reaped the benefits of the 1944 Education Act, and whose occupational skills and roles have removed them from the attitudes of the older England. In this sense, but not in others, these critics would agree with the diagnoses of the "end of ideology" writers.

None of this cluster of critics offers a new "world view" ideology to the British, but most of them are concerned with the reordering of basic political attitudes in the second sense that I have used the term "ideology." While acknowledging the need to retain many of the historic values associated with the British polity, they would nevertheless adjust the equilibrium of ancient and modern values in the direction of modernity. This can be achieved, they believe, in the best British tradition, without resort to cosmic theories or to the intolerance of closed systems.

SOURCES OF ADMINISTRATIVE BEHAVIOR: SOME SOVIET AND WESTERN EUROPEAN COMPARISONS

JOHN A. ARMSTRONG University of Wisconsin

It is hardly surprising that most investigations of Soviet bureaucracy have emphasized the unique aspects of that system rather than its relation to broader problems of administration.1 Yet the importance of Soviet experience makes a beginning in comparative analysis highly desirable. The purpose of this article is to identify some (by no means all) of the ways in which Soviet administrative behavior resembles or differs from administrative behavior in Western Europe, which is assumed here to be the norm of administration in a politically and economically modernized society.2 Where Sovist and Western European administrative behavior coincide, it is assumed that the behavior arises from requirements of the economically modernized societies which prevail in both the USSR and Western Europe at present, Where acministrative behavior differs in the two areas, tentative explanations are sought in (1) the circumstance that the Soviet economy has become modernized more recently and more rapidly than the economy in Western Europe; and (2) the difference between the Communist pclitical system and the pluralistic systems prevailing in Western Europe.3

Materials on the structure and functioning of Soviet administration, as on so many other features of Soviet society and government, have been very scarce. The present analysis depends heavily upon previous studies of various aspects of the Soviet bureaucracy, but I found

- ¹ I use "bureaucracy," "organization," and "administration" in the sense employed by Peter Blau and W. Richard Scott in Formal Organizations (San Francisco, 1962), pp. 7-8; since the formal organizations I deal with are highly bureaucratic and engaged in administration, the terms are frequently interchangeable.
- I make the distinction between economic and political modernization which Joseph LaPalombara clarifies on pp. 37 ff. of "Bureaucracy and Political Development" in the book which he ed ted on Bureaucracy and Development (Princeton, 1963).
- ⁵ Obviously a different set of assumptions about the relation between the Western European and the Soviet political systems would have produced a different model leading to a different approach to the problem.

it essential to augment such data by systematically interviewing Western European administrators who in recent years have had direct personal contact with parts of the Soviet administrative apparatus.4 The data I obtained in this manner consist, of course, of the perceptions of outsiders; but this fact makes them especially valuable for comparative purposes, for the Western Europeans were able to compare the administrative behavior they observed in the USSR with their experience of their own systems, for which they qualify as expert informants. Reliance on interviews (especially in view of unavoidable time limitations binding both interviewer and informant) restricted the examination to certain salient features of the Soviet bureaucracy which visitors could observe. As a consequence, the most sensitive political structures (Party, police, and military) cannot be analyzed directly. Many important features of bureaucracy, such as centralization vs. autonomy, personnel selection and socialization, rules formation, responsiveness to publics, participation in policy formation and involvement in power conflicts, are scarcely touched upon. Focus upon the contemporary period of foreign contact limits consideration of the dynamic elements of bureaucratic development, though these could be treated briefly in some contexts. Within these limitations, however, it is possible to present a series of interrelated propositions which may serve as hypotheses for future investigation as more data become available.

4 During 1963-64, I interviewed twenty-seven German, twenty-four British, and twenty French administrators who had either visited the USSR for professional or business purposes or who (in a small minority of cases) had dealt extensively with Soviet administrators in Western Europe. The wide commercial and official contacts of Western Europeans (in comparison to Americans) with Soviet administrators made these informants especially valuable. While it was not feasible to select a "sample" of the Western Europeans, I was careful to secure a distribution that was broadly representative of the European government officials and private businessmen and of welfare as well as "line" or industrial administrators within the official group. The interviews were open-ended, but highly structured, so as to cover a fairly standardized range of topics yet to permit intensive probing of informants who turned out to have made unusually significant observations of Soviet administration. I intend to deal more fully with the backgrounds of the informants in a subsequent article which will treat the differences in role perceptions of the various types of Western European administrators. At this point I should express my gratitude to the American Council of Learned Societies and the Graduate School and the International Studies Program of the University of Wisconsin, which provided the grants for extensive interviewing in Europe and a brief visit to the USSR.

I. FORMAL CHARACTERISTICS OF THE SOVIET COMMAND STRUCTURE

A. In comparison with Western European administration, departures from hierarchical principles in the formal structure of Soviet administration are greatest in spheres concerned with human welfare.

Western European informants who were administrators of welfare or service agencies (social security, public health, and education) were almost unanimous in feeling that hierarchy was replaced by multiple chains of command in the Soviet counterparts of their agencies. For example, a school system director pointed to the formal subordination of local school administrations in the USSR to higher school authorities and to the local soviets (legislative bodies). He believed that the education committees of the Soviets occupied a significant role in the supervision of the schools and that teachers deliberately played off the committees against their hierarchical superiors. Similarly, a highly placed social security administrator was aware that local social security officials in the Soviet Union are legally subordinate both to the Union Republic ministry of social security and to the local soviet. When he visited the USSR he asked how possible conflicts of authority were resolved. He was informed that in case of conflict the social security director resigned; but the visitor remained unconvinced that any simple solution to the problem of dual subordination was possible.

Nearly all of the Western European welfare administrators believed that their own agencies were, in contrast, basically hierarchical in organization: i.e., that they conformed essentially to Max Weber's "ideal type" in which each administrative official is subordinate to a single superior. Without overlooking the importance of informal relationships in welfare agencies, one can hypothesize that, in Western Europe at least, hierarchical relationships (closely related to rules specificity and impersonality) have prevailed to a great extent in agencies administering service affairs which have traditionally been the concern of government. As a recent study suggests, "government by law is the most bureaucratic of all institutions because to a greater extent than other institutions it feels bound by its own rules." In the USSR, on the other hand, administration of schools, social security, and health-"administration of people" in contrast to "administration of things"—has always had a high political content. The totalitarian ideology demands that every administrative action concerning people be carefully fitted to the political aims of the regime. Consequently, dual subordination, with frequent intervention of "mass organizations" like the soviets, directed by the Communist Party, is essential. In the welfare agencies which Western European informants could observe this indeterminacy in the command structure apparently permitted some leeway to "grass-roots" pressures as well. Nevertheless, the general concept is in close accord with studies of more highly politicized elements of the Soviet administrative system. For example, the extremely politicized wartime partisan movement (in contrast to the regular Red Army) had a very indeterminate command structure.7 In the higher political structures examined by Barrington Moore, "because of the need for means to check up on the execution of policy decisions there apparently exists a vested interest in confusion, and particularly confusion in the allocation of authority."8 Similarly, Merle Fainsod, in his study of the Soviet political structure notes that

The leaders of the regime guard their power jealously. They are willing to forego the advantage of a single, clearly defined administrative hierarchy, and they blur lines of authority by multiplying

- ⁵ Peter M. Blau's The Dynamics of Bureaucracy (Chicago, 1955) is, of course, concerned with just such relationships in an American welfare agency.
- ⁶ Marshall Dimock in Robert K. Merton et al., ed., Reader in Bureaucracy (Glencoe, Ill., 1952), p. 399.
- ⁷ John A. Armstrong and Kurt DeWitt, "Organization and Control of the Partisan Movement" in John A. Armstrong, ed., Soviet Partisans in World War II (Madison, 1964), pp. 133-34.
- ⁸ Soviet Politics—The Dilemma of Power (Cambridge, Mass., 1950), p. 286.

controls at every point of the government structure.9

As the passages just cited suggest, Communist doctrinal insistence on an extreme degree of political control may involve a certain sacrifice of efficiency. Welfare administration is evidently less crucial politically than administration in the higher echelons of Party and government. To a regime which places first priority on economic modernization welfare administration is also less important than industrial directions. Other differences between welfare and economic administrators which appear to be definite consequences of the emphasis on modernization will be noted later. At this point, it is important to suggest that the differences between Soviet and Western European administration in the welfare sphere are due not only to the communist ideology but to the relative deemphasis of governmental welfare functions which rapid economic modernization-in contrast to political modernization—entails.

E. In Soviet industrial production and foreigr-trade, departures from hierarchical command principles are similar to those in the same administrative spheres in Western Europe.

This observation runs counter to the conclusions of some studies of Soviet administration, which have tended to generalize the principle of indeterminacy in the command structure to include economic management as well. Nevertheless, the consensus of Western European informants is overwhelming on this point. Perhaps the earlier studies, viewing the Soviet system in isolation, tended to exaggerate the comparative importance of departures from hierarchical principles in its formal economic administration. Businessmen, regardless of the size or nature of their own firms, were convinced that the agencies they dealt with in the USER were as much under "one-man managemert" as their own. So were most Western European government administrators in "line administration" or in state industrial management. The only exception these men made to their generalized view of the hierarchical formal structure of Soviet administration was the influence of the Communist Party; but they could rarely specify the nature of this influence. One businessman did note that the director of Sovsudoimport (the agency concerned with purchasing ships) also occupied a high Party post, which seemed to endow him with an unusual degree of authority in the agency.10

It would appear (as several informants spontaneously noted), that a considerable measure of adherence to hierarchical administrative principles is necessary to the highly modernized economies which now prevail in both Western Europe and the Soviet Union. The command structure need not, and for the sake of efficiency should not, be rigid in either system.

9 How Russia Is Ruled, 2d ed. (Cambridge, Mass., 1963), p. 245.

C. In Soviet industrial administration, the principal departure from hierarchical principles in the formal command structure consists of the authority acquired by staff or functional agencies through their power of reporting directly to the top of the command structure.

Informants who observed foreign trade agencies saw little if any evidence of departures from formal subordination to a single superior. The advantages of maintaining at least the appearance of unity of command for the Soviet side in trade negotiations is obvious. Businessmen and government officials who were able to penetrate to the production agencies in the USSR obtained a somewhat different conception of the Soviet administrative system. But it frequently took considerable probing to unearth their observations, for the type of divergence from hierarchical principles described below did not strike the Western European administrators as unusual in the light of their experience with their own administrations.

The most interesting line of inquiry concerned relations between the state committees and the councils of national economy (sovnarkhozy), which in 1957 had replaced the central ministerial apparatus for directing industry. Formally, the state committees were made responsible only for research and design; in other words, they were staff or functional agencies. Implementation of state committee proposals, often even at the experimental stage, however, depended on the cooperation of line agenciesthe sovnarkhozy and the industrial enterprises under them. Though none of the Western European informants spontaneously noted the significance of this relationship, several had made extensive observations of state committee-sovnarkhoz interaction. One (a civil servant) believed that formal committees set up to coordinate relations between the agencies were effective. Nearly all informants agreed, on the other hand, that harmony had not been attained by this device. Instead, the state committees had to resort to pressures exerted through top-level bodies such as the Council of Ministers.

¹⁰ As indicated below, the informants were fully convinced of the the operation of informal mechanisms such as tolkachi (expediters) which circumvented the formal structure of the agencies they dealt with, but they denied that these mechanisms were sanctioned by the rules or ideology of the system.

Apart from the overloading of vertical communications and the friction between line and staff officials which the sovnarkhoz-state committee relationship entailed, it resulted in delays which the Soviet administrators openly regarded as intolerable. One businessman with intimate contacts in the USSR was told that the proposed remedy for these deficiencies was to transform the state committees into khozraschet (profit-and-loss) agencies. They would then perform eighty percent of their research operations on contract with production agencies, or would independently develop processes for licensing to factories. Since Khrushchev's ouster, this solution has apparently been abandoned; instead, a partial return to the ministerial system of centralized control of development and production appears likely. It is entirely clear, however, that the independent chains of command of development and production agencies were too inefficient to be maintained in a modern industrial economy. In the view of the Western European administrator, such a failure in an administrative experiment is not unique to the Soviet system, but the emphasis on centralized control aggravated the situation in the USSR. While the nature of the Soviet-type economy poses special difficulties, the informants were inclined to believe that no insuperable ideological barriers stood in the way of a solution.

D. Friction between line administrators and staff officials is somewhat greater in the Soviet economic administration than in Western Europe.

The sources of the friction have already been noted in the previous section. The line (industrial direction) administrators feel a compulsion to respond, at least in part, to "suggestions" of the staff agencies because the latter have independent channels of communication to the top authorities." This forced responsiveness is not, however, based on informal cooperative mechanisms, but emphasizes divergent organizational interests, leaving a residue of antagonism.12 The immediate aim of the industrial director is short-run production, which is the criterion by which his effectiveness is judged. The experimental innovations of the state committee specialists are almost certain to disrupt production in the short run, however fruitful they may later turn out to be. Informants who had observed personal relations between Soviet staff officials and industrial directors were almost unanimous in detecting friction. A high-ranking Western European planning official found that Soviet plant directors-nearly all engineers by training-became noticeably more cordial when they learned that he was also an engineer by background rather than (as they had assumed) an economist, as are many Soviet planners. An official of a steel firm found production men referring contemptuously to "long-haired researchers." "Practical" industrial managers looked down on research specialists as "theoreticians" and on foreign trade specialists as "grocers" who did not understand the real needs of production, according to a businessman who speaks Russian fluently. None of these observers found this kind of friction unusual in comparison to their Western European experience, though it was more intense. Nor was it surprising that the production directors were more aggressive in expressing their dissatisfactions. Here again the Soviet experience appears merely to reproduce in somewhat aggravated form the frictions common to modern administrative systems.

II. COMMUNICATIONS

A. In comparison with Western European administrative systems, vertical communication channels are overloaded in Soviet administration.

As was indicated above, overloading of vertical communication channels is partly a result of the tendency, even in industrial direction, to allocate independent reporting channels to staff agencies. This tendency, which apparently springs from the doctrinal desire to maintain centralized control, is even more noticeable in aspects of the administration which lack production goals but which are more immediately sensitive from the political standpoint.13 It is reinforced by the fear of subordinates of being harshly punished for "mistakes"—i.e., exercises of their own judgment that turn out badly—and their consequent tendency to pass the buck by asking for permission or instructions before making any move. The whole question of communication channels in the Soviet administration is a crucial one, but it is extremely difficult to observe their actual functioning. Consequently, the discussion of this subject must be limited to a few principal points.

B. Formal communication is relatively inefficient in the Soviet administration.

¹³ See especially Merle Fainsod, Smolensk under Soviet Rule (Cambridge, Mass., 1958).

¹¹ Cf. Herbert A. Simon, Administrative Behavior (New York, 1961), p. 168.

¹² Cf. John A. Armstrong, The Soviet Bureaucratic Elite (New York, 1959), p. 96 ff.

Nearly all the Western European informants believed that formal communications in the Soviet agencies they had observed were grossly inadequate. One industrial manager with unusually broad experience in the USSR asserted that the Soviet administrators were under pressure to make ten times as many reports as their counterparts in his very large industrial firm. Furthermore, he added, the European firm had a special section constantly concerned with reducing routine reports, while such an agency was unknown in the USSR. As a result the reports continued to pile up, but were neither informative nor readily available. A French exporter even warned his compatriots that they must not expect their publicity materials to be distributed to the Soviet agencies which could effectively utilize them.¹⁴ Most information concerning the formal communications system was elicited in response to questions concerning the extent to which telephone calls were used by Soviet administrators in lieu of writing. My original hypothesis was that Soviet administrators resort to telephoning (or other oral communication) because administrators in a totalitarian system fear to commit themselves in writing. Most informants rejected this explanation. Instead, they believed that the major reason for extensive telephoning (not all agreed that it was more extensive than in Western Europe) is the extremely poor clerical facilities available to the Soviet administrator. Office space is limited and poorly arranged, with file cases crowding the corridors even in such a high-level agency as the skyscraper headquarters of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs ("the Smolenskaya"). Relatively simple items of equipment, such as typewriters and carbon paper, are in short supply and poor in quality. Most important, the ratio of secretaries, typists and file clerks to administrators is very low. According to a calculation recently made by the British economist Alec Nove, there were only 130,000 stenographers and typists in the USSR (about 1960), as compared to 559,000 in Great Britain in 1951.15 He writes

... there are remarkably few clerks in the Soviet Civil Service, and this, one suspects, is generally true of their way of doing business. Visitors to large Soviet enterprises have often noticed the ¹⁴ M. Bonnier, Directeur Général Adjoint, Société Bénoto, "L'Expérience d'Exportation d'une Entreprise de Construction de Matériel d'Equipement," Hommes et Techniques, Vol. 15 (July-August 1959), pp. 687-89.

¹⁵ Economic Rationality and Soviet Politics: Or Was Stalin Really Necessary? (New York, 1964), p. 276. smallness of the offices. Much more seems to be decided by more senior staff, and by word of mouth, by personal dealings or at meetings.... Far fewer cases are handled by correspondence in Government offices. The administrative pyramid is much narrower. This explains why so much time is wasted by officials and others in the waiting rooms of various institutions, waiting to see some senior official (this is a traditional feature of Russian administration). 16

Similarly, a businessman remarked to me that he frequently met Soviet administrators in the corridors of their office buildings; this convinced him that Soviet administrative organization was poor, for, he said, in a well-run organization administrators are in their offices dealing with the flow of properly channelled written communications rather than running back and forth for personal consultations.

Seeking the reasons for the inefficiency of Soviet clerical assistance, one encounters a peculiar combination of tradition and ideology. As Nove suggests, reliance on oral communication and neglect of correspondence is traditional in Russia; in a sense the present situation represents simply the failure of a modernizing regime to overcome cultural lag. But Leninist doctrine aggravated the situation. Lenin stressed the primacy of production work as contrasted to clerical and record-keeping operations, and his successors, while constantly adding to the burden of paper work, have maintained this emphasis.

C. There is strong internal pressure for improving formal communications in the Soviet administration,

The waste inherent in an inefficient system of formal communications was perhaps tolerable as long as the Soviet economic system was not fully modernized, but the present system calls for much more careful allocation of administrative as well as other resources. Recently a spate of articles in the Soviet press has urged the need for improving clerical services and "restoring" the role of the business letter, which, one writer complains, has "lost its force, the force of an obligation assumed in making a personal promise or in a telephone conversation." Another writer refers obliquely to the continuing detrimental influence of the ideology by pointing out that "when workers in these [clerical] categories are nevertheless cut down, their duties are usually shifted over to production personnel, who are as a rule more highly paid." In at least two instances Soviet managers have explicitly sought systematic advice on office procedures from Western European business management sources.

¹⁶ Ibid., pp. 269, 275.

¹⁷ "The Director's Time," Pravda, June 2, 1964, trans. in Current Digest of the Soviet Press, XVI, No. 22, pp. 25–26. Cf. similar articles, ibid., XVI, No. 13, pp. 17–18; No. 31, pp. 11–12; No. 46, pp. 14–19.

An even more sweeping change may be introduced into the flow of communications by the introduction of modern electronic data processing and computing machinery. In recent years the regime has admitted the relevance of cybernetic theory, which had been banned during Stalin's lifetime. Two informants who are experts in that field and in computer techniques found virtually no evidence of the use of data processing machines or computers for management control—as contrasted to manufacturing control-during visits about 1960, but Soviet interest in management applications was intense. One of these informants remarked that the administrators who were concerned with installing the new equipment were all young, recent graduates of technical higher schools who generally formed a group apart from the older bureaucrats. It is possible, therefore, that the introduction of new methods of communicating information will proceed hand in hand with a turnover in generations in the Soviet administration. Such a "computer revolution" may enormously increase the effectiveness of formal communication channels. This in turn may permit a considerable increase in centralized control. It is quite possible therefore that modernization of communication may have the paradoxical effects of forcing the abandonment of the Leninist ideological exaltation of production at the expense of clerical work at the same time that it actually enhances totalitarian control by making a fully centralized network of administrative communications channels really feasible.

III. INFORMAL RELATIONSHIPS

A. While informal relationships are highly important in Soviet administration, they are not much more so than in Western European administration.

Theoretical considerations would lead one to expect that a bureaucracy like the Soviet, where the formal communication system is weak, would be strongly influenced by informal relations. Most treatments of Soviet administration have fully recognized this aspect. As David Granick writes, "with this absence of formal clarity, it is natural that emphasis has always been placed on the need for the closest ties and a comradely atmosphere between the management and the plant's Party organization." Other students of Soviet administration have stressed the importance of "protective family circles" and pull. The general tendency of these analyses has been to view informal relations as dysfunctional from the standpoint of the Soviet system, as the following passage by Barrington Moore indicates:

¹⁸ "For Flexible Economic Management of Enterprises," Pravda, August 17, 1964, trans. in Current Digest of the Soviet Press, XVI, No. 33, pp. 13-15.

It does not appear that this pattern [of exerting pressure on managers through indeterminate command structures] is in general the product of deliberate creation, although some sophisticated individuals at various levels of the bureaucratic hierarchies are undoubtedly aware of some of the principles by which it operates. As might be anticipated on the basis of the preceding information, there is a tendency within the bureaucracy for informal groupings to spring up and serve as defense against the competitive pressures induced by the system.²¹

Certainly the prevalence of informal relationships, the decision of cases on the basis of personal associations rather than strictly impersonal rules, violates a cardinal principle of the traditional bureaucratic model. But, as Peter Blau notes, "Weber's decision to treat only the purely formal organization of bureaucracy implies that all deviations from these formal requirements are idiosyncratic . . . [and] that any deviation from the formal structure is detrimental to administrative efficiency." Blau goes on to point out that this approach is misleading, for "informal relations and unofficial practices often contribute to efficient operation."

Most of my informants definitely shared the view that informal relations in the Soviet bureaucracy were not very different in degree from those prevailing in Western European administrations, and therefore made little difference in the relative efficiency of the organizations. For example, one businessman reported that a very high Soviet official had told how, when he directed one of the major steel plants

¹⁹ Management of the Industrial Firm in the USSR (New York, 1954), p. 229.

²⁰ Fainsod, Smolensk Under Soviet Rule, p. 92; Joseph Berliner, Factory and Manager in the USSR (Cambridge, Mass., 1957), p. 204.

²¹ Moore, op. cit., p. 290.

²² Bureaucracy in Modern Society (New York, 1956), pp. 35-36.

in the Urals, he had maintained special agents (tclkachi—though he did not use the term) to carry on informal negotiations with the railways when he encountered difficulties in obtaning boxcars. But only one Western Europe administrator believed that Soviet Communism had advanced far enough toward its ostensible goal of creating the "new man" to have overcome the "general" propensity of administrators to resort to informal mechanisms.

B. Informal relationships in Soviet administration are based, far more frequently than in Western Europe, on career contacts.

Most informants were very strongly impressed by the fact that the Soviet administrators whom they had observed had formed almost all of their friendships in the course of careers. ... Many interviewees, strongly impressed by the extent of informal relationships in the Soviet system, argued that physical circumstances prevented intimate social contacts away from the place of work. The most important factor, many informants believed, is the extreme pressures upon the successful Soviet administrator that virtually preclude his cultivating interests outside his work. This observation is in accord with previous discussions based on Soviet publications.23 Few meeting places of a non-institutional nature like cafés—are available for informal meetings outside the places of work. The very small apartments assigned even to major officials make private social gatherings highly inconvenient. Lack of space prevents the official from carrying on most hobbies or avocations at home, while "clubs" at the place of work provice special facilities for many such activities (sports, photography, etc.). As a result, according to one informant, even adult members of the same family are apt to be separated during a considerable portion of their off-duty

These observations cast considerable doubt on the hypothesis that residential proximity could form the basis for informal relationships. Nevertheless, in view of the important trend in the United States and some parts of Western Europe toward dormitory suburbs inhabited by families of homogeneous income levels—resulting in considerable informal contact among administrators holding equivalent status in diverse organizations—one should not neglect the possibility of a similar Soviet development. In earlier years, such a development was precluded in many Soviet areas by the fact that major industrial enterprises provided apartments for their administrative personnel; in view of the extreme housing shortage the administrators from a single organization were obliged to live together as well as to work together. This situation appears to prevail to a considerable extent in provincial Soviet cities even today. In Tula, according to one informant, coal mine trust directors lived in the same quarter of that relatively small city and frequented a neighborhood restaurant. Even in Volgograd (a city of nearly a million inhabitants) a Russian-speaking Western European administrator found that his Soviet counterparts from a given enterprise lived in a single apartment building. On the other hand, a businessman who had visited numerous factory sites in the provinces in connection with the installation of equipment his firm was supplying found that the managerial staffs lived in scattered locations. The information available on Moscow tends to bear out the official position that new apartments are assigned without regard to the place of work of the applicant, except insofar as he requests an apartment in a quarter of the city near his job. Even then, due to the immense size of the city and the scope of construction, no concentration of employees of a single agency results.

²³ I advanced this hypothesis in The Soviet Bureaucratic Elite, p. 11.

A few informants thought that the Soviet regime deliberately restricts private housing facilities to loosen family and friendship ties, but a majority inclined to the belief that construction priorities rather than totalitarian objections to uncontrolled associations are a sufficient explanation. Similarly, the extreme degree to which the successful administrator must be absorbed in his job seems to be a concomitant of the intense emphasis upon work rather than the direct result of a desire to prevent outside activities.24 On the other hand, communication between officials which is not related at least ostensibly to the performance of their duties is suspect, and, if it has political connotations, can easily give-rise to the charge of "fractionalism," which Leninist doctrine has always regarded as a most heinous offense. On the whole, therefore, it appears that the restriction of informal relationships to career associations is primarily the result of the pressures of modernization, though these are greatly enhanced in the Soviet case by the "work ethic" of Leninism.

C. Persisting associations between former classmates form the basis of informal relationships in Soviet administration to a degree comparable to that existing in Western Europe.

²⁴ However, as I argued, ibid., the regime does frown upon the development of hobbies and avocations which do not indirectly improve an official's work ability.

The observation that informal relationships in the Soviet administration center about career associations, is, of course, only the starting point in the search for sociological factors which tend to promote such relationships. While the outsider is especially limited in his opportunity to observe these factors, the subject is so important that it was a central concern in my interviewing. One possible factor is common educational experience. The importance of the "old school tie" (in rather diverse forms in different countries) in Western European elite associations hardly needs emphasis. Some studies of the Soviet bureaucracy have found evidence of the development of similar ties. In some cases Party apparatus officials retain associations originally based on distinctive training in different branches of Party schools.25 Joseph Berliner noted (after interviewing administrators who had left the USSR during World War II) that "one hears remarks oddly reminiscent of 'the old school tie'."26 Even so, it was surprising to hear one of the first interviewees spontaneously remark that he had encountered several Soviet administrators who explained that their affairs were expedited when they were dealing with their former classmates in higher technical schools. Few subsequent informants could provide definite corroboration for this phenomenon, and some regarded it as improbable. But indirect confirmation came from the observation (noted earlier) that young administrators trained in computer technology maintained a group feeling and from two separate reports that coal mine directors in the Tula and Donets fields are in each case almost without exception graduates of local schools of mines. In fact, there seems to be—contrary to Karl Deutsch's hypothesis that high geographical mobility is an index to modernizing tendencies27—a strong tendency for the lower and middle levels of Soviet administrators to originate and to be trained in the regions where they work.28

25 Ibid., p. 40.

²⁶ Berliner, op. cit., p. 261.

²⁷ Karl W. Deutsch, "Social Mobilization and Political Development," this Review, Vol. 55 (September 1961), pp. 495 ff.

²⁸ An analysis of the backgrounds of industrial Party secretaries (to appear in Soviet Studies, Jan. 1966) suggests that these officials—dealing with the most modernized sector of the Soviet economy—have exhibited only half as much geographical mobility during their careers (during and since higher education) as Party secretaries of

The persistence of school ties is undoubtedly contrary to Soviet ideology, but it is probably to some extent an indirect result of the highly competitive system marked by extraordinary suspicion which developed during Stalin's lifetime. It is reasonable to suppose that ties formed at an impressionable age would influence administrators to trust each other more than colleagues whom they had come to know only in the heat of career rivalry-which was often literally a struggle for existence. At the same time, it seems likely that the stress on technical education in any modern social system will tend to form permanent associations among the products of its higher schools. The stress on technical education in the USSRhigher education there is almost always rigidly directed toward forming specialists—probably enhances this tendency. School comrades have shared narrow curricula (in the case of administrators, usually in some branch of engineering), which constitute direct preparation for the first stages of their careers. While their career activities may diverge somewhat in subsequent years, it is likely that the common professional outlook fostered by their training is as important in perpetuating associations as is mutual trust-and indeed may be a source of trust.

D. As compared to Western Europe, certain kinds of ethnic solidarity are more important in forming the basis for informal relationships among Soviet administrators.

While some Western European observers detected no indications of ethnic differences among Soviet administrators, many-including nearly all those who traveled extensively or who knew Russian-found evidences not only of differing backgrounds but of ethnic solidarity. Observations on the peculiar role of Armenians were most definite. It is, of course, relatively easy to identify Armenians (their surnames nearly always end in "-yan"), but many informants who were sufficiently knowledgeable to make other ethnic identifications insisted that the Armenians formed much the most distinctive group of non-Russian administrators. Armenians occupy many important posts in trade organizations. One businessman reported that he had found many Armenian fiscal officers, and had the impression that Armenians preferred handling money to production assignments. Another businessman, disagreeing on the latter point, noted that the deputy director of Sovsudoimport, with major responsi-the same status and age group supervising the less modernized (agricultural and political) sectors. bilities for industrial procurement, was an Armenian. A businessman with extensive contact in Soviet chemical manufacturing had encountered numerous Armenian factory directors in this field.

Mildly anti-Armenian jokes are common such as the frequent use in official circles of the derisory term "Armenian broadcast" to mean rumors. A current joke, "Sir Humphrey Trevelvan is one of the two most influential Armenians in Moscow" is a play on the termination of the British Ambassador's name. The other "Influential" is, of course, Mikoyan, but most informants doubted that Mikovan had deliberately insinuated his fellow countrymen into high administrative posts during the course of his long and varied career. Of course, some tendencies toward ethnic differentiation of administrators are almost inevitable in the complex multi-national Soviet society, as compared to the relatively homogeneous Western European sccieties. But the Armenians, at least, do seem to meet special needs of the administrative system. Their "southern" warmth and approach-ability makes them more flexible in human contacts -a notably deficient side of Soviet administration—and these qualities are intimately related to Armenian skill in trade negotiations. Armenians also possess to an unusual degree the propensities for education, geographic mobility, and adaptation to urban environments. needed in a newly modernized society. Traditionally, Jews provided these qualities in a relatively traditional Eastern European economic system, but anti-Semitic prejudices limit (without by any means wholly eliminating) their role in contemporary Soviet administration.29 Quite possibly many rapidly 29 Informants found ample evidence of discrimination against Jews in administration. While one German businessman was told by a Soviet official that the presence of Jews in the Ministry of Foreign Trade proved that there was no anti-Semitism in the USSR, another was told jokingly, "all of our Jews have been sent to their own province in Siberia." Other informants encountered more sharply anti-Semitic jokes, especielly when the Soviet administrators had been drinking. An informant of Russian parentage overheard a young Russian woman remarking that she refused to dance with his superior (in a Western European administrative delegation) because he was obviously Jewish. It seems evident that Jews in Soviet administrative positions are subject to uncomfortable pressures, but it is noz so clear that they develop a defensive solidarity. Some informants (but by no means all who commented on the ethnic situation) believed that modernizing societies will provide special roles for minority ethnic groups which have traditionally developed skills in human relations, but have not completely succumbed to the overpowering production ethic which tends to make the majority ethnic elite inflexible in human relations. Certainly the peculiar role of the Armenians is entirely contrary to Leninist prescriptions, and is wholly unrecognized by official Soviet sources. Here the pragmatic needs of modernization seem to have won a small but definite victory over Communist doctrine.

IV. MOTIVATIONS

A. As compared to Western European production administrators, Soviet production administrators exhibit intense career achievement orientation.

At several points in the preceding discussion I have assumed that the Soviet system, by some means or other, has imbued most of its administrators with a very strong production ethic. The extent and nature of such a motivating ethic, of course, make an extraordinarily difficult subject of study in any culture; evidence concerning the Soviet elite is particularly hard to obtain. Crude though the approach necessarily was, it seemed worthwhile to secure Western European administrators' observations on this topic, for they had had unusual opportunities to observe their Soviet counterparts in informal situations. A large majority of the informants were convinced that Soviet administrators were more intensely involved with their work and exhibited a stronger drive for promotion than Western Europeans. This consensus coincides with the extreme achievement orientation which Fainsod found in examining the Smolensk archives.30 It also agrees with Berliner's contention that even in Stalin's day few managers were obsessed by fears of getting into trouble or wanted to "live peacefully," for men with such propensities were eliminated at an early stage from the fierce competition for advancement.31 The most extensive examination of this question has been conducted by Inkeles, Bauer, and Kluckhohn, who note the "persistence of goal striving" of the elite and its acceptance of the Party's stress on unlimited achievement.32 Increasingly, suc-

Ukrainians in the administration also tended to stick together.

³⁰ Smolensk under Soviet Rule, p. 92.

³¹ Berliner, op. cit., pp. 53-54.

³² Raymond A. Bauer, Alex Inkeles and Clyde Kluckhohn, How the Soviet System Works (Cambridge, Mass., 1957), p. 58.

cess in the USSR has been defined, as in the United States, as advancement along the occupational ladder, and, especially at higher levels, satisfaction is correlated with intrinsic qualities of one's job.³³

One further line of inquiry tended to confirm the impression of the persistence of an unusually strong career achievement orientation among Soviet administrators. A possibly crucial test of a man's devotion to his calling, as contrasted to more or less fatalistic acceptance of his circumstances, is his occupational aspirations for his children. Inkeles and Bauer have suggested that the post-1941 generation of nonmanual workers in the USSR shows a slight tendency toward greater emphasis on self-expression as contrasted to achievement goals for its children.34 Some current reports by travelers to the USSR have also suggested that better educated parents may dislike the thought of their children marrying bureaucrats or entering bureaucratic careers. Instead, parents prefer strictly "intellectual" careers for their children. Such a development would be analogous to the nineteenth-century capitalist's effort to buy his children's way into the aristocracy or the liberal professions or the eighteenth-century French merchant's effort to secure a magistrate's post for his son. Most of my informants had never discussed children's prospects with their Soviet counterparts. Those who had, found that Soviet fathers who were administrators placed enormous emphasis upon their children—especially their sons-obtaining higher educations, and were willing to pull strings (in complete violation of the ideologically proper attitude) to get them assigned to superior secondary schools (outside their neighborhoods), or to enable them to avoid the work assignment interruptions required during 1958-64. Since students in the natural sciences frequently were not required to take work assignments, while engineering students were, administrators who were engineers by training sometimes advised their sons to become research scientists—despite the line administrator's aversion to "long-hairs." Most administrators, however, seemed sincerely glad to have their sons get the type of higher education that the regime indicated was desired. For example, a trade official indicated that he was happy that his son was studying chemistry, because Khrushchev had said that there lay the career of the future. With one exception, fathers were glad that their sons were studying engineering and similar technical subjects that are, in the USSR, the most common preparation for administrative careers. This does not necessarily mean that administrators definitely wish their sons to become administrators, but the fathers must have envisaged this possibility with equanimity.

B. Performance criteria tend to replace eschatological criteria as the production administrator's motivations.

If the evidence is strong that striving for achievement in one's career is prevalent in the USSR, what are the motivations? Obviously this is a case where multiple causation is highly likely. Several Western European administrators contended that a certain proportion of men in any society must find outlets for their ambitions in striving for advancement. The Soviet regime has stressed the principle "to each according to his work" for over four decades; administrators, especially in industry, are highly rewarded in comparison with members of other occupations. Hence it is scarcely surprising that most informants indicated material rewards as a major motivating factor, at least as strong as in Western Europe. High status, extraordinarily closely related in the USSR to superior occupational attainments, was also cited. A few informants thought that sincere belief in the vision of a Communist society was a major motivating factor among production administrators. A businessman had suggested to a very high Soviet official (whose primary career was in industrial direction, who had traveled abroad extensively, and who spoke a Western European language fluently) that professional technological interests might form a stronger bond than Communist eschatology. The Soviet administrator rejected this suggestion vehemently.35 But most informants-including several whose Soviet experiences go back to the 1930s—felt that ideology in the sense of conscious concern with Leninist doctrine, particularly in its eschatological aspects, had atrophied.

While some informants saw traditional Russian patriotism as the major motive replacing Communist ideology, more defined contemporary Soviet patriotism as a kind of amalgam of traditional Russian sentiment and belief in the Soviet system. One businessman volunteered the suggestion that the main motivating factor is that people have seen their own careers progress in accordance with the growth of Soviet strength. Similarly, a school administrator remarked that most Soviet administrators started life as peasants, and in their present relatively exalted posts naturally believe that the Soviet system has accomplished great things.³⁶

³³ Inkeles and Bauer, The Soviet Citizen, (Cambridge, Mass., 1959) pp. 96 ff. 120.

³⁴ Ibid., pp. 226-27.

²⁵ Cf. the very similar quotation from the Stalin-period press in John A. Armstrong, The Politics of Totalitarianism (New York, 1961), p. 182.

In believing that the Soviet system ought to be furthered because its success has been correlated with his own personal success rather : than because Communism promises a glorious future for mankind, the administrator is replacing an eschatological by a pragmatic performance criterion. Probably this is a concomitant of economic modernization, since the highly upwardly mobile individuals tend to identify with the successful system. There is an apparent paradox here, however, for we have already noted that economic modernizaticn requires intense achievement orientation; yet this orientation is, according to the preceding analysis, motivated by identification with a successfully modernized economic system. A more dynamic model, based on historical study,37 would indicate that the initial impulse toward achievement orientation did come in large measure from Communist doctrine (semetimes regarded as a surrogate for the Protestant ethic), but that in the recent system (as, perhaps, in the contemporary United States) achievement motivation is, for the time being, derived from secondary phenomena. In other words a modernized society, whether Soviet or Western, tends to maintain its achievement momentum—though perhaps not indefinitely-whereas the crucial question for a moderrizing society in its early stage is how the achievement ethic is to be inculcated.

C. As compared to Western European welfare administrators, Soviet welfare administrators are lower in career motivation.

While the number of informants was far too small to provide conclusive evidence, this is one of the most striking suggestions advanced by the Western European administrators who were in close touch with their Soviet counterparts. Visiting Western European school officials who were impressed by the Soviet school system in general, nevertheless found that Soviet educational administrators in particular seemed to be low both in ability and in motivation. Many apparently owe their posts to political reliability rather than educational criteria. The better teachers, on the other hand, tend to avoid promotions to administrative posts in order to remain in truly educational work. It is particularly noteworthy that these remarks were all made by Western Europeans who were themselves committed to careers in educational administration; similar views were expressed by social security and public health officials concerning their Soviet counterparts.

To a considerable extent, this situation is a result of the low priority placed upon welfare administration as compared to production by Communist ideology, for this priority inevitably results in less capable people being drawn into welfare administration, and in their having slighter prospects of career rewards. On the other hand, the "new man" in Communist society, (if he were really achieved) should not be influenced by such considerations. In fact, as indicated above, the more capable candidates tend to reject welfare administrative posts because they prefer technical activities to involvement in a politicized administration. These considerations seem at least in part a result of economic modernization, which has at the same time encouraged greater concern with personal values and choice of occupation and weakened ideological motivation. In a sense then, welfare administration in a modernizing totalitarian context would seem subject to a vicious circle of deterioration, in which the administrators (but not the practitioners) tend to become constantly lower in quality. Obviously the evidence is too slight to sustain a longterm projection, however.

D. Eschatological criteria are more important for Soviet welfare administrators than for Western European welfare administrators or Soviet production administrators.

This finding is almost a corrollary of the previous proposition; it is also borne out by more direct observations. Welfare administrators were prepared, usually, to argue doctrinal points more than were production officials. For example, a Western European social security administrator noted that despite the very evident problem of alcoholism, Soviet health administrators contended that the need for psychiatric treatment had drastically declined because Communism has eliminated alcoholism and prostitution. As suggested in section IV. B. above, however, this greater conviction of the validity of Communism's millenial promises is not incompatible with a belief (among school administrators) in the concurrent success of the system and the individual. To the extent to which the Soviet political and social system is less modernized than the economic system, one would expect welfare administrators and other more politically involved officials to be the more eschatologically motivated group.

³⁶ Ibid., p. 81.

³ See Merle Fainsod, "Bureaucracy and Modern zation: The Russian and Soviet Case," in LaPalombara, op. cit.

E. An engineering approach or technocratic approach toward human problems is more characteristic of Soviet than of Western European administrators.

A subject holding a peculiar fascination for many Western European informants was the possibility of a tendency toward technocracy in the USSR. While some disagreed on the meaning of this term, a fairly broad consensus prevailed that it implied a social system in which numerous highly skilled technical experts disposed of great material resources without notable political interference. To some informants, the strength of the ideological motivations described above precluded the Soviet administrator's rejecting political direction. To others, it was precisely the ability to dispose of vast resources which constituted the appeal of the Soviet system for administrators of engineering background. Such an appeal is understandable. Social theory notes that some groups, such as corporation management in Western societies, tend to adopt a single aspect of another group's ideology-in this case the engineer's approach to broader problems.38 It would hardly be surprising if Soviet administrators, so many of whom were trained as engineers, unconsciously accepted elements of the "engineering" approach to human problems.

To some informants, the Soviet administrator's engineering approach to human problems appeared to be a source of callousness. A director of a Western European civil service training school was dismayed by the lack of human feeling in Soviet administrators (trained as engineers), their readiness to pass judgment upon others, and their unwillingness to admit sociological and psychological causes for delinguencies. There is no necessary contradiction between these harsh attitudes in interpersonal relations and the tendency, which a Western European planning official found very prominent, for high Soviet planners to be aware of and concerned with broad problems arising from developments like automation. There is a general trend, apparently, for really first-class administrators to become less parochial in outlook and more concerned with the broad problems of their society as they rise higher in the bureaucratic scale.39 A modernized economic system both encourages and requires such administrators. But the values they bring to these broader concerns do not usually transcend those stressed by the ideology in which the administrators have been indoctrinated.

V. RECAPITULATION

Western European and Soviet administrative behavior are essentially similar in the following characteristics:

- B. The extent of departures from hierarchical command principles in industrial production and foreign trade.
- III. A. The importance of informal relationships.
- II. C. Persisting associations between former classmates.
- IV. B. Replacement of eschatological by performance criteria as motivations.

In addition, the following, though accentuated in the Soviet administration, do not present very marked differences from Western European administrative behavior:

- I. C. The authority acquired by staff or functional agencies through their power of reporting directly to the top of the command structure.
- D. Friction between line and staff administrators.

Following the assumption that Western Europe represents the norm of administration in a politically and economically developed society, and that a modernized economy now prevails in the USSR, one can tentatively conclude that the above characteristics are requirements of an economically, but not necessarily a politically modernized society.

It is more difficult to separate the factors of Communist doctrine and the requirements of economic modernization in explaining the differences between Western European and Soviet administrative behavior, since no direct detailed comparison of the Soviet administration and that of a non-totalitarian modernizing system has been made. Both factors probably influence most of the differences, but one can attempt an analytic differentiation. The influence of doctrine seems to be the prime determining factor for:

- A. Departures from hierarchical principles in the formal structure of Soviet welfare administration.
- C. The authority acquired by staff agencies through their power of reporting directly to the top of the command structure.
- I. D. Friction between line and staff administrators.
- II. A. Overloading of vertical communication channels.

³⁸ Vernon K. Dibble, "Occupations and Ideologies," American Journal of Sociology, Vol. 68 (1962), pp. 229-241.

³⁹ Ibid.

- II. B. Inefficiency of formal communication.⁴⁰
- III. B. Basing of informal relationships on career contacts.
- IV. C. Lower motivation of welfare administrators.
- IV. D. Higher ideological motivation of welfare administrators.

All of the above characteristics are also heavily influenced, directly or indirectly, by the factor of recent and rapid economic modernization, except (to a large extent) I. C. and I. D. which are precisely the characteristics which represent the least difference (in this group) between Western European and Soviet administrative behavior. The following characteristics, on the other hand, appear to be primarily determined by the extent to which modernization has been rapid and recent, though they are all heavily influenced, directly or indirectly, by Communist doctrine:

- II. C. Internal pressures for improving formal communications.
- -0 Russian tradition is a third factor influencing at least this characteristic.

- III. D. Ethnic solidarity as a basis for informal relationships.
- IV. A. Intense career achievement orientation among production administrators.
- IV. E. An engineering or technocratic approach toward human problems.

If these latter characteristics are really due to rapid and recent modernization, they should, of course, decline in importance as the Soviet economy becomes fully modernizedthough the fruition of II. C. depends on overcoming political barriers. Consequently, apart from the difficulty of obtaining confirmatory data, they should be relatively easy to test. Whether or not these characteristics actually apply to all administrations in societies with rapidly modernizing economies can, of course, be tested only by extensive comparative studies. The second group of propositions, on the other hand, despite a certain measure of incompatibility with economic modernization, will prevail unless political modernization takes place—i.e., unless Communist doctrine ceases to be a significant force. That question, of course, requires consideration in a far broader context than the study of comparative administration.

IDEOLOGICAL CORRELATES OF RIGHT WING POLITICAL ALIENATION IN MEXICO*

KENNETH F. JOHNSON Colorado State University, Fort Collins

Evaluations of single-party democracy in Mexico have yielded a substantial literature from the researches of contemporary scholars.¹ Their primary subjects of treatment have been the institutionalized agents of moderation and compromise that have made Mexico one of Latin America's more stable political systems. In prosecuting these studies, however, only scant attention has been given to political groups outside the officially sanctioned "revolutionary family" of the Partido Revolucionario Institucional. The PRI has maintained a virtual monopoly of elective and appointive offices since 1929 and traditionally has been thought of as affiliating to itself the only politically relevant groups in Mexico.

Modern Mexican political life has always had its "out groups" and splinter parties. Mostly, they have come and gone, leaving little or no impact upon the political system which they have attempted to influence. Howard Cline has contended that opposition groups in Mexico find it impossible to woo the electorate away from the PRI and thus feel forced to adopt demagoguery and other extreme postures which serve only to reduce their popular

* An abbreviated version of this paper was prepared for delivery at the Annual Convention of the Western Political Science Association, March 19, 1965, at Victoria, B. C., Canada. Field work on the project was supported by Rockefeller Foundation funds received via the University of Denver Social Science Foundation.

¹ Cf. L. Vincent Padgett, "Mexico's One-Party System: A Re-Evaluation," this Review, Vol. 51 (Dec., 1957) pp. 995-1008; Martin C. Needler, "The Political Development of Mexico," ibid, Vol. 55 (June, 1961), pp 308-312; Philip B Taylor, Jr, "The Mexican Elections of 1958: Affirmation of Authoritarianism," Western Political Quarterly, Vol 13 (Sep., 1960), pp. 722-744; Robert E. Scott, Mexican Government in Transition (University of Illinois Press, Urbana, 1959); Howard Cline, Mexico: Revolution to Evolution, 1940-1960 (Oxford University Press, London, 1962); William P. Glade and Charles W. Anderson, The Political Economy of Mexico (University of Wisconsin Press, Madison, 1963); David T. Garza, "Factionalism in the Mexican Left: The Frustration of the MLN," Western Political Quarterly, Vol. 17 (September, 1964), pp. 447-60.

appeal.² Cline writes further, "in nearly every case, the dissidents return quietly to the PRI ranks, without prejudice or reprisals." The historical accuracy of these contentions goes unquestioned here. Rather, I seek to explore, using modern analytic techniques, the possibility that Mexico is becoming a less rigid single-party authoritarian system, that it may be moving instead toward a cooperative two-or even three-party system surrounded by a number of alienated but relevant satellite groups.

I undertake this with due deference to the works just cited, whose authors have told much of the Mexican story and told it well. In addition, I respond directly to Merle Kling's recent dictum that it is time to "assume the risks of creating and testing hypotheses, formulating generalizations and theories" about the nature of change in contemporary Mexican politics.4 This cannot be done if potentially relevant "out groups" continue to be neglected. Kling refers to "risks." One is surely the chance that the Mexican "out groups" selected for study are not indeed politically relevant. My criteria for relevance, stated below, are intended to obviate that difficulty. Perhaps a more severe risk is conservative resistance to the very suggestion that groups outside the "revolutionary family" may be gaining political relevance within the Mexican system. But to offer such a suggestion is my prime purpose.

Ι

When the Mexican Revolution was scarcely one year old, the following challenge was hurled against its leader:

Mexicans: Consider that the cunning and bad faith of a man are shedding blood in an outrageous manner because of his incapacity to govern ... we turn arms against him for having betrayed the Revolution ... (Emiliano Zapata et. al., Plan de Ayala, 1911, as quoted in Heriberto Garcia Rivas, Breve Historia de la Revolución Mexicana, México, Editorial Diana, 1964, p. 112)

² Cline, op. cit., p. 168.

³ Ibid.

^{&#}x27;Merle Kling, "Area Studies and Comparative Politics," American Behavioral Scientist, Vol. 8 (September, 1964), p. 10.

Those words were voiced in outrage over a promised land reform that had not materialized. After a half-century of equally inspiring promises, and of progress along many lines, one still hears words faintly reminiscent of those above.

Citizens: by means of the vote you can once and for all put an end to the lies, exploitation and fraud of those who would profiteer from the Revolution. With no other arms than your honorable and clean vote, citizens, National Action is confident of victory. (From a speech by José González Torres, presidential candidate of Partido de Acción Nacional, as printed in La Nación, 17 mayo, 1964, p. 32)

Both expressions are examples of political alienation, but there is an important difference in degree. The one is a call to armed rebellion; the other acknowledges the silent force of popular challenge in an honestly counted vote. Measurement of such contemporary political alienation in Mexico is the immediate task of this paper. Political alienation is one element in a larger theoretic formulation that I have described elsewhere as an analytic approach to the study of stability and instability in the Latin American political culture.5 In Mexico, political alienation will be understood to mean a specific and identifiable syndrome of ideology and behavior which is manifest in support for, sympathy toward, or participation in political extremism. This, in turn, is defined (for Mexico) as advocacy of violence, advocacy of a conspiratorial interpretation of Mexican political life (including the doctrine that the political system is manipulated by hostile foreign powers or by a treasonable internal cabal), advocacy of turning the government of Mexico or its major subdivisions over to private enterprise or to the Roman Catholic Church, or advocacy of the total abandonment of constitutional government. This definition was designed with right wing alienation in mind but a modified version of it could prove suitable for left wing alienation as well.

Before coming to the present scene, let us look back briefly over the development of right wing ideology in Mexico. One sees it nurtured in the Querétaro Club of 1810 that produced Hidalgo and Allende and in the subsequent rebellions against the gachupines. Reactionary ideology thrived during the regimes of Iturbide and Santa Anna, and burst forth in the clerical opposition to Lerco, Juarez, Ocampo and to the Liberal Constitution of 1857. Ultra-conservative thought was rejuvenated for thirty-five years by the cientificos during the Pax Porfiriana, and passed thereafter into the hands of the cristeros who fought Calles and Vasconcelos who unsuccessfully opposed Ortiz Rubio. Ultimately, it was crystallized in the organized popular reactions to Lázaro Cárdenas's reform era during the 1930s. The latter period is particularly important for this study since it included the genesis of two groups that are of chief concern here.

Especially bitter targets of reactionary attack were Cárdenas's sweeping nationalizations of industry, accelerated distribution of agricultural lands via the usufructory device of ejidos, and stricter enforcement of the anticlerical provisions of the Constitution of 1917. Those who organized against Cárdenas and his political predecessors embraced an ideological outlook that persists in Mexico today and is gaining political relevance. I shall term it "restorationism." Mexico's restorationists are those who would return to the Church its political and financial privileges, to the great families or abolengo the land, and to the unhampered forces of the marketplace business and commerce.

They are, to some extent, those whose aspirations for socio-economic advantage are thwarted by restricted access to places of influence within the governing single-party system. In short, the revolutionary machinery has not accommodated itself adequately to the psychological and material requirements of all relevant and active political sectors in Mexico. True to the prototype of France's experience following 1789, the Mexican Revolution scored a violent dislocation of the political status quo, radically changed the social structure, but preserved seeds of potential unrest by its failure to supplant entirely the reactionary right. Today, Mexico's restorationists have two principal organized forms, Unión Nacional Sinarquista and Partido de Acción Nacional.⁶

The term sinarquismo is a corruption of two words, sin anarquia, without anarchy—or in better English, with order. Order, orden, as the name of its official journal implies, is the hallmark of Union Nacional Sinarquista. It is an order of Christian democracy, first under God, then under a God-fearing state. UNS members are ardent practicing Roman Catholics, disciplined soldiers of a theocratic faith. The movement was born (according to official doctrine) amid an explosion of enthusiasm, faith, and courage.7 The basic committee that proclaimed UNS from León. Guanajuato in 1937 consisted of José Antonio Urquiza, José Trueba Olivares, Manuel Zermeño, Juan Ignacio Padilla, Rubén and Guillermo Mendoza Heredia. So intense was the local popular frenzy in response to their declarations that the Governor of Guanajuato, an appointee and puppet for President Cárdenas, drove the committee from his state, whereupon they established offices in Mexico City and began publication of a mimeographed El Boletín in an effeort to develop a national organization.8

⁶ Several lesser groups that have been variously affiliated with PAN and UNS are Acción Católica Mexicana (which cannot legally call itself a party because of the constitutional prohibition against use of religious titles in political organization), Unión Nacional de Pacres de Familia, and Partido Nacionalista de México.

⁵ Kenneth F. Johnson, "Causal Factors in Latin American Political Instability," Western Political Quarterly, Vol. 17 (September, 1964), pp. 432-446.

Although José Antonio Urquiza is most often called the Founder of UNS, its first national chief to hold working office was José Trueba Olivares who still lives as a retired attorney in his native León. Soon after taking office, Trueba resigned for "economic reasons" and was followed by Manuel Zermeño.

The assassination of José Antonio Urquiza in 1938 was the first of many crises for UNS. Its stepped-up counter-offensive against an alleged Communist design to liquidate it produced a period of ambiguous rioting and bloodshed about the country, which lasted throughout the war years in the 1940s and which the sinarquistas stubbornly blame on the political left. The same disorders were blamed by the ⁷ Juan Ignacio Padilla, El Sinarquismo (2d ed., Ediciones UNS, México, 1953), p. 25.

Cárdenas regime on fascist elements within sinarquismo.

It is fair to say that the sinarquistas did cause a great amount of trouble for Cárdenas and for his successors. But since the labor riots around the time of the 1958 presidential succession (blamed officially on both leftists and rightists), sinarquismo has tended to function as a pacific, although not passive, civic opposition. As an ideology that is essentially restorationist, sinarquismo finds little likeness between its own image of the ideal state and the political realities of contemporary Mexico.

The second major political group in Mexico that reflects a restorationist ideology is the Partido de Acción Nacional. PAN was founded two years later than UNS, as a distinct part of the conservative reaction to Cárdenas. Sinarquistas are quick to point out that they antedate PAN and that it was formed out of splinter elements from their own group. Although many panistas deny this, enough agree with it to make the contention plausible. Most scholars of Mexican politics have agreed that PAN is the only serious opposition to the official PRI.

PAN emerged as a political party in September, 1939, at a convention held in Mexico City, and claims as its founder Manuel Gómez Morín, an attorney who is still active in the party's national organization. Unlike UNS, PAN has always considered itself a political party and, except in 1940 and 1946, has offered congressional, state, and presidential candidates throughout Mexico. In its appeals, PAN

UNS members indicate that it could be easy to mistake religious vehemence and anti-semitism for a full-scale commitment to Nazi or Fascist doctrine. I take issue with Cline only in suggesting that branding this group as a "fascist type organization" does not give the sinarquistas credit for the truly progressive civic spirit which I have known them to demonstrate. See footnote 10, below.

to protest unfair property taxation and public service scandals); Agrupación de Iniciativa Privada Pro-Morelos (formed in Cuernavaca during 1962 in protest over fiscal mismanagement of statefunds); Unión Civica Defensora de los Intereses del Pueblo (formed in Tepic, Nayarit to protest abuses in meter reading and collection of water charges by the municipal government during 1964).

⁸ Ibid.

⁹ On July 11, 1939, in Celaya, Guanajuato, a woman sinarquista, Teresita Bustos, was murdered while performing in a UNS rally. As a symbolic gesture of unity each outgoing national president of UNS delivers to his successor the flag which she was carrying at the time of her death (Orden, 31 de mayo, 1964, p. 2). The ceremony is repeated annually in the main plaza of León, Guanajuato, where the sinarquistas hold a mass pilgrimage, normally during March. Sinarquista leaders wear armbands bearing a geographic shape of Mexico. They march in a semi-military fashion that has given sinarquismo the largely erroneous appearance of being Fascist- or Nazioriented. Use of a Hitler-type hand salute reinforces this image. In an earlier work, Howard Cline developed the theme of fascism in sinarquismo, The United States and Mexico (Harvard University Press, Cambridge, 1953), p. 320. My own experiences in interviewing and knowing carefully avoids direct attacks upon those institutions which are traditionally mexicano and are important symbols of nationhood. Thus the Constitution of 1917 (except for Article 3) is upheld as a basis for freedom and equality among Mexicans. PAN charges the PRI with "bastardization" of this great work through administrative abuses of liberty. Principal foci of the PAN attack are the anti-clerical provisions of the Constitution11 and the extension of state capitalism into the traditionally private sector. Today's panistas include the abolengo, old estabished families whose wealth and position have been reduced or threatened, certain of the nouveaux riches who aspire to greater places, many of the upwardly mobile middle class who "never quite made it," and an uncertain base of peasants and artisans whose susceptibility to clerical propaganda has placed them within PAN ranks. Philip Taylor correctly observed that FAN claims a heavy female membership.12 Having never been able to claim more than 12 percent of the officially reported vote in a presidential election, PAN carries the image of a wear and ineffectual alternative to PRI.

II

Few contemporary observers will deny that Unión Nacional Sinarquista and Partido de Acción Nacional represent bodies of alienated political sentiment. But are they politically relevant and, if so by what criteria? Politically relevant alienation must be of sufficient magnitude to pose a threat (latent, incipient, or actual to the stability of a political system. The threat can be judged by the adaptive responses it is able to force upon the operative power structure, upon the incumbent custodians of the political status quo. Merely to direct frustration and aggression against the state is not erough. The stewards of political power must actually see an organized group as a threat to system stability and condition their behavior to that belief; i.e., they must react adaptively or defensively. Thus a recent study 11 Arcicle 3 of the Constitution of 1917 prohibits priests, ministers, and ecclesiastics generally from participating in primary or secondary religious nstruction. The Revolutionary regime has interpreted this to include the teaching of religion in public schools as well. Under the López Mateos regime (1958-64) a program of gratuitous distribution of textbooks was initiated by the national government. The texto único has preoccupied much of the right-wing attack on officialdom because it deliberately does not mention religion or the name of God.

by David Garza points to the low political efficacy of fragmented leftist groups in Mexico that are associated with the Movimiento de de Liberación Nacional. It is questionable whether these formations are politically relevant in the Mexican system, since they are not so viewed by the status quo regime. In the light of recent events surrounding the 1964 presidential succession, however, there is a strong basis for arguing that Mexican rightist alienates are coming to be viewed as politically relevant.

Elsewhere, I have described in some detail the machinations of political groups during the 1964 presidential campaign.14 The evidence I have to present in support of the contention that UNS and PAN are viewed as politically relevant by the status quo regime may be shortly summarized here. Several months prior to the voting in July, Union Nacional Sinarquista entered into a coalition agreement with a nearly defunct splinter party, the Partido Nacionalista de México. The latter, PNM, enjoyed official recognition by the Secretaría de Gobernación and was to be placed on the official ballot as a registered opposition party. When word of the UNS-PNM alliance became public, the Secretaria de Gobernación cancelled the PNM registration, ostensibly on the ground that the party lacked the legally required membership of 75,000. Confidential sources in PAN, UNS. PNM, and even in PRI itself admitted that the cancellation was a reaction to the threat of a large sinarquista vote for PNM candidates for the Cámara de Diputados. UNS spokesman claimed it could muster a popular vote somewhat in excess of one million. Under Mexico's new electoral law, this could place up to twenty sinarquistas, or their sympathizers, in the Congress.15 Moreover, I was informed 18 Garza, op. cit., passim.

¹⁴ See my "Political Alienation in Mexico: A Preliminary Examination of UNS and PAN," The Rocky Mountain Social Science Journal, Vol. 2 (May, 1965), pp. 155-63.

15 The reformed electoral law was a major issue in the campaign and was stressed by PRI candidate Gustavo Díaz Ordaz and incumbent President Adolfo López Mateos as the Revolutionary party's guarantee of an honest and "clean" election (Novedades, 12 de junio, 1964, front page). The new law provided a "mixed system" of proportional representation for the Cámara de Diputados. A registered party could win either electoral districts or deputies at large known as diputados de partido, or both. For deputies at large, the party would have to win at least 2.5 per cent of the total national vote for deputies, a means of that the original demand for the cancellation came from the national committee of Acción Nacional which feared loss of its own "privileged" status as the "official opposition party." This testimony came from highly placed sources in the groups involved, whose confidence I had cultivated over the past several years, and whose testimony could be viewed as reliable.

¹² Taylor, op. cit., p. 741.

We may say, therefore, that the incumbent regime's defensive reaction to the threat of a UNS-PNM alliance is an indicator of the potential, if not actual, relevance of that combination in the Mexican system. By coopting PAN as its official opposition, PRI recognized the relevance of that group as well. Maintenance of a favored opposition party may be an instrument for periodic legitimizing of what still remains a single-party democracy. Significantly, and for the first time in post-revolutionary Mexican politics, an opposition candidate publicly admitted honest defeat without disparaging the election and was warmly thanked by the winner for this gesture of "political maturity."17 This points to an important fact that was independently corroborated in confidential interviews. The upper hierarchy of PAN is no longer as acutely alienated toward the single-party system as it was in recent years.18 The main body of eliminating parties which contested in only a few states. Winning the 2.5 per cent vote meant an automatic receipt of five deputy seats. Then, one additional seat would be awarded for each one-half per cent of the national total, up to a limit of twenty seats. PRI, Primera Reunión Nacional de Programación (México, 1963), pp. 292-293.

18 In return for its guaranteed status as an "official opposition," PAN leaders gave its pledge to support the official election returns. As an additional bonus, PAN was guaranteed twenty diputados de partido, less those elected from districts. Two panistas were declared district winners in Chihuahua and León and the total national vote for PAN candidates was sufficient to guarantee the remaining eighteen deputies. According to informed sources in both PRI and PAN, the official returns of the election were reported honestly but the official regime was prepared to keep its commitment to PAN regardless.

¹⁷ Novedades, 11 de julio, 1964, front page. On June 15 the same periodical carried a cartoon whose caption wryly summarized the plight of PAN as follows: "hay algo peor que no ganar.. perder, sin fraude." [There is something worse than not winning...losing without fraud.]

¹⁸ The 1958 presidential campaign period was marked with severely alienated pronouncements severely alienated sentiment that can be properly attributed to the Mexican right wing, therefore, continues to be the sinarquistas and lower echelon panistas who do not see themselves as beneficiaries of deals—"sweetheart contracts," in the terminology of labor relations—such as the recent rapprochement of PAN and PRI.

If working relationships exist between PRI and PAN there is little sympathy for them in the lower echelons of Acción Nacional. It became patently clear in interviewing panistas that many have defected out of disgust for alleged deals betweeen the rival parties, even at the local level. A number of former PAN members were found working in the context of UNS, boycotting the 1964 election, or casting ballots for independent rightist candidates. Repeatedly, I found rank and file PAN members harboring intense resentment and hatred toward developments in their political arena. These restorationists, along with many of their sinarquista counterparts, frequently volun-

by PAN's leadership. Luis H. Alvarez blamed all the ills of Mexico and of the world on the PRI. He cursed his defeat as an enormous fraud leaving strained relations between the two parties. There was certainly a great amount of fraud in the 1958 election, but not enough by itself to have taken the presidency away from Alvarez. However, the election was conducted in a tense atmosphere that involved the murder of one PAN campaign worker and several attacks on Alvarez himself. This writer interviewed Luis H. Alvarez after the election and did not find him to be the demagogue that Taylor pictured him, op. cit., p. 741. The violence of the opposition to his presidential candidacy undoubtedly accounted for much of PAN's extreme alienation in 1958. None of these misfortunes were visited upon José González Torres in 1964, which—in all likelihood due to the rapprochement of PAN and PRI-made the most recent campaign appear much less antagonistic. Significantly, the campaign's only reported violence of serious proportions was directed against the PRI. An attack by stone-throwers on Díaz Ordaz in Chihuahua city (see Indice, 7 de abril, 1964, front page) and a frustrated dynamite attempt in Nuevo Casas Grandes (see La Nación, 26 de abril, 1964, p. 11) were officially blamed by the regime on the leftist splinter group Frente Electoral del Pueblo. One of their leaders, Braulio Maldonado Sández (a former governor of Baja California Norte) was deported as a result of the incident. Similar happenings during the 1958 campaign were blamed exclusively (and in many cases unfairly) on Acción Nacional and the sinarquistas.

teered the belief that violence of 1910 proportions would again be an ultimate necessity in restoring true democracy to Mexico.

On the basis of the preceding observations, it will be the major contention of this paper that Partido de Acción Nacional has been partially coorted into the Mexican single-party system and that Unión Nacional Sinarquista now serves as the principal catalyst for articulation of alenated restorationist sentiment in Mexico. It is contended further that ideological differences between UNS and PAN are amenable to emp rical verification and measurement.

Quantitative techniques for multivariate analysis were utilized in order to examine these contentions and to isolate correlates of political alienation among Mexican rightists. On the basis of the author's previous fieldwork, the state of Guanajuato was selected as a research site. Guanajuato offered the advantage of being relatively compact, with all major urban centers accessible by bus. It is also the symbolic home of sinarquismo and a traditional stronghold of the Partido de Acción Nacional. The author and a graduate assistant arranged a series of interviews with UNS and PAN leaders in the four principal cities of the state, León, Irapuato, Guanajuato, and Celaya. Their cooperation was secured for purposes of distributing a measuring instrument to key members of each group.

UKS and PAN have an overlapping membership. Because neither group would divulge its total membership list it was impossible to draw two independent samples. Definition of the proper universe for which population parameters would be generalized was handled, therefore, on the basis of an exhaustive sample of what might here be called the "esoteric" members of each group. In practical terms, this meant the basic municipal committees for both UNS and PAN in each of the cities specified above. Between twenty-five and thirty intensive nterviews were held with group leaders who in turn promised to distribute the questionnaires to all of their municipal committee members. A return of ninety-six percent was secured by mail and later by personal follow-up. Although the sample is not necessarily adequate for generalization about the total Mexican universe of UNS and PAN members, the results of processing the data using standard tests of significance yield strong inferences that, in all likelihood, do represent Mexico's restorationist ideologues.

Although, as just stated, it was not possible to draw two completely independent samples of UNS and PAN members, the responses were sorted on the basis of answers to question thirty-four which asked the respondent to state which political party or group he preferred to see gain political power during the next five years. This item discriminated the respondents into roughly equal groups, and so provided a basis for statistical comparison. The questionnaire consisted of forty items including standard SES and attitudinal variables together with scalogram items of the Guttman-Himmelstrand type. ¹⁹ Most of the correlations were without major statistical significance. Those that achieved significance appear in Table 1.

From these data it is apparent that the sinarquistas have a much more instrumental orientation to concrete human problems (such as unemployment) than do the panistas in this sample. The UNS respondents seem geared for concrete action while more of the PAN respondents are willing to take refuge in an emotive "resort to principle" approach. The sinarquistas are decidedly less optimistic about their future chances for improvement in status. This corroborates the general impression I have gathered in knowing and interviewing members of both groups. PAN members scored much higher on the SES index than did the UNS members. Although the sinarquista scores on social gregariousness point toward withdrawal, at least in terms of discussion outside the primary group, it is well to remember that sinarquismo is something of a large primary group in itself and it would be possible, therefore, for members to see themselves as operating within esoteric confines. The incidence of sinarquista-led pressure movements throughout Mexico that was cited earlier is adequate testimony to the fact that UNS members do not generally feel that they lack political efficacy as a result of their being denied overt participation. Finally, and significantly, the sinarquistas took a decidedly jaundiced view of public morality while panistas expressed a more laudatory evaluation. This finding lends weight to the contention that Acción

19 The questionnaire represented this author's second pilot attempt to devise an instrument for attitudinal measurement for use among a specialized Latin American clientele. The scalogram components yielded a coefficient of reproducibility of .63 in the instrumental items but failed to scale at all in the emotive or "High L" items (cf. Ulf Himmelstrand, Social Pressures, Attitudes, and Democratic Processes, Stockholm, Almquist and Wiksell, 1960). While insufficient to be reported here, these findings did provide insight into the problem of instrument construction in the Spanish vernacular.

TABLE I. ALIENATION CORRELATES OF PAN AND UNS MEMBERSHIP

Item	Partido de Acción Nacional (N = 45)		Unión Nacional Sinarquista (N = 52)		p under H₀ that x≥chi square
	%	N	%	N	MARKET LA
R's participation in organizations that seek to solve such community problems as unemployment				,
often	32	15	33	17
sometimes	27	12	48	25
rarely or never	41	18	19	10	.05
It's easy to make up my mind about solving the unemployment problem. It's just a matter of principle.*
agree	28	13	21	11
undecided	42	19	25	13
disagree	30	13	54	28	.05
R's optimism as to his own chances for socio-economic mobility high	36	16	17	9
medium	39	18	28	15
low	25	11	55	28	.01
R's discussion of social and economic problems with persons outside the primary group
often	35	16	18	9
sometimes	42	19	. 23	12
rarely or never	23	10	59	31	.001
R's view of change in the morality			, of Mexican public officials during the past twenty years.†		•
improved	27	12	10	5
the same	48	22	21	11
worse	25	11	69	36	.001

^{*} This was one of the Himmerstrand-type items which produced a statistically significant correlation with group partisanship. In an earlier work I suggested the hypothesis that "High L" political actors may be the most acutely alienated toward the political system (cf. "Causal Factors in Latin American Political Instability," op. cit.) The data above do not at all confirm that hypothesis.

† Admittedly, there is some ambiguity in the second response category for this item. It could be Nacional is gradually being coopted into the single-party system.

III

The foregoing results of an attitudinal survey in one Mexican state are insufficient to call into question Philip Taylor's assessment in 1958 that Mexico seemed to be a "smoothly running authoritarian regime." The potential threat to the stability of the system that is repsented by restorationist ideologues is not at the moment large enough to justify alarm. If PAN is being coopted into the "revolutionary family," other rightist formations may come to be similarly blessed, especially under the conciliatory new regime of Gustavo Díaz [†] Admittedly, there is some ambiguity in the second response category for this item. It could be argued that answering "the same" meant "the same old immorality" to the PAN and UNS respondents.

²⁰ Taylor, op. cit., p. 729.

Ordaz. Thus we could expect to see an enlarged brotherhood of revolucionarios dividing eventually into a smoothly running multiparty system. Then, UNS and its leftist counterparts would no longer occupy satellite positions. The probabilities of such a development are difficult to calculate.

The nexus between political alienation and potential instability must not be forgotten, however, and the direction taken by such relevant "out groups" as Unión Nacional Sinarquista, either toward or away from integration into the national political life, will be critical for any effort to hypothesize the broad outlines of Mexican political change. Continued rightwing political alienation of the restorationist variety could have serious implications for stability within the Mexican political system.

Mexican restorationists view social conflict as the product of a sinister design engineered by political cabals. Their ideology does not embrace a rationalized concept of human misunderstanding and error. Restorationists feel they are denied both political participation and equality of socio-economic opportunity. Competitive material consumption, which Robert E. Lane found to be a stability factor for American political ideologies,21 does not operate to reduce ideological polarization in Mexico. In fact, the sinarquistas and some panistas moralize their demands for status and deference to a degree that encourages polarization and political cleavage. The Mexican restorationist does not "morselize"22 his conceptual approach to political issues but rather looks beyond the dayafter-tomorrow issues in life to an ethereal vision of the perfect future. Estranged from the main thrust of Mexican revolutionary ideology, the restorationist hoists the spectre of his martyred heroes and withdraws his support of the political status quo. He expects the system to respond only to his minimal needs of personal security, not to his aspirations for mobility and achievement. Protest movements against established government policies, therefore, are designed more to dramatize evil and injustice than to bring about a constructive redress of grievances.

Is the system just? Indeed not, in the minds of Mexican restorationists. Unintentionally, but poignantly, the spirit of their dilemma was captured by Carlos Fuentes in these lines from La Muerte de Artemio Cruz:

It is a sin, a very grave sin against the Holy Spirit to refuse to receive the gifts of heaven . . .

everyone should go forth to farm the land, to harvest the crops, to deliver the fruits of the earth to their legitimate landlord, a christian landlord who pays for the obligations of his privilege by promptly delivering a tenth to Holy Mother Church. God punishes disobedience.

-And justice, father?

—Final justice is imparted up there, son.

Do not look for it in this vale of tears.²³

There can be no felt sense of justice in this life, say the sinarquistas, when the political system which governs them is manipulated by one or all of several protean cabals. No one cabal will do for every occasion. Jews, Masons, Communists, gringos, all are believed to interact concertedly in a voracious web of planned aggression against the Mexican nation.

The practical implication of this evaluation can be stated briefly. Conspicuous supporters of the official regime will be, and are, targets for the wrath of alienated "out groups." Accurrately or not, United States Ambassador Fulton Freeman was quoted as having endorsed the candidacy of Díaz Ordaz in May, 1964. In a rare moment of affinity between left and right, the allegation brought outcries from editors of PAN and UNS publications as well as from a leading left wing publication (Politica) with strong marxist leanings.24 Ambassador Freeman was likened to former ambassadors Poinsett and Wilson, two damaging symbols of influence in Mexican-American history. Such an event takes on added significance if, although momentarily, it forces opposing "out groups" into a negative coalition of anti-Americanism.

More common are the cases of defensive adaptation by the status quo regime in the face of restorationist pressure. A dramatic example of this occurred during February, 1963, when the official regime in San Luis Potosí seized and destroyed the first printing of a restorationist-oriented book that exposed local government corruption.²⁵ Later that year, PAN and UNS came out openly together protesting

²³ Carlos Fuentes, La Muerte de Artemio Cruz (México, Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1962), p. 46.

²⁴ Politica, 1 junio, 1964, p. 19.

²⁵ Antonio Estrada M. La Grieta en el Yugo (2d ed., México, no publisher cited, 1963). The first edition was destroyed and the press that produced it wrecked by the government of San Luis Potosí. The work is a crude tabloid but contains photographs of documents and detailed accounts of events in San Luis Potosí which were largely corroborated by independent observers interviewed by this author.

²¹ Robert E. Lane, Political Ideology (Glencoe, 1962) p. 80.

²² Ibid., pp. 346-363.

electoral fraud in the municipal elections of Apaseo el Grande, Guanajuato.²⁶ More recently in the same state, sinarquistas were jailed after a public protest meeting at Celaya.²⁷

Mexico's right wing alienates are not yet ready to launch a violent revolution. But they say that they desire one and are building the social and ideological base for it. Finding no external promise of psychic security in a gemeinschaft society of spiritual brotherhood, they take solace in an ideological view that promotes cleavage in the body politic. Excluded from effective involvement in a political system that offers few gestures toward immediate change, the restorationists have constructed an apocalyptic view of eventual salvation and relief. We must place the restorationists at the negative end of the allegiance-alienation continuum. The future of their ideology and behavior, indeed perhaps of political stability in Mexico, will be determined by the direction of change and flexibility in the single-party system.²⁸

²⁶ Based on interviews in Apaseo el Grande and on handbills and other printed propaganda bearing the insignia of both PAN and UNS that are currently in the author's possession.

²⁷ Based on confidential communications recently received from informants in Celaya. A founder of Unión Nacional Sinarquista and currently an important member of its national executive board, Juan Ignacio Padilla, was reportedly kidnapped from a public street in Ensenada, Bcfa., at gunpoint by members of that state's judicial police (see La Suegra de la Cotorra, 29 de noviembre, 1964, front page). There is little doubt that harassment of political restorationists continues throughout Mexico.

²⁸ The only other published effort to measure political attitudes among Mexican rightists is included in the recent work of Gabriel Almond and Sidney Verba, The Civic Culture (Princeton University Press, 1963). Almond and Verba did not include UNS within their sample and they do not isolate alienated nuclei within the Mexican system. They do make the interesting broad contention that Mexicans generally are more alienated from governmental output than respondents of the other four nations (not Latin American) surveyed in their study (p. 495).

MAKING THE JAPANESE CONSTITUTION: A FURTHER LOOK

JUSTIN WILLIAMS*
University of Maryland

American scholars generally take a dim view of the 1946 Constitution of Japan. Because it carries the imprint of a foreign political philosophy and, more particularly, because it was allegedly imposed through the willful and covert action of an American field commander, that instrument, they feel, is off key and should be rewritten. Their case was well stated some years ago by Harold S. Quigley, in these words:

... the SCAP draft Constitution ... has been regarded widely in Japan as a foreign imposition not wholly suited to a people of very different legal and social traditions. . . . [It was] written hastily by men without adequate knowledge of Japanese civilization and with little regard . . . for the national right of self-determination. . . . The decision to prepare a constitution was made by General MacArthur, who interpreted directives from Washington liberally. These directives . . . did not require SCAP to write a new constitution. . . . they specifically laid down . . . that the new-government should be established "in accordance with the freely expressed will of the Japanese people." Moreover . . . "any directives dealing with fundamental changes in the Japanese constitutional structure . . . " were to be "issued only following consultation and the attainment of agreement in the Far Eastern Commission."1

Quigley partisans cling to the basic tenets of this case despite the presentation of new and strong counter-evidence by an official Japanese study mission, sent to the United States in late 1958 to obtain additional information on the

* Justin Williams is assistant to the President (Research) at the University of Maryland. He was chief of the Legislative Division of the Government Section, GHQ, when the draft constitution was debated in the Japanese Imperial Diet.

1 "Revising the Japanese Constitution," Foreign Affairs, Vol. 38, No. 1 (October 1959), p. 140. The Far Eastern Commission, created at Moscow in December 1945, supposedly to make Allied occupation policy, was composed of four veto powers (U. S., Great Britain, U.S.S.R., China) and nine other members (Australia, Canada, France, India, the Netherlands, New Zealand, the Philippines, and—after November 1949—Burma and Pakistan).

origin of the new Constitution. The investigation conducted by this group, according to its leader, Professor Kenzo Takayanagi, "resulted in the explosion of a number of erroneous and harmful surmises."2 The Takayanagi party found, as Quigley relates to the detriment of his own case, that the Supreme Commander in drawing up a model constitution "merely desired that the Japanese Government prepare a draft similar in fundamental principles and basic forms"; that the Mac-Arthur draft was advisory, not mandatory; that it did not contravene the Moscow Agreement of December 1945 creating the Far Eastern Commission; that MacArthur's action "was still following the policy of his home government" for establishing a new political system "in accordance with the freely expressed will of the Japanese people"; and that "The surmise that it was the intention of SCAP to impose an American type constitution... loses sight of the Allied pressure on SCAP."3 But Takayanagi, as we shall see, did not give MacArthur—as distinguished from the United States government—a completely clean bill of

Notwithstanding these findings by agents of the country presumably adversely affected, Quigley refused to give ground. He remained "concerned . . . with the propriety and possible consequences of exerting great influence upon the process of constitutional reform in another state," and he repeated that "this concern was felt by the Far Eastern Commission."4 Thus he continued to believe essentially that Japan was saddled with an ideologically incompatible constitution by the arbitrary action of an American general; and because of this belief, he forecast "a conservative-minded revision . . . [which] would reflect the view of those who characterize the present instrument as alien in authorship and idiom, destructive of the traditional status of the dynasty, disruptive of the family system and restrictive of military power."5

- ² Kenzo Takayanagi, "Making the Japanese Constitution: What Really Happened," Japan Times, March 16, 1959.
 - ³ Quigley, op. cit., p. 142.
 ⁴ Ibid.
- ⁵ Ibid., p. 144. Quigley based this prediction on the probability of a Socialist Party split which subsequently occurred.

Although Quigley's argument is persuasive on first reading, on further examination it is found wanting in certain respects. For instance, it is not entirely consistent in its approach to the naturally conflicting aims of the United States and Japan's conservative leadership regarding the question of constitutional reform. When dealing with the U. S. side, it concedes that much is to be said for the way MacArthur handled a very complex and thorny problem; but on turning to the Japanese side, it tends to interpret MacArthur's part in the drama as being imperious and pernicious. It is partial to the Japanese side. §

Then, too, Quigley's argument treads on shaky ground by giving Americans concerned with Japanese affairs at that time a de facto classification of "bad guys" and "good guys." GHQ in Tokyo is composed of the former and the American home government—meaning the small "Japan Crowd" in the State Department—of the latter. Ignored is the fact that 6 Ardath W. Burks reflects this ambivalence by writing, on the one hand: " . . . Yoshida Shigeru ... feels that [the new Constitution] is well designed for modern Japan. Dr. Takayanagi . . . denied . . . that the constitition was . . . imposed. ... Had the MacArthur Constitition been presented . . . as a sharp break with tradition . . . it might possibly have been accepted and have been acceptable." But on the other hand: "...the historic fact [is] the constitution represents alien authorship, in that it was imposed ... by SCAP. . . . it is safe to predict that public opinion will steadily mobilize behind the movement for limited revision." Ardath W. Burks, The Government of Japan, 2d ed. (New York, 1964), pp. 17-30.

7 To suggest that GHQ arrogated to itself a function which the State Department's Office of Far East Affairs had intended to perform through the instrumentality of the Far Eastern Commission, Hugh Borton writes, relative to the obstinacy of the Japanese government against proposing fundamental constitutional changes: "This situation resulted in the Government Section of SCAP taking steps to make sure that it would play the dominant part in the revision of the Constitution." F. C. Jones, Hugh Borton and B. R. Pearn, Survey of International Affairs, 1939-1946: The Far East, 1942-1946 (London. 1955), p. 329. In a slightly different manner, Theodore McNelly suggests that MacArthur usurped the constitutional revision role: "[Inasmuch as] 'any directives dealing with fundamental changes in the Japanese constitutional structure ... will be issued only following ... agreement in the Far Eastern Commission' . . . it would apthe President of the United States, the Secretary of State, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Congress, and the American press and public did not interpret MacArthur's actions on governmental reform as in contravention of U. S. policy, disobedience of orders, or disregard of the will of the Japanese people. It follows from this that if governmental change in Japan had taken a course to satisfy the Quigley school of thought, most segments of the American scene would have viewed the results with alarm, and MacArthur would have been denounced for dereliction of duty.

In other respects the Quigley case does not stand up well under close scrutiny. It fails, for example, to give enough weight to the fact that the Japanese side strongly supported Mac-Arthur's approach to the problem of governmental reform; that the Japanese people. having lost faith in their traditional system of . government, showed enthusiasm for a democratic basic law; that the ruling classes which controlled the Cabinet, the Privy Council, the Imperial Household, and the Diet, being realistic, subscribed—not surprisingly with some resistance at first-to the United States government's reform program as presented to them by MacArthur.8 Furthermore, it offers no alternative procedure to the one followed by MacArthur for accomplishing the paramount political aim of the United States; it makes no pear that constitutional reform in Japan could not be unilaterally carried out by the American occupation authorities." Theodore McNelly, Contemporary Government of Japan (Boston, 1963), p. 29.

 8 "... The final draft ... as ... approved by GHQ . . . contained much that the Cabinet as a whole could not bring itself to agree to, particularly regarding the position of the Emperor. . . . when it had been ascertained that His Majesty had been heard to say that . . . there seemed to be nothing particularly wrong about the definition in it of the position of the Emperor... the conclusion was reached . . . to accept the final version sent to us from GHQ. . . . " Shigeru Yoshida, The Yoshida Memoirs-The Story of Japan in Crisis (Boston, 1962), p. 135. "After the draft ... had been completed, it was submitted for discussion to the Privy Council, the Lower House of the Diet and the House of Peers, the members of which official assemblies included Japan's foremost authorities on law and administration. . . . therefore, it is correct to say that the best informed elements among the Japanese people had a hand in shaping it, a point which is in these days too easily and too often ignored." Ibid., p. 145.

attempt to explain how the Far Eastern Commission, with State Department coaching, or the Japanese, acting alone without some kind of a primer on democracy, could ever have fulfilled this requirement.

In any event, Quigley and other scholars insist on two categorical prerequisites for making fundamental changes in the Imperial Constitution: consent of the Far Eastern Commission and approval by the Japanese people. Since in their opinion these conditions were not met in drawing up the 1946 Constitution, that document is ipso facto an alien imposition and should, therefore, be amended. But cause for amendment would not exist, according to this reasoning, if fundamental changes in the Japanese constitutional structure had been made by the proper procedure, that is, following agreement in the Far Eastern Commission and approval by the Japanese people.

It is significant that these writers subordinate the substance of the new Constitution to the method by which it was drafted and adopted, i.e., to its legitimacy. By narrowing the discussion to the procedural side of constitutional reform they place blame for an alleged injustice done Japan on the shoulders of a soldier in the field and thereby avoid pointing the finger at the United States as a whole. Thus, however unintentionally, they pillory MacArthur without establishing his guilt and, more important, hint at a remedy on the presumption of his culpability that could generate misunderstanding between the American and Japanese people. 10 For this reason alone

⁹ Though not a member of the Quigley school, John M. Maki is bold enough to mention, but not explain, three novel and impractical alternative solutions to the problem of constitutional reform: indefinite continuation of the contradictory situation between the occupation reforms and the Imperial Constitution; suspension of that Constitution to eliminate the contradiction; step-by-step development by the Japanese of their own basic law under occupation tutelage. John M. Maki, Government and Politics in Japan—The Road to Democracy (New York, 1962), p. 78.

¹⁰ When Premier Nobuske Kishi proposed in 1957 to discuss restoration of the Emperor's status to that of "Head of State"—which, he pointed out, would not change the functions of the Throne—the New York Times commented: "It would, however, give some emphasis to the way in which Japanese thought is moving. Any such discussion will be closely watched by the United States." New York Times, March 17, 1957.

we are justified in looking further at the major premises of their version of the origin, composition and adoption of the new Constitution of Japan.

This paper proposes, therefore, to call in question generally accepted assumptions regarding governmental reform in Japan, to challenge specifically the premises that the Supreme Commander: had a major part in devising either the substance or the procedure of the radical plan for incorporating the political philosophy of the West in the new Japanese Constitution, schemed to violate the Moscow Agreement vis-à-vis the prerogatives of the Far Eastern Commission, prepared a model constitution without authorization to do so, and imposed a new form of government on the Japanese people against their will.

Ι

To begin with, neither the plan nor the procedure for revising the Imperial Constitution of 1889, as Quigley and other writers imply. originated with MacArthur. On the contrary, MacArthur was explicitly instructed by the United States government to perform major surgery on that charter; and to do so by one of three methods. The full details were spelled out in a 14-page paper entitled "Reform of the Japanese Governmental System" which was sent to the Supreme Commander in draft form on December 4, 1945, and in final form on January 9, 1946. This document is identified as SWNCC 228 after the interdepartmental State-War-Navy Coordinating Committee, under whose auspices it was prepared. On December 18, 1945, in SWNCC 228/1, a two-page annex, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, commenting on a draft of SWNCC 228, recommended inclusion in that paper of what the JCS conceived to be the short-term and long-range objectives of the occupation, points that will be elaborated below, A copy of SWNCC 228/1 was sent to MacArthur on December 28, 1945.11

Although SWNCC 228 is the master key to an understanding of what happened to the Meiji Constitution, this singularly important Washington policy paper appears to have been examined by no more than a half-dozen scholars and comprehensively treated by none of them. The first published reference to it was made in 1953 by one of its authors, George H. Blakeslee; in 1955 Hugh Borton, another of its authors, gave Washington credit for suggesting to MacArthur the principles to be incorporated in the new Constitution—disclaiming Washington responsibility, however, for the no-war clause.12 Ardath Burks and Theodore McNelly in more recent studies on Japanese government and politics, like Blakeslee, quote a single sentence from SWNCC 228 to prove that MacArthur's method of revising Japan's Constitution was contrary to the spirit if not the letter of Washington's orders:13 but they do not mention the passage which definitely authorized him to employ that particular method. The missing passage had been supplied in a provocatively unique earlier study by Professor Robert E. Ward, whose major interest in SWNCC 228 was that it faced up to the Allied commitment to establish a form of government in Japan "in accordance with the freely expressed will of the Japanese people." He subordinated the determination of the United States to establish a "peacefully inclined and responsible government" in Japan to "the problem of the ultimate Japanese reaction to such a stand." He feared that the Japanese would interpret the "freely expressed will" proviso "as an absolute guarantee, and the United States' stand in SWNCC 228 as evasive, legalistic and essentially moral...."14 The legalistic and moral as-

¹¹ The Department of State made available to the writer the contents of the SWNCC 228 folder.

¹² George H. Blakeslee, The Far Eastern Commission—A Study in International Cooperation, 1945–1952 (State Department Publication 5138, Dec. 1953), p. 45; Hugh Borton, Japan's Modern Century (New York, 1955), note 5, pp. 423–24.

¹³ Burks, p. 26; McNelly, p. 39; Blakeslee, p. 45.

14 Robert E. Ward, "The Origins of the Present Japanese Constitution," this REVIEW, Vol. 50 (December 1956), pp. 990-91. In this 30-page article. Ward is highly critical of the U.S. government for demanding drastic revision of the Meiji Constitution and of the Supreme Commander for doing the bidding of his government. He holds that the Allied powers and the Supreme Commander could favor and support but not impose a democratic form of government on Japan. Appreciating why both the United States and Japan, for somewhat different reasons, opposed participation of the Far Eastern Commission in constitutional revision, he complains nevertheless because that international body was not permitted to perform this function. Forgetting that in August 1945 Japanese Cabinet members "sobbed loudly" on accepting the terms of surrender (Toshikazu Kase, Journey to the "Missouri" [New Haven, 1950], p. 253), he notes that members of the Shidehara Cabinet in February 1946 tearfully endorsed, at MacArthur's urging, a U. S. plan for democratizing Japan's traditional form of government in fulfillment of the terms of pects of American policy are not questioned by other writers.

A sixth scholar who uses SWNCC 228 to prove a particular point is Takayanagi, referred to above. Chairman of Japan's 39member Commission on the Constitution which recently completed a seven-year study on the origin and propriety of that country's organic law, he, too, directs special attention to the familiar line in SWNCC 228 about Japanese initiative to prove that MacArthur deviated from the Washington-prescribed procedure for effecting constitutional revision. On the basis of this one sentence, 31 of the 39 members of the Commission on the Constitution take the stand in the 5,600-page final report submitted to Premier Hayato Ikeda on July 3, 1964, that "the postwar constitution was forced upon the country by the occupation authorities . . . and should therefore be replaced by a document based upon the free will of the Japanese...." Takayanagi makes MacArthur responsible for what happened by reasoning as follows:

It was...the policy of the American home Government that the constitutional revision necessitated by the Potsdam Declaration...be effected by the Japanese voluntarily.... This policy is clearly stated in ... SWNCC 228 SCAP followed that policy ... until ... February 1946.... [Then] Gen. MacArthur ordered the Political Section to make a draft.... This extraordinary step was taken without the knowledge of the American home Government.... 16

To leave no doubt about the meaning of this 1959 statement, Takayanagi repeated in 1964: "The policy of the American home government as shown by SWNCC 228 was to make the Japanese draft revision of the Meiji Constitution, subject to SCAP review, and not for the Supreme Commander to suggest any concrete plan to the Japanese as a model. From surrender. Notwithstanding Japan's remarkable progress under the new Constitution, he insists that the Japanese electorate is in a state of shock from conducting governmental affairs by an alien political philosophy. Conceding that the Supreme Commander was under orders to carry out a radical governmental reform plan, he damns MacArthur and his staff for doing the job in an inelegant and overly thorough manner. Ibid., pp. 980–1010.

¹⁵ New York Times, July 4, 1964. This report is summarized and also made the subject of a lengthy editorial in the Japan Times Weekly, Vol. 4, No. 28, International ed., July 11, 1964.

16 Takayanagi, Japan Times, March 16, 1959.

this angle . . . [MacArthur's action] seems to be an 'extraordinary step'.... "17 In other words had GHQ not prepared a constitutional guide for the Japanese but instead followed Takaranagi's construction of SWNCC 228 for revolutionizing Japan's political system—that is, awaited voluntary action by the Japaneseno "e=traordinary step" would have been taken and hence no reason given the majority of the Commission on the Constitution for favoring revision now. What Takayanagi does not say is that SWNCC 228 specified two other procedures for MacArthur to fall back on in the event the Japanese did not voluntarily effect the constitutional revision necessitated by the Potsdam Declaration.

It would be extremely difficult for anyone to read EWNCC 228 in its entirety and not conclude that Japan, whether from the Supreme Commander or from the Far Eastern Commission-both Allied creations-was to receive a Western-style basic law, and in a form not at all compatible with Japan's traditions. SWNCC 228 begins by stipulating the democratic reforms "which the occupation authorities should insist be carried out in Japan": a responsible government based on wide suffrage, an executive branch responsible to the electorat = or to a fully representative legislative body a legislature with full budgetary controls, guarantee of fundamental civil rights, provision for popular amendment of the constitution. Next in SWNCC 228 appears the oft-quoted sentence said to prove that Mac_rthur violated his orders: "Only as a last 17 Fersonal letter from Professor Takayanagi to the writer, December 8, 1964. He opposes those in Japan who have "the idea that since the new Japanese Constitution was one imposed by force on the Japanese, it might be thrown overboard whatever its contents, and that they ought to write the Constitution anew themselves. This smaczs of a political strategy of accelerating revision by stimulating nationalist (or xenophobic) sentiment. I do not approve of the strategy." Ibid. On tLis point the late Kazuo Kawai wrote: "The react-onaries . . . obviously want to discredit the present constitution in order to make way for a return to the past." Kazuo Kawai, Japan's American Interlude (Chicago, 1960), p. 69. "Significently enough," writes Edwin O. Reischauer, "the pharge of foreign origin has been repeatedly leveled ... by those who wished to see it changed." Edwin O. Reischauer, The United States and Japan, rev. ed. (New York, 1957), p. 254. According to Quigley, the old Liberal Party, as of 1954 "would come close to restoring the Meiji Constitution." Quigley, p. 145.

resort should the Supreme Commander order the Japanese Government to effect the above listed reforms, as the knowledge that they had been imposed by the Allies would materially reduce the possibility of their acceptance and support by the Japanese people for the future."18 This injunction is amplified in the following paragraph of SWNCC 228 which cautions the Supreme Commander not to proceed with the job of revision piecemeal and head-foremost. "The effectiveness of governmental reforms in preventing the resurgence of military control in Japan," it pontificates, "will depend in a large measure upon the acceptance by the Japanese people of the entire program. In the implementation . . . the Supreme Commander must take into account the problems of sequence and timing, as well as the measures which might be adopted to prepare the people to accept the changes, in order to insure that the reforms are lasting in strengthening representative government in Japan."19

What Washington meant, and what the above-mentioned scholars, excepting only Ward, thought too insignificant to point out, is elucidated in SWNCC 228, Appendix B. "Discussion." The first paragraph of this section defers dutifully to the "freely expressed will" commitment and then gets down to brass tacks thus: "... the Allies ... are fully empowered to insist that the Japanese basic law be so altered as to provide that . . . the government is responsible . . . and the civil is supreme over the military branch...."20 Devoting the next five paragraphs to an exposition of governmental shortcomings that should be remedied, the Discussion in paragraph 7 directs the Supreme Commander to insure constitutional reform in one of three ways. First, according to this paragraph, the necessary changes "should be initiated and carried into effect by the Japanese Government out of a desire to eliminate elements of the national structure which have brought Japan to the present pass and to comply with . . . the Potsdam Declaration. [Second,] Failing such spontaneous action by the Japanese, the Supreme Commander should indicate the reforms which this Government considers necessary [Third,] Only as a last resort should a formal instruction be issued . . . specifying in detail the reforms to be effected."21 Until the beginning of February 1946, as Takayanagi indicates, MacArthur followed the first of these

¹⁸ SWNCC 228.

¹⁹ Ibid. Italics added.

²⁰ Ibid.

²¹ Ibid.

alternatives. But then, when he became convinced that the Japanese leaders would not or could not initiate and carry into effect a farreaching constitutional reform program, far from taking an "extraordinary step" he simply turned to the second alternative of indicating—graphically, to be sure—the reforms Washington considered necessary. The third alternative of issuing a formal instruction to the Japanese government was held in reserve and never used.

MacArthur's obedience to the spirit as well as the letter of his orders on constitutional reform is further confirmed by the degree to which his action harmonized with the views of the Joint Chiefs of Staff (JCS) on this matter. A powerful body in shaping American foreign policy during and for some time following World War II, the JCS dispatched all official orders to MacArthur; and MacArthur, with an ear ever tuned to the locus of power, was particularly deferential to it. Consequently SWNCC 228/1 which reflects the attitude of the JCS toward the substance of SWNCC 228 is of more than passing importance. As indicated above, it offered suggestions on two points, long-range and short-term military interests. "The principal short-term military interest," it says, "is the possibility that the implementation of the proposed reforms may foment unrest in Japan to such a degree as to require increases in the occupation forces."22 This put MacArthur on notice that it was his responsibility to accomplish a difficult political and diplomatic mission without giving rise to violence, civil war, and chaos.

From the long-range military point of view, the major concern of the JCS as stated in SWNCC 228/1 was that "no nationalistic or military clique or combination should again be able to dominate that country and lead it into a war of aggression."23 How effectively this objective would be achieved, MacArthur was told, "will depend in large measure upon acceptance by the Japanese people of the entire program."24 This thought, it will be recalled, is incorporated in SWNCC 228. A military man with less of MacArthur's penchant for personalizing his actions might have interpreted such emphatic language as a mandate to devise and espouse, as the Supreme Commander and Premier Kijuro Shidehara actually did,25 the famous no-war clause of the Constitution. Whatever else may be said of Article 9 renouncing war as a sovereign right, there is no denying that it accomplished, at least for a generation, the long-range aim of the occupation as defined by the JCS. Moreover, JCS insistence in SWNCC 228/1 that the Supreme Commander, in the process of reforming the government, should destroy for all time Japan's potential for military aggression casts serious further doubt on Takayanagi's finding that the American home government expected MacArthur merely to review a Japanese draft revision of the old Constitution without taking the liberty, if necessary, of making concrete suggestions for the Japanese to follow. Such a hands-off course would have been totally at variance with the rationale by which the occupation of Japan was conducted in the winter of 1945-1946. Whether by MacArthur or by others, military or civilian, a drastic change was to be made in the Meiji Constitution and, as in the case of surrender some six months before, it simply could not be made painlessly. All that can safely be said is that the operation might have been monumentally botched if it had been performed by fits and starts on the advice of the delegations of eleven different nations residing in Washington.

What does this add up to? Simply that the United States government's unalterable objective, with three optional procedures for accomplishing it, was to democratize Japan's traditional form of government. Naturally, for both military and political reasons, a maximum of Japanese popular support for the new form of government was desirable. But such support, to repeat, was not mandatory. The "freely expressed will" proviso was, as every student of the subject knows, inserted in the Potsdam Declaration without enthusiasm and only at the last minute, not to accord the right of full constitutional self-determination to the Japanese, but rather, in line with Under Secretary Joseph C. Grew's urging, to facilitate Japan's surrender by opening the prospect that the monarchy might be retained.26 If Japan's Japanese Constitution," Political Science Quarterly, Vol. 77 (September 1962), pp. 350-78. According to MacArthur himself: "... I knew that it was exactly what the Allies wanted at that time for Japan. They had said so at Potsdam and they had said so afterwards...." Douglas MacArthur, Reminiscences (New York, 1964), p. 304.

²⁶ Joseph C. Grew, Turbulent Era. A Diplomatic Record of Forty Years, 2 vols. (Boston, 1952), II, ch. 36. In this chapter Grew writes: "If it had not been for [Secretary of War Henry

²² SWNCC 228/1.

²³ Ibid.

²⁴ Ibid. Italics added.

²⁵ The collaboration of MacArthur and Shidehara on this point is explained in Theodore McNelly, "The Renunciation of War in the new Constitution is in fact, as Quigley describes it, "a foreign imposition not wholly suited to a people of very different legal and social traditions," that circumstance must be attributed not to any "extraordinary step" taken by MacArthur but to its democratic character as prescribed by the American home government in SWNCC 228. How suitable any democratic constitution would be for Japan and whether the existing one should be amended are not questions at issue here.

TT

If MacArthur's Washington orders gave him sufficient procedural latitude to assist in revising the Meiji Constitution, he obviously had no reason to harbor a scheme of his own for achieving that purpose. Yet on the books stands a heretofore uncontested charge that he proceeded surreptitiously with the reform of Japan's governmental system. Used to prove that MacArthur contravened United States policy, the charge was initially made by one-time United States officials who might have been unduly concerned with the prerogatives of the Far Eastern Commission. Little consideration need be given the Far Eastern Commission, for that international body never L.] Stimson's wholehearted initiative, the Potsdam Conference would have ended without any proclamation to Japan being issued at all. But even Mr. Stimson was unable to have included in the proclamation a categorical understanding that unconditional surrender would not mean the elimination of the dynasty if the Japanese people desired its retention." In a footnote he quotes a psychological warfare expert to the effect that "the analysts [of the Foreign Morale Analysis Division of the Office of War Information] thought that the Emperor might be turned to good use in lowering resistance if the enemy were told that the decision regarding his fate after an Allied victory would be up to the Japanese themselves." Henry L. Stimson puts it this way: "... Some maintained that the Emperor must go. . . . Others urged that the war could be ended much more cheaply by openly revising the formula of 'unconditional surrender' to assure the Japanese that there was no intention of removing the Emperor if it should be the desire of the Japanese people that he remain as a constitutional monarch. This latter view has been urged with particular force and skill by Joseph C. Grew...." Henry L. Stimson and McGeorge Bundy, On Active Service in Peace and War (New York, 1947), p. 626. "... we made a clear bargain. . . . American lives for an emasculated monarchy." Reischauer, p. 261.

made and was not intended to make an impact on American policy toward Japan. This was confirmed by Secretary of State James F. Byrnes himself who wrote in 1947 regarding the Far Eastern Commission and the Allied Council for Japan:

At the time the commission and the council were established, I stated that the authority of General MacArthur should not be obstructed by the inability of the commission to agree on policy or of the council to agree on advice for carrying out that policy events have proved that the two bodies have not interfered with MacArthur's administration. He and his staff have continued to carry out their difficult task with an efficiency that has won the plaudits of the people in other Allied nations besides the United States.²⁷

Not from any action of the Far Eastern Commission, then, but rather from a Tokyo visit of members of the Far Eastern Advisory Commission, predecessor of the Far Eastern Commission, arose the allegation of GHQ deviousness.

What are the facts? At one of the early GHQ briefings of this group in January 1946, as George H. Blakeslee recalls, MacArthur explained that he had held frequent personal conferences with Japanese state ministers to clarify to them Allied policy on constitutional reform "as interpreted in more specific form by the American Government." At another session on January 30, just before their return to the United States, he told them that constitutional reform "had been taken out of his hands by the Moscow Agreement." Having had up to this point neither an opportunity nor a compelling reason to explore fully the implications of the newly created Far Eastern Commission, MacArthur's comment on that occasion was at best a horseback opinion; presently he would reverse himself, as was his right, but not until he had taken a hard look at the overall situation.

²⁷ James F. Byrnes, Speaking Frankly (New York, 1947), p. 218. The U.S. Initial Post-Surrender Policy approved by President Truman on September 6, 1945, states: "... in the event of any differences of opinion among [the Allies], the policies of the U.S. will govern." Jones, Borton and Pearn, op. cit., Appendix 10. The Far East subcommittee of SWNCC recommended on October 16, 1945, that the U.S. hold to its position of maintaining final authority in the control of Japan, and the President, the Secretary of State, and the Director of the Office of Far East Affairs in the State Department supported the recommendation; "but . . . certain of the European experts in the State Department favored additional concessions to the British and Soviet proposals." Blakeslee, p. 13. "... the Japanese constitution . . . is probably the single most important accomplishment of the occupation. . . . I am certain that it would never have been accomplished had the occupation been dependent on the deliberations of the Far Eastern Commissionwith the Soviet power of veto!" MacArthur, p.

The sincerity of MacArthur's assurance to the Commisioners that he was not then planning to effect changes in the Imperial Constitution has been sharply challenged by two scholars who had been members of the United States delegation to the Fir Eastern Commission. One of these, George H. Blakeslee, puts it this way: "Two days after General MacArthur had stated to the member: of the Far Eastern Advisory Commission that he had ceased to take any action in regard to the revision . . . he felt forced to take vizorous measures."29 Another United States delegate, Hugh Borton, writes: "Prior to their return . . . [the Commissioners] had been told by General Whitney that the problem of constitutional reform was a matter for the Japanese to consider and that no work was being undertaken by SCAP."30 The implication is, of course, that MacArthur and members of his staff de iberately misrepresented the situation.

Both the innocence of the accused and the misjudgment of the accusers can be substantiated in this instance by the minutes of a meeting held in the Government Section on January 17, 1946, when the Far Eastern Advisory Commission visitors sat down to discuss occupation affairs with seven Army and four Naval officers, a group that included Brigadier General Courtney Whitney, chief of the section, and his deputy, Colonel Charles L. Kades. The proceedings or that occasion were recorded in a 41-page paper written the same day. 31 which discloses what GHQ's thinking on constitutional reform realls was, and was not, at the time. It leaves no doubt that Mac-Arthur, as he informed the Commissioners, was following the first Washington-prescribed procedure of giving the Japanese every opportunity to initiate the desired changes; and it disposes of the conspiracy theory.

²⁸ Blakeslee, p. 44.

Kades opened the meeting by reading a prepared statement which reflected GHQ's attitude. "Conforming to the policy . . . that the Japanese Government be permitted to initiate its own reorganization to the greatest extent practicable," he said, reading from the paper, "the Government Section . . . makes every effort . . . to encourage the Japanese to correct defects in their governmental system through their own administrative reforms." The paper ended on this revealing note: "The [civil rights and purge] directives of 4 October [1945] and 4 January [1946] will accomplish politically what has already been achieved militarily. . . . the election of a new Diet by the freely expressed will of the Japanese people from candidates untainted with militant nationalism will be a long step toward establishment of the peacefully inclined and responsible government in Japan contemplated by the Potsdam Declaration."32 If this position paper erred, it was in the too complacent assumption that the Shidehara Government's draft revision of the Meiji Constitution, soon to be completed and submitted to GHQ, would incorporate as a minimum the occupation-induced political reforms of the previous four months.

Then followed a question and answer period which included this dialogue:³³

- Q. Mr. Thomas Confesor [Philippines member]: Are you considering amendments to the Constitution?
- A. Col. Kades: No. The Government Section has understood that that is a long range problem concerning fundamental changes in the Japanese constitutional structure which is within the province of your Commission.
- Q. Mr. Thomas Confesor: I do not understand ... why constitutional revision is not part of your work.
- A. Col. Kades: Because formal revision of the written document would constitute a fundamental change in the Japanese constitutional structure, and as such be within the Commission's jurisdiction.
- Q. M. [Francis] Lacoste [French member]: I think that the alterations in the Japanese governmental system which are being carried out under the guidance of the headquarters are in fact con-

²⁹ Ibid., p. 45.

³⁰ Borton, note 7, p. 421. "Whatever faults may be inherent in the military character, evasive misrepresentation has never been one of them." MacArthur, p. 287.

^{31 &}quot;Government Section Report to the Far Eastern Commission," dated January 17, 1946. A copy is in the writer's personal files.

³² Ibid.

³³ Ibid.

stitutional changes which should be ultimately in a revision of the written Constitution.

* * *

Q. Sir George Sansom [U. K. member]:... Have you made any formal studies on this? A. Col. Kades: No, Sir George, we have not.

Although Kades' answers were an open admission that GHQ had not done its homework on the implications of the Far Eastern Commission, they definitely disprove the charge that GHQ was holding in reserve a plan of its own for revising Japan's Constitution.

What, then, was MacArthur's thinking on constitutional reform? As of January 1946 he assumed on the basis of oral instructions he had previously given Japanese leaders that the Shidehara Cabinet would in good time produce a suitable preliminary draft of a democratic constitution for GHQ consideration within the framework of United States policy. MacArthur's crystal ball had not revealed that the character of the Cabinet revision plan to be laid before him in early February 1946 would completely change the constitutional picture and require a different procedural approach to governmental reform within the context of SWNCC 228.

Nor had the Supreme Commander anticipated the necessity of having the Government Section assist him in preparing a model constitution for the guidance of the confused and unresponsive Japanese leaders. Because the qualifications of Government Section personnel to perform such a task have been questioned, it is in order to examine briefly the part they actually played.

III

An appraisal of the role of the Government Section involves answers to three questions: Was it necessary to prepare a model constitution to implement SWNCC 228? If so, did it have to be prepared on short notice? Were the Government Section people competent to do that part of the job entrusted to them?

By coincidence, as already indicated above, the answer to the first of these questions was supplied by the Japanese government within a day or two of MacArthur's final meeting with the Far Eastern Advisory Commission on January 30. That answer consisted of the "unacceptably reactionary" constitution revision plan drawn up by State Minister Joji Matsumoto's Constitutional Problem Investigation Committee during the previous three months and submitted to GHQ on February 1, 1946.34 Matsumoto's revision, found by GHQ to be "no revision at all,"35 served notice that the conservative forces of Japan, without the help of an Allied blueprint of some kind, would never be able to reach a consensus on the reform program they had been told repeatedly by MacArthur to initiate and carry out. It demonstrated that Japan's leaders were no more willing to curtail the prerogatives of the Emperor in January 1946 than they had been in August 1945 when they were contemplating surrender: and without taking this drastic step, it would have been utterly impossible for them to comply with the unheard-of and unsuspected SWNCC 228. Still the best evidence that they had no intention of incorporating Western concepts in the Meiji Constitution as demanded by Washington is that supplied by Tatsuo Sato, member of the Cabinet Legislative Bureau who worked more intimately with both GHQ and the Japanese government on the new Constitution than any other Japanese. He wrote in 1957 concerning the real intention of his superiors regarding revision:

The Potsdam Declaration did not mention any explicit obligation to revise the Meiji Constitution...in the subconscious minds of the Cabinet members there was some expectation that the Potsdam Declaration could be executed even under the Meiji Constitution, if the application of the supreme law were improved.³⁵

This avenue to constitutional reform bore no resemblance to that envisaged by the authors of SWNCC 228 who seemed to favor abolition of the Throne but were willing to settle for a constitutional monarchy with a figurehead Emperor.

At first MacArthur reacted to the Matsumoto draft by instructing Whitney to prepare a detailed answer rejecting it. 37 After further consideration, however, not only of the ³⁴ Courtney Whitney, MacArthur, His Rendezvous with History (New York, 1955), p. 249.

35 Ibid., p. 248.

²⁵ Tatsuo Sato, "The Origin and Development of the Draft Constitution," reprinted from Contemporary Japan, Vol. 24 Nos. 4-6 and 7-9 (Tokyo, 1957), p. 2. The Matsumoto Committee draft, according to Maki, "clearly revealed the unwillingness or, perhaps, complete inability of the Government and its leaders to respond to the challenge." Maki, op. cit., pp. 78-79

³⁷ Report of Government Section, SCAP, Political Reorientation of Japan, September 1945 to September 1948, 2 vols. (Washington, n. d. [1949]), I, 102. Cited hereafter as Political Re-orientation.

Matsumoto submission but of all aspects of the situation—Japanese, American, international—he came to the conclusion that a different tactical approach to governmental reform was required if the objectives of the occupation were to be achieved satisfactorily, in an orderly manner, and within a reasonable period of time.³⁸ MacArthur's own recollection of the Matsumoto affair, which he recorded only months before his death in April 1964, stresses the time element:

I was now confronted with a time problem [he wrote]. Earlier, at my suggestion, the legislative body had revised the election laws, giving those who had been disenfranchised the right to vote. With this new law in effect, the government had called for a general election on April 10, 1946. I had expected that the new constitution would be finished by then and that the voting would, in fact, be a plebiscite. The way things stood after Dr. Matsumoto finished his work, the people would be voting on whether they wanted to keep the old constitution or one just like it. Accordingly, I directed my staff to assist... in the formation of an acceptable draft.³⁹

Other courses were open to MacArthur but they all appeared to be less desirable than the one he took within the context of his instructions. He was acutely aware of the abrupt confrontation between the aims of the American government and those of the Japanese government. With Japan's conservative leaders angling to salvage the Meiji Constitution and the United States-not to mention other Allied powers-determined to make sweeping changes in that instrument, Mac-Arthur was not privileged to arrive at a leisurely decision in an ivory tower. He was confronted with a fast-moving situation.

Once persuaded of "the prime importance of immediate constitutional revision," MacArthur switched to the second SWNCC 228 alternative of indicating to the Japanese in more specific form the nature of the changes to be made in the existing structure of government. This he did in full realization that time was running out. Crucial to the success of the move was complete understanding and prompt sponsorship of the reforms by the Japanese government. MacArthur's popularity in Japan and elsewhere was now at its peak. With his reputation as a civil administrator at stake, and the advice of the State-War-Navy Coordinating Committee and the JCS not to take a leap in the dark fresh in mind, he characteristically planned this step carefully, taking into account the many tricky domestic and international factors involved. This done, he unfolded the entire plan before the Japanese on the assumption that from enlightened selfinterest alone they would decide to cooperate. "I did not . . . try to force an American version of a Japanese constitution," he recalled: "and then order them to adopt it. The revision had to be made by the Japanese themselves and it had to be done without coercion."41 The Shidehara Government opted to sponsor the new Constitution—aware, among other things, that if it did not do so it might not outlast the stepped-up cry through-Japan for immediate and genuine constitutional changes, which reached a crescendo immediately following the Mainichi Shimbun's February 1 exposure of the innocuous Matsumoto revision plan.42 Shidehara like Premier Higashi-Kuni before him might have chosen to say no and resign. But had he and the Emperor and the Japanese people not backed the Supreme Commander at this critical stage of the occupation, "the results," MacArthur informed Takayanagi years later, "would have been catastrophic."43

It seems strange that anyone would question the competence of the Government Section staff to perform the modest chore of incorporating in a model constitution the elementary democratic principles set forth with great clarity in SWNCC 228. Specially selected for their qualifications to deal with problems of government in Japan, the officers of this section were fully capable of comprehending the plain language and equally plain intent of the ³⁸ Whitney, p. 248. Pertinent here is Government Section's Feb. 1, 1946, memorandum on "Constitutional Reform," in Political Reorienta tion, II, 622-23.

³⁹ MacArthur, p. 300.

⁴⁰ Political Reorientation, I, 90.

⁴¹ MacArthur, p. 299.

⁴² Sato, p. 8; Political Reorientation, I, 101; Robert A. Fearey, The Occupation of Japan: The Second Phase, 1948-1950 (New York, 1950), p. 3; Douglas G. Haring, ed., Japan's Prospect (Cambridge, Mass., 1946), p. 301; Whitney, pp. 283-84; Yoshida, pp. 134-36.

⁴³ Takayanagi, Japan Times, March 16, 1959. MacArthur has this to say regarding the part played by the Emperor: "... I always explained carefully the underlying reasons for occupation policy, and I found he had a more thorough grasp of the democratic concept than almost any Japanese with whom I talked his loyal cooperation and influence had much to do with the success of the occupation." MacArthur, p. 288.

Washington planning experts who prepared that document.

The Supreme Commander himself, nevertheless, was unwilling to give Government Section personnel a free rein in preparing a draft constitution. Because of his own heavy responsibility, he personally controlled with a firm hand the brief and delicate task of drawing up a democratic model for the Japanese to imitate. To insure complete conformity with the basic principles contained in SWNCC 228, MacArthur personally dictated the parts of the draft bearing on sovereignty, demilitarization, and feudalism. On these and other points he counseled and advised constantly Whitney, who in turn kept the situation in hand through his own Steering Committee composed of Kades, Commander Alfred R. Hussey, and Lt. Colonel Milo E. Rowell, all, like Whitney, experienced lawyers.

How the Government Section acquitted itself during the eight-day "constitutional convention," so-called, beginning February 5, has been disclosed partially in published writings of some of the participants:44 but the more incisive details have been concealed for years in a secret Government Section "Memorandum for Record," written the following year.45 This 7,000-word paper, prepared from notes jotted down during the "debates," reveals how MacArthur with the help of Whitney and the Government Section Steering Committee directed the proceedings. The Steering Committee, of which Kades was chairman, vetoed all proposals of staff members that were not in accord with SWNCC 228. Steering Committee differences were appealed to Whitney for settlement by Mac-Arthur. For example, on February 8,46

... A sharp and fundamental difference of opinion developed... in the discussion of Article IV, that asserts that no future Constitution... shall limit... the rights guaranteed in this Constitution, or subordinate... democracy to any other consideration.

Col. [Pieter K.] Roest defended this Article by premising that... we must guarantee for all time the social and moral advances made up to the present. Mr. [Harry Emerson] Wildes expressed the belief that the omission of Article IV inevitably opened the gates to Fascism in Japan....

44 Political Recrientation, I, 101-05; Whitney, p. 249ff.; Harry E. Wildes, Typhoon in Tokyo: The Occupation and Its Aftermath (New York, 1954), ch. 4.

⁴⁵ The Government Section, SCAP, "Memorandum for Record," dated December 16, 1947, prepared by Ruth Ellerman. A copy is in the writer's personal files.

46 Ibid.

No satisfactory compromise could be reached. It was decided to submit Article IV to General Whitney for decision. . . . (In the final draft of the document, this Article was omitted.)

Also on February 8, agreement could not be reached on proposals giving "detailed orders for the establishment of social welfare, public health, free education, orderly adoption and child labor laws in Japan." According to the memorandum:⁴⁷

... Col. Rowell objected that ... these provisions might cause so much resentment that the Japanese Government might reject our constitutional draft in toto. Mr. Wildes answered that we do have the responsibility to effect a social revolution in Japan....

No compromise solution could be found.... General Whitney recommended that the minutia of social legislation be omitted and a general statement made that social security shall be provided.

In the final Government Section review of the draft on February 12, the Steering Committee made at least 16 additional changes, some of major importance. It changed, for instance, a February 8 compromise amendment vesting executive power "in the Prime Minister as head of the Cabinet" to read: "The executive power is vested in a Cabinet." But help from outside was needed to settle a week-long dispute between Kades and Hussey. Hussey insisted on language in the Preamble to the effect "that this Constitution draws its sovereignty not only from the will of the people but from the principles of universal morality." Kades protested that "political morality and sovereignty have nothing to do with each other." Whitney entered the discussion, listened to Kades' recapitulation of the opposing arguments, and sided with Hussey.48

Thus was fashioned in conformity with SWNCC 228 a working paper to help the ⁴⁷ Ibid. Wildes wrote later: "Some of the more radical officers favored . . . an elective president, the initiative and referendum, social insurance, a compulsory eight-hour working day, and proportional representation; but, as this received no support outside Socialist ranks, it was dropped." Wildes, p. 44.

48 Government Section, "Memorandum for Record."

Japanese write the democratic philosophy of the West into their country's organic law. Without a sample showing in graphic detail what was meant by such expressions in the Potsdam Declaration as "responsible government," "democratic tendencies," and "fundamental human rights," Japan's conservative leaders would not have been able to reach agreement on the revolutionary governmental changes demanded of them.

IV

Finally, a brief look should be taken at the question of Japanese acceptance of the new Constitution. The Potsdam Declaration promised that the occupation forces would be withdrawn when a responsible government had been established. As between a responsible government taking the form of a republic and one taking the form of a constitutional monarchy, the Japanese were free to choose. But the choice did not extend to a form of government that was not responsible to the electorate.49 On the safe assumption that the ruling forces of Japan preferred a constitutional monarchy to a republic, MacArthur's model constitution retained the Emperor but only as a symbol. After recovering from the shock of MacArthur's reform program, and after considering the even more disagreeable alternative of a republic of some kind, Japan's leaders, impressed by the sincerity and good will (if not by the rhetorical flourishes) of top Government Section staff. 50 elected to string along with MacArthur. The individual Japanese leader who left an indelible trace through his part in converting the ruling classes to the idea of a constitutional monarchy was Shigeru Yoshida. Yoshida like Shidehara was able to perceive that the mass protests against the constitutional revision plan of the Matsumoto Committee at the beginning of February 1946 might become so intense as to cause the downfall of the existing conservative government and the establishment of a people's republic. With this in mind, and with a helpful nudge from the Emperor himself, Yoshida concluded—however reluctantly—that, balance, it would be in Japan's best interest to accept the SWNCC 228 program in some such form as MacArthur recommended. 51 The most stubborn convert to the new Constitution thus became its greatest champion. As Premier he sponsored legislation for revising the Imperial Constitution which required approval by the Privy Council and both houses of the Diet.

49 Grew, II, ch. 36.

⁵⁰ Yoshida, pp. 133-37, 141-46. "... at the time of its initial drafting . . . General Mac-Arthur's headquarters did insist, with considerable vigour, on the speedy completion of the task, and made certain demands in regard to the contents of the draft. But during our subsequent negotiations with GHQ there was nothing that could properly be termed coercive or overbearing in the attitude of the Occupation authorities towards us. They listened carefully to the Japanese experts . . . and in many cases accepted our proposals . . . they would often adopt the attitude that we were perhaps too steeped in the ways of the old Constitution we might at least give their suggestions a trial if they did not work, we could reconsider the whole question at the proper time and revise the necessary points. And they meant it." Ibid., p. 143.

It now became Yoshida's responsibility, not MacArthur's, to win Diet support for the Government's Draft Constitution Bill. As Yoshida saw it, Japan's foremost authorities on law and administration were in the Diet. and "despite the fact that the nation was . . . under foreign Occupation, these men were able to give free expression to their opinion without any restraint whatsoever."52 GHQ, he said, "maintained in general an attitude of watchful silence throughout the discussions in the Diet, but . . . did intervene once or twice."53 He noted that the "Occupation authorities carefully studied the reports of the discussions in progress. . . . "54 How GHQ managed to study these reports, and in what way such study contributed to the Diet's freedom of debate. Yoshida did not say; but since there was a close connection between GHQ's exact knowledge of Diet proceedings and GHQ non-intervention in the normal legislative processes, this gap in the story of the making of the Japanese Constitution should be closed.

Mindful of the long record of Japanese resistance to any change in the Meiji Constitution, and still dubious of the real intentions of Japan's conservative leaders regarding fundamental reform, MacArthur kept a watchful eye on Diet discussions by means of special Government Section memoranda on deliberations of the 90th Diet, which examined the ⁵¹ Ibid., pp. 135-36; Harold Wakefield, New Paths for Japan (New York, 1948), pp. 131-32, 136-37; Political Reorientation, I, 101. "It is now . . . apparent that the Japanese leaders at the time saw eye to eye with SCAP, far more than we had previously believed possible" Burks, p. 28.

⁵² Yoshida, p. 145.

⁵³ Ibid., p. 140.

⁵⁴ Ibid.

Draft Constitution Bill from late June to early October 1946. Prepared under the personal and completely autonomous direction of the writer⁵⁵—from continuing interviews with Diet leaders and from thoroughly reliable information furnished systematically and expeditiously by Japanese officials covering Diet activities—the original of each Government Section memorandum, or "Diet Report," by command of General Whitney, was hand-carried to MacArthur's office, and only then were copies distributed to Whitney himself and his top staff.

Through these special Diet reports, GHQ's initial doubts concerning Yoshida's integrity and true intentions were substantially mitigated if not totally erased. The reports depicted a forthright and commanding figure who earnestly defended the principles incorporated in his own Draft Constitution Bill. He pulled no punches as he told the Japanese repeatedly that the substance of the new Constitution was required under the terms of surrender. As one of the earliest of the Diet reports brought out, Yoshida in addressing the House of Peers showed his insight into the situation by calling for "sincere and prudent consideration . . . with exact understanding of international and internal circumstances, as the draft was made with due consideration of these circumstances." This meant that Yoshida and his associates had been well briefed by Mac-Arthur and the Government Section staff on the purport of SWNCC 228 and on the fluid and highly uncertain international situation, facts that would be established later by the Japanese Commission on the Constitution.⁵⁷ It meant, also, that Japanese public support for the new form of government was won by Yoshida's power of persuasion, not by Mac-Arthur's fiat.

Only in relation to the discussion of national sovereignty, or "national polity," were Yoshida and his chief assistant on the Constitution, Tokujiro Kanamori, called into conference by GHQ officials. With SWNCC 228 insistence on a responsible government in 55 Government Section, SCAP, "Diet Report" series. Eighty-five such reports were prepared on deliberations of the 90th Diet. Similar reports were prepared on the proceedings of subsequent Diets until the end of the occupation. The writer has copies of these reports in his personal files.

56 Government Section, "Diet Report," No. 7, June 23, 1946.

⁵⁷ Theodore McNelly, "The Japanese Constitution: Child of the Cold War," Political Science Quarterly, Vol. 24 (June 1959), pp. 187-89.

mind, MacArthur became disturbed over an issue growing out of charges made in the House of Peers that the new Constitution downgraded the Emperor and thus changed the fundamental character of the state. Out of deference to Japanese sensibilities on this subject, Premier Yoshida answered: "The spirit of the revised constitution is 'absolutely consistent' with the idea of the fundamental character of the state."58 How the matter was resolved to the satisfaction of both the Yoshida Government and the Supreme Commander was related in a July 28 Diet report which, typically, omitted mention of a recent informal conference between representatives of Yoshida and MacArthur to clarify the burning sovereignty issue, but signified nevertheless that the matter had been resolved in that manner. The report said in part:

The Constitutional Sub-Committee [of the House of Representatives] agreed yesterday to state in the Preamble...that 'sovereignty rests with the people.' This statement is thought to be clearer than 'sovereignty of the people's will.'59

The revised statement insured establishment of a government that would be responsible to the people as prescribed in SWNCC 228.

To guard against future misunderstanding between GHQ and the Japanese government on this basic issue, as a Diet report of August 2 informed MacArthur, the House Sub-Committee's final recommendation on the Draft Constitution Bill, before going to the parent Special Committee, "will be submitted to SCAP for examination." This was not an indication of GHQ coercion but rather a measure of the spirit of cooperation between the two sides. It revealed GHQ's part as that of referee allowing the Japanese the widest latitude under the basic rules prescribed by Washington.

Unlike its reception in the House of Representatives, whose members had been recently elected, the Draft Constitution Bill was not enthusiastically received in the House of Peers. Speaking freely for the record while shutting their eyes to the realities of Japan's predicament, an articulate minority of the scholars and intellectuals in that body of noblemen and distinguished citizens, representing neither the Japanese government nor the Japanese voters, bitterly attacked Yoshida and his constitutional revision plan. In a five-page Diet report to General MacArthur on August 31, the following excerpts from replies of Kanomori and Yoshida to Peers' interpellations recapitulate the Government's case for the new Constitution and suggest why GHQ's doubts regarding Yoshida's sincerity were removed:

⁵⁸ Government Section, "Diet Report," No. 12, June 28, 1946.

⁵⁹ Ibid., No. 37-A, July 28, 1946.

⁶⁰ Ibid., No. 40-A, August 2, 1946.

Mr. Kanamori.... The Meiji Constitution and its lax enforcement caused the downfall of this country. There is no way out... except by adopting the democratic system.... The Potsdam Declaration provides that the political system of Japan shall be decided by the free will of the people....

Mr. Yoshida.... Although the international situation predominantly overshadowed the drafting of the Constitution, the demands of the people have not been denied.

Thus the Supreme Commander kept track of how the Premier persuaded his countrymen to approve the new Constitution. Satisfied, in part by these special reports covering Diet deliberations, that the Japanese leaders were acting in good faith, MacArthur reciprocated by respecting the democratic right of the Diet to carry on its deliberations in an atmosphere of complete freedom. And because the Japanese people through their Representatives openly and freely accepted the entire SWNCC 228 program as incorporated in the Draft Constitution Bill, thanks to the statesmanship and leadership of Premier Yoshida, General Mac-Arthur, in consonance with the views of the United States Government, acknowledged publicly that Japan had fulfilled the requirement of the Potsdam Declaration.62

V

What is said in these pages is intended to place in better focus the making of the Japanese Constitution. Unavoidably, issue is taken with those American scholars who feel that this instrument is bad, that it is bad because it is alien in philosophy, and that it is alien in philosophy because it was imposed by an American military man in violation of his orders and in contravention of the policy of his government. Issue is also taken with the finding of the Japanese Commission on the Constitution that MacArthur forced a constitution on the Japanese against their will, in that his approach to the matter did not conform to a specific procedure prescribed by the United States government; Washington's thought, reasoned the Commission, was to have the Japanese conduct the excercise without any GHO coaching from the sidelines.

The effect of these interpretations, it seems, is to cast that epochal event in a narrow mold of ulterior motives and subjective judgments. rather than in the broader context of the changing post-World War II situation where it belongs. Looked at in the latter setting, the 1946 Constitution appears to have served its purpose reasonably well.63 The alien philosophy embodied in it is Western democracy, which the Japanese people warmly embraced. Instead of being imposed, this philosophy was approved by the Japanese government when it accepted the terms of the Potsdam Declaration.64 Instead of taking unilateral action. MacArthur was obeying both the letter and the spirit of his orders when he showed the Japanese by example how to fulfill their commitment to establish a "responsible government." Instead of contravening United States policy by not leaving constitutional reform to the Far Eastern Commission, the Supreme Commander adhered strictly to the set resolve of President Truman "that MacArthur would be given complete command and control . . . in Japan," that "We were not going to be disturbed by Russian tactics in the Pacific."65

63 From a study of the Commission on the Constitution's 5,000-page stenographic report on public hearings held throughout the country, "... the richest single source of information on the thoughts and feelings of a representative group of Japanese about the state of their society under constitutional democratic government," Maki concludes: "... the longer the people live under a fundamental law that has yielded them desirable benefits and has revealed no basic defects . . . the less they will consider it in need of change" Maki, op. cit., pp. 206-12. When the Commission's final report was submitted to the Japanese government in early July 1964, Japan's leading English language newspaper commented in its weekly edition: "[it] cannot be said that there has been anything like a popular demand for constitutional changes. . . . " Japan Times Weekly, July 11, 1964.

64 See the Aug. 25, 1946, memorandum by Government Section's Judge Alfred C. Oppler on "Powers of the Diet with Regard to Constitutional Amendments under the Meiji Constitution," in Political Reorientation, II, 662-66.

⁵⁵ Harry S. Truman, Memoirs, Vol. One, Year of Decision (New York, 1955), p. 412.

⁶¹ Ibid., No. 60-A, August 31, 1946.

⁶² Fearey, op. cit., p. 3; Political Reorientation, II, 765.

Without a model of some kind for their guidance, the Japanese demonstrably could not have complied with the Potsdam Declaration requirement, as amplified by SWNCC 228, to establish a democratic form of government. The United States government has consistently regarded the present Constitution of Japan as satisfactory compliance with the Potsdam Declaration on this point. What Robert A. Fearey, a State Department of ficial, wrote in 1950 still holds good in 1965: "It is doubtful whether SCAP and the U.S. Government should have acted differently if the events of the past four years could have been foretold.... By and large...it is doubtful if the democratization program would, or should, have been carried out much differently from the way it has been."66

66 Fearey, pp. 97-100.

REASON AND REVELATION IN HOOKER'S ETHICS

ROBERT K. FAULKNER Princeton University

This essay has two complementary purposes. It seeks principally to clarify the basis of the political philosophy of Richard Hooker, the great Elizabethan divine, and, in so doing, to clarify as well certain of the limits of political speculation itself. We hear quite often now that reports of the death of political philosophy have been greatly exaggerated. If this is indeed a time of its resuscitation, it is important that its limits be recognized and that inquiry be liberated from doctrines which cannot be based on unassisted reason alone. The ancillary purpose of this study is a contribution to such a disentanglement.

Hooker's political thought itself also repays the attention of modern political scientists, if only as a remarkably comprehensive model of pre-modern or "traditional" society. Hooker wrestles with one of the difficulties which had much to do with ending "traditional" society in Europe and in those places Europe has influenced: the bitter and conflicting claims of church and state, and especially of various churches. Hooker's is a revealing endeavor to solve the political problems inherent in revealed religion, without abandoning-as his "enlightened" successors did-Christianity as a decisive constituent of politics or Aristotle as · the secular guide of politics. Hooker's thought is thus a peculiarly revealing combination of Christian revelation and Aristotelian political philosophy.

This essay does not explore the whole range of Hooker's political philosophy, however, but only the views which constitute its basis: his ethics. Hooker's view of what is good for man decisively conditions the core of his political views, the common good for man. In fact his ethics determines the very status of politics in his political philosophy. What follows will show by a comparison of Aristotle's and Hooker's ethics the manner in which the theologian subtly reshaped a philosophic ethic to comply with a doctrine of Christian salvation, thereby necessarily displacing politics from its Aristotelian status.¹

To begin with, Hooker surely follows Aristotle in the broad defining principles of his ethics. That cannot be gainsaid. It is impossible to follow those who see Hooker as partly modern, as having one foot in the camp of such great modern critics of Aristotle as Machiavelli and Locke. Thus Hooker agrees with Aristotle in holding that man inclines by nature to a twofold perfection, speculative and moral, Philosophy and moral virtue are the two goods most appropriate to man, bringing to fruition the best that may be in him. "Speculation of truth" and "exercise of virtue," Hooker says, are the activities "beseeming man's excellency."2 And of the two philosophy is the finer, most reflecting man's distinctive rationality. Philosophy, Hooker says, is that "wherein the excellency of his kind doth most consist." Still, Hooker remains consistent with Aristotle in holding that moral virtue is also a genuine perfection of man, if not quite measuring up to philosophy. There is such a thing as moral virtue, that is to say, an excellence of human character apart from the unequivocal excellence of the reason's theoretical activity.

¹ For very helpful comments on an earlier version of this essay I wish to thank several friends, especially Thomas S. Schrock of Chicago and Walter F. Murphy of Princeton.

If the stature of moral virtue in Hooker's teaching resembles that in Aristotle's, the general shape of moral virtue is similar as well. The ethics of each can be divided into two parts or levels. There is a minimal level and a higher level. The first consists of those necessary duties or acts which must be performed by all men. And the second comprises the finer moral dispositions, the virtues proper, which distinguish the character of the peculiarly fine man. One might say (what I am not the first to say) that the ethics of Hooker no less than that of Aristotle is bounded by natural necessity on the bottom and natural excellence on the top. It is as if Hooker says "...you can lay down a flooring of acts required by necessities of human nature, and known by man generally, and a ceiling of finer dispositions which the best inclinations of human nature call for, and of which only the finer men are aware. Everything between depends in good part on circumstance. Presuming that you perform the things which necessity requires, you should try to be as excellent a fellow as circumstance permits." But the interesting questions concern what are to be regarded as the moral necessities of men and what as their excellences. I shall consider the first at disproportionate length, contenting myself with a brief consideration of the latter, since the necessary duties of man assume a great and even preeminent importance in Hooker's teaching, for non-Aristotelian and theological reasons.

² Richard Hooker, Of the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity, in The Works of that Learned and Judicious Divine Mr. Richard Hooker, arranged by John Keble, revised by R. W. Church and F. Paget (Oxford, Clarendon Press, 1888), Bk. V, ch. lxxvi, sec. 3; hereafter cited V lxxvi 3.

³ I x 12. See also I v 3, I xi 1, 3, 4, I viii 5 (end).

I. THE LAW OF REASON

The necessary flooring of Hooker's ethics comprises those moral duties encompassed under the prescriptions of the "law of reason," as Hooker calls his equivalent to Aristotle's natural justice. Hooker's definition of this law is succinct. "... the nature of Goodness being . . . ample, a Law is properly that which Reason in such sort defineth to be good that it must be done. And the Law of Reason or human Nature is that which men by discourse of natural Reason have rightly found out themselves to be all for ever bound unto in their actions." These things so commonly required are common indeed, a kind of lowest common moral denominator. The Law of Reason prescribes only things of "so mean a degree of goodness,"4 as Hooker puts it, that all men can perform them.

The conspicuous importance Hooker attached to the law of reason itself indicates a variation from Aristotelian thought. Aristotle's single thematic discussion of natural justice occupies but a slight and, it must be said, obscure page in his Nicomachean Ethics. The discussion occurs in the context of the chapter on political justice. Hooker's elaboration of his "law of reason," however, occupies a most conspicuous place in Book I of his Laws, a book whose theme is not political but divine justice. Both the laws of reason and of political society appear as but manifestations of God's government of His creation. With minor exceptions, the context of the law of reason resembles the deductive theology of Thomas and not the apparently unschematic ethics of Aristotle.

Perhaps it is not so obvious that revealed religion determines the character as well as the context of reason's law. To one who reads lightly chapters v through x of Book I, it may seem that reason's law is what its name proclaims—the product of unassisted reason, not of revelation. In those central chapters where Hooker lays his "new foundation" for an ecclesiastical polity, he seems to draw his laws of reason from calculations based on human nature alone. In chapter viii Hooker expressly holds the law of reason knowable "without the help of Revelation supernatural and divine," and generally he cites the pagan philosophers profusely. "A law of reason," he writes, is a rule "whereunto by the light of reason men find themselves bound in that they are men." 5

Whatever might be the appearance of an appeal solely to unassisted human reason, however, Hooker's true appeal is ultimately to revelation. His religious bent shows itself in a simple qualification. By "reason" in its fullest sense, Hooker means perfect reason in the Christian sense—reason unspotted by original sin. Only by such an intelligence is the law of reason to be fully understood. Signs of this view appear to the careful reader even as Hooker deduces his law of reason. In chapter vii, for example, he would not "be understood" to say that "man's natural understanding" can "rightly perform its function as oft as we cause God in his justice to withdraw." A more explicit remark occurs in later manuscript comments on his Puritan critics' Christian Letter: "Reason can find every necessary good when it is supported by divine aid, but none at all without it. It has in itself sufficiently all good by which it can prove itself to a man who is painstaking and diligently pays heed. But our sloth [the effect of original sin] turns us away in other directions until the Holy Spirit stirs up zeal for virtue."6

This understanding implies that reason is subject to revelation. For original sin is known only by revelation. The point may be made in another way. No man's reason has been free of original sin since the "first foundation of the world." Reason as men without revelation have possessed it—as all pagans including the philosophers knew it—is then inferior to that perfected reason portrayed by revelation. It is no accident that, in the later or supernatural sections of Book I, Hooker concludes that sacred scripture is the final authority for determining doubtful parts of the law of reason. In short, the natural foundations of the early chapters are dependent upon doctrines of reason discernible only in the unspotted supernatural light shed by the later. Equipped with this sketch of the basic principle underlying Hooker's argument, we may proceed to consider the way in which the developed principle is reflected in the law of reason's details. First we will consider the law's end or defining object, then the content of its duties and the manner in which they are discovered, and finally its very status as law or command.

⁵ I xvi 1, I viii 9.

⁶ Of the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity, Book Five, edited by Ronald Bayne (London, Macmillan, 1902), p. 594. I viii 3. Cf. Works, II, 539, 239. Sloth in the exercise of reason is the manifestation of man's original sin. I vii 7.

⁴ II viii 2, I viii 8.

The end or final cause of the law of reason is salvation, which is to say immortal life together with literal union of the soul with God in both understanding and moral virtue. Although this is a divine and other-worldly object, Hooker nevertheless held it to be the goal of reason's law, not of divine law alone. His argument is this: a divine end is appropriate to human nature as such and hence can be appropriately discerned by the guide of human nature, reason. To expand upon this particular point, let us consider Hooker's general treatment of the various objects appropriate to human nature.

Hooker, like Aristotle and Thomas before him, understands these objects as the goods to which men naturally incline, the things which men naturally desire. He presents two accounts of the desires, one in chapter v, a definitive second in the later chapter xi which speaks from the perspective of the "external" perfections man receives from God. The first distinguishes man's desires to continue in being, to perform his function well, and to proceed in virtue and knowledge. The second differentiates the things desired as "sensual," "intellectual," and those "spiritual and divine, consisting in those things whereunto we tend by supernatural means here, but cannot here attain unto them." Hooker elaborates this last object. Men seek something above "vital use," which "exceedeth the reach of sense," even "somewhat above capacity of reason, somewhat divine and heavenly, which with hidden exultation it rather surmiseth than conceiveth." So attractive is this prospect that "all other known delights and pleasures are laid aside, they give place to the search of this but only suspected desire." "So that Nature even in this life doth plainly claim and call for a more divine perfection than either of these two that have been mentioned." Only God is sufficient to satisfy our desires and "therefore he [is] our felicity and bliss."8

It might be wondered whether man's natural desire for a divine end necessarily implies the existence of such an end for him. Hooker replies to this objection with an argument borrowed from Thomas's commentary on Aristotle's Metaphysics. "It is an axiom of nature that natural desire cannot utterly be frustrate." Since only a divine life satisfies man's desires, they would be frustrate without it. Hence it exists.

The difficulty of treating this argument as dependent solely upon premises discernible by unassisted reason, may be readily shown. Hooker's conclusion does not follow from his premises as literally stated. Suppose it be granted that men desire a happiness beyond that permitted by life on earth. Perhaps their nature, blended of earth's matter no less than a divine soul, renders them capable of only a qualified happiness, of only the "hidden exultation" accompanying "surmises" of divine happiness, and not of the divine happiness as such. It may be granted that natural desire may not be "utterly frustrate." Nevertheless, it may be somewhat frustrate. It may need to be contented with only a composite happiness not fully contenting the best desires of man's composite nature.

Moreover, if reason should teach the "surmised" object of desire to be impossible, desire would not be frustrate at all. "Let Reason teach impossibility in any thing, and the Will of man doth let it go; a thing impossible it doth not affect, the impossibility thereof being manifest." Hooker himself asserted that the possibility of the soul's life after death was rarely susceptible to discovery by the unassisted natural reason and that bodily life after death had never been so discovered.¹⁰

Perhaps reasons also exist, apart from Hooker's own premises, for wondering if the existence of a provident deity providing divine benefits for men can be naturally proven. In any event it is enough here to say that Aristotle—whom Hooker classed as "the head of all philosophers," who has "alone... performed more very near in all parts of natural knowledge" than "the whole world" has since done in "any one part thereof"—seems not to have believed it could be proven. Aristotle seems to judge the belief in gods with human capacities as but a salutary opinion rendering the multitude more docile and men generally more law-abiding.¹¹

This seems to imply not only that Aristotle's ethics is not pointed to a religious salvation, but also that it is intimately connected with a political way of life. And such an implication is surely true of at least the minimal level of "the philosopher's" ethics. Natural justice, that right which was available to men generally, seems to mean no more to Aristotle than the ⁷ I xi 3; cf. I ix.

⁸ I vii 5.

⁹ I xi 4.

¹⁰ I xii 2; cf. III viii 8; I vii 5.

¹¹ Aristotle, Metaphysics, XII, viii; I vi 3.

minimal principles of justice needful for the enduring existence of any polity and hence commonly present in all polities.¹²

Hooker's peculiar use of Aristotelian references disguises his variation from Aristotle. In fact, every passage from a great Greek or Roman philosopher, that Hooker uses in Book I to substantiate the truth of a provident deity, in its original context urges religious duties only as civically useful or speaks philosophically of only a non-providential divinity. Hooker's most charming distortion of a philosopher occurs in chapter iv, where Aristotle's Metaphysics is implied to be "plainly teaching" the way in which God moves the angels.

A more revealing example of Hooker's art occurs in the crucial proof that God punishes violation of the law of reason and rewards obedience. The proof itself consists in no more than an inference of divine reward or punishment from the common belief that even secret actions are rewarded or punished. In the course of this Hooker quotes in a footnote, without citation, a Latin passage which may be translated: "They will approach the gods in purity, bringing piety, and leaving riches behind. Whoever shall do otherwise, God himself will punish him." Keble locates this passage in Cicero's Laws. There it occurs as the very first of the laws on religion proposed by Cicero himself for his polity. In the preface to his laws, Cicero emphasizes only the political utility in inculcating beliefs that the gods rule all things, being "great benefactors of man, observing the character of every individual, what he does, of what wrong he is guilty." Cicero's particular commentary on the law mentioned is characteristic: "The provision that no human judge, but God himself, is to punish the disobedient would seem to strengthen the power of religion through the fear of immediate punishment."13

Hooker's own philosophic authorities, then, fail to confirm his contention that an immortal

¹² Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, V vii. Cf. Marsilius of Padua, The Defender of Peace, trans. Alan F. Gewirth (New York, Columbia University Press, 1951), II xii 7; I iii 4, I xix 13. See Leo Strauss, Natural Right and History (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1953), pp. 156-64. It is a great pleasure to acknowledge that my interpretations of Aristotle, Marsilius, and even Hooker owe their best parts to Professor Strauss's instruction. Cf. his "Marsilius of Padua," in Leo Strauss and Joseph Cropsey, History of Political Philosophy (Chicago, 1963).

¹³ Cicero, De Legibus (Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1928), II viii 1, x 25. Hooker, I ix 2.

life in union with God is a good naturally knowable to man and thus a possible fruition of his natural desires.

Still, Hooker might have a reply. He might reject the philosophers' view that immortality cannot be naturally discerned. For practical purposes, indeed, sacred scripture is the safest authority for "such natural duties as could not by light of Nature easily have been known." In principle, however, an end beyond this life is naturally knowable. For the imperfections that philosophers think inseparable from man's composite nature—even the imperfections in man's ability to grasp with reason his divine future—issue only from nature's corruption, not from nature itself. Deficiencies in man's actions, as in nature's actions generally and even in speculative reason itself, originate in man's original sin.14 This reply, however, has the decisive difficulty already suggested. The speculatively known cause of nature's manifest deficiencies is known only from revelation. In principle as in practice the law of reason is pointed to a perfection which is not manifest to reason unperfected by revelation.

From the religious object of Hooker's law of reason follows its distinctively religious content. Its two chief precepts might be summed up as "Worship God" and "Love your neighbor." To begin with the second, the love of each man or your neighbor which the law prescribes is a duty to men generally. The precept does not prescribe a duty principally to one's fellow citizens. It thus reminds of Biblical universality, not of the essentially particular polity to which Aristotelian natural right is attuned. The brevity and difficulty of Aristotle's thematic discussion makes it difficult to give examples of Aristotelian natural right. But there is good reason to follow Thomas Aquinas' Commentary on the Nicomachean Ethics in inferring two illustrative maxims from a nearby passage. According to Aristotle, it is natural justice that a citizen peculiarly oppressed in the line of civic duty should be aided. Similarly, it is natural justice that the highest honors or sacrifices be paid to the city's heroes or to the city's gods. One might also add as an illustration, if with some qualification, the minimum principles of commutative justice which ensure a just reciprocal exchange of good for good and a just repayment of evil with evil. "The very existence of the polity," Aristotle emphatically asserts, depends on allowing men the opportunity to trade on the one hand and to obtain recompense for injuries on the other. It is clear that the spirit of Aristotelian natural right emphasizes the minimum requirements of a polity.¹⁵

¹⁴ I xii 3, I vii 7, xi 5, iii 3. See editor's note in Works, I, 222-23.

The secondary status of political justice in even that precept of Hooker's law which concerns duties toward man can be more vividly demonstrated. In a manner foreign to Aristotle. Hooker distinguishes between "primary" and "secondary" precepts of his law of reason. While primary precepts are appropriate to man's true nature, secondary precepts are required only by man's fallen nature. Secondary laws of reason guide men with respect to potential evils rather than potential goods, evils of the state of corrupted nature. They include precepts that "men always knew," so that they might defend themselves from force and injury, and keep others from injuring a third party, and so that no one might decide his own case, or rule others without their own consent.16 Among the secondary precepts alone does any concern for a polity appear. The natural primacy of the polity has disappeared and with it the primacy of the citizen's point of view.

The disappearance is even more striking in Hooker's account of the other and principal precept, prescribing love of God. Far from being set forth as part of political justice, it is deduced from the natural theology which has been discussed. Worship of God is primary because in the decisive respect God and not the polity governs. "Presuming some knowledge," Hooker remarks, "not only that there is a God, but also what power, force, wisdom, and other properties that God hath, and how all [benefits] depend on him [as their principal cause]," each man can be brought to perceive that God ought be honored. The religious tenor which results is apparent not only in the basic precepts but ¹⁵ Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, V vii. Cf. Thomas Aquinas, Commentary on the Nicomachean Ethics, trans. C. I. Litzinger (Chicago, 1964), V L.XII C.1024.

16 Secondary Laws of Reason are not explicitly expounded as such. Only some time after Hooker has stated them (Ix10) does he name them, and he never does call them Secondary Laws of Reason. Yet the principles of section 10, paraphrased in the text, cannot but be those mentioned in section 13. The fact that men have always known them is a sure sign they are Laws of Reason (see I viii 3, 9). Also, they could not be international laws or laws of polity and regiment, the other types of Secondary Laws mentioned in 4 end, 5 beginning, since they precede the establishment of the latter; the former, as well at the latter, are treated elsewhere in chapter x.

throughout those maxims which can be necessarily deduced from them. "That which is simply against [the law immutable of God and nature]... can at no time be allowable in any person, more than adultery, blasphemy, sacrilege, and the like." 17

If Hooker's law of reason is distinct in its purpose and content from Aristotle's natural justice, it differs as well in the manner in which it is known. Since the principles of Aristotelian natural right comprise no more than the minimal foundations of justice needed for the maintenance of any polity, they are of a kind apparent to the sense and equity of most politically active men. To know them would require little more than a consultation of the common customs of polities. Perhaps the Averroist Marsilius of Padua catches the spirit of Aristotle when he remarks that the recognition of such principles comes "not as a result of profound inquiry, but solely by the common dictate of reason and a certain duty of human society."18 But knowledge of Hooker's law of reason requires "profound inquiry," for its deduction rests on theological premises.

Indeed, when Hooker begins his account of the way reason discovers its laws, he seems to resign himself to a discussion premised merely on popular opinion. He distinguishes between "knowledge of the causes" of goodness and "observation of [its] signs or tokens." He largely forgoes the first for the second, "which being the worse in itself, is notwithstanding now by reason of common imbecility the fitter and likelier to be brooked." Of these mere signs of good action, the most certain is "the general persuasion of all men." Hooker's reason for putting such a premium on common opinion is important. "... For that which all men have at all times learned, Nature herself must needs have taught." Merely by use of his naturally acquired reason man can and does know the chief duties naturally required of him. Among these manifest principles are such as this, "that the greater good is to be chosen before the less," "God [is] to be worshipped," "parents [are] to be honored," "others [are] to be used by us as we ourselves would be by them."19

Soon, however, Hooker's account turns abruptly from "signs" to "causes." He turns from common opinion as the indication of what reason commands to be good, to speculative investigation into the true reasons for what is good. Whatever might be the principles that are apparent to men, they were "at the first ¹⁷ VII xv 14, I viii 7.

¹⁸ The Defender of Peace, I iii 4, I xix 3.

¹⁹ I viii 5, 2, 3.

found out by discourse, and drawn from out of the very bowels of heaven and earth." Hooker dwells on the extent to which "the knowledge of every the least thing in the whole world" serves as "mother of all those principles" in the law of reason. He spells out the process of birth. In consequence of observations that the best things, unhindered, produce the best operations, and that the best thing in us is our soul and especially its "diviner part," "the soul then ought to conduct the body, and the spirit of our minds the soul." This is the first law. Hooker then goes on to deduce the "several grand mandates" which the understanding faculty, its superiority established, imposes. Here, in chapter viii, he only "presupposes" some kind of discourse whereby "the minds even of mere natural men" have grasped God's providential power and our consequent dependence on Him. From this presupposition, the axiom directing honor, worship, and prayer to God has arisen. Similarly, "my desire to be loved of my equals in nature as much as possible may be, imposeth upon me a natural duty of bearing to themward fully the like affection."20

Two characteristics especially distinguish Hooker's account of the way reason knows the moral law. On the one hand, Hooker relies upon speculative reason to establish the very precepts of ordinary morality. On the other, these precepts are understood to be grasped by most men in a thoroughly calculating manner. To realize the peculiarity of Hooker's teaching, it is helpful to compare it with that of St. Thomas Aquinas, to whom Hooker's doctrines are commonly traced with only qualified accuracy.

With respect to the place of speculative reason in moral reflection, Thomas's views are not without subtlety. Nevertheless, his massive and conspicuous teaching holds that the practical or moral reason is self-sufficient. It is guided by naturally known basic principles of practical conduct, from which all the other precepts of the natural law may be in various ways deduced. These basic principles are grasped by a kind of natural "habit" or faculty of practical principles, synderesis, the application of which is conscience. Crudely speaking, Thomas holds that a kind of natural conscience imposes the law of nature's basic principles on man's reason. This doctrine is not present in Aristotle, and it is absent from Hooker's teaching as well.

Hooker supposes no natural faculty of right principles—no synderesis or conscience in the Thomistic sense. I believe that the term "synderesis" is absent from Hooker's works: it surely is absent from Keble's index. Moreover, nothing in Hooker's teaching corresponds to synderesis. There is indeed certain language which reminds of Thomas's doctrine and which seems to have misled even such a close student of Hooker as J. W. Allen.²² Occasionally Hooker will speak of "conscience," or of "that law which is written in all men's hearts," or of "... an infallible knowledge imprinted in the minds of all the children of men...."23 But Hooker seems to use the words "heart" and "conscience" only to refer metaphorically to what we call "feelings" and he called "affections." He asserts that the persuasion of hearts or consciences ought to depend upon probable or necessary reasons. And if he does refer to certain "seeds" of Godliness, they are of a kind "sown in the hearts of many thousands" by religious feasts.24 While he speaks of the "imprinting" of knowledge of nature's law in two senses, neither implies that precepts are by nature grasped by the practical intellect. Usually, "imprinting" refers to the general manner in which knowledge is obtained by reason.25 But the term also indicates the impression upon man of his natural faculties-reason, for example. Only the faculty of reason is the "infallible knowledge imprinted in the minds of all the children of men, whereby both general principles for directing of human actions are comprehended and conclusions derived from them." The Law of Reason is imprinted only in the sense that the faculty of reason is imprinted, by whose light the law's precepts may be discovered.26

²⁰ I viii 6, 5.

²¹ Summa Theologica, in Basic Writings of Saint Thomas Aquinas, ed. Anton C. Pegis (New York, 1945), I II, Q. 94, A. 2, 3; Q. 90, A. 3, ad 3, 4 ad 1; Q. 91, A. 2, ad 2, 3, ad 2; Q. 51, A. 1, 2; Q. 63, A. 1, 2, ad 3; Q. 100, A. 2; cf. I, Q. 79, A. 11, Truth, XI, 1.

²² J. W. Allen, A History of Political Thought in the Sixteenth Century (London, Methuen, 1941), pp. 188ff. See also F. J. Shirley, Richard Hooker and Contemporary Political Ideas (London, Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, 1949), p. 80.

²³ II viii 6, III vii 2.

²⁴ V lxxi 2. Cf. Summa Theologica, I II, Q. 63, A. 1, 2 ad 3; Q. 51, A. 1. Preface, i 3; Works, III, 613. Preface, vi 6; cf. vi 3.

²⁵ "The soul of man being therefore at the first as a book, wherein nothing is and yet all things may be imprinted; we are to search by what steps and degrees it riseth unto perfection of knowledge." I vi 1.

²⁶ II viii 6. "The Apostle St. Paul having speech

In all this I do not mean to slight Hooker's opinion that men generally sense the beauty and appropriateness of actions according to the law of reason and, moreover, recognize the law's prescriptions as apparent once they have been suggested for consideration. Indeed, the laws have been "generally known." The question concerns the way in which these laws are generally known and, especially, first suggested. That suggestion does not originate in the prompting of a practical faculty which has grasped the first practical principles, but rather in the grasp by speculative reason of human nature "and other things in relation to" man. "Notwithstanding whatsoever such principle [of the Law of Reason] there is, it was at the first found out by discourse, and drawn from out of the very bowels of heaven and earth." Probably Hooker's quite explicit preference for the term "law of reason" over "natural law" can be traced to his law's ultimate dependence on a discourse of reason rather than an inherent natural prompting.27

If Hooker's deduction of his moral precepts from speculatively known premises distinguishes him from St. Thomas, it distinguishes him from Aristotle as well. Indeed, it seemed essential for Aristotle to introduce at the beginning of his Nicomachean Ethics an argument establishing the superiority of soul to body, the beginning copied almost literally by Hooker.28 But the Anglican divine then departs from Aristotle by proceeding also to deduce the specific practical duties from speculative premises. Whatever the Aristotelian relation between proper moral action and man's distinctive rationality, in no simple sense does Aristotle deduce either moral virtues or minimal natural duties from speculatively given premises. It would seem that this difference may be traced to the theological basis required for Hooker's primary precept.

To some extent the distinctly calculating concerning the heathen saith of them, 'They are a law unto "themselves." 'His meaning is, that by force of the light of Reason, wherewith God illuminateth every one which cometh into the world, men being enabled to know truth from falsehood, and good from evil, do thereby learn in many things what the will of God is; which will himself not revealing by any extraordinary means unto them, but they by natural discourse attaining the knowledge thereof, seem the makers of those Laws which indeed are his, and they but only the finders of them out." I viii 3.

cast of Hooker's law of reason also may be explained by his concern for a salvation above and beyond the happiness of this life. The object of Hooker's law is finally individual or private, and hence it is to be discovered not by consulting what is good for the community but rather what is good for the individual soul. The law's practical precepts are deduced from each man's desire to obtain all good, coupled with a calculation that he will not be benefited by either God or his neighbor unless he treats each rightly. "My desire therefore to be loved of my equals in Nature as much as possible may be, imposeth upon me a natural duty of bearing to them-ward fully the like affection."²⁹

Moreover, the chief duties of this life are in good part, if by no means solely, means to happiness in another. "We labor to eat, and we eat to live, and the good we do is as seed sown with reference to a future harvest." Hooker has distressed some of his closest admirers because he never tires of the refrain that divine happiness issues in part as a reward for "such duties performed as are rewardable."

Probably the key to the law's calculating cast, however, is its stature as law which men generally can know, coupled with the peculiar manner in which Hooker finds it to be known. To the few who love fine things for their own sake, who come nearest to God's perfection in their own understanding and virtue, no need for calculation exists. The finer men desire the finer things naturally or spontaneously. "The greatest part of the world" are, however, "better able by sense to discern the wants of this present life, than by spiritual capacity to apprehend things above sense, which tend to their happiness in the world to come."31 And the law of reason with its elevated aim must nevertheless cater to the capacity of that "greatest part." Now it might be possible to resolve this difficulty without emphasizing the usefulness of duties here to obtaining another life there. St. Thomas managed to do it with his doctrine that all men are spontaneously guided to the most necessary duties by naturally known principles in the reason. Hooker rejected that doctrine. He sought instead to deduce the law of reason from man's desires. Unable to deduce

²⁷ I viii 1, 5; cf. 6, 7.

²⁸ Cf. I viii 6 with Nicomachean Ethics, I vii 13-16.

²⁹ I viii 7.

³⁰ I xi 5, 1. See I x 6, I xii and Works, III, 598ff., 609, and editor's note, 626-7, 641. R. W. Church notes that "... the doubtful explanation of the shortest and easiest way is a favorite one with Hooker." Of the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity, Bk. I, ed. R. W. Church (Oxford, Clarendon Press, 1905), p. 121.

³¹ V xxxv 2.

it from man's better desires which perhaps few men share, he deduces it from the most reliable desire characteristic of all men-the desire for eternal life. "It is the demand of nature itself 'What shall we do to have eternal life?' The desire of immortality and the knowledge of that whereby it may be attained, is so natural unto all men, that even they which are not persuaded that they shall, do notwithstanding wish that they might, know a way how to see no end of life." "There never was that man so carelessly affected towards the safety of his own soul, but knowing what salvation and life doth mean, though his own ways were the very paths of endless destruction, yet his secret natural desire must needs be, not to perish but to live."32

This solid basis of the minimal duties in Hooker's ethics receives a certain illumination from comparison with the philosopher who systematically grounded his whole politics on the most solid and minimal basis possible. That philosopher was Thomas Hobbes. Searching for a law effective among all men, Hobbes was led to found men's duties on the strongest and steadiest natural passion, the fear of death and especially of violent death. By no means does Hooker ground his minimal law of reason on a mere repulsion from pain nor his politics on minimal duties alone. There is a useful analogy nevertheless. Hooker's search for a natural law effectively prescribing man's relation to God leads him also to base man's most necessary duties on the desire to continue in being eternally, a desire common even to the most "desperate despiser of God and godliness living."

I have dwelled on the manner in which the end, the content, and the knowledge of Hooker's law of reason distinguish it from its Aristotelian equivalent. But it is also distinct in its very legal form. Hooker set forth not merely principles of reason but laws of reason.

This differs decisively from the Aristotelian teaching. Aristotle speaks of natural justice or right in his thematic discussions, but not of natural law. He even emphasizes that all right among men is changeable, whatever may be the situation among the gods.³³ Interpretation of ³² Works, III, 511, 615-16. "That sovereign good, which is the eternal fruition of all good, being our last and chiefest felicity, there is no desperate despiser of God and godliness living which doth not wish for. The difference between right and crooked minds, is in the means which the one or the other do eschew or follow." Works, III, 599: cf. I, 648, 697, 511.

33 Nicomachean Ethics, V vii.

It is true that Aristotle in Book II, vi, 18, re-this passage is not easy, but it seems to mean that all rules of political justice need be qualified in extreme cases in order to preserve that very polity whose justice is their object. The rescue of a citizen from undeserved suffering on his country's behalf might entail a potentially disastrous war. To repeat, the principles of natural justice are means to preserve a just community and therefore dispensable when their application might endanger that community or its justice.³⁴

For Hooker, however, the laws of reason are indispensable means to an object superior to all earthly considerations. They are therefore superior to all exceptions here on earth. "Natural laws direct in such sort, that in all things we must for ever do according unto them." The precepts' unequivocal generality cannot be due to the grand dignity of the acts they prescribe. It will be remembered that the laws of reason concern only things of a "mean . . . degree of goodness." Rather, it is owing to the fact that these duties, ordinary in themselves, are nevertheless the necessary means prescribed by God to the greatest good. Thus the generality distinguishing Hooker's "law" is occasioned by its stature as God's command. Law as distinguished from counsel implies mandatory counsel, advice that is in some wav enforced by sanctions in the counsellor. Hooker holds that a provident God rewards man with a happiness far more perfect than that available in this life only if man strictly performs what "the law of nature and God" prescribes. "The light of nature," Hooker assures us in chapter xi of Book I, "is never able to find out any way marks that certain acts such as adultery are always "extreme," which implies that they are absolutely wrong. But is is not certain that this brief remark represents Aristotle's developed doctrine as presented in Book V. Compare the treatment of adultery in Politics, VII, 1335b, 38.

It is also true that Aristotle does speak in the Rhetoric, I, 13, of laws "based upon nature." His bare references there, however, occur but incidentally to his task of providing materials useful for persuasion—especially when positive law is against the advocate. In addition, neither of his illustrations occurs in his own name, but rather as a quotation from other writers. Neither illustration, moreover, seems free in the original from an association with divine, rather than natural, origin. At least one implies a doctrine—all slavery is unnatural—with which Aristotle elsewhere expressly disagrees.

³⁴ See Leo Strauss, "Marsilius of Padua," in History of Political Philosophy, p. 243. Cf. Strauss, Natural Right and History, pp. 156-64.

of obtaining the reward of bliss, but by performing exactly the duties and works of righteousness."35

II. PHILOSOPHY AND MORAL VIRTUE

The demands of divine justice decisively condition Hooker's treatment not only of the necessary qualities but also of the finer ones. Indeed, Hooker writes frequently that the performance of "virtuous duties" is all that "the gospel of Christ requireth" even from fallen nature in order that immortal happiness be obtained. Those who commend the "love of equity and right itself," for its own sake, "though they speak not of religion, do notwithstanding declare that which is in truth her only working."36 Perhaps this partly explains the "rationalism" which some have observed in Hooker's teaching; it surely accounts for his reliance upon philosophers such as Aristotle. In them can be found both an exposition of the virtues fitting man's nature and a speculative account of nature generally. But Hooker's reliance on the philosophers is qualified, just as the adequacy of their views on virtue and speculation is qualified. For the philosophers did not recognize the unqualified perfection of which nature is capable, especially the literally divine end possible for man. This culminating knowledge occasions the differences distinguishing the place of philosophy and moral virtue in Hooker from their place in the ethics of "the head of all philosophers," Aristotle.

To begin with, philosophy itself is depreciated. Indeed Hooker celebrates speculation, but this is not inquiry by the unassisted reason. It is inquiry whose difficulties and doubts are resolved and decisively enlightened by revelation. The queen of the sciences is not philosophic reason but "theological reason, which out of principles in Scripture that are plain, soundly deduceth more doubtful inferences."37 What Aristotle saw as queen serves the King of Kings. It might be said that the theoretical perfection of philosophy becomes ultimately inferior to the moral virtue of justice, to divine justice which commands obedience to its laws and essential beliefs. This is only to say again that divine justice leads where philosophy alone does not go: to an immortal and divine happiness.

With respect to moral virtue proper, the chief effect of Hooker's theology is a depreciation of the more or less aristocratic manliness praised by Aristotle, in favor of a somewhat less political and more dutiful Christian righteousness. I do not wish to overstate this. Hooker's doctrines are fervidly Aristotelian compared to the powerful attacks on aristocratic morality and politics launched by Machiavelli, followed up by Hobbes and Locke. Hooker surely follows Aristotle in taking his ethical bearings from the gentlemanly excellences, no less for their "beauty" than for their "fitness for use." To his readers he counsels "the cherishing of those virtues . . . , wherein if nobility do chance to flourish, they are both an ornament and a stay to the commonwealth wherein they live."38 And thus he praises among the virtues not only the courage, moderation, and prudence which are politically necessary, but also the more splendid Churchillian virtues of liberality and grandeur of soul less closely tied to utility. Liberality and even magnificence befit great men. They "always know that great things are at their hands expected. . . . For actions which must be great, mean instruments will not serve. . . . " Even in matters of religious worship "devout magnificence" is a fitting tribute. If charity to the poor is a necessary work, the splendid raising of churches is even in God's eves "an honorable work." Hooker's words seem to point toward the peak of moral virtue for Aristotle: magnanimity or greatness of soul. Knowing its own excellence, noble pride pursues only what Hooker like Aristotle calls "the chiefest" of "earthly blessings," "reputation" or "honor."39

But if Hooker prepares a celebration of magnanimity, he does not consummate it. His writings include no discussion of noble pride comparable to that in Book IV of the Nicomachean Ethics. The reason seems to be the equivocal place of pride occasioned by Hooker's Christianity.

Magnanimity presupposes an unflawed excellence of character and a proud awareness of that excellence. But this disposition is at variance with the Christian's insistence that all men are flawed by sin and that fallen man's well-doing proceeds fundamentally, if indirectly, from God's providence. This insistence implies that man's disposition ought always to contain an element of humility, of subservience to his true superior, God. The status of pride is then doubtful. It is quite striking that Hooker does not, like Aristotle, treat vanity as merely ³⁵ I xi 5, cf. ix 1, II viii 2; Works, III, 599, 619.

I viii 8, 11, III ix 1, VII xv 14, V ix 1, lxxxi 4,
IV lx 5, 6, 7.

³⁶ V i 2, 3, lxxi 2, II i 2.

³⁷ Works, III, 594-95. Cf. II iv 7, vii; III viii 7-10, esp. 11, 12-17.

³⁸ VII xviii 10, cf. xxiv 5.

³⁹ V lxxvi 2, 3, lxxvii 14; VII xxiv 18; V xv 3, 4; V xv 5 lxxix 14.

one kind of vice. Hooker calls vanity the crowning "mother" of "all" vice. His readers are exhorted repeatedly to "meekness and tenderness of heart." "God doth load with his grace the lowly, when the proud he sendeth empty away," he writes, and then interprets a Biblical parable.

The Pharisee and publican having presented themselves in one and the same place, the temple of God, for performance of one and the same duty, the duty of prayer, did notwithstanding, in that respect only, so far differ the one from the other, that our Lord's own verdict of them remaineth (as you know) on record, "They departed home," the sinful publican, through humility of prayer, just; the just Pharisee, through pride, sinful. So much better doeth he accept of a contrite peccavi, than of an arrogant Deo gratias. 40

Similarly, Hooker's praise of liberality and magnificence is qualified by his view that virtue's importance depends essentially on one's intention as perceived by God, rather than on the grandeur of one's means. "... The meanest and the very poorest amongst men yielding unto God as much in proportion as the greatest, and many times in affection more, [may be assured] that in his sight from whom all good is expected, they are concerning acceptation, protection, divine privileges and preeminences whatsoever, equals and peers with them unto whom they are otherwise in earthly respects inferiors."41 In short, the more splendid and aristocratic virtues culminating in magnanimity are kept from their Aristotelian place by the Christian tendencies in Hooker's thought which advance patience, humility and dutifulness. Greatness of soul is somewhat presumptuous in the light of divine justice.

The preeminence of divine justice depreciates not only the magnanimity which crowns the fine man, but also the more or less aristo-

⁴⁰ Works, III, 702. Hooker expands upon all the evils occurring in "private families," "greater societies," and the Church. He then says that by "... naming pride, we name the mother which brought them forth, and the only nurse that feedeth them. Give me the hearts of all men humbled; and what is there that can overthrow or disturb the peace of the world? wherein many things are cause of much evil; but pride of all." Works, III, 606, cf. 647, 614. Cf. Aristotle, Eudemian Ethics, 1240b, 21-24.

"The good man never finds fault with himself at the moment of his act, like the incontinent, nor the later with the earlier man, like the penitent, nor the earlier with the later, like the liar."

cratic distributive justice which crowns the fine polity. These two are inextricably combined in Aristotle's thought, in fact, for the claims of the outstanding man justly extend to political rule, if not to unqualified political rule. If the flooring of Aristotle's ethics is attuned to the necessities of politics, the ceiling is attuned to the best in politics, the best regime. The peak of aristocratic virtue is matched by the peak of distributive justice, an appropriate distribution of office and privilege to the finer man. While the manner of distribution or the form of government is crucial to the consummation of Aristotle's ethics, it is not so crucial to Hooker's. "... The kinds [of regiment] being many, Nature tieth not to any one, but leaveth the choice as a thing arbitrary."42 It is perfectly characteristic of Hooker that his only thematic elaboration of justice passes up human justice (briefly summed up as "distributive, commutative, and corrective") to dwell upon divine justice. Justice is considered as "the bond" of the very "world," whereby each thing benefits from the rest. God's distributive justice "yields unto each person that which is due according to the difference of their quality." God's corrective justice punishes sins. No commutative justice is mentioned, perhaps because there are no transactions in divine justice between parties sufficiently equal so that each can benefit the other.43 God's goodness cannot be increased by man; man's goodness comes as the free gift of God. Thus justice consists fundamentally in dutiful righteousness. If its manifestation lies partly in helping other men according to law, its fundamental tenor consists in righteous obedience to God's law. Human justice is but a reflection of the dictates of divine justice.

The substitution of divine for political justice yields a tone of dutiful resignation to Hooker's politics which further distinguishes it from Aristotle's. For the excellence of political justice is never unqualified in Aristotle's teaching, whereas Hooker's divine justice is in an important sense always perfect. Apart from its general inferiority to philosophy, political justice is so rarely perfect in practice that its very stature in Aristotelian principle is somewhat questionable. It prescribes the most excellent kinds of action and character only in the best regime. In all others-in the overwhelming majority of cases, that is—justice prescribes goods inferior to that of which the fine man is capable. The good citizen and the good man are rarely identical. For Hooker, however, divine justice is always perfect, and that perfection conditions his treatment of all human justice. Even that which may appear as chance or evil falls under the law of God—if it be only his first and unknowable eternal law. Even the faults of earthly justice are in a decisive way the dictates of divine justice. Perhaps no other part of Hooker's ethics indicates so graphically the distinction between his Christian Aristotelianism and Aristotle's own political philosophy.

⁴¹ V lxxix 8.

⁴² T x 5

⁴³ Works, III, 615ff.; cf. I ii, iii.

To conclude, Hooker's ethics is given its decisive tone by his Christian understanding of man as finally a spiritual animal, not simply a rational and political animal. The religious content, the elaborately calculated derivation, even the strict legality, of Hooker's law of reason reflect its important stature as a providential deity's command of the necessary means of salvation. Similarly, the aristocratic and political tone of Aristotelian moral virtue is qualified by Hooker with a tenor of humility and a-political dutifulness befitting obedience to a justice not human but divine. The distinctive basis of Hooker's political philosophy is obtained not by philosophy alone, but only with the decisive assistance of revelation.

COMMUNICATIONS

ON THE CRISIS OF POLITICAL IMAGINATION

TO THE EDITOR:

Joseph S. Murphy, in his review of The Crisis of Political Imagination in your June, 1965 issue, p. 460, has handled my main ideas with considerable carelessness. Most of the views he attributes to me I do not recognize as those I tried to set down in the book; and his main criticism seems to me patently fallacious as well as misleading concerning my argument. Some of the fault here is undoubtedly mine. If I were rewriting the book now I think I could be clearer; and there may be faults in the book which he has sensed but has not succeeded in bringing into focus. Nevertheless, more sympathetic readers have gained a very different impression of the book than the one described in the review. Hence the same intention which led me to write the book constrains me to attempt a brief clarification and rejoinder.

1. The reviewer states that the book's chief theme is "the alleged failure of political theory to do away once and for all with all the world's ills and to rectify the tragedy of the human condition." In contrast, my own notion of the book's chief theme is that it concerns the failure of political theory to attend with sufficient fidelity to those ills which cannot be rectified. I dwell particularly on the primary and unrelievable gravity (as well as relevance to political theory) of death and of sin. What I tried to argue is that politics, with its responsibility for the general setting of life, must be concerned with trying to assure such a setting that these insuperable ills can be confronted with dignity and composure. I am perhaps in error on this matter; but if so, my error is certainly not that of suggesting that political theory can "do away once and for all" with death and sin.

2. Murphy asserts that alienation is an "exceptive" concept and that it would be senseless to assert that "everyone, everywhere and always," is alienated. To begin with, this is certainly not true. None of the main concepts through which we envision man—rationality, freedom, and the like—are "exceptive"; otherwise, they would not serve to characterize man as such. By way of analogy he asserts that it would be senseless to assert that all men, in all times, are selfish. But it is not, as Christian arguments concerning original sin show. These arguments may be false; men may be less universally selfish than the more pessimistic Christians suppose. But the doctrine of original sin is not senseless. Likewise it is not senseless—although it may be false—to assert that man as such is an alienated being.

In suggesting that this was my point Murphy seriously oversimplifies the view I was trying to present. I did try to show that alienation is present in a great many aspects of our lives today; and I argued too that present-day estrangement characterizes human life as such. Alienation, as well as death and sin, is among the ills which I argued could not be completely rectified. But surely it is reasonable to hold that there are degrees of alienation and that man is more alienated now than he has been at some periods in the past. This seems to me a rather complex matter, but I do not think I am guilty of quite so unqualified and indiscriminate an application of the concept as he charges.

The reviewer implicitly acknowledges that I draw some limits in applying the concept when he imputes to me belief in a past "veritable Golden Age of Fulfillment." But here he misconstrues my viewpoint in the other direction. I did not intend to put forth such a notion and I really cannot see how a reasonably conscientious reader could think that I did. I do have the impression that life in the Athenian polis or the medieval town often involved less estrangement than does life in a modern city or suburb. But I do not know how I could have made clearer my belief that no "Golden Age of Fulfillment" is possible within history nor my conviction that even the best of earlier societies have suffered from the radical flaw of class conflict and exploitation. Indeed, one aspect of my chief theme is that, because of the poverty which has always afflicted mankind, no earlier societies have had our opportunities for achieving community.

3. Finally, the reviewer states that "it is sheer folly to suppose that a possible solution to these problems lies in the resurrection of ancient and well interred religious institutions." While "sheer folly" is a little strong, I share his conviction that such a view would be seriously in error, and ask, who indeed holds it? Some Anglicans and some Catholics, perhaps. But I certainly do not. Again he has made my argument seem something very different from my intention. I was trying to pose the question as to how religious truths can be recognized by a society in view of this very fact: that the ancient religious institutions cannot (and I think I pretty clearly said should not) be re-established.

Further, I devoted many pages to distinguishing between the religiously significant but undogmatic insights of artists, philosophers, and various secular figures—many of whom may be professed atheists—and the revelations on which religions are built. I explicitly stated that only the former, free of all dogma and orthodoxy, should in any way be officially supported. I confess that I am still not satisfied with this argument and am convinced only that the problem is serious, and that I am on the right track. But when a critic implies that I desire to resurrect the Holy Roman Empire I can only feel that he ought to pay more attention to what I said.

The Crisis of Political Imagination is centered upon these hypotheses: that man is properly and inevitably concerned above all with questions concerning eternity; that serenity and dignity in personal existence depend on achieving an intuition, even if unformulable, of the answers to these questions; that one's sense of the meaning of his existence is not derived mainly from dogmas or even from churches but from the whole society in which he lives; that government, as the present administration in Washington has clearly knowledged, is necessarily and increasingly concerned with the quality of the whole society; and that consequently the simple and extreme secularism of the modern democracies, while embodying some important truths, cannot be an historical resting place. These hypotheses seem to me to state some of the main conditions of community. The crisis of political imagination I see as lying in our loss of serious and deep concern for community. I readily admit that these are vast issues, which I have by no means mastered. I had hoped, however, in writing The Crisis of Political Imagination, that we might discuss them.

GLENN TINDER University of Massachusetts (Boston)

MATCH TO TINDER

TO THE EDITOR:

I very much regret that Glenn Tinder finds my review of his The Crisis of Political Imagination careless. I am certainly inclined to agree with his assertion that "some of the fault is undoubtedly" his own in failing to make his arguments clear. My quarrel, however, is not with the clarity of his writing, but with the intellectual utility of the concepts which constitute the heart of his arguments.

It may be, as he complains, that he does not recognize the views attributed to him, a circumstance about which there is little to say; that my main criticisms are "fallacious as well as misleading," is a somewhat more grave charge and requires examination.

He denies that it is senseless to use the concept of alienation in the way he does. He argues that my objections to the use of 'alienation' would apply equally to 'rationality,' 'freedom,' and the like. I quite agree. If these concepts are used, as they often are, in the same fashion as he uses 'alienation' they are indeed meaningless. I fully understand his desire to have such statements characterized as, at the very least, false, rather than meaningless. For then his talk about alienation would have the appearance of empirical legitimacy. After all, the denial of a false proposition is a true proposition. My objection is that he has asserted no propositions, but rather a host of meaningless statements which can neither be confirmed nor disconfirmed. Saying, as he does, that the doctrine of original sin, though it may be false, is not senseless, does not make the doctrine of original sin meaningful—and the same holds for alienation and other similarly misused concepts. It is a simple rule of thought that a property, quality, or condition which can be predicated universally is uninformative—it tells us nothing about the world or its contents.

I agree, in this context, that talk about varying degrees of alienation is a complex matter. It becomes all the more complex in the absence of a clear and unambiguous statement about what sort of condition the alienated condition is supposed to be.

As to the rest I can only ask: How does one go about confirming or disconfirming the hypothesis that "man is properly and inevitably concerned above all with questions concerning eternity"? What is one to do with the statement: "Serenity and dignity in personal existence depend on achieving an intuition (sic), even if unformulable of the answers to these questions"? I do not know. I do not know how one can know.

Tinder mentions at several junctures what his intentions were. I am, of course, pleased to know something about these, though it must be clear that I reviewed what I took him to be saying in his book, not what he intended to say.

The pity of this exchange is that what separates Tinder from my own position is what separates political theory, at least as it is done in some quarters, from political theory as it is done in others. Yet we have done little to narrow the breach.

Joseph S. Murphy

Brandeis University

ON ELECTORAL MYTH AND REALITY

TO THE EDITOR:

One item, at least, in the article by Philip E. Converse, Aage R. Clauson and Warren E. Miller: "Electoral Myth and Reality: The 1964 Election" (this Review, June, 1965) deserves comment.

In attempting to explain the Goldwater loss in 1964, the authors offer some strikingly original observations. In their effort to explain the Goldwater strategy, they construct a rationale (pp. 332-6) which is supposed to reveal what might have served to mislead the Goldwater forces into thinking that they could win the contest against President Johnson. The authors suggest, in effect, that practically everyone in the country knew that Senator Goldwater had little chance of winning in November. Therefore, there must be some explanation as to why Goldwater and his aides were so badly misled. There is an explanation. But it cannot be obtained by employing the theory of games, which in this case would place victory as the sole or major objective of all participants.

According to the authors, Goldwater was misled by the intensive efforts of his supporters which led him to believe that he had a larger base of support than actually existed. In their words, "... the large bulk of letters to public officials or the printed media come from a tiny fraction of the population, which tends to write very repetitively.... [and] as these few people write more and more letters over time, they are counted again and again..." (p. 333). We are thus to conclude that inasmuch as "public opinion is a protean thing," (p. 332) the Goldwater forces committed a most understandable error: they simply failed to realize how weak their base of support really was.

But 1964 was not an orthodox election year. The quest for winning elections, which had always serve to guide the decision-making process in the past, was absent to a large degree from the 1964 Republican nominating convention. How could such a thing happen? People dominated by ideological considerations and dedicated to Senator Goldwater captured control of the delegate-selection process. For them, being "right" was far more important than winning the contest for the presidency. To paraphrase one of them: they had won with echoes but they much preferred a choice.

In these circumstances, the standards used by the authors to try to explain what probably took place in the minds of those advising Goldwater were not necessarily the standards employed by the Goldwater people. The Goldwater forces may have been comforted but were not misled by their own fan mail. When one is called to duty, one goes without regard to cost or consequence. How else does one explain the uncompromising and ideologically "heavy" tone of the Goldwater acceptance speech? "Southern strategy" notwithstanding, a man eager to win does not snub party leaders and millions of the rank-and-file.

Moreover, we have had benefit of the type of analysis offered by Richard Neustadt in Presidential Power long enough to realize that our ex post facto analyses of political events often impose a degree of order to the happenings which the participants wouldn't recognize. Even the 1964 Republican nominating convention and campaign, filled as they were with examples of great single-mindedness, were nonetheless the products of decisions and events which were at times disparate and isolated. Senator Goldwater probably did feel an obligation to his dedicated followers who had long been begging him to run. His original plan was set in motion before the assassination of President Kennedy and although this plan may have depended upon his running against Kennedy, it was still allowed to continue after November, 1963. And, what ideologue wouldn't jump at the chance to present his case before a nation-wide audience? In the meantime, Goldwater supporters worked hard lining up delegates who would not stray from the fold in the face of threats, including that of almost certain defeat at the polls in November. This last factor was the key to the Goldwater nomination. His followers may not have won more than temporary control of a major party, but they did gain command of the delegate-selection machinery. And as they showed us so clearly, this can mean much more than what members of the Gallup panel say.

WILLIAM C. BAUM

Creighton University

ERRATA

The Review regrets two editorial mistakes resulting in the misidentification of men named in Avery Leiserson's article on "Scientists and the Policy Process" in the June issue. On p. 412, in the acknowledgement footnote to Table I, the correct name is David Z. Beckler. On p. 415, in the second paragraph of footnote 19, the correct name is Edward C. Wenk, formerly on the staff of the Office of Science and Technology, Executive Office of the President.

BOOK REVIEWS, NOTES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY

BOOK REVIEWS

The Symbolic Uses of Politics. By Murray EDELMAN. (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1964. Pp. 201. $5.00.)

This is one of those lucid, tightly reasoned books that are an intellectual pleasure to read, because its argument-and its virtues and defectsare so pellucidly visible. The book discusses how symbols affect political action generally and how political symbols influence what people specifically expect out of government. As the title implies and as the content verifies, it is not a book about the relationship between what people individually want and how these wants are collectively, politically symbolized. Rather, the subject matter is verbal and non-verbal symbols, in the sense in which Pavlov or J. B. Watson analyzed them: as cues which are received by the brain and produce conditioned responses. The subject matter is not the food fed to the dog but the bell or other stimulus to which the dog responds in order to get the food. Occasionally and only peripherally, the author considers the political hungers that relate political responses to symbolic cues, but his candid, central concern is with the symbols of hunger and of food and not the elusive reality of hunger and Edelman analyzes a variety of symbolic activities, including the ritual of leader-follower relationships and of authority. He nicely describes the rituals involved, for example, in law enforcement, collective bargaining, and in the practices of regulatory agencies. He persuasively argues that these rituals are a basic characteristic of these political practices in America. Law enforcement in this book becomes a ritualistic game in which both citizen and government test enforceability of legal rules by symbolic acts probing the limits of coercion and compliance that lie just this side of force. Collective bargaining becomes a verbal exchange in which each party tests the willingness of the other to demand and concede-and in the process symbolically reassures the public (which will likely pay the bill in the form of higher prices) that the end of bargaining has achieved the best interests of labor, management, and the public. Regulatory agencies similarly limit and are limited by the demands of the regulated industry and similarly reassure the public that its interests have been served.

Leadership is analyzed in terms of a public official's availability, his conspicuousness, and above all his ability to give the impression of being able to cope with the great problems which confront the polity. A major goal of the leader is to maximize acquiescence. To achieve this he must establish the symbolic and artificial semblance of coping with these problems. The test of his effectiveness is the establishment of a consensus on norms. The occurrence of the dissensus that in extreme form is called rebellion is an ambivalent response to a variety of political value symbols.

The book contains the virtues and vices of reducing political analysis to the symbolic, to which semanticists and stimulus-response psychologists at times tend to reduce human action. To establish agreement on the meaning of the symbols of loyalty and dissent is difficult but it is far easier than to establish agreement on the ways that concrete acts abstractly labeled, for example, identification and alienation affect loyalty and dissent. Purely verbal units of analysis are more readily demonstrable and manipulable than those which include non-symbolic origins of behavior. It is indeed unnecessary to consider non-rational roots of behavior to be able to demonstrate what the author has so cogently shown: that our political actions are to an enormous degree amenable to symbolic analysis and people do act politically in response to symbols. It is similarly unnecessary to probe deeply into the meaning of meaning, for semanticists to point out how bound people are by their words. And stimulus-response psychology has produced a wealth of highly valuable research with specific, discrete, demonstrable units of analysis like the conditioned stimulus of Pavlov's bell.

The defects of symbolic analysis relate to the excessive emphasis on symbols, which in this book is symbolized by Edelman's bold assertion that we can learn more about the behavior of elites and masses from esthetic theory than from anthropology and social psychology. In his frank uneasiness about symbolism, he keeps peering over the edge of the symbolic into the, to him, obscure world of human wants and other mental processes. Rebellion, he says, correlates with a bimodal value pattern and he seems to say that this bimodality causes rebellion. But he declines to let things rest with the symbolic: particular wants of people must be satisfied to produce "political contentment." And he does not quite argue that the stage settings and ritual actions of policy makers and administrators are sufficient conditions for contentment. Dramaturgy is not enough: popular anxiety about ultimate consequences remains.

But Edelman shies away from this obscure, non-symbolic, non-rational world whose existence he seems to acknowledge anxiously. Symbolic satisfactions are not enough, but what the real needs are he does not seriously discuss. He treads over the psychology from which he says we can learn so little with the uneasy awkwardness of a city-slicker suffering from agoraphobia and muddy feet as he steps into these vast, well-tilled, and fertile fields of scientific endeavor. To let rebellion be symbolized as an ambivalent response to signs and as a bimodal value pattern, leaves much to be said about not only revolution but also about more orderly political conflict.

What people mean when they say "you can't eat the constitution" remains verbal in this book. Hunger and the lack of food remain not quite brazen sound, but they are regarded as little more than tinkling cymbals. The actual state of the stomach is not deemed very relevant to the discussion. This limitation of the book delimits its contribution, which in its own terms indeed is very worthy of our attention.—James C. Davies, University of Oregon.

Theories of the Political System: Classics of Political Thought and Modern Political Analysis. By William T. Bluhm. (Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1965. Pp. vi, 502. $7.95.)

This stimulating book is an imaginative and bold attempt to relate the classics of political thought to modern political analysis. Bluhm seeks, in this way, to build a bridge (1) between the traditional masters of political philosophy and modern political scientists, and (2) "between the varying tendencies with political studies today." He seeks to demonstrate the continued relevance of the classics to the approaches, problems, and ambitions of the modern political scientist. Hopefully, the outcome may be the synthesis of classic and modern, "noumenalist" and "naturalist." In this synthesis justice would be done to philosophy, science, and statesmanship, to the good life, empirical politics, and prudential judgment.

Bluhm supports his argument in a provocative series of critical essays in which he compares classic and modern. The illuminating, heuristic juxtaposition is best captured, initially, in his chapter titles which also reveal the book's contents, most of the men treated, and clues as to the meaning of such terms as "naturalist," and "noumenalist": "Naturalistic Political Science: Thucydides and Snyder;" "Noumenalist Political Science: Plato and Strauss:" "The Aristotelian Bridge: Aristotle, Lipset, Almond;" "The Augustinian Bridge: St. Augustine, Niebuhr, and Morgenthau;" "Thomas and Neo-Thomism: St. Thomas and Maritain;" "Naturalistic Prudence: Machiavelli and Neustadt:" "Mathematics in Naturalistic Political Science: Hobbes, Downs, and Riker;" "From Political Science to Ideology: Lockean Theory;" "Naturalistic Political Science as Interest Group Theory: Harrington and Bentley;" "The Theory of Democratic Virtue: Rousseau, Friedrich, and Burns;" "Conservative Immanentism: Burke and Lippmann;" "Marxian Theory: Marx, Engels, Mills;" "Scientific Liberalism: John Stuart Mill and Christian Bay."

Bluhm argues that a critical, comparative review of classic theories and certain modern analogues will (1) greatly enhance our methodological sophistication, (2) help transform ideology into knowledge, and (3) advance the building of a general political theory which will accommodate partial insights and illuminate the whole discipline. Bluhm urges a fruitful dialogue among contending schools, classic and modern. He believes that such a dialogue would lead to that synthesis which would do justice to an integrated political science, one in which the integrity of individual approaches would not be sacrificed in the resulting union. In such a science, "political ethics would not swallow up descriptive science, nor would ethical questions be reduced to behavioral ones." The "Socratic dialectic of the Platonists would not be outmoded," but would "work with more elaborate and sophisticated data." The desirability and possibility of democracy, communism, and other systems and theories, would be tested in the light of broader ethical and scientific inquiry. Moreover, there would be room for many approaches: of decision-making, group process, conditions of democratic stability, the structure of freedom. Bluhm's disposition to relate ethics, science, and statesmanship is reflected in his critical acceptance of these approaches. Thus, "Neustadt's recipes for power would not be outlawed but would be combined with, and perhaps modified by, a theory of the uses of power." Similarly, "game theory, from which the students of political ethics can learn canons of clear and precise reasoning about ends and means, could no longer be criticized as a science of sharp practice but would become one aspect of a science of the human political good." And, ultimately, "the mathematical vocabulary which has been developed by the game theorists and some of the other decision-making theorists might become a vehicle for expressing the principles of the entire unified discipline, both in its ethical and behavioral dimensions."

What can be said of this ambitious, stimulating, very suggestive book? Two main points need to be stressed. First, this book should be welcomed as another major effort to reconcile the normative, empirical, and prudential components of the discipline of political science. It will unquestionably be an exciting book for students in political theory who are interested in exploring the possibilities of constructing a grand theoretical design. They will be encouraged to read the classics with an eye to universal ideas; they will see in the classics most of the methodologies and assumptions that underlie the "discordant variety" of modern political science; and they will be helped to weave together the diverse threads of the discipline's several fields into a more meaningful theoretical fabric.

Second, one hopes that the partisans on both sides of Bluhm's bridge will not shoot him down without seriously examining his thesis and argument. If the traditional theorist or modern empiricist attempt to discredit him by sniping at what they consider his faulty interpretations of the men treated, they will be missing his main point: the continued relevance of the classics for modern political science, and the need to develop a more "catholic" political theory for modern men. In those places where Bluhm's exposition and analysis may be incomplete cr questionable, let those concerned not rip the bridge down but constructively assist in its completion-or at least suggest an alternative bridge. Happily, we are now far along in the task of clearing the air of the often stultifying smoke produced by the extremist guns in the behavioral-traditional battle. As a result, we can now see better the remaining problems that face us as we seek, in our respective ways, to advance the five major tasks of the discipline: unity, clarification of the good political life, illumination of empirical political behavior, prudent guidance, and significant research. To the more intelligent accomplishment of these tasks Bluhm has made a major contribution. I venture to predict that this book will be the most widely discussed theory book of the year.—NEAL RIEMER, The University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee.

The Founding of New Societies: Studies in the History of the United States, South Africa, Canada, and Australia. By Louis Hartz. (New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, 1964. Pp. xi, 236. $6.50.)

Professor Hartz has undertaken a difficult if not impossible task. By elaborating on the thesis of The Liberal Tradition in America, he has sought to propound a general theory of the principles governing the development of "fragment" societies—that is, societies that have grown out of a fragment of an older culture. At the same time he has tried to combine his general treatment with specific studies of four countries, each written by a different person. (Hartz himself contributed the study of the United States.)

Almost every paragraph of this impressive book bristles with challenging ideas, with insights, and with difficulties. Take its opening sentences. "There is a problem of traditionalism and change common to the societies studied in this book, and it derives from the fact that all of them are fragments of the larger whole of Europe. . . . For when a part of a European nation is detached from the whole of it, and hurled outward onto new soil, it loses the stimulus toward change that the whole provides. It lapses into a kind of immobility." (p. 3) One wonders whether the problem of immobility and change is not common to almost every nation on the face of the earth, including the countries of Europe. Moreover, has the United States been more afflicted with immobility than has the United Kingdom? Perhaps the author is thinking of ideology rather than of events; but (whether or not that would solve the difficulty) this seems to be only partly true.

Professor Hartz's style, often poetic and somehow Hegelian, also adds both charm and (frequently) obscurity. The following passage is perhaps typical of the best of his writing: "When fragmentation detaches [the European ideology] from this context, and makes it master of a whole region, all sorts of magic inevitably take place. First of all, it becomes a universal, sinking beneath the surface of thought to the level of an assumption. Then, almost instantly, it is reborn, transformed into a new nationalism arising out of the necessities of fragmentation itself." (p. 5) (Incidentally, Professor Rosecrance later tells us that "one of the strange outcomes of Australian history . . . is that social and political reform did not lead to the consolidation of a nation-state in the mid-nineteenth century." (p. 291)

The fragments, Hartz argues, are not cross-sections; they are horizontal cuts. In one place they may be feudal (Latin America), in another liberal (the United States), and still elsewhere radical (Australia). They do not reproduce a likeness of the original, but the transplanted element proliferates the ideology it brought with it. Today however the fragments are at the end of one era and the beginning of a new one. Just why it should come at the same time for all of them or what is the reason in each case is not always clear, although it appears to be the race problem that explains why the mechanism of rigid conservatism is producing insecurity rather than security in South Africa and in the United States and which will therefore, with a new revolution, bring to an end the "fragment" phase of history. Indeed, Hartz declares that the new era is already "igniting again a spark of philosophy" that had long been dead.

The author finds the lack of ideological conflict in the various fragments the most significant factor in determining the development of ideas (and events?) in those countries, although he also recognizes, secondarily, the role of more concrete factors. The latter, incidentally, are uniformly accorded much more significance by his collaborators.

Professor Leonard M. Thompson, for instance, declares that the "primary phenomenon" in South Africa is that the two European fragments which settled there "have been established amidst more numerous peoples of non-European origin." (p. 179) Interestingly enough, the word "fragment" escaped my eye, if indeed it appeared, in Richard M. Morse's interesting chapter on Latin America. Professor Rosecrance, struggling manfully to bring his enlightening discussion of Australia into accord with the Hartzian theory, finds support in the fact that "Australia's various schemes for meeting the problems of the Great Depression were far less radical in relation to the social context in which they were evolved and applied than were the parallel policies of the New Deal in the American context." (p. 312) The statement would appear to be equally applicable to Britain and many other non-"fragment" societies.

Perhaps the most fundamental difficulty with the attempt to spread a theoretical net so wide is that the theory tends to become so complicated that it can explain anything. "The American fragment absolute," writes Hartz, "comes out then in many ways: civil rights, economic life, the intricacies of political alignment. It is a jewel of many facets." (p. 116) Indeed it is. It includes the absolutistic polarity by which we can switch from keeping the Negro in subjection to insisting on the most absolute equality; and at the same time it also includes pragmatism. (p. 115) It is remarkable that the latter term appears so seldom in a discussion of American political philosophy; but it does appear, and by its inclusion in the explanatory scheme, in addition to what has gone before, it would seem that the theory receives a saving flexibility that would render disproof impossible.

Many of my remarks have been critical. Perhaps I have indulged too freely the scholarly penchant for picking on the flaws and taking the gems for granted. Primarily, I would stress, however, that this book's value lies in its insights, its comparisons, its richly textured relating to each other of ideas and tendencies seldom contemplated together. From this kind of experience the reader may draw his own fruitful conclusions without accepting those of the author.—J. Roland Pennock, Swarthmore College.

The Lawmakers: Recruitment and Adaptation to Legislative Life. By James David Barber. (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1959. Pp. xx, 314. $5.00.)

Professor Barber's study can be read with profit by any interested student of government, layman or professional. With an understanding and sympathetic feel for the day-to-day life of the freshman state legislator, it explores imaginatively the patterns of recruitment into and adjustment to legislative life. The results of this exploration are a worthwhile contribution toward understanding the psychology of legislative behavior. This contribution is rare, however, in that the work attempts not merely to describe and account for certain types of political behavior and attitudes but also to relate the findings to questions about the functioning of the legislative sub-system in the larger political system. It is also of more than usual methodological interest in that it analyzes coherently three varieties of data not often combined in one research operation-pre- and postsession mail questionnaires (to 150 freshman Connecticut legislators of the 1959 session), intensive interviews with a sample (27) of the ninety-six legislators returning either or both of the mail questionnaires and basic documentary data such as legislative records and census reports.

The book's substance can be readily described. On the basis of a legislative-activity index, calculated from legislative records, and a willingnessto-return-to-legislature index, derived from answers to questions about such willingness, legislators are classified as Lawmakers, Reluctants, Advertisers, or Spectators, Attitudes and behaviors associated with each category are delineated by a series of tabular "profiles" and analyses of interview materials and further amplified by extended discussion of three case-typical individuals of each sort. Each of the four types of legislator is examined with respect to the character of community and nominating processes which seem to produce the type, the personal reactions of the new arrival in the legislature, his perceptions and conceptions of self, his strategies for managing the personal stresses and strains of adapting to legislative life, the implications of that type of behavior for the working of the legislative system, and the probable political future for legislators of a given

Critical readers, especially those tending to be skeptical of behavioral research on principle, will find some likely targets for criticism in this work. The basic assumption "that the individual's political behavior represents a collection of adjustive techniques or strategies by which he attempts to maximize the satisfaction of his needs" (p. 213) will seem weak to some because it is "too psychological," and to others because it is too eclectic psychologically. Similarly, the inference of diverse psychic needs and complex psychic states from relatively scanty interview data will be unconvincing to many readers besides those who are cold to psychoanalytical approaches in general. More specifically, it is difficult to explain or justify in terms of any body of psychological or political theory the enormous weight put on the two particular variables which serve to put each of the subjects into his proper typological niche. Skeptics and more friendly critics may both question the happy accident that all the Procrustean beds for Barber's data seem to be of the same size, that, in Barber's own words, "The world begins to arrange itself in fourfold tables." (p. 261) For example, it is remarkably convenient that there are exactly four types of legislator and exactly four alternative strategies by which legislators can adjust to legislative life. Critics may also be made uneasy by the fact that each type of legislator is described mainly, so far as proportionate allocation of space is concerned, through excerpts from case-typical interviews, so that the reader has no way of knowing just how general or typical the illustrative data really are.

These are all legitimate methodological queries. But one should not make more of them than they deserve. The author is well aware of the limitations of his methods and his objectives, and makes no exaggerated or misleading claims for his wares. He knows and explicitly recognizes the character of the psychological foundation on which his work rests. He is by no means claiming, as careless critics might erroneously assume, that each legislator is wholly and fully accounted for as a person or as a legislator by classifying him into one of the four categories described. His typology is an analytical distinction intended to account for limited classes of legislative behavior, not to account once and for all for everything about the legislators classified. More specifically, one should not overlook the fact that substantial independent and objective validation of the typology is provided in the tabular profiles of each type of legislator, although for some reason the author does not exploit these data as fully as it appears he could. Moreover, the typology seems to point to patterns of behavior which have been found by other means in other studies, although the author makes little effort to relate the patterns he found to patterns or typologies used in other works. Finally, the work is not a test of hypotheses drawn from a specified theory but an effort to infer speculative hypotheses for future testing from a body of empirical data not organized into any particular theoretical mold.

Indeed, one of the book's most attractive features is the author's constant effort to speculate well beyond his data, to do more than just describe what he has found. More than most research reports and certainly more than most doctoral dissertations, Barber's never loses sight of the body of knowledge to which it is supposed to be ultimately relevant. He has chosen to emphasize the bearing of his data and findings on the problem of recruiting personnel into legislatures more than their bearing on the problem of operating a legislature after they are recruited. As a result, despite lip-service recognition of the institutional utility of Advertisers, Spectators, and Reluctants, there is no doubt that it is the Lawmakers who are Barber's legislative heroes. The concluding discussion of improving the caliber of legislative bodies therefore sounds suspiciously like the naive pleas of some civic reformers of an earlier age. But even if one is unsympathetic to such pleas, he must applaud the effort to keep research relevant to such problems.—John C. Wahlke, State University of New York at Buffalo.

Home Place: The story of the U.S. House of Representatives. By William S. White. (Boston: Houghton Miffin, 1965. Pp. 175. $4.00)

Perhaps it was inevitable that William S. White would get around to writing a companion volume to Citadel: The Story of the U.S. Senate (1957). The result is disappointing. White, former chief congressional correspondent for the New York Times and now a nationally syndicated columnist and confidant of President Johnson, has been away from the House of Representatives too long. Instead of analyzing basic differences between the two institutions, he pontificates on the ways in which the Senate is better than the House. Many of the common myths about the House are perpetuated. White adds a number of misinterpretations and inaccuracies of his own. Home Place consists of a series of partially developed themes, impressions of the House as of the 1940s and 1950s as viewed by a congressional correspondent; who, almost from the beginning, "was unable to bring himself to go to the House when anything at all was doing in the Senate" (p. 43). Most of the book's themes are grand oversimplifications. The House is dominated by senior members from small-town and rural America. In essentials it is no different than it was a century ago. Its primary concern is domestic policy. Foreign policy is left to the more sophisticated Senate. The Senate can always outthink the House, although never outwork it. Occasionally, the House stampedes, but, fortunately, the Senate, in its wisdom, comes to the rescue. Nevertheless, the House has its virtues. It is the home place in our government, a forum, above all, for the average American.

Many of these themes, when developed at all, are based upon misinterpretation, if not errors of fact. For example, take White's contention that the House is dominated by senior members from small-town and rural America. This is so, White argues, because "one rarely finds [safe one-party districts] in any essentially urban areas of the country, although they do turn up occasionally in states like New York and Massachusetts . . ." (p.

32). In fact, there are over 100 urban congressional districts, the great majority of which consistently return Democrats to office. Many of these members rise to positions of considerable authority in the House-to mention only a few, Speaker McCormack of Massachusetts, chairmen such as Celler and Powell of New York, and influential committee members such as Kirwan of Ohio, Keogh and Rooney of New York, Bolling of Missouri, Thomas of Texas, and Shelley and Roosevelt of California. At the time when White was covering the House, one would also want to include Sabath of Illinois, Buckley of New York, and the late Tom O'Brien of Chicago and William Green of Pennsylvania. There is, of course, a partial truth in White's simple thesis about rural domination, but the far more interesting questions are barely touched upon. He says very little about the working relationships between big-city, machine Democrats and rural southern Democratic chairmen which have long controlled the organization of the House. He says even less about challenges to this control since 1958 by a younger, different type of northern liberal organized into the Democratic Study Group. Furthermore. White's simple thesis obscures the fact that there are at least ten Republican "safe" urban districts and an even larger number of suburban districts which consistently return Republicans to the

A sampling of the more obvious errors and inaccuracies illustrates White's failure to do his homework. He has the party leaders rather than committee chairmen controlling floor time on legislation (p. 25). He asserts (p. 85) that "never in all history has a topmost House National reached the Presidency, save for James Madison . . ." (Polk? Garfield? McKinley?). The Committee on Education and Labor is incorrectly assigned jurisdiction over pensions and medical-care legislation (p. 90). The Republican Committee on Committees is not "composed of the senior Republicans in the House from each of the fifty states," and cannot be said to come under the influence of the Ways and Means Committee (p. 96). The appellation "Judge" is not "bestowed by the House upon chairmen of the Rules Committee with no known past judicial distinction . . ." (p. 114). Both the late Adolph Sabath of Illinois and the current chairman, Howard W. Smith of Virginia, were judges for more than eight years prior to their election to the House of Representatives.

Irritating as such blunders are, it is even more aggravating to find White perpetuating distinctions between foreign and domestic policy and arguing that the Senate reigns supreme in the former and the House dominates the latter. In the process of supporting this dubious thesis, defense policy becomes a home affair, House involvement in questions of foreign aid and the disposal of surplus agricultural commodities is largely overlooked, and the crucial roles of House Appropriations subcommittees on defense and foreign operations are barely acknowledged in passing.

White is at his best in his character sketches of House "Nationals," the members who rise above local interests and concern themselves with nation-wide and world policy. Yet even after these intimate glimpses of the men who stayed-Rayburn and Mahon of Texas, Mills of Arkansas, Judd of Minnesota, Curtis of Missouri, and Smith of Virginia-and the men who left the House-Garner, Dirksen, Nixon, Kennedy, and Johnson-Home Place is singularly thin. The last four or five chapters, in particular, are curious fragments of themes, hurriedly presented, as if the author, pressed by his publishers and longing to return to viewing the Presidency and the Senate, had all but given up on this book.—ROBERT L. PEABODY, The Johns Hopkins University.

Soviet Foreign Propaganda. By Frederick C. Barghoorn. (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1964. Pp. 329. $6.00.)

Probably this book attracted more initial attention than any other published by a university press last year, for it appeared less than three months after its author had been secretly held for seventeen days by the Soviet security police. Professor Barghoorn, like many less involved observers, believes that his arbitrary imprisonment was designed to interfere with communication between Soviet and Western intellectuals: it was a kind of "propaganda of the deed." Considering the fact that Barghoorn has devoted his scholarly career to the study of how ideology and tactics are related in the Soviet system (his earlier works examined the Soviet propaganda image of the United States, the mixture of Russian nationalism and Communism in Soviet ideology, and Soviet manipulation of foreign cultural contacts), his victimization by the security police was at least symbolic of the Soviet desire to maintain a kind of iron curtain. The present volume is an attempt to describe how the Soviet regime, despite its essentially defensive attitude, has maintained an offensive posture in the world-wide competition for public support.

It is fair to call Soviet Foreign Propaganda a description, for Barghoorn's treatment consists primarily of detailed coverage of the content of Soviet propaganda themes rather than analysis of the communication process. The central chapters of the book are devoted to the themes of nationalism and anti-American propaganda which Barghoorn treated in his earlier books, but this time the subjects are examined as part of the continuing Soviet international propaganda campaign rather than as elements of domestic indoctrination. In this part of the book Barghoorn also discusses the extremely important "peace" theme in Soviet propaganda abroad and the advocacy of the Soviet model for modernization. The first part of the book is devoted primarily to a discussion of Soviet concepts of the role of propaganda. While this subject has been treated many times, Barghoorn points out significant new developments, such as the virtual discarding of the distinction between "propaganda" and "agitation" in Soviet terminology. The last three chapters, which deal with techniques, organization, media, and effectiveness, are the weakest. Even in a purely descriptive approach, one would have hoped for a more detailed discussion of such highly important themes as the organizational and physical divisions between foreign broadcasts to Western and to Asian countries (e.g., the role of Radio Tashkent) and recruitment and training of propaganda personnel. While the author has skillfully utilized some of the published surveys designed to assess the effectiveness of Soviet propaganda, he has not pursued such investigations himself nor has he exhaustively examined the available journalistic reports.

In a book of this kind, however, one certainly cannot expect depth analysis of all aspects. Only a scholar with Barghoorn's long personal familiarity with Soviet life and with a full command of Russian could have produced what is a veritable encyclopedia of the subject. One can expect that future monographs by students who necessarily lack Barghoorn's special qualifications will build on his solid foundation by relating Soviet propaganda activities to communications theory and especially by systematic investigation of why, as well as to what extent, this propaganda has really succeeded. In the meantime, Barghoorn has presented an extraordinarily balanced overall judgment of the success and limitations of Soviet propaganda efforts, which he believes have often been overrated and are now diminishing in effectiveness, at least in the advanced countries.-John A. Arm-STRONG, University of Wisconsin.

The Life of Lenin. By Louis Fischer. (New York, Harper and Row, 1964. Pp. viii, 703. $10.00.)

Fischer's biography of Lenin is a monumental study of a historical figure whose full impact on the course of human destiny and civilization has not yet been exhausted or expended. Imaginatively conceived, excitingly written and thoroughly documented, The Life of Lenin is authentic biography in the classic mold. The author admirably refuses to cater to the prurient, the sensation-seekers, or the demonologists. He demolishes myths intended to exalt or degrade, traces rumors to their source, unearths new data, creatively synthesizing and integrating familiar information with new material released by the Soviet authorities. Scrupulously faithful to the facts, he has scoured libraries, research institutes, and archives; he has consulted scholars, specialists and experts; but above all he has called upon his own incomparable and unique experience as a correspondent in Russia during the formative years of the Soviet experiment. It is something of a tribute to Fischer's scholarly impartiality that in spite of the vicissitudes of personal ideological traumas and transfigurations he has been able to describe personalities and events with a detachment that is not wholly deceptive. Although he was ideologically engaged, disengaged, and outraged, knew personally and intimately many of the characters in his biographical drama, and was an observer and semi-participant in many of the events, he surveys the terrain with a remarkably determined aloofness and wholly unnecessary diffidence.

As a consequence, Fischer's book is genuine biography, not iconography. Neither is it an exposé, searching out the seamy side of Lenin's life, breathing false life into groundless rumors or outlandish fabrications, catering to the sensational and prurient. He focuses on Lenin the man, the revolutionary, the statesman, the husband, colleague, friend, boy, son, and brother, not Lenin the prophet, the philosopher, the messiah, scoundrel or demon. The Life of Lenin is obviously a magnificent labor of love, not love for Lenin or his ideas, but love for Lenin the subject. It is likely to remain the most comprehensive and authoritative treatment for many years, although it is unlikely to receive an enthusiastic welcome in that third of the world ruled by Lenin's followers. The study falls just short of being definitive, but only because of the secretiveness of the Soviet regime and through no fault of the author. Some of the most basic facts concerning Lenin's life, such as his precise ethnic origins, remain locked in the Soviet archives. Fischer surmises on the basis of available data, that not only Tartar blood, but Jewish as well, flowed through Lenin's veins. "The Kremlin's secretiveness," Fischer writes, "may be explained by the wish to create a nationalistic image of Lenin as a one hundred per cent Great Russian without infusions of non-Russian blood." But, according to the author, "Reliable facts to prove Dr. Blank [Lenin's maternal grandfather] was or was not a Jew have not been made public," although the records are undoubtedly available in "Russia's bulging archives."

Lenin was a man of seemingly inexhaustible energy, a massive intellect, and a complicated personality, whose mysteries Fischer attempts to unravel with the aid of psychoanalysts and psychiatrists, not always with happy results. Lenin's written output alone is sufficient to stagger the imagination and paralyze the neophyte. From 1893 to 1923, Lenin wrote an estimated 10 million words, nearly all of them preserved in millions of volumes in more than a dozen languages. The deathless character of Lenin's prose, however, is not a tribute to his literary genius, but a hieratic monument to his success as a revolutionary prophet. As Fischer aptly puts it, "Lenin wrote endlessly, but he was not a literary man."

In Fischer's biography, we see Lenin in all his guises and moods: the compulsive revolutionary, the dedicated fanatic, the artful conspirator, the quarrelsome politician, the expedient statesman, and the devoted but not always faithful husband. We live with Lenin the fugitive, in hiding and in exile; we see him at home, in his office, at the ramparts, on the soapbox, at war and at peace. We hear his boisterous laughter, his shrill invective, and we see him with Trotsky and Stalin, alternately insulting, praising and despairing. We witness Lenin at the height of his mental and physical powers, the prototype of the virile intelectual condottiere, and we also see him crippled by a debilitating infirmity.

What is Lenin's proper place in history? Fischer hardly raises this question, yet it is obviously both an embarrassing and burning question for Western historians. If historical greatness is to be measured in terms of lasting impact, imprint and influence on the course of human destiny, then surely by any standard Lenin must be accounted among the most monumental figures not only of this century, but in all recorded history. Western historians are understandably reluctant to place Lenin in the historical pantheon of greats while his ubiquitous eponymous followers are still frantically dedicated to preempting both the future and the past in his name. Yet Lenin almost certainly will join the company of Alexander the Great, Mohammed and Napoleon rather than that of those ephemeral flashes of destructive and malevolent genius like Genghis Khan, Tamerlane and Adolf Hitler. Already one-third of the world is ruled in his name, another third is animated and motivated by his theory of colonialism and imperialism, while the remaining third alternately quakes and thunders before his battalions distributed everywhere.

Thus, Fischer is rightly more concerned with the man of action rather than the man of thought. Lenin resembles Alexander the Great more than he does Aristotle, in spite of his prolific and often prolix output. He is more properly the founder of an empire-civilization than a philosophical system, and his successors are more like diadochi and epigoni than apostles or disciples, but he is even more than this. He has been rein-carnated as a God, whose philosophical exegeses have been transmuted into Holy Writ and whose utterances have been converted into aphorisms and beatitudes. "The iconoclast," writes Fischer, "is now a modern Russian icon."—Vernon V. Aspaturian, Pennsylvania State University.

Nationalism in Iran. By RICHARD W. COTTAM. (Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1964. Pp. ix, 332, $6.00.)

Probably as many crimes have been committed in the name of nationalism as in the name of religion—particularly in modern times. Among these offenses, though hardly conspicuous, lurk the academic. Library catalogues bulge with titles like The Paradox of Nationalism, Nationalism: The History of an Idea, Nationalism and After, Essays on Nationalism, and even Modern Nationalism and Religion. Yet, despite the proliferation of publications, very few useful empirical studies of the phenomena of nationalism exist. This book is to be placed among those worthy few.

The subject has an importance only slightly exceeded by its complexity. As nationalism seems to be setting in the West (save, perhaps, in the 5th Republic—better labeled the 3rd Empire), it is rising in the East. In the West it has recently been most strongly associated with Hitler, Mussolini, racism and international violence. In the contemporary East it is more likely to have the aureole of nation-building, integration and sorely needed consensus. One worries how to damp it in Europe and encourage it in much of Asia.

Actually, no paradox is present here. In developing societies, extending the social and political units with which the individual is acquainted. with which he feels involved, and with which he identifies is a basic problem. In the absence of identification with far more comprehensive units than the traditional family, clan, village and tribe. valued developmental programs have bleak prospects. Consequently, political scientists search keenly for those factors which induce expanded horizons of political allegiance. But we also recognize grotesqueries that are aspects of the same phenomena. Nationalism becomes jingoism, patriotism becomes chauvinism, and identification degenerates into xenophobia. As part of our quest we must also discover the when and why of these aberrations.

Other vital queries also abound. For instance, at times it seems as if there is a fixed capacity for change in an individual's political attachments. He seems to exhaust his affect on the first new unit he learns and thereafter refuses to extend himself again. At other times it appears that the initial extension of political allegiance is the hardest, and that each subsequent extension is easier.

Certainly we do not at present have a definitive grasp of these problems of political identification, including nationalism. But it seems no less clear that well planned empirical investigations—surveys, experiments, and case studies—are the stuff from which the necessary theory must arise.

Professor Cottam, formerly a foreign service officer in the U.S. Embassy in Tehran, has given us a case study of Iranian nationalism, which he regards as a "major key" to fathoming intricate Persian politics. His theme is the impact of nationalism on Iranian political behavior, and he presents it through historical analyses of a number of crucial actors on the Persian scene. After a very sensible introduction and after three excellent background chapters, the author inspects in turn: the tribes, including the Kurds; the non-Muslim minorities; the localities and regions; foreign influences; and the "Nationalist" movement (i.e., Mossadeg's National Front). In this process he also offers many astute comments on other actors, such as the Pahlevi Shahs, the landowners. the military, the Tehran mob including the chaqukeshan (bully boys who are semi-professional rioters), and the mollahs (religious leaders).

Particularly perceptive are the comments on prevailing myths that orient Iranian political attitudes-especially the legacy of the frustrating 1906-1917 period in which the early constitutional impetus petered out. In fact, the British presence in Iran, well discussed by Cottam, is a telling illustration of the more subtle but durable disasters of foreign interference. The British narrowly pursued the goals of short run internal stability for Iran and protection of British economic interests. The contrast between this policy and avowed British principles strongly impressed the Iranians. Like other Near Easterners, they attributed it mainly to duplicity, and they created the exaggerated image of insidious British intrigue that students of the Near East know so well. But the tragedy of the encounter was its long run internal effect on Iranian politics. The easy charge of treason, refutable only through nationalist extremism, was tossed at nearly all prominent politicians and found plausible by a conditioned, already insecure public. Furthermore, all failures could be attributed to some sort of foreign manipulation, adding to the prevailing disillusionment, but getting some politicians off the hook. As a result, the practical sense of national responsibility that is so essential for inter-group cooperation and domestic strength seems to have been retarded.

Many facets of this story should sound familiar to students of American foreign policy. Indeed, Cottam strenuously urges that the United States misread the dynamic of the Mossadeq movement and lost its best chance to promote an escape from the perilous political juggling act that has been going on in Tehran for over a decade now. Though Cottam would seem, retrospectively, to have a strong if oversimplified case, its implications for the current political situation are far from clear.

The political scientist interested in nationalism will find in this book many fascinating observations. However, he must formulate their broader theoretical significance for himself. Cottam leaves his work at the observational level or, at best, at the level of interpreting the specific import of his findings for the Iranian political system. More general implications are rarely discussed. At the same time, it seems to me that Cottam's work offers the best political history of modern Iran now available, despite the fact that its focus on nationalism and several critical group actors compels a more compartmentalized and repetitive treatment than a conventional history. His comments on many salient power relationships in Iran are quite acute. For example, the ability of the bazaar merchants to paralyze portions of the economy, the power of the mollahs to arouse South Tehrani masses, the lack of unity among religious leaders, the attentiveness with which the British scrutinized intra-tribal wrangles to control the tribes, and Reza Shah's strategy of isolating his enemies are all sharply depicted.

The book would be even more useful if it had a bibliography and a less capricious index, if Persian titles had been translated into English, and if certain words like "prescience" and "atavistic" had been less worked. More disturbing is the author's lack of reference to the discussions of nationalism by Deutsch, Doob and others and his failure to consider several relatively recent major contributions to the analysis of Iranian politics. Though Leonard Binder's important Iran: Political Development in a Changing Society came out too late for reference, there are many points where the recent works of Banani, Upton, and even Mohammed Reza Shah Pahlevi are relevant to the author's concern but are unnoted. All the same, these are minor flaws and, it is gratifying to observe that, with works such as this, we are at last being given some basic, probing, empirical political studies of one of the most academically neglected and intriguing polities in the world.-FREDERICK W. FREY, Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

The Great Debate: Theories of Nuclear Strategy.

By Raymond Aron. (Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday and Co., 1965. Pp. 265. $4.95.)

If proof were needed that Raymond Aron ranks among the ablest students of international affairs, it is supplied by his latest book, appraising the national defense implications of the thermonuclear age for governments on both sides of the Atlantic. Planned initially as an attempt to explain American defense policies to the French society, the work has been re-written and broadened into a thorough and searching analysis of strategic doctrines advocated by the Pentagon, of General de Gaulle's concept of the force de frappe, of Soviet defense capabilities and dogmas, and of other issues intimately related to the maintenance of international security in an environment dominated by the threat of nuclear devastation.

Aron's work serves as a model of succinct, tightly organized, and forceful expository writing. He gives us more food for thought in less than 300 pages than other commentators sometimes give us in two or three times that space. With a kind of relentless logic, Aron supplies one insight after another, as he evaluates the complexities inherent in concepts like massive retaliation, deterrence, and the "rationality of irrationality" (the term he employs for the assumption that a French nuclear force could actually "deter" Soviet aggression). Thanks in no small measure to the successful labors of translator Ernst Pawel, Aron emerges as an epigrammist. Nearly every page has its bon mot. Deterrence, we are told, is "in essence, a form of diplomacy" since never in the history of diplomacy "have unused weapons weighed so heavily"; the transition from the atomic to the thermonuclear age "was at least as radical as that from so-called conventional chemical explosives to atomic . . . bombs"; "maximum deterrence does not necessarily coincide with maximum security"; "one cannot use joint suicide as a constant threat"; in nuclear strategy it "is impossible, by definition, to ward off one danger without thereby automatically increasing another": (in reference to developments like the "hot line" between Washington and Moscow) "the meaning of messages remains equivocal up to the very last moment"; and the "entire American theory" of thermonuclear deterrence is "based on rationality," while the "risk of irrational decision increases with the number of countries acquiring nuclear arms."

Aron's analysis challenges hallowed doctrines in Europe and in America. In surveying technological developments during the fifteen year period after 1945, for example, he attacks the long-standing assumption that, save for American possession of nuclear weapons, the Red Army would have swept across Europe after World War II. Moreover, he asserts that in the period 1945-50, the American monopoly of nuclear weapons played a minimum role diplomatically—far less than unilateral possession of weapons of this magnitude might have led observers to expect. In his examination of the strategic doctrines underlying NATO. Aron advances many ideas which we have now come to associate with General de Gaulle. At the heart of the continuing debate over NATO's future lies a dilemma that has existed since its inception: "leaders were not too clear about the differences between a strategy of deterrence and a strategy of use [of thermonuclear weapons] following failure of deterrence." Yet his analysis of recent American nuclear strategy-and particularly his appraisal of Secretary Robert McNamara's refinements-will gladden more hearts in Washington than in Paris. Aron credits Mr. McNamara with possessing a subtlety of mind in perceiving a number of deficiencies in the American defense posture, and the leadership capacity required to correct many of the lacunae.

At the same time, Aron is equally forthright in discussing continuing defects in American nuclear strategies, particularly as they appear to European eyes. Many American defense experts, he charges, are more concerned with arms control and safeguarding military communications than with the military "susceptibility of their European allies." McNamara's doctrinal innovations "left Europeans more troubled than convinced" about the soundness of the Pentagon's strategic assumptions. Europeans were rightfully apprehensive "that war could be fought on European soil and devastate that continent while the territories of both the United States and the Soviet Union were spared out of a desire, strategic or moral, to prevent extreme escalation." McNamara's concept of "graduated deterrence" in effect minimized "the risk of a big war that might involve the continental United States at the price of putting up with little wars (little, that is, when viewed from across the ocean) in which only Europeans would be killed."

These reservations about American policy do not, however, add up to a defense of Gaullist strategic contentions. If anything, Aron is even more searching in his appraisal of Gaullist, than of American, defense postulates. After examining all the arguments advanced in support of the force de frappe, he concludes that the Gaullist case "postulates a highly implausible situation in which, moreover, the French deterrent would be absolutely worthless." De Gaulle's nuclear strategy represents nothing more than a "fatal rehash of the massive retaliation concept, and it is a miniature version ten years behind the times." If Paris actually endeavored to deter a hostile Soviet thrust (not already deterred by the American arsenal), then its action would convey to Moscow "nothing but a convincing impression of its own insanity."

In the last section of his book, Aron is at pains to supply a dimension to his treatment which is not infrequently neglected in earlier pages, an omission which leaves the reader to wonder how applicable his (and other experts') extremely rationalistic strategic models are to the real world of policy-formulation. In the concluding pages, Aron emphasizes the importance of "psychological understandings," of human emotions, of mind sets, and of deeply held convictions on both sides of the Iron Curtain. Here he notes, for example, that the French force de frappe may be even more a psychological instrument of French power than a needed addition to the Western military arsenal. Here, he discusses the prospects and implications of defense concepts resting upon a foundation of paradox and irrationality, such as the possibility of highly rational responses by the nuclear giants in an age when global warfare itself approaches a form of human madness. And here he evaluates the likely characteristics of a world in which the revolution in military technology has "abolished traditional forms of peace as well as conventional war. . . ."

Aron's appraisal is a challenging, readable, and significant work—ranking perhaps as the most indispensable treatment available for anyone seeking to understand the impact of thermo-nuclear weapons upon military strategy and diplomacy.—Cecil V. Crabb, Jr., Vassar College.

How Nations Negoticte. By Fred Charles Iklé. (New York: Harper & Row, 1964. Pp. xii, 274. $5.95.)

Diplomacy is still more of an art than a science, but perhaps, in the nuclear age, a systematic analysis of one of its prominent techniques, namely negotiation, may be useful as a supplement to the standard works on diplomatic practice and the memoirs of practicing diplomats. Such an analysis might well be undertaken by a scholar trained in behavioral research, rather than by a professional diplomat. The volume under review admirably meets these specifications.

Professor Iklé has effectively combined research in the records of diplomacy in recent years, interviews with persons who have had extensive experience in negotiation (mostly Americans and Europeans), and clinical analysis. His research has been supported by the RAND Corporation, the Rockefeller Foundation, the Council on Foreign Relations, and the Center for International Affairs at Harvard, under whose auspices the book was written. His study is therefore the work of a behaviorally trained political scientist and a keen observer, not of a professional diplomat or a longtime student of diplomacy. It has the virtues and the weaknesses of the author's background. It lacks the flavor of a diplomat's memoirs and the authority and the grace of style of the classic works on diplomacy. It cites historical examples in bewildering numbers, but because most of these examples are drawn from current diplomatic experience, the treatment lacks real historical dimensions. Almost all the illustrations are taken from the recent diplomacy of the United States, the United Kingdom, France, and the Soviet Union. Most of the rest of the world (including all of the new nations) is almost wholly neglected; yet many of the new dimensions and characteristics of contemporary negotiations arise from the entrance of so many new nations into the diplomatic arena.

The author is well aware of the limits as well as the possibilities of negotiation. He warns against the common cliché, frequently heard at the present time, that "the act of negotiating is in itself meritorious" (p. 54). He points out that negotiators face a "continual threefold choice": to accept "available terms," to choose no agreement, or to continue the bargaining process. His longest chapters deal with the "Rules of Accommodation" and "How the Parties Come to Terms." He gives due heed to the effects of domestic pressures and concerns, and to the role of personalities.

In a study which concentrates largely on the diplomatic as well as the political cold war between the Soviet Union and the West, it is not surprising that the book's greatest practical value, and its most impressive insights, lie in the area of negotiation with the Soviet Union. In this area the author finds the main differences in negotiating styles. (If he had also studied the diplomacy of the new states, he might have found other interesting examples of differences in negotiating styles.)

Iklé maintains that "Western fortes show up mainly in negotiations with other Western governments but are of little value with Communist opponents" (p. 236). In a long "inventory of Western weaknesses" in negotiating with the Russians (pp. 238-253) he emphasizes "letting the opponent determine the issues," being "shy about counterdemands," being "afraid of making unacceptable proposals," and "denying oneself available threats." Soviet negotiators, on the other hand, have certain advantages over their Western counterparts. They are "backed by an authoritarian government"; they "need not feel constrained by domestic public opinion as much as Westerners do"; they can "support their long-term strategy and day-to-day tactics with fully coordinated propaganda machinery" (pp. 226-235).

But "the shrewd and skillful negotiating style of the Soviet government turns out to be a myth" (p. 234). Soviet diplomats commit many blunders. They often fail "to take advantage of Western vulnerabilities"; "they often ask for a whole loaf where they could get half a loaf—and wind up with nothing"; "they fritter away the credibility of their threats and the value of their promises"; "they cannot find the right dosage of demands and inducements"; "they are bold rather than shrewd, brazen rather than cunning" (pp. 234-235).

The contemporary negotiator, in short, is often lacking in the qualities most needed in the "compleat negotiator," notably realism, flexibility, and patience. Thus Professor Iklé, after his long clinical analysis of negotiation under contemporary conditions, ends by emphasizing the qualities of a diplomat prescribed in Sir Ernest Satow's A Guide to Diplomatic Practice, or even, as he recognizes, in "seventeenth- and eighteenth-century manuals on diplomacy" (p. 253). The conditions under which international relations must be carried on have greatly changed, but apparently, for better or for worse, successful diplomacy in the nuclear age calls for essentially the same qualifications as in former days.

This book, which is also available in a text edition, will be useful as supplementary reading in courses in international relations and diplomacy. Professional diplomats and other practicing negotiators could also read it with profit, although no doubt few of them will.—Norman D. Palmer, University of Pennsylvania.

Pathways to Parliament: Candidate Selection in Britain. By Austin Ranney. (Madison and Milwaukee: The University of Wisconsin Press, 1965. Pp. xiv, 298. $6.50.)

Ever since the renascence in the forties and early fifties of the case for greater "responsibility" in American political parties, scholars have been taking a longer and cooler look at the British system upon which the "responsibility" model seems implicitly to be based. The inquiries have revealed not only a much more complex and variegated pattern of relationships within and among British parties than had been assumed by the reformers; they have also served to cast into doubt the likelihood—even the desirability—of an easy replication elsewhere of the British model. Yet most of the recent studies have focused almost exclusively on the parties as national, parliamentary, policy-making institutions, and none has delved more than fitfully into the consequences for party cohesion of the pattern of local-national relationships. It is a welcome departure that the author of this book, who has already explored the doctrine and condition of party responsibility in the United States, should turn his attention to this neglected but important question in the reputed home of strong democratic parties. In doing so he has put in his debt students both of British politics and of parties generally.

Ranney begins with the assumption that candidate selection matters in the British system of government. Despite the prevalence of party voting by the electorate and the frequency of bloc voting in the House of Commons, the parties, he believes, are not so monolithic that it makes little difference who is selected by the constituency parties to stand for Parliament. That up to now the process of candidate selection has been cloaked in secrecy and neglected by scholars does not mean that it is either impossible to fathom or of marginal importance to an understanding of how British parties behave.

In producing the first really comprehensive study of candidate selection in Britain, Ranney has succeeded in bringing to the surface a very large part of the iceberg. His data are impressive. They consist of three main types: (1) his own interviews with national party leaders and workers, regional organizers, constituency association officers, agents and activists, M.P.s and candidates; (2) accounts in the press of controversies over the selection of candidates; and (3) information about candidates and their constituencies for general and by-elections from 1951 to 1964 punched on cards and subjected to various statistical analyses. This combination of sources has enabled him to derive explanations and inferences which reliance on any single type of data would have made difficult, and to invest his statistical tables with the flavor of political life.

The result is a rich mine of information about the kinds of candidates adopted, the process by which and the conditions under which they emerge, the comparative power of national leaders and local parties in the selection process, and differences on these questions within and among the three main parties. Much of the analysis tends to confirm pre-existing generalizations, but on several questions the data either add substantially to or throw into doubt standard interpretations. Three such deserve mention here.

First, Ranney's evidence rebuts the widespread view that the parties' central leadership tightly control the selection of candidates and use this power to discipline backsliding or recalcitrant M.P.s. Notwithstanding a few highly publicized cases of Transport House vetoes and expulsions, the findings indicate that central control of candidate selection-and in over two-thirds of the constituencies adoption is tantamount to election -makes only a minor contribution to British party cohesion. It simply is not that strong, as Ranney's cases and statistics show. Not only have the impressive formal powers of the national headquarters fallen into desuetude; since 1945 far more Conservative and Labour M.P.s have been disciplined by their constituency parties than by national officers. To a much greater extent than commonly supposed, the de facto local control of candidate selection in Britain resembles the de jure local control in the United States—though the results for parliamentary cohesion remain different, for, as Ranney suggests, "the national leaders do not need to control local candidate selection in order to maintain party cohesion in Parliament; the local activists do the job for them" (p. 281).

Second, the data support the established belief that politics in Britain are elite-dominated. Not only in social status, outlook, and personality do the chosen candidates of all three parties resemble each other much more than they do their respective supporters. They are also selected in fact by a tiny minority of local activists, a few of whom control the gates to the short list. Much of the time this local elite shares the broad presuppositions of the national leadership, but Ranney's evidence also shows that what the locals look for in a candidate (more often than not demographic and personality rather than ideological traits) does not always square with the needs and preferences of the national leadership, and a certain amount of conflict between the levels is endemic.

Third, the data point to the conclusion that the two major parties in Britain do not diverge greatly in the way they select parliamentary candidates. While Ranney does find more differences between the parties at this level than someone like Robert McKenzie would likely admit, he comes down none the less on the side of those who view the parties as remarkably similar in the realities of organizational power. His discussion of the motives, procedures, and sensitivities of grassroots activists is one of the strongest features of the book, but it also points up the need for much more knowledge of the process by which people are recruited into politics at this level.

This study, then, is first-rate in almost every respect. Admittedly there are a few places where the reviewer's eyebrows rose. The author's decision to eliminate all incumbent M.P.s from his statistical analysis of the identifiable characteristics of candidates adopted by the local parties may well have skewed some of his results, and the figures he has used to construct categories of "winnability" are not altogether convincing. And in view of his declared belief that the study may provide "some basis for estimating the extent to which British practices are exportable and constitute a model other democracies should follow," (p. xi) it is disappointing to note that he does little to follow up this theme. Nevertheless, as raw material for more genuinely comparative analysis his work is bound to prove useful and in this respect is an important contribution to comparative politics.—James B. Christoph, Ohio State University.

[The foregoing review, of a book written by the Book Review Editor of this journal, was commissioned by the Managing Editor.]

BOOK NOTES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY

POLITICAL THEORY, HISTORY OF POLITICAL THOUGHT, AND METHODOLOGY

Political and Sociological Theory and Its Applications. By George E. G. Catlin. (Ann Arbor: The University of Michigan Press, 1964. Pp. viii, 118. $3.95.)

The title is misleading; this is not a manual of research methods but five light essays on weighty topics, presented with insight and verve in a style at once intriguing and irritating. Professor Catlin, who has combined a long scholarly career (The Atlantic Community, Systematic Politics) with practical operations to shape up the Western world (Prohibition repeal, Indian independence, building the Labour Party, advancing Churchill and Willkie), expounds on peace and war, democracy, and the First Amendment, the social sciences as a "Third Culture," and the existence of political science, in 118 pages.

Three themes recur in Catlin's exposition. One is the "Theory of the Political Market," analyzed at greater length in his Systematic Politics. "Men make certain demands for political goods, for which they are prepared to pay the costs, even in terms of abridgment of precedent freedoms. According to Marx-Engelism both demands and goods are ultimately material or economic. A profounder analysis is that they are demands of varieties of power to achieve, or to guarantee freedom to achieve, whatever we want. Controls and governments of all kinds . . . are concerned to adjust those goods to those demands, having reckoned the costs." A second theme is the need for Western self-criticism: "One half or more of the world is patently wrong-headed. Are we then, all of us, patently right-minded?" And a third is the tripartite division of the study of politics as art, philosophy and science, particularly as this bears on liberal education.

In the first of four chapters developed from lectures at the University of Washington, Catlin asks whether political science offers anything practical for problems of peace and war. After a call for political scientists to come "up from their cloistered caves of speculative doubt into the daylight of the common forum"—but not as anxious "for-God's-sakers," who "too often commit blasphemy against the scientific spirit," he asserts that social science "begins with practical needs and, when its pure theory moves over to application, makes a circle back to practical needs." In between, "an empiric political or sociological science is now in process of being constructed, cumulative in its conclusions." Much as modern economics has dispelled the myth that God wills unemployment, political science may replace the belief that wars are inevitable with practical advice as to how to end them.

What, then is the substance of political science's contribution? That "the days of the national powers are over and the day of the superpowers alone has arrived." Neither anarchism nor crude Marxist anti-imperialism is the answer, but the development and effective enforcement of law through world authority with "teeth and not afraid to use them." This will require first Atlantic (not just European) union, and then "some kind of understanding or adjustment in coexistence between the free world and the communist blocs." The blind alleys include too much and too little reliance on force, Gaullism, and irrelevant ideological arguments.

In the next three chapters, the author dashes about the political landscape, incinerating straw men and planting his flags. He does point to several crucial new developments in the character of democracy, although each is exaggerated. Mass communications and polling mean that leaders are in closer touch with followers, so that neither need depend for guidance on the inherent ambiguities of elections. "The authentic representative vision is to be found not so much in representative persons for all matters as in wellchecked polls of all persons on particular matters." Political parties, increasingly manned by professionals, are the essential posers of alternatives for the public, but "what really matters is that each of these parties, if called upon to form the government, should be competent to put into power men who can produce efficiently the political goods which the majority of the public wants." Thus "the future, it may be, belongs to men of the McNamara and Beeching type. . . . Among the consumers there will be equality and among the producers quality."

The gist of the chapter on "Political Philosophy and the First Amendment" is that a moral code should be inculcated "directively" (primarily through education) rather than "coercively." The teaching of Marxism should be permitted and the Analects of Confucius required. The essay on "The Third Culture: The Role of the Social Sciences in Education" develops the idea that political science has a special part to play in linking those other two cultures, since it contains both a humanistic and a scientific dimension. The final chapter, "Political Science: Does It Exist?", contains a succinct summarization of the main features of Catlin's conceptual system. The list bristles with significant questions, some of which are probably researchable.

As a piece of witty gadflyery unencumbered with evidence, as an incitement to dig into Catlin's more thorough work, and as a collection of personal affirmations by an experienced "pious Erasmist," this book is worth reading. The discourse is often disconnected and it falls short of demonstrating how political theory applies to the big questions. But perhaps it was meant mainly to stimulate, and that it does.—James David Barber, Yale University.

Tocqueville and England. By SEYMOUR DRESCHER. (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1964. Pp. viii, 254. $6.00.)

This is a challenging and original study. It calls into question previous interpretations of the origin and meaning of Tocqueville's thought; it breaks new ground in its emphasis upon the critical importance of his English experience. This is not to say that its argument will be universally accepted; this reviewer found some of the book to be based upon inadequate evidence. Often the texts cited by Drescher do not fully bear the weight he puts upon them. Yet by assembling and analyzing so vigorously the materials thus far available on Tocqueville's visits to Great Britain, Drescher has made a genuine contribution.

The thesis of this book is that as the result of his British travels and friends, Tocqueville altered permanently the concepts and models he used to deal with society and politics. Abandoning the contrast between aristocratic and democratic societies that dominates De la Démocratie en Amérique, Tocqueville in his last and most mature work, L'Ancien Régime et la Révolution, placed his entire emphasis upon another dichotomy—that between those regimes that are free and those others that are not. Thus by the end of his life, so Drescher argues, Tocqueville had discarded the United States as the model he recommended to his French countrymen. England was far more suitable:

England clearly presented a case in which the disintegration of medieval society had not led to the permanent alienation of its constituent classes, and it still afforded viable political machinery for the transfer of political power by peaceful means. England, more than America, proved that a nation could successfully combine national cohesion with a maximum of local self-government, and could remain free while sustaining the tremendous economic transformation that placed her at the forefront of the industrial revolution.

And from what he saw and heard in the British Isles. Tocqueville came to see the connection between the rise of democracy and that of centralized bureaucracy; the conditions determining the evolution of aristocracies: the reasons why revolutions occur in some countries and not in others; the necessity for certain political and economic reforms in France; and, finally, what ought to be a great power's goals and methods in its foreign and colonial relations. Thus Drescher claims that some parts of the Démocratie originated in Tocqueville's English experience, rather than his visit to America. It was from his view of the industrial revolution in England that Tocqueville came to write that famous chapter on how industrialists may come to constitute an aristocracy in an ostensibly egalitarian society.

Using the method first applied by Professor G. W. Pierson to Tocqueville's and Beaumont's visit to the United States, Drescher has given a thorough account of what and whom these same two saw on their travels in England and Ireland. What Tocqueville learned there impressed him with the significance of voluntary associations for the politics of a free society; with the differences between an aristocracy that performs real functions, such as administering justice, and another that does not. Such laissez-faire economists as Nassau Senior imposed their views upon their French friends. Tocqueville thus came to adopt mid-Victorian theories of economic liberalism and of punitive treatment of the poor. Finally, he was brought to see that laws of inheritance concerning land did not have the importance he had once attributed to them.

Many of these assertions are well substantiated by the evidence offered in this book. But Drescher goes on to make further and more dubious claims. He sees drastic discontinuties everywhere in Tocqueville's thought, and all of them are due to the impact of England. The assumption that underlies this book is that Tocqueville once held rigidly defined and systematically constructed theories and that he abandoned them for other and incompatible ones. But there are good reasons for rejecting such an interpretation. Tocqueville had a way of adapting his views so that they could be relevant to what was happening in French politics at a given time. Although his political values remained relatively constant, his emphasis did not. Thus he tended to refer to whatever foreign model seemed most likely, at that particular juncture, to realize his own political preferences. During the Second Republic, he once again placed great importance upon the Constitution of the United States. After the coup d'état that established the Second Empire, Tocqueville referred more often to England. But in neither case did such a reference prove a basic change in Tocqueville's ideas.

Equally relevant to such an interpretation is the question of Tocqueville's distinctive style of thought. He was not the sort of thinker who cared much for careful definition or internal consistency. There are striking incompatibilities between his successive treatments of even his favorite subjects. But such discrepancies were due to forgetfulness, lack of system, and a boundless fertility of intellectual imagination. This type of mentality Tocqueville shared with Montesquieu: both were aristocrats trained as magistrates rather than as professional philosophers or as university professors of the social sciences; both had penetrating but eclectic minds. Their concerns, to which they constantly returned, so far from being mutually exclusive, were interrelated-how may political regimes be classified in terms of the person or persons who dominate? how much and what sort of liberty is enjoyed by the citizens of such regimes? what is the distinctive spirit of the society? None of these questions ever received an overriding priority. Certainly, as Drescher states, liberty is a great theme in the L'Ancien Régime. But is democracy unmentioned in that volume? One has only to read the last chapter to see how much equality weighed on the mind of Tocqueville. both as a force that helped destroy the Old Regime and as a political value that ought to be reconciled with liberty, although, in French experience, it had not been.

Drescher's assertion that the different phases of 'Tocqueville's thought were based on quite discrepant themes is not always based upon close textual analysis. To take one example, Chapter III closes with the following sentence: "When the first part of the Démocratie finally appeared early in 1835, England was the contemporary example of the aristocratic principle and all its workings." The evidence cited is Appendix B to the first part of the Démocratie. Within that text, Tocqueville wrote: "However until 1832 the amount required to qualify as a voter remained what it had been during the fifteenth century, which proves that the English Constitution became far more democratic with time." [Tocqueville, Oeuvres Complétes, ed. J. P. Mayer (Paris, 1951), Tome I, p. 451.]

Despite such lapses, this is a book that deserves to be widely read. It is full of general hypotheses worth discussion; it calls attention to English influences upon Tocqueville, a subject previously little known or understood.—Melvin Richter, Hunter College of the City University of New York.

Machiavelli and Guicciardini: Politics and History in Sixteenth-Century Florence. By Fellx

GILBERT. (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1965. Pp. x, 349. $6.50.)

This well written book by an able historian should be of considerable benefit to students and teachers of Western political thought. Professor Gilbert expertly employs contemporary source materials, in particular Florentine official documents and early sixteenth-century memoirs, to produce a persuasive portrait of the social and political environment from which emerged a new way of thinking about politics and history.

Concentrating initially on the explosive career of the short-lived Florentine republic (1494-1512), the author lays bare the source and character of its class struggle, which produced competing aristocratic and republican ideologies. Even more significant was a rapidly spreading disillusionment with then-customary ways of viewing and evaluating political life. The traumatic French invasion of Italy in 1494, the patently sham constitutionalism of the Medicis before and after the republican interlude, and the obviously self-interested claims of the disputants on both sides of the continuous debate over republican institutions, led many Florentines to doubt the traditional beliefs that the city's institutional structure had been ordained by God and that all political troubles were the fruit of individual sinfulness. The internal and external difficulties faced by republican Florence, leading eventually to the overthrow of that regime, contributed to a spreading conviction that only egoism and force are significant in politics; moral principles and individual goodness or evil seemed irrelevant to an apparently autonomous political Professor Gilbert builds on this carefully detailed foundation his interpretation of Machiavelli's political thought, to which I shall return. In the second part of the book is presented a clear, concise discussion of Florentine historiography around the year 1500. The author indicates how Renaissance humanism's aping of classical historians gave way gradually to a more realistic approach to political history, reaching its culmination in the writings of Machiavelli's younger contemporary, Francesco Guicciardini.

Of perennial interest to students of political ideas are the many varying interpretations of Machiavelli. Professor Gilbert's treatment presents no radically new insights, nor does he claim to have found a key to the single true and definitive manner of understanding Machiavelli's intent as a theorist. But his presentation strikes me as among the most lucid, informative, reasonable, and well-substantiated treatments of this topic. In his view, Machiavelli's great originality lay not in his ideas, most of which had become common coin in Florentine political circles, but in artfully weaving them together in a manner so dramatic and forceful as to present a new vision of political life.

Unlike some intellectual historians, Professor Gilbert seeks to penetrate to the philosophical foundations of Machiavelli's thought and not merely to link his ideas to the context of his times. For example, Machiavelli's veneration of the Roman republic was shared by many of his fellow Florentines, but in his writings it did not represent Renaissance man's desire to imitate the ways of a great classical age; rather it was a call to return to living according to natural instincts for the sake of a truly efficacious political virtue. This meant that Machiavelli sought to be neither immoral nor amoral, nor even to create a new moral code. He simply presented in the most extreme and consistent form possible the growing conviction that politics is an autonomous realm of human endeavor, with behavioral laws and normative standards appropriate only to the political sphere.

On certain points that are constantly debated by commentators on Machiavelli, Professor Gilbert presents illuminating observations. In his view there is no contradiction between Machiavelli's championing of one-man rule in The Prince and his favorable attitude toward republican government in The Discourses. The two works were written as responses to differing external stimuli, and in both the problem of political leadership is a central concern. Further, it is erroneous to conclude from the final chapter of The Prince that Machiavelli was the forerunner of modern Italian nationalism; at most he sought a temporary league of Italian states in order to expel foreign invaders and had by no means given up on the prospects of the city-state in Italy.

My one regret concerning this book is that the author did not specifically subject to critical examination interpretations of Machiavelli that have been published by other scholars. In particular, I missed a consideration of what is perhaps the most audacious, controversial, and exciting of all such works, Professor Leo Strauss' Thoughts on Machiavelli. Certainly Professor Gilbert is at odds with Strauss in many ways; for example the former says of Machiavelli that "he was not a man who builds a system in which every detail has an appointed spot and forms part of a whole" (p. 167). A more decisive entry into debate with Professor Strauss and with other interpreters of the great Florentine theorist would have made even more valuable for students of political ideas what must yet be considered a most distinguished contribution to our understanding of the matrix from which emerged so much that is distinctive of modern political thought.—Fred H. WILLHOITE, JR. Louisiana State University.

The Devine Politics of Thomas Hobbes: An Interpretation of Leviathan. By F. C. Hood. (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1964. Pp. xii, 263. $7.20.)

Recent scholarship on Hobbes emphasizes the need to re-examine some common views of his work. One such view is that the extensive treatment of religious and theological matters in the Leviathan is a grand and ironic tour de force. Hobbes found it safest to proceed as he did because he wanted to undercut the challenge to civil authority represented by organized religion without, however, giving dangerous offense to the established orders. All Hobbes's protestations of sincerity, according to this view, are disingenuous and he is described as one of the founders of the new and secular politics.

Professor Hood calls this view into question. His book argues that Hobbes was a religious thinker whose political theory was a consequence of his Puritan belief in the primacy of Scripture. In so arguing, Professor Hood develops the idea, also considered by A. E. Taylor and Howard Warrender, that the concept of God is necessary to give coherence to Hobbes's political theory. But, while Taylor and Warrender treat the concept of God as a necessary (or useful) implicate of the political theory, Professor Hood holds that Hobbes's political theory flows from his religious beliefs and that the critical problems associated with the former are best interpreted by reference to the latter.

Hobbes's materialism seems to be a formidable objection to this argument; but Professor Hood suggests that Hobbes, in attacking "school divinity," was attacking an interpretation of Christianity rather than Christianity itself. It was the political uses of dominant modes of theology to which Hobbes objected. Christian "spiritualism" was used to intimidate and confuse the faithful. While Hobbes's materialism was incompatible with this spiritualism, it entailed an idea of God like Tertullian's: since God has being He necessarily has extension or body because the idea of being involves the idea of extension. Christian materialism was not, for Hobbes, a contradiction in terms.

Professor Hood's interpretation brings into new perspective old problems in the analysis of Hobbes's theory. Professor Hood is concerned, as all the important critics of Hobbes have been, with the logic of his doctrine of civil society and with the key aspect of that doctrine, the concept of obligation. Professor Hood finds that for Hobbes obligation means the obligation of conscience. But conscience is a moral or religious concept which, given Hobbes's view of the limits of philosophic (i.e., scientific) thought, cannot be fully comprehended by Hobbes's new civil philosophy. Hobbes's analysis of the human passions and of the rational articulation of those passions in the new a priori science patterned after Euclid does not yield the doctrine of moral obligation which is necessary for the rational construction of the commonwealth. Conscience is necessary for politics but it is beyond politics or the science of politics.

Professor Hood regards Hobbes's teaching about the obligation of conscience as a "fiction" in his civil philosophy, like the idea of a point in geometry. Since obligation transcends the limits of the new civil philosophy, which is necessary in itself to bring order into societies marked by disorder, Hobbes must surreptitiously introduce supernatural obligation into his naturalistic theory concerning the human passions. He does this by importing obligation through a stipulated definition as Euclid would. Hobbes's problem is set for him by the fact that obligation always implies one who obliges. Within civil society the meaning of this is clear, on Hobbes's theory. But the obligation creative of civil society involves God as the One who obliges; however, Hobbes's science of civil society cannot accommodate God within its rubrics.

Professor Hood's study adds another dimension to the controversy in scholarship about Hobbes. He tells us that he came to this interpretation of Hobbes in an attempt to "make sense of his moral and political thought as a whole" (p. vii). While it is true that Professor Hood has given us a new examination of Hobbes, the old problems remain even though many of them are newly described. Previously we had to worry about getting Hobbesean man from the state of nature into civil society; now we must worry about getting him from the kingdom of grace into civil society. In either case, it is an arduous logical journey.

The presentation of Hobbes as a figure in the history of political piety may strain the credulity of some readers. His sensibilities, his judgments, and his definition of political (and thereby religious) truth would seem to make Hobbes indifferently disposed toward the inward dimensions of religious life. That he was interested in the political outcomes of religious positions there can be no doubt; that his argument proceeds out of such a position remains at issue even after the reading of so able a book as this.—J. A. Schwandt, St. Olaf College.

John Marshall and Alexander Hamilton. By Samuel J. Konefsky. (New York: Macmillan, 1964. Pp. viii, 274, $5.95.)

Subtitled "Architects of the American Constitution," Professor Konefsky's work principally seeks to show modern American democracy—"grown" from a "living Constitution"—what it owes to two of its early republican founders. The book explores "the manner in which Marshall and Hamilton helped to mold the Constitution into the dynamic implement of government it has proved itself to be." Rightly observing some differences between these two architects, moreover, the author wishes also to give a "comparative study of the ideas of Marshall and Hamilton."

Simply confining himself to exposition and summary of these two statesmen's writings, Konefsky generally manages to portray the important and obvious essentials of their policies. He rightly points out that all of Hamilton's proposals for America were "republican," at least in the sense of resting directly or indirectly "on the solid basis of the consent of the people." Quite properly, too, he deduces the great Treasury Secretary's overwhelming anxiety for an "energetic and powerful national government" from his "pessimistic" view of the usual "interests" and "passions" of human nature. Great powers are needed to deal with "the probable exigencies of ages, according to the natural and tried course of human affairs." If the nation's powers are to be great and liberally construed, however, their objects are narrowly confined to the preservation of the individual and his property. To assure respect for individual rights sovereign power is separated and thus checked, with the Supreme Court as key check in our popular government on "the more popularly constituted branches." In a helpful review of Marbury v. Madison Konefsky shows this Hamiltonian understanding to be shared by Marshall as well.

Generally, Konefsky summarizes with some skill the great judgments of the Marshall Court, exhibiting the Chief Justice's devotion to "the sanctity of property," an independent national government of "great and sovereign powers," a domestic and foreign commerce unhindered by the states. He does make a mistake or two. It is not true, for example, that in Willson v. Blackbird Creek Marsh Company "there was no specific federal legislation" according to which Marshall might have decided the case differently.

This study is indeed useful, but it must be added that its utility is principally that of an introduction for the general reader. It lacks the reflective, subtle, and comprehensive investigations of statesmanship, of modern America, of the architects' thought, which would be required for an original treatment. That Hamilton "contributed" to a powerful economy, a great central government, a supervising judiciary, that Marshall made these unequivocally part of the country's basic laws, is true but well known. The book does not bring out more subtle traits of modern America whose connection with the framers is not so widely known: a pervasive concern for personal comfort and security, respect for law and order, a thorough-going organization of society in productive effort, anxious careerism, etc., etc.

The old founders are treated considerably better than our modern country, but still not satisfactorily. The book only sketches Hamilton's views. It does not clarify in a decisively helpful way most of the notions basic to Hamilton and Marshall alike-their "republicanism," for example, and their individualistic and capitalistic "liberty." If this study often brings in contrasting opinions like those of Jefferson and Justices Gibson and Holmes, it commonly slides away from an extended confrontation which might expose the deeper if more subtle strengths and weaknesses of the architects' thought. These interesting subtleties might also have been developed by a more extensive exposition of the architects' style of architecture: the liberal political thought of Blackstone, Smith, Montesquieu, Hume, and Locke.

The book is also rather unsuccessful in bringing out the differences between Hamilton and Marshall, a subject where an original contribution might easily be made. It is doubtful whether Marshall ever embraced the "high-toned" oligarchic or aristocratic republicanism advocated by Hamilton at the Constitutional Convention, even if he retreated from what perhaps he alone would call his "wild and enthusiastic democracy" of Washington's early adminstration. Similarly, Marshall was a stickler for law and proper procedures, while Hamilton's temper was of a bolder cast. Beveridge concludes that Marshall's constitutional scruples blocked the Federalists' Disputed Elections Bill of 1800. Hamilton, however, urged a blatantly partisan course on Governor Jay in the same year, to recoup the prospective defeat of Federalist electors by New York's Republican legislature. Marshall, moreover, would never have carried on what Julian Boyd calls Hamilton's "bold" and "devious" endeavors to shape American diplomacy by secretive correspondence with a British intelligence agent. Finally, Marshall expressly disavowed Hamilton's avoidance of the Constitution's enumeration of powers by deduction of plenary power from the "general welfare" clause. Only the last of these differences is noted by Konefsky, and that in a footnote not calculated to draw out a general comparison of the two statesmen. Unfortunately, the footnote is typical of the book's deficiencies for the scholar, whatever its merits for the general reader.—ROBERT K. FAULKNER, Princeton University.

Legalism. By Judith N. Shklar. (Harvard University Press, 1964. Pp. ix, 246. $5.95.)

This is an excellent study of selected ideas about law, primarily about legalism. Thus, it should be noted at the outset that the book is not a study of law. Nor is it—nor does it pretend to be—a balanced treatise on jurisprudence. The author wrote: "The object here . . . is not only to understand legalism, but also other ways of thinking about law." (p. 3) In thinking about law, not of law, she presents a skillful analysis and criticism of what legal scholar-philosophers—a number of whom were trained solely in civil law—have written in their textbooks and treatises. The common law as a base familiar to Anglo-American scholars is not emphasized.

It is possible that one may find implied in this study a reaching toward participants in a larger audience than that of theorists who content themselves with mere analyses and criticisms of what jurists and other theorists have written. The large mass of social scientists-excepting those who have immersed themselves in "numbers games"need to cope with processes, procedures, and ends of law as they relate to scholarly work. So it is that such scholars must at least understand "about law." In their work they scarcely can avoid making effective use of such basic tools as statutes and judicial decisions, material that scoffingly may be characterized as "a plumbers' manual." (p. 32) But, as well, they must understand something of theories of law (including legalism) in order to employ fragments of law effectively. Broadly trained social scientists can hardly accept the idea that legal concepts are based on nothing more firm than the speculations of theorists.

In reading this volume one misses the "little" cases that contribute richly to understandings within common law systems. Indeed, the author of this book has stressed little more than a few so-called "big" cases, highly publicized politicolegal trials: the Rosenberg and Dennis affairs, the Nuremberg and Tokyo trials, and propaganda shows in Moscow. Professor Shklar reviews and dissects these incidents with consummate skill. In doing so, she has been able to examine ideas of many legal philosophers as these men have concerned themselves with their conceptions of natural law, of higher law, of legal positivism. However, an examination of seemingly small but deeply meaningful actions in private law merits greater attention. The mass of such decisions may guide both lawvers and social scientists more effectively than can a few tenuously connected and widely publicized judicial actions. The little things that have "grown up without benefit of much ideology" (p. 139) might well become the head of the Legalism is not a textbook (p. vii), and fortunately so. Teachers and mature and intellectually disciplined students who have carried on studies in law will find Professor Shklar's study provocative—due to the author's directness, confidence, and clarity—for she offers more intellectual excitement than can be found in textbooks on jurisprudence. The author expressed the hope that this volume will "open a debate" (p. viii), and one anticipates that this hope will be realized.

Legalism is a finely planned study. It is certain to give pleasure to many and to irritate legalists and other newly found "adversaries."—Charles Aikin, University of California (Berkeley).

The Politics of Bureaucracy. By Gordon Tullock. (Washington: Public Affairs Press, 1965. Pp. 228. $4.50.)

Political scientists have been writing about the inter-relationships of politics and administration for more than a generation, but they have neglected the politics of administration itself. Gordon Tullock, an economist, has sought to remedy the gap in the literature in this volume. His approach is similar to that which he used in collaboration with James Buchanan in The Calculus of Consent. He is concerned with the individual "politician" in organizations and develops a model of rational behavior based upon the self-interest of the individual. He rejects mathematical or abstract speculation as well as empirical method in favor of what he terms "understanding." As he puts it, "For a number of the assertions that will be made in this book, the supporting evidence must be found in the mind of the reader. That is to say, instead of presenting concrete evidence, I shall simply try to convince the skeptical reader by appealing to his own intuition and experience." (p. 15)

Tullock starts with the premise that political relationships are those involving superior and subordinate status in contrast to economic relationships which are those among equals. All governmental units and many business firms are political in nature. The individual, or politician, in organizations is motivated primarily by advancement of his own goals, irrespective of the stated organizational goals. With this in mind the author develops his model of the organizational process from the standpoint of the individual politician. He divides his analysis into two parts. In the first he writes from the vantage point of the politician somewhere in the middle (hierarchically) of the organization. He examines relationships with superiors (sovereigns), peers and subordinates. In the second part he examines the same system from the standpoint of the individual at or near the top, describing relationships with subordinates and spelling out the problems associated with supervision, control and coordination. His analysis leads him to the conclusion that complex and centralized bureaucracy is essentially inefficient. In an economic setting, pursuit of self-interest is always functional to the organization. But in a political setting it is often dysfunctional, and the tools for control, coordination and supervision are inadequate to provide efficiency. His solution is to localize, decentralize, and reduce organizational size so that the limited tools of supervision available in a non-economic setting can be maximized.

Some readers might conclude that this is a sophisticated presentation of Barry Goldwater's Conscience of a Conservative. Perhaps it is, but I am satisfied that it is a serious attempt to develop an approach to the study of the administrative process. Unfortunately I think to some extent the author has failed in his mission.

The premise that the politician is moved by self-interest sounds reasonable, but as developed by Tullock, the politician is an overly simplified combination of Machiavelli's Prince and "economic man." As Robert Dahl has stated:

What one views as his "self" depends on one's identifications, and evidently these vary a good deal. How one perceives the "self" is not wholly instinctive, it seems, but also a matter of social learning. Likewise, what one considers to be in the "interest" of the self is shaped by learning, experience, tradition and culture. Consequently, to attribute an act to self-interest does not explain very much. (Modern Political Analysis, p. 66).

An example of the shortcoming of Tullock's use of self-interest is found in his description of peer relationships. He sees the politician playing a zero-sum game in which it is essential for him to upgrade himself and downgrade his peers in the eyes of the superior. Even if this kind of activity is handled so subtly that no one else is aware of what is happening, it fails to account for the great number of situations in which self-interest is enhanced by the improvement of the status of many, if not all, members of the group. Even in the individualistic setting of the university organization (one of the two sources tapped by Tullock for most of his illustrations) the zero-sum game is probably becoming less and less consequential.

Tullock devotes a chapter to a discussion of culture, subculture, and general environment, but only in terms of their influence on strategy and tactics of politicians. There is every reason to believe that these phenomena are themselves among the important determinants of the motivations of politicians and Tullock's failure to deal with them in this context is perhaps the greatest shortcoming of the volume.

Another particularly weak point in the work is found in Tullock's discussion of the inadequacy of the control system. He refers to a high frequency of what he calls bureaucratic free enterprise, by which he means that lower units in an organization become essentially autonomous of their superiors and are uncontrolled. What he fails to recognize, perhaps because of the peculiarities of an agency like the State Department from which his illustrations are derived, is the presence for most organizations of an elaborate system of relationships with individuals and groups in the external world including appropriation subcommittee members, professional peers, consumers of the service provided by the agency, etc. Each of these exercises controls and is a source of agency accountability. The irony of this particular failing in Tullock's work is that his analysis from the standpoint of the middle management politician rejects, quite convincingly, the Weberian notion of hierarchy, but his analysis from the standpoint of the top level politician retains the Weberian concept of hierarchy and encourages the blind spot described above.

Despite my disappointment in the work, I believe that Tullock has attempted a groundbreaking effort in an important area of study. His limited acquaintance with the literature of sociology, social psychology, and even political science has handicapped him, but this volume ought to stimulate individuals in all of these disciplines to pursue the study of the politics of administration.

—ROBERT S. FRIEDMAN, University of Michigan.

Machiavelli: The Chief Works and Others. TRANS-LATED BY ALLEN GLIBERT. (Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1965. 3 vols. Pp. xiii, 1514.)

Students of political theory and other admirers of Machiavelli will welcome this new, three-volume translation of his works. Professor Gilbert has essentially retranslated even those works included in his 1941 collection, and has added a great many others. While not absolutely complete, the new collection is very extensive, ranging beyond Machiavelli's well known political books and his two comedies, to include a wide selection from his poetry, letters and dispatches. Finding that "most translators of The Prince and other works make little effort—to my ear—to bring over into their own tongue the qualities of Machiavelli's style," Professor Gilbert strives "to secure Machiavellian emphasis" in English. Each selection is briefly introduced by the translator, and there are illustrations and an index.—Hanna Pitkin, University of Wisconsin.

Statistical Concepts: A Basic Program. By Jimmy R. Amos, Foster Lloyd Brown, and Oscar G. Mink. (New York: Harper & Row, 1965, Pp. 125. $1.75 paper.)

A useful elementary introduction to basic statistical concepts intended for students of the behavioral sciences with little background in statistics.—A. R.

Liberalism vs. Conservatism. Liberty vs. Authority. By C. William Hushaw. (Dubuque, Ia.: Wm. C. Brown Book Company, 1965. Pp. 113. $1.40 paper.)

Definitions of "liberalism" and "conservatism" as the terms have been used historically and are curently used in American political debate.—A. R.

Data Processing: Applications to Political Research. By Kenneth Janda. (Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press, 1965. Pp. 288. $3.45 paper, $7.50 cloth.)

Another in the Northwestern series of handbooks of research techniques in political behavior, this volume gives an elementary and clear introduction to the use of punchcard equipment for recording and processing data of various types, with some introduction to programming, using political data and illustrations throughout.—A. R.

Interviewing: Its Forms and Functions. BY STEPHEN A. RICHARDSON, BARBARA SNELL DOHR-ENWEND, AND DAVID KLEIN. (New York: Basic Books, 1965. Pp. 380. $7.50.)

A manual on interviewing techniques.—A. R.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON POLITICAL THEORY

ISAAC KRAMNICK Harvard University

Aron, R. Catégories dirigeantes ou classe dirigeante? Revue Française de Science Politique. February, 1965.

Aron, R. La définition liberale de la liberté (II).

Archives Européennes de Sociologie. Vol. V, No. 2, 1964.

Aron, R. Sartre's Marxism. Encounter, June, 1965.

Bendix, R. Max Weber and Jakob Burckhardt. American Sociological Review. April, 1965.

Birou, A. Forces d'Alienation et liberté. Economie et Humanism. March-April, 1965.

Boonin, L. G. The Logic of Legal Decisions. Ethics. April, 1965.

Brinton, C. Utopia and Democracy. Daedalus. Spring, 1965.

Buehrig, E. H. The Institutional Pattern of Authority. World Politics. April, 1965.

Chabert, A. Rousseau Économiste. Revue d'histoire économique et sociale. No. 3, 1964.

Chamberlain, G. L. Don Sturzo and the Ethical Value of Society. Review of Politics. April, 1965.

Chroust, A. The Ideal Polity of the Early Stoics: Zeno's Republic. Review of Politics. April, 1965.

Cox, R. H. Ideology, History and Political Philosophy: Camus' L'Homme Révolté. Social Research. Spring, 1965.

Crocker, L. G. Recent Interpretations of the French Enlightenment. Journal of World History. VIII-3, 1964.

D'Entreves, A. P. Obeying Whom? Political Studies, February, 1965.

De Vries, T. Spinoza als politischer Denker. Deutsche Zeitschrift Für Philosophie. 11, 1964.

Eckstein, H. On the Etiology of Internal Wars. History and Theory, IV, No. 2, 1965.

Eisermann, G. Georges Sorel und der Mythos der Gewalt. Der Staat. 4 Band, 1965 Heft.

Fleischmann, E. De Weber à Nietzsche. Archives Européennes de Sociologie. Vol. V. No. 2, 1964

Friedrich, C. J. A Critique of Pareto's Contribution to the Theory of a Political Elite. Revue Européene d'histoire des Sciences Sociales. 5, 1965.

Groth, A. J. The "Isms" in Totalitarianism. American Political Science Review. December, 1964.

Guérin, D. D'une nouvelle interpretation de la Révolution française. Annales. Jan.-Feb., 1965.

Guttman, A. Political Ideals and the Military Ethic. American Scholar. Spring, 1965.

Hassner, P. A la Recherche de la classe dirigeante: Le débat dans l'histoire des doctrines. Revue Française de Science Politique. February, 1965.

Hobart, C. W. Freedom, A Neglected Area for Social Research. Ethics. April, 1965.

Hodges, D. C. Political Democracy: Its Informal Content. American Journal of Economics and Sociology. January, 1965.

Holmes, R. Freud and Social Class. British Journal of Sociology. March, 1965.

Huntington, S. P. Political Development and Political Decay. World Politics. April, 1965. Jolif, J. Y. Marxism et Societe Industrielle. Economie et Humanisme. Jan-Feb., 1965.

Kreitzer, D. J. An Analysis of the Nature of Power. Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. March, 1965.

Krieger, L. Kant and the Crisis in Natural Law. Journal of the History of Ideas. April-June, 1965.

Labasse, J. Pour une nouvelle conscience politique. Economie et Humanism. March-April, 1965.

Lazarfeld, P. F. and Oberschall, A. R. Max Weber and Empirical Social Research. American Sociological Review, April, 1965.

Lichtheim, G. The Concept of Ideology. History and Theory. IV, No. 2, 1965.

Love, W. D. Edmund Burke's Idea of the Body Corporate: A Study in Imagery. *Review of Poli*tics. April, 1965.

Lucas, E. Marx Studien zur Frühgeschichte und Ethnologie. Saeculum. Band 15, 1964, Heft 4.

MacIntyre, A. Marxist Mask and Romantic Face: Lukács on Thomas Mann. Encounter. April, 1965.

Mansfield, H. C., Jr. Party Government and the Settlement of 1688. American Political Science Review. December, 1964.

Morstein-Marx, F. Staat, Politik, Öffentlichkeit. Zeitschrift Für Politik. February, 1965.

Oakley, F. Almain and Major: Counciliar Theory on the Eve of the Reformation. American Historical Review. April, 1965.

Pellegrini, A. "Sturm und Drang" und Politische Revolution. German Life and Letters. January, 1965.

Pelzer, R. Studien über Hegels ethische Theoreme. Philosophie. Band 13/1-2.

Pitkin, H. Hobbes's Concept of Representation—II. American Political Science Review. December, 1964.

Plamenatz, J. La Classe dirigeante. Revue Française de Science Politique. February, 1965.

Pluchon, P. La Politique dans l'oeuvre de Gobineau. Revue Politique et Parlementaire. March-April, 1965.

Rathé, C. E. Innocent Gentillet and the first "Anti-Machiavel." Bibliothèque d'Humanism et Renaissance. Vol. XXVII, 1, 1965.

Riemer, Neal. Democratic Theory and the New States: The Dilemma of Transition. Bucknell Review. March, 1965.

Rosen, S. The Role of Eros in Plato's Republic. The Review of Metaphysics. March, 1965.

Roth, G. Political Critiques of Max Weber: Some Implications for Political Sociology. American Sociological Review. April, 1965.

Rumble, W. E., Jr. The Paradox of American Legal Realism Ethics. April, 1965.

Ryan, A. Freedom. Philosophy. April, 1965.

Schmidt, H. Zur Natur der Eigentumsbildung in der Arbeit. John Locke in den Deutungen von Raymond Polin. Der Staat. 4 Band, 1965, Heft 1.

Schmitt, C. Die vollendete Reformation. Bemerkungen und Hinweise zu neuen Leviathan—Interpretationen. Der Staat. 4 Band, 1965, Heft 1.

Scupin, H. Der Begriff der Souveränität bei Johannes Althusius und bei Jean Bodin. Der Staat. 4 Band, 1965, Heft 1.

Shils, E. Charisma, Order and Status. American Sociological Review. April, 1965.

Shklar, J. N. The Political Theory of Utopia; From Melancholy to Nostalgia. Daedalus. Spring, 1965.

Shklar, J. N. Rousseau's Images of Authority. American Political Science Review. December, 1964.

Simey, T. S. Weber's Sociological Theory of Value: An Appraisal in Mid-century. The Sociological Review. March, 1965.

Stigler, G. J. The Economist and the State. American Economic Review. March, 1965.

Stove, D. Hume, Probability and Induction. Philosophical Review. April, 1965.

Thomson, H. F. Adam Smith's Philosophy of Science. Quarterly Journal of Economics. May, 1965.

Tucker, W. R. Fascism and Individualism; the Political Thought of Pierre Drieu La Rochelle. The Journal of Politics. February, 1965.

Ulam, A. Socialism and Utopia. Daedalus. Spring, 1965.

Waldo, D. The Administrative State Revisited. Public Administration Review. March, 1965.

West, E. G. Liberty and Education: John Stuart Mill's Dilemma. Philosophy. April, 1965.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON

METHODOLOGY AND RESEARCH IN THE SOCIAL SCIENCES*

S. SIDNEY ULMER University of Kentucky

Opinions and Attitudes

Carlsson, G. (46) Time and Continuity in Mass Attitude Change: The Case of Voting. Public Opinion Quarterly, Vol. 29 #1 (Spring 1965) pp. 1-15.

Carment, D. W. (15), Cervin, V. B. Persuasiveness and Persuasibility as Related to Intelligence and Extraversion. British Journal of Clinical Psychology, Vol. 4 part 1 (February 1965) pp. 1-7.

Jones, F. E. (15), Lambert, W. E. Occupational Rank and Attitudes Toward Immigrants. Public Opinion Quarterly, Vol. 29 #1 (Spring 1965) pp. 137-144.

Kosa, J., Nunn, G. Z. Race, Deprivation and Attitude Toward Communism. Pylon (11) Vol. 25 #4 (Winter 1964) pp. 337-346.

Lerner, M. J. (36) The Effect of Preparatory Action on Beliefs Concerning Nuclear War. The Journal of Social Psychology, Vol. 63, second half, (April 1965) pp. 225-231.

Sanua, V. D.. Patterns of Identification with the Jewish Community in the U.S.A. The Jewish Journal of Sociology, Vol. 6 #2 (December 1964) pp. 190-212.

Skrzypek, S. The Political, Cultural, and Social

* The number in parentheses following the name of each author indicates institutional affiliation which may be determined by reference to the institutional list on page 719.

Views of Yugoslav Youth, Public Opinion Quarterly, Vol. 29 #1 (Spring 1965) pp. 87-106.

Treadwell, Y. (20) Development and Analysis of a 'Cumshaw Tolerance' Scale. Journal of Applied Psychology, Vol. 49 #2 (April 1965) pp. 126-130.

Culture and Institutions

Aldous, J. (41), Hill, R. Social Cohesion, Lineage Type, and Intergenerational Transmission. Social Forces, Vol. 43 #4 (May 1965) pp. 471-482.

Edelstein, J. D. (17) Democracy in a National Union: The British AEU. Industrial Relations, Vol. 4 #3 (May 1965) pp. 105-125.

Elder, G. H. Jr. (3) Role Relations, Sociocultural Environments, and Autocratic Family Ideology. Sociometry, Vol. 28 #2 (June 1965) pp. 173-196.

Gerstle, J. (57) Perrucci, R. Educational Channels and Elite Mobility. Sociology of Education, Vol. 38 #3 (Spring 1965) pp. 224-232.

Goldstein, S. (51), Mayer, K. B. Illegitimacy, Residence, and Status. Social Problems, Vol. 12 #4 (Spring 1965) pp. 428-436.

Lang, K. (54), Lang, G. E. Resistance to School Desegregation: A Case Study of Backlash Among Jews. Sociological Inquiry, Vol. 35 #1 (Winter 1965) pp. 94-106.

Lewis, L. S. (42) Political Heroes: 1936 and 1960. Journalism Quarterly, Vol. 42 #1 (Winter 1965) pp. 116-118.

Nixon, R. B. (41), Freedom in the World's Press: A Fresh Appraisal with New Data. Journalism Quarterly, Vol. 42 #1 (Winter 1965) pp. 3-14, 118-119.

Roach, J. L. (42), Gursslin, O. R. The Lower Class, Status Frustration and Social Disorganization. Social Forces, Vol. 43 #4 (May 1965) pp. 501-510.

Siegel, P. M. (9) On the Cost of Being a Negro. Sociological Inquiry, Vol. 35 #1 (Winter 1965) pp. 41-57.

Thernstrom, S. (11) Yankee City Revisited: The Perils of Historical Naivete. American Sociological Review, Vol. 30 #2 (April 1965) pp. 234-242.

Motivation and Personality

Argyle, M. (13), Delin, P. Non-Universal Laws of Socialization, Human Relations, Vol. 18 #1 (February 1965) pp. 77-86.

Davis, M. (19), Results of Personality Tests Given to Negroes in the Northern and Southern United States and in Halifax, Canada. Pylon, Vol. 25 #4 (Winter 1964) pp. 362-368.

Elder, G. H. Jr. (3) Life Opportunity and Personality: Some Consequences of Stratified Secondary Education in Great Britain, Sociology of Education, Vol. 38 #3 (Spring 1965) pp. 173-202.

Gallo, P. S. Jr. (22), McClintock, C. G. Cooperative and Competitive Behavior in Mixed-Motive Games. Journal of Conflict Resolution, Vol. 9 #1 (March 1965) pp. 68-78.

Mingione, A. D. (28) Need for Achievement in Negro and White Children. Journal of Consulting Psychology, Vol. 29 #5 (April 1965) pp. 108-111.

Mosher, D. L. (30) Interaction of Fear and Guilt in Inhibiting Unacceptable Behavior. Journal of Consulting Psychology, Vol. 29 #2 (April 1965) pp. 161-167.

Mueller, W. J. (29), Grater, H. A. Aggression, Conflict, Anxiety, and Ego Strength. Journal of Consulting Psychology, Vol. 29 #5 (April 1965) pp. 130-134.

Schellenberg, J. A. (56) Dependence and Cooperation. Sociometry, Vol. 28 #2 (June 1965) pp. 158-172.

Shure, G. H. (24), Meeker, R. J., Hansford, E. A. The Effectiveness of Pacifist Strategies in Bargaining Games. Journal of Conflict Resolution, Vol. 9 #1 (March 1965) pp. 106-117.

Teele, J. E. (11) Suicidal Behavior, Assaultiveness, and Socialization Principles. Social Forces, Vol. 43 #4 (May 1965) pp. 510-518.

Zander, A. (14), Curtis, T. Social Support and Rejection of Organizational Standards. Journal of Educational Psychology, Vol. 56 #2 (April 1965) pp. 87-95.

Cognitive Processes and Individual Decision-Making

Beaty, W. E. (19), Shaw, M. E. Some Effects of Social Interaction on Probability Learning. The Journal of Psychology, Vol. 59, second half, (March 1965) pp. 299-306.

Dana, R. H. (32), Condry, J. C. Jr. A Criterion for Analyses of Interpersonal Perception. The Journal of General Psychology, Vol. 72, second half, (April 1965) pp. 233-238.

Greenbaum, C. W. (34), Cohn, A., Krauss, R. M. Choice, Negative Information, and Attractiveness of Tasks. Journal of Personality, Vol. 33 #1 (March 1965) pp. 46-59.

Harsanyi, J. C. (3) Bargaining and Conflict Situations in the Light of a New Approach to Game Theory. American Economic Review, Vol. 55 (May 1965) pp. 447-457.

Hutte, H. (18) Decision-Making in a Management Game. Human Relations, Vol. 18 #1 (February 1965) pp. 5-20.

Kelley, H. H. (23) Experimental Studies of Threats in Interpersonal Negotiations. Journal of Conflict Resolution, Vol. 9 #1 (March 1965) pp. 79-105

Lamanna, R. C. (53) The Negro Teacher and Desegregation: A Study of Strategic Decision-Makers and their Vested Interests in Different Community Contexts. Sociological Inquiry, Vol. 35 #1 (Winter 1965) pp. 26-40.

Price, K. O. (14), Harburg, E., Mcleod, J. M. Positive and Negative Affect as a Function of Perceived Discrepancy in ABX Situations. Human Relations, Vol. 18 #1 (February 1965) pp. 87-100.

Psathas, G. (55), Stryker, S. Bargaining Behavior and Orientations in Coalition Formation. Sociometry, Vol. 28 #2 (June 1965) pp. 124-144.

Rhodes, A. L. (6), Reiss, A. J., Duncan, O. D. Occupational Segregation in a Metropolitan School System. The American Journal of Sociology, Vol. 70 (May 1965) pp. 682-694.

Tullock, G. (2) Entry Barriers in Politics. American Economic Review, Vol. 55 (May 1965) pp. 458-466.

Webb, S. C. (38), Cheuh, J. C. The Effect of Role Taking on the Judgment of Attitudes. The Journal of Social Psychology, Vol. 65, second half, (April 1965) pp. 279-292.

Wickelgren, W. A. (3) Decisions Based on Conflicting and Inaccurate Observations. Journal of Mathematical Psychology, Vol. 2 #1 (February 1965) pp. 180-189.

Yaari, M. E. (48) Complexity in the Theory of Choice Under Risk. Quarterly Journal of Economics, Vol. 79 # 2 (May 1965) pp. 278-290.

Research Methods

Dodd, S. C. (43) The Likeability Models for Predicting Probable Acts of Men. Systematics, Vol. 2 #4 (March 1965) pp. 263-292.

Ehrlich, H. J. (50), Rinehart, J. W. A Brief Report on the Methodology of Stereotype Research. Social Forces, Vol. 43 #4 (May 1965) pp. 564-574. Guilford, J. P. (16) The Minimal Phi Coefficient and the Maximal Phi. Educational and Psychological Measurement, Vol. 25 #1 (Spring 1965) pp. 3-8.

Johnson, M.C. (14) Computer Search for Group Differences. Educational and Psychological Measurement, Vol. 25 #1 (Spring 1965) pp. 239-243.

Kaiser, H. F. (45), Caffrey, J. Alpha Factor Analysis. Psychometrika, Vol. 30 #1 (March 1965) pp. 1-14.

Labovitz, S. I. (12) Methods for Control with Small Sample Size. American Sociological Review, Vol. 30 #2 (April 1965) pp. 243-249.

McDonaugh, E. C. (16), Rosenblum, A. L. A Comparison of Mailed Questionnaires and Subsequent Structured Interviews. Public Opinion Quarterly, Vol. 29 #1 (Spring 1965) pp. 131-136.

Meredith, W. (3) A Method for Studying Differences Between Groups. Psychometrika, Vol. 30 #1 (March 1965) pp. 15-29.

Roberts, H. V. (9) Probabilistic Prediction. Journal of the American Statistical Association, Vol. 60 #309 (March 1965) pp. 50-62.

Warner, S. L. (10) Randomized Response: A Survey Technique for Eliminating Evasive Answer Bias. Journal of the American Statistical Association, Vol. 60 # 309 (March 1965) pp. 63-69.

Interpersonal Influence

Burke, W. W. (35) Leadership Behavior as a Function of the Leader, the Follower, and the Situation. Journal of Personality, Vol. 33 #1 (March 1965) pp. 60-81.

Donohew, L. (36) Publishers and Their 'Influence' Groups. Journalism Quarterly, Vol. 42 #1 (Winter 1965) pp. 112-113.

Milgram, S. (11) Some Conditions of Obedience and Disobedience to Authority. Human Relations, Vol. 18 #1 (February 1965) pp. 57-76.

Organizational Behavior

Downs, A. (1) A Theory of Bureaucracy. American Economic Review, Vol. 55 (May 1965) pp. 439-446.

Goldberg, L. C. (7), Baker F., Rubenstein, A. H. Local-Cosmopolitan: Unidimensional or Multidimensional. The American Journal of Sociology, Vol. 70 (May 1965) pp. 7C4-710.

Group Behavior

Bower, J. L. (11) The Role of Conflict in Economic Decision-Making Groups: Some Empirical Results. The Quarterly Journal of Economics, Vol. 79 #2 (May 1965) pp. 263-277.

Dodd, S. C. (43) McCurtain, M. The Logistic Diffusion of Information Through Randomly Overlapped Cliques. Operational Research Quarterly, Vol. 16 #1 (March 1965) pp. 51-63.

Dubno, P. (40) Leadership, Group Effectiveness, and Speed of Decision. The Journal of Social Psychology, Vol. 65, second half (April 1965) pp. 351-360

Smith, S. A. (39) Conformity in Cooperative and Competitive Groups. The Journal of Social Psychology, Vol. 65, second half (April 1965) pp. 337-350.

Triandis, H. C. (19), Hall, E. R., Ewen, R. B. Member Heterogeneity and Dyadic Creativity. Human Relations, Vol. 18 #1 (February 1965) pp. 33-55.

Zander, A. (14), Medow, H. Strength of Group and Desire for Attainable Group Aspirations. Journal of Personality, Vol. 33 #1 (March 1965) pp. 122-139.

Voting

Fuchs, D. A. (3) Election Day Newscasts and Their Effects on Western Voter Turnout. Journal-ism Quarterly, Vol. 42 #1 (Winter 1965) pp. 22-28.

Glaser, W. A. (47) Television and Voting Turnout. Public Opinion Quarterly, Vol. 29 #1 (Spring 1965) pp. 71-86.

Pool, I. de S., Abelson, R. P., Popkin, S. L. A. Postscript on the 1964 Election. American Behavioral Scientist, Vol. 8 #9 (May 1965) pp. 39-44.

Sellers, C. (3) The Equilibrium Cycle in Two Party Politics. Public Opinion Quarterly, Vol. 29 #1 (Spring 1965) pp. 16-38.

Key to Institutions Listed in Bibliography

- 1. Real Estate Research Corporation, Chicago
- 2. University of Virginia
- 3. University of California, Berkeley
- 6. Florida State University
- 7. Johns Hopkins University
- 9. University of Chicago
- 10. Claremont Graduate School
- 11. Harvard University
- 12. Washington State University
- 13. Oxford University
- 14. University of Michigan
- 15. McMaster University, Hamilton, Ontario
- 16. University of Southern California
- 17. Northern Illinois University
- 18. State University at Groningen, Holland
- 19. University of Illinois

- United States Naval Ordnance Test Station, China Lake, California
- 22. San Diego State College
- 23. University of California at Los Angeles
- 24. System Development Corporation, Santa Monica, California
- 28. University of North Carolina
- 29. Michigan State University
- 30. Ohio State University
- 32. West Virginia University
- 34. The Hebrew University of Jerusalem
- 35. University of Texas
- 36. University of Kentucky
- 38. Emory University
- 39. State University College, Potsdam, New York

- 40. New York University
- 41. University of Minnesota
- 42. State University of New York at Buffalo
- 43. University of Washington
- 45. University of Wisconsin
- 46. University of Lund, Sweden
- 47. Columbia University
- 48. Yale University
- 50. National Institute of Mental Health
- 51. Brown University
- 53. University of Notre Dame
- 54. State University of New York at Stony Brook
- 55. Washington University
- 56. Western Michigan University
- 57. Purdue University

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

The National Guard in Politics. By Martha Derthick. (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1965. Pp. 202. $4.95.)

The stated purpose of this book is to analyze group power through the examination of a single case. The case concerns the politics of the National Guard expressed by its organized interest representative, the National Guard Association. This organization is characterized by the author as one of the most successful pressure groups in our political system.

What distinguishes this work from that growing body of longitudinal studies of single organized interest groups is its unique concept of group power. According to Professor Derthick, a group's power is the ratio of its achievements to its goals. Goals are claims communicated to government. Achievements are actions taken by government in fulfillment of the claims. To establish that a group has power, however, it is not necessary to link specific governmental actions as responses to group activities. "An achievement is a goal fulfilled whether or not it can be established that the group "caused" the fulfillment by conscious effort beyond mere assertion of the claim." (p. 13)

In this formulation group power is at a maximum when achievements and goals are in "balance." Power increases as achievements increase if goals remain constant or as goals decrease if achievements remain constant. Power decreases as achievements decrease if goals remain constant or as goals increase if achievement remain constant.

To account for variance with this notion of power requires establishing magnitudes for goals and achievements. Professor Derthick proposes that the magnitude of goals is determined by the degree of resistance to them. Resistance to goals is a function of three factors: the number and range of political actors involved in processing claims (i.e. the more numerous the actors, the more resistance the group will encounter); the attitudes of the actors i.e. the more hostile the actors the more resistance the group will encounter); and the incidence and intensity of competing or supporting claims (i.e. the more numerous and intense are competing claims, the greater the resistance the group will encounter). The magnitude of achievements is determined by relating them to the magnitude of the expressed goals. "If all claims made are perfectly fulfilled, then the magnitude of the group's achievements equals that of its goals, and its power is at a maximum. To the extent that claims go unfulfilled, the magnitude of achievements falls short of the magnitude of goals (and power is accordingly less)." (pp. 13-14)

With this perspective on group power three major phases in the political experience of the National Guard are identified: a period of offense and success illustrated by such legislation as the Militia Act of 1903 and the National Defense Act of 1916, both highly favorable to the Guard; a period of stability of claim and achievement lasting until 1950; and third, a period of decreasing success and increasing defense necessitated by such actions as the recent proposal by the Secretary of Defense to merge the Guard with the Army Reserves. While the conceptual statement deemphasizes the importance of group resources and strategies, the highly readable account of the National Guard's politics since 1879 places about the same emphasis on organization, leadership skill, and socio-economic bases as other case studies of interest groups. For the National Guard, the author concludes, "In retrospect, the impression generally is one of power—of goals fulfilled; but for this fulfillment, the Guard owes as much to fortuitous circumstance as it can claim credit for on account of its own political activity." (p. 164)

This summary interpretation is representative of the limitations of the concept of group power as a system of general explanation. Power as conceived in this study is not necessarily related to group activity at all. As noted, the only link provided between the group and public policy is an "assertion" of a claim which is "communicated" to government. The terms "assertion" and "communicate" are not clarified further. All that is necessary is for the group to be satisfied with a governmental action which, as in the case of the National Guard, may well be the result of "fortuitous circumstance." This condition of group satisfaction is called achievement and achievement is equated with power. Few suggestions are offered to render the extraordinarily complex processes subsumed under the deceptively simple notion of group satisfaction amenable to empirical inquiry.

The problem of assessing magnitudes also is intriguing. Goal magnitude is held to be wholly a function of external resistance. Most other interest group theories make magnitude at least partially dependent upon the intensity with which a goal is supported by the group making the claim. But if goal magnitude can be thought entirely a function of external resistance, it might be as plausible to focus on the groups which cluster around an issue as to focus in detail on the activities of the single claimant group. A more precise statement of goal magnitude, crucial here to the determination of the power of the National Guard, would seem to require a closer analysis of the activities of such groups as the Department of the Army, the Reserve Officers Association, and the Office of the Secretary of Defense.

Resistance to goals might also be the function both of the kind of issue involved as well as the political setting in which the conflict takes place. Theodore Lowi suggests some very useful analytical categories in his important review article "American Business, Public Policy, Case Studies, and Political Theory," in World Politics XVI (July, 1964) pp. 677-715.

Understanding of political life will be advanced mainly through careful empirical inquiry generated by precisely stated theory. The National Guard in Politics does provide a theoretical emphasis distinct from other single longitudinal studies. But unfortunately, it is not entirely satisfying as a formal guide to inquiry and the organization of information.—Charles R. Green, Macalester College.

Rural-Urban Consolidation: The Merger of Governments in the Baton Rouge Area. By William C. Havard and Floyd L. Corty. (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1964. Pp. xv, 181. $5.00.)

Interest in methods of adapting local governmental arrangements to changing urban needs increases each time a proposed solution is adopted in a specific area. The recent consolidation of Nashville and Davidson County, Tennessee, makes a study of the earlier (1949) consolidation of City of Baton Rouge and East Baton Rouge Parish especially timely.

The book examines the results of the Baton Rouge consolidation in the light of more than a decade of experience in its operation. It is an "evaluation of the way in which the consolidated government has worked in practice . . by means of a survey of the organization of the city-parish government and of the administrative programs of the most important consolidated departments in the city-parish government," including a comparison of costs of the new plan of government with the costs of the old separate city and parish governments. The authors focused their inquiry on the effects of consolidation on the rural sector of the parish.

The political fragmentation in the East Baton Rouge Parish before 1949 was typical of the situation in many other metropolitan areas characterized by rapid industrialization and population growth—a parish government, the City of Baton Rouge, several small incorporated places, and a variety of special districts. The parish government in itself was diffused among a number of semiautonomous boards, commissions, and offices. The solution originally proposed was a consolidation of the city and parish governments. Pressures were sufficient to turn the original plan into a partial functional consolidation rather than a complete unification. Separate councils were continued for the urban and rural areas but with overlapping memberships and a single elected "mayor-president." The need for compromise necessitated the continuation of the parish constitutional officers.

In spite of the limitations imposed by the modifications designed to make the plan acceptable, substantial functional consolidation was achieved in planning and in the development of public works. The department of public works became an excellent example of "compound-functional consolidation" with administrative consolidation of supervision, purchasing personnel, central garage, and major works planning, but with a clear separation between urban and rural areas in budgeting.

If any lessons are to be learned from this account, one is that consolidation does not assure lower costs of government. Even when adjustments were made for changing dollar values, expenditures per capita were greater after consolidation than they were before. In a sense, it was through increased spending that the greatest benefits of the new plan were demonstrated to the inhabitants of the rural parts of the parish. The physical changes brought about by unified planning and construction of road, drainage, and sewer systems prepared the rural area for the increasing urbanization it was constantly undergoing and at the same time produced a favorable public reaction.

The authors believe that the most valuable object lesson in the Baton Rouge experiment is found in "its demonstration of the limits on what is possible in local government change." Herein lies the reason for the success of the plan—the willingness of its originators to make the kind of concessions to the interests concerned necessary to win their support. This pragmatism also may be an important element in what the authors find to be the system's "capacity for self-correction of weaknesses and possible adaptability to further consolidation."

The book has its rough spots. Typographical errors add to the difficulties inherent in comparing the text with the Tables in the Appendix.

A fitting sequel to this publication would be a study of the political factors involved in the adoption of the new government and a survey of the attitudes of both urban and rural residents toward the system in effect today.—Alice L. Ebel, Illinois State University.

The Negro and the First Amendment. By HARRY KALYEN, JR. (Columbus, Ohio: Ohio State University Press, 1965. Pp. ix, 190. $4.75.)

One of the less happy incidences of the behavioral revolution in the study of public law has been a tendency on the part of the "rebels" to ignore legal doctrines in their analyses. This tendency undoubtedly represents an over-compensation for those years in which doctrinal analysis was the dominant staple of public law scholarship. But whatever its derivation, it is a tendency which should be modified. For studying the behavior of judges without the doctrinal outputs is as incomplete as studying doctrines as abstractions.

It is the virtue of this skillfully written book that it tries, however marginally, to focus on one of the many questions arising out of the relationship of doctrinal development to social forces impinging upon the judiciary. Professor Kalven takes as his main theme the impact of the civil rights movement on the First Amendment, with specific emphasis on the development of a "theory" of the free speech portion of that Amendment. His analysis also sheds considerable light on the other side of the same coin-namely on the responses of the Supreme Court justices to a major social movement. The analysis does not succumb to the establishment of an easily dichotomized relationship between judge and litigant. It does not suggest that the only relevant variables are the judges' attitudes toward the claims of such groups as the NAACP. Rather it assumes that the judges' responses to the cases involved are complex crystallizations of their attitudes toward many things, including the need for satisfactory doctrinal development, and a commonly shared sympathy towards the goals of the NAACP.

Professor Kalven uses three sets of cases to support his analysis. Each set focuses on a particular doctrine which has been invoked before the Supreme Court to protect the NAACP from different forms of harassment by state governments and their instrumentalities—the most frequent forms being public exposure of NAACP activities and membership lists and state encouragement of private discrimination in public accommodations.

The first of these doctrines, that of group libel and seditious libel, is of major importance to any theory of the First Amendment, but of minor importance to the civil rights movement, since, as Professor Kalven reluctantly concludes. NAACP has shown no inclination to depend on this approach. The second doctrine involves the right of association, and poses for the Court some major problems of bothersome precedents. In order to extricate the NAACP from a variety of predicaments, the Court must establish a principle which would support the right of a state to regulate certain types of organizational activity, but would prohibit it from obtaining the membership lists of the NAACP; and to meet another challenge it must re-examine the states' traditional prerogative of regulating litigation under the common law rules of barratry, champerty, and maintenance.

The third set of cases is perhaps the most fascinating, for it deals with the Court's handling of convictions of sit-in demonstrators. Here the Justices were faced with two competing strategies—lawyers for the demonstrators and the Solicitor General were urging upon the Court a broadened view of the state action principle while lawyers for the southern states and communities were urging it to hold that state trespass laws could be used to enforce private discriminatory actions. It is fairly clear that it was the Court's purpose to protect the demonstrators as much as possible without endangering useful doctrines still needed for nonracial purposes, and it is a tribute to the Court's ingenuity that it was able to accomplish its goal.

Professor Kalven has whetted the reader's appetite with his descriptions of the impact of the civil rights movement on some aspects of the First Amendment. But he has also left considerable room for further scholarship. Some of the major variables have been identified, but others have not been explored. And the author's theme, while highly plausible, is the product of insight rather than strict empirical analysis. The former is useful; but the latter is also called for.

A final word should be added on what is perhaps the least satisfactory element of this bookthe author's use of the term theory. The notion that it is necessary to formulate a theory of the First Amendment has become prevalent in law review circles, and Professor Kalven seeks to build upon it. But it is not clear from this book how the term theory is being used. It is certainly not being used in its empirical sense to describe and predict the relationship between two or more variables. And I doubt if it is being used here in the simpler sense of describing the meaning of the First Amendment as expounded by the Supreme Court. If it has any meaning for this study, it is a completely normative concept-i.e. a theory of the First Amendment being one's organized thoughts about what it ought to mean. But this is unsatisfactory, either for purposes of this study or for general use in modern scholarship, and is in need of further clarification.—JOEL B. GROSSMAN, University of Wisconsin.

Franklin D. Roosevelt and the New Deal, 1932-1940. By WILLIAM E. LEUCHTENBURG. (New York, Evanston, and London: Harper and Row, 1963. Pp. xvii, 393. $6.00 cloth, $2.45 paper.)

Having been delayed in doing this review for nearly two years, I can console myself (and even more importantly, the editor) with the thought that I am in a position to write what is indeed a review, not simply a quick first impression. For I read this work in manuscript; I read it when it first appeared; I've been through it with care twice since; and I've dipped into it repeatedly.

As one who has spent so much time with this book, I can report that my first impressions were correct. Leuchtenburg has written a richly detailed, carefully balanced, and thoroughly reliable survey of the New Deal era. This is unquestionably the standard one-volume treatment of the period for this generation, far surpassing its only serious rivals, Basil Rauch, The History of the New Deal, 1933-1938 (1944) and James M. Burns, Roosevelt: The Lion and the Fox (1956).

Fortunately it has been, from its moment of publication, available in paperback, thanks to the happy policy of its publishers. It has been my pleasure, as a teacher of graduate students in recent American history, to see this book attract and hold an audience dissatisfied with the superficial glibnesses of Richard Hofstadter's interpretations of the New Deal in his The American Political Tradition (1948), and The Age of Reform (1955), and vaguely unhappy with Burns' treatment.

I cannot judge whether political scientists will find Leuchtenburg's book as satisfying as political historians have judged it to be. Certainly those who still believe with Professor Burns that Roosevelt missed a great opportunity to reorganize American political parties along liberal-conservative lines will find little comfort in Leuchtenburg's book. Here the New Deal is seen as something essentially new, in spite of the Progressive-World War I era origins of many of its elements, and emphasis is given to how Roosevelt was able to change the essential nature of American politics by his reform of the Democratic Party. Leuchtenburg looks at his subject with sympathy and with concern, yet he never sees it through rose-colored glasses. He has many funny and telling anecdotes to relate-some of them never before in printyet he never seems to be striving for mere literary effect. He is generous to other scholars. Thus he pays tribute to Arthur M. Schlesinger Jr.'s analysis of F.D.R.'s "administrative talent" in The Coming of the New Deal (1959); and he says that Carl N. Degler in Out of Our Past (1959) "has written the best analysis of the permanent significance of the New Deal." But he is also skeptical when he cannot find evidence to support a thesis, such as Rauch's contention that F.D.R. deliberately turned away from domestic reform in order to win the support of restive Southern Democrats for his foreign policy. On this Leuchtenburg says simply: "Little evidence has been cited for this view. The New Deal seems to have sputtered out for quite other reasons."

Leuchtenburg has based his work upon widely scattered archives, in addition to the enormous body of published materials on the New Deal. This is not merely a synthesis of what others have written about the New Deal, although that is certainly one of its most obvious characteristics. It is essentially a work of original scholarship, written with restraint and judgment. It is one of the best volumes in the somewhat uneven "New American Nation" series edited by Henry Steele Commager and Richard B. Morris. Like other works in the series, it has a full bibliography and it has footnotes where footnotes should be, at the bottom of the pages. No matter what a person's interest in the New Deal and F.D.R. may be, he can benefit from a reading of this book. As for political scientists, even those of the most advanced behaviorist persuasion could profit from a study of Leuchtenburg's book, for he shows how fine "traditional" political history can be when it is done by a man who combines a first-rate intellect with imagination, energy and a personal knowledge of practical politics.—ROBERT E. BURKE, The University of Washington.

The Higher Civil Service: An Evaluation of Federal Personnel Practices. By David T. Stanley. (Washington, D.C., The Brookings Institution, 1964. Pp. 145. $3.50.)

Perhaps it is a mark of growing political maturity that we have become concerned about the quality of our higher civil service. Stanley's work is a useful addition to empirical studies of this problem. He centers on the background, performance, and morale of some 16,000 officials in grades 15-18 whose decisions touch so many aspects of American life. Generalizations are based on a sample of 559, two-thirds in headquarters jobs, the others in the field. Twenty-seven per cent are in the Defense Department; 34 in other Cabinet departments; and 38 in various other agencies. Almost 200 men are former employees, whose views, as might be expected, are less positive. Interviews, questionnaires, secondary analysis, and reviews of earlier studies provide the means of analysis. Valuable comparisons are made with earlier studies such as those by Warner and Kilpatrick. The material is nicely organized and the data clearly presented.

Regarding typical career lines, the theme is one of slow, steady advance at the rate of one grade every three years. No meteoric rises occur, and the initial rate gradually slows to one grade for every five years. Regarding occupational role, the largest proportion are in engineering, general administration, science-math-statistics, and law respectively. Continuous and focused federal service is the rule. Over eighty per cent had served in only two departments and in only two major occupational fields during their entire career, again indicating that rotation is fairly uncommon in the federal service. Five out of six had college degrees and one out of three had advanced degrees. Average age of the group was almost 50, most of whom plan to retire within the next 5-10 years. making the problem of replacing them compelling.

Data on the views of top management people are presented, based on interviews with 67 men. Following the caveat that responses of the group are likely to be biased in favor of a system which brought them to the top, Stanley concluded that about half of them feel generally positive about the higher civil service. One of their major criticisms (40 per cent) is the lack of any system for forecasting future personnel needs and meeting them. Here, apparently, is one area where some improvement can be made. Contrary to current reports from Washington about the difficulty of finding competent high-level administrators, almost half the officials said they had no trouble filling responsible positions. Those who did attributed it mainly to salary limitations, quotas on the super-grade jobs, and occasional rigidities in classification. Almost two-thirds of such jobs were filled from within the agency or department.

This happy picture is clouded, however, when we learn that getting rid of incompetents is an unsolved problem, even at the GS 15-and-over levels. More than half of the respondents feel that reassigning such men is the proper course, while the next most favored technique is to force them out. One-quarter concluded that nothing could be done.

When asked what changes they would like to see at their own level, most of the officials said they were satisfied with things as they are. Those who wanted change stressed higher salaries and more felicitous classification practices, including a "rank-in-man" system. They also wanted agencies to be able to make their own supergrade assignments. Greater mobility between agencies and departments was recommended.

Regarding general attitudes about the higher federal service, once again most officials are generally satisfied. The challenge and variety of work is the most common source of satisfaction, with "public service" third. Here, an interesting difference between scientific-technical men and generalists appears: public service is a poor third in the eyes of the former, yet ranks first among the administrative group. Regarding dissatisfactions, there is greater unanimity and indeed almost half of the entire sample cites "government complexity" as the major source of disenchantment. Second, again by a fairly wide margin, is timid or otherwise inadequate supervision. Here we find a nice similarity with Kilpatrick, Cummings, and Jennings' broader survey which also stressed poor supervision and delays and complexity in the federal bureaucracy. Comparing their jobs with those in business, present federal officials believe the only advantage would be better pay. Those who had left the government, however, regarded their jobs in the private milieu as better on all counts.

Responses regarding the "advisability of a young person following a career leading to a position such as your own" are somewhat dampening insofar as satisfaction and the vital problem of recruitment is concerned. Combining former and present employees, less than half of this highly successful group give an unqualified "Yes." Scientists and engineers are the least positive, which is consistent with their tendency to regard "public service" as a less compelling work incentive and their significantly greater belief that "red tape" is a major frustration.

Stanley turns finally to a general analysis of his findings to determine what can be done to improve the higher civil service. Here again, as he notes, the usual recommendations appear: better forecasting of personnel needs; more imaginative and vigorous recruitment; better evaluation, with less dependence on subjective judgments; selective increase in training and development, particularly in long-term assignments; better selection with more recruitment from outside the service. One must wonder about the competitiveness of appointments when, as the survey data show, most of the officials received their present positions through personal associations and 71 per cent of them believed their own replacement would come from within their own agency.

In reading once again these various prescriptions, one must ask whether they really touch the heart of the matter. Perhaps the continued emphasis upon better recruitment, encouraging bright young people to enter the service, the advantages of rotation and training, etc., is really beside the point. Is not the essential problem the system itself? As Weber noted, only inspired charismatic leadership can overcome the castration of bureaucracy. As the careful study by Kilpatrick shows, among the more successful and brighter members of the general employed public and among students, federal employment is seen as personally restrictive and frustrating: "over and over again, variations on this theme were repeated: the government is a vast organizational machine in which the individual is in danger of losing his identity and autonomy." (p. 122) "The special stress on lack of self-determination and too much bureaucracy . . . is another way of saying there would be too many restrictions on the individual's autonomy in the work situation." (p. 123) The desire for autonomy, moreover, is highly associated with personal competence and initiative: "The evidence is strong that the occupational satisfaction offered by the federal service is relatively lower for the high-level federal employee than for his colleague of lower rank." (p. 118) And most sadly, "the appeal of federal employment is lowest among those kinds of employed adults for whom the government's qualitative needs are the greatest and for whom the competition will be keenest in the future." (p. 117) Such evidence suggests that more effort should be devoted to modifying the system to provide a milieu in which senior officials have more opportunity to use their skill and initiative and to which young people can come with better assurance that their talent will find an outlet.—Robert Presthus, Cornell University.

Congressional Reform: Problems and Prospects.

EDITED BY JOSEPH S. CLARK. (New York: Thomas
Y. Crowell Co., 1965. Pp. 364. $2.50, paper.)

Short essays by political scientists like Huitt, Robinson, Fenno, Matthews, and Burns, and journalists and participants like Burnham, Cater, Smith, Javits, and the editor, on aspects of congressional reform.—A. R.

The Road to the White House. EDITED BY HAROLD FABER. (New York: Mc Graw-Hill Book Company, Inc., 1965. Pp. 305. $6.95.)

Narrative of the 1964 preconvention and election campaigns by the New York Times staff. Much useful information, little interpretation.—A.R.

The Congress and America's Future. EDITED BY DAVID B. TRUMAN. (Englewood Cliffs, N.J.;
Prentice-Hall, Inc., 1965. Pp. 186. $3.95 cloth,
$1.95 paper.)

Papers for an American Assembly on Congress by Samuel Huntington, Douglas Price, Richard Fenno, Ralph Huitt, Richard Neustadt, Harvey Mansfield, Holbert Carroll, and the editor.—A. R.

The Statistical History of the United States from Colonial Times to the Present. (New York: Horizon Press, 1965. Pp. 789. $9.95.)

Census materials on many subjects updated to 1962.—A. R.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

FRANKLIN L. BURDETTE

University of Maryland

ARTICLES AND BOOKLETS

National Government

Anastaplo, George. The Declaration of Independence. Saint Louis University Law Journal. Spring, 1965.

Controversy over U. S. Immigration Policy. [Symposium.] Congressional Digest. May, 1965.

Cooper, Joseph. Jeffersonian Attitudes toward Executive Leadership and Committee Development in the House of Representatives, 1789-1829. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1965.

Haimbaugh, George D., Jr. Vice Presidential Succession: A Criticism of the Bayh-Celler Plan. South Carolina Law Review. Spring, 1965.

Kane, Albert E. Jurisdiction over Indians and Indian Reservations. Arizona Law Review. Spring, 1965.

Miller, Arthur Selwyn. Presidential Power to Impound Appropriated Funds: An Exercise in Constitutional Decision-Making. North Carolina Law Review. April, 1965.

Tugwell, Rexford G. Transition: Hoover to Roosevelt 1932-1933. Centennial Review. Spring, 1965.

State Government

Allen, David J. New Governor in Indiana: The Challenges of Executive Power. Institute of Public Administration, Indiana University. 1965.

Bahl, Roy W., Jr., and Robert J. Saunders. Determinants of Changes in State and Local Government Expenditures. National Tax Journal. March, 1965.

Boyd, William J. D. Suburbia Takes Over. National Civic Review. June, 1965.

Brazer, Harvey E. Michigan's Fiscal Outlook. Wayne Law Review. Winter, 1965.

Clem, Alan L., and George M. Platt. A Bibliography of South Dakota Government and Politics. Governmental Research Bureau, University of South Dakota. 1965.

Drury, James W. The Kansas Traveling Library Commission: An Administrative History. Governmental Research Center, University of Kansas. 1965.

Earmarked State Taxes. Tax Foundation. 1965. Fulmer, John L., and Utha Conrad, eds. The Budget Analyst in State Management. National Association of State Budget Officers. 1965.

Goldberg, Edward M. The California Constitution: Will Rivision Equal Reform? Southern California Law Review. Spring, 1965.

Huckshorn, Robert J. Decision-Making Stimuli in the State Legislative Process. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1965.

Krawood, Benjamin. Michigan's Need for a Tax Court and the Inadequacy of Appeal Procedures Provided by the General Property Tax Law. Wayne Law Review. Winter, 1965.

Miller, James Nathan. Hamstrung Legislatures. National Civic Review. April. 1965.

Morey, Roy D. Politics and Legislation: The Office of Governor in Arizona. Institute of Government Research, University of Arizona. 1965.

Moschos, Demitrios M., and David L. Katsky. Unicameralism and Bicameralism: History and Tradition. Boston University Law Review. Spring, 1965.

Norvell, James R. The Railroad Commission of Texas: Its Origin and History. Southwestern Historical Quarterly. April, 1965.

Private Groups in Illinois Government. Institute of Government and Public Affairs, University of Illinois. 1965.

Rothenberg, Leon. State Budgets—1965. State Government. Spring, 1965.

Schenker, Alan Evan. Occupational Licensing in California: The Department of Professional and Vocational Standards. Institute of Governmental Affairs, University of California, Davis. 1965.

Simmons, Robert H. American State Executive Systems: A Heuristic Model. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1965.

Local Government

Anderson, Desmond L. Many Influences Contribute to Image of Urban Manager. Public Management. May, 1965.

Beck, Morris. Determinants of the Property Tax Level: A Case Study of Northeastern New Jersey. National Tax Journal. March, 1965.

Buechner, John C. Differences in Role Perceptions in Colorado Council-Manager Cities. Bureau of Governmental Research and Service, University of Colorado. 1965.

Cahill, Robert S., and Harry J. Friedman, Criteria for a Proposed Theory of Local Government. Philippine Journal of Public Administration. October, 1964.

City Government in the State Courts. Harvard Law Review. June, 1965.

Cunningham, Roger A. Zoning Law in Michigan and New Jersey: A Comparative Study. Michigan Law Review. May, 1965.

Dawson-Terrell County: Ideas for Development. Institute of Community and Area Development, University of Georgia. 1964, Dembeck, Louise E. Board of Zoning Appeals Procedure—Informality Breeds Contempt. Syracuse Law Review. Spring, 1965.

Dvorin, E. P., and A. J. Misner. Single-Purpose Cities. Western City. March, 1965. Part II. Ibid. April, 1965

Fagin, Henry. The Policies Plan: Instrumentality for a Community Dialogue. Institute of Local Government, University of Pittsburgh. 1965.

Frye, Robert J. Housing and Urban Renewal in Alabama. Bureau of Public Administration, University of Alabama. 1965.

Gans, Herbert J. The Failure of Urban Renewal. Commentary. April, 1965.

Garrett, Robert J., and Roy L. Lassiter, Jr. The Burden of Ad Valorem Real Property Taxes under Varying Assessment Ratios: A Case Study. Public Administration Clearing Service, University of Florida, 1965.

Johnpoll, Bernard K. Thwarting 'City Slickers.' National Civic Review. June, 1965.

Land Planning and the Law: Emerging Policies and Techniques. [Symposium.] UCLA Law Review. March, 1965.

Leach, Richard H. A Leadership Crisis. National Civic Review. May, 1965.

Levenson, Rosaline. The Role of the Board of Tax Review in Connecticut Local Government. Institute of Public Service, University of Connecticut. 1965.

MacCorkle, Stuart A. Municipal Annexation in Texas. Institute of Public Affairs, University of Texas. 1965.

Municipal Revenues. [Symposium.] Municipal Finance. May. 1965.

Sanders, John L. Equal Representation and the Board of County Commissioners. Popular Government. April, 1965.

Sax, Joseph L. Municipal Water Supply for Nonresidents: Recent Developments and a Suggestion for the Future. Natural Resources Journal. May, 1965.

Smallwood, Frank. Guiding Urban Change. National Civic Review. April, 1965.

Symposium: New Towns. Washington University Law Quarterly. February, 1965.

Urban Problems and Prospects. [Symposium.] Law and Contemporary Problems. Winter, 1965.

Watson, Walter B., Ernest A. T. Barth, and Donald P. Hayes. Metropolitan Decentralization through Incorporation. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1965.

Intergovernmental Relations

California Urban Policy for Intergovernmental Action. Coordinating Council on Urban Policy, Sacramento, 1965.

Developing Metropolitan Transportation Policies. Committee for Economic Development, 1965.

Ervin, Sam, Jr. Federalism and Federal Grantsin-Aid. North Carolina Law Review. April, 1965.

Hardwick, C. T. Purchasing Study of Local Government in the Southeast Michigan Metropolitan Six-County Region. Metropolitan Fund, Detroit. 1965.

Ranney, David C. Regional Development and the Courts. Syracuse Law Review. Spring, 1965.

Reynolds, Harry W., Jr., ed. Intergovernmental Relations in the United States. Annals. May, 1965.

Constitutional Law and Civil Liberties

Amsterdam, Anthony G. Criminal Prosecutions Affecting Federally Guaranteed Civil Rights: Federal Removal and Habeas Corpus Jurisdiction to Abort State Court Trial. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. April, 1965.

Berger, Raoul. Executive Privilege v. Congressional Inquiry. UCLA Law Review. May, 1965.

Black, Charles L., Jr. The Problem of the Compatibility of Civil Disobedience with American Institutions of Government. Texas Law Review. March, 1965.

Brooks, Harvey David. Vagrancy: A Constitutional Battle. Syracuse Law Review. Spring, 1965.

Bryenton, Gary L. Employment Discrimination: State FEP Laws and the Impact of Title VII of the Civil Rights Acts of 1964. Western Reserve Law Review. May, 1965.

Carden, Philip M. Federal Power to Seize and Search without Warrant. Vanderbilt Law Review. December, 1964.

Conaway, O. B., Jr., ed. Administration and Race Relations. American Society for Public Administration. 1965.

Cowen, Lindsey. Some Additional Thoughts on "States' Rights." St. John's Law Review. May, 1965.

Dixon, Robert G., Jr. Reapportionment Perspectives: What Is Fair Representation? American Bar Association Journal. April, 1965.

Enforcement of Fair Employment under the Civil Rights Acts of 1964. University of Chicago Law Review. Spring, 1965.

Freedom of Expression in a Commercial Context. Harvard Law Review. April, 1965.

Garvey, Gerald. The Constitutional Revolution of 1837 and the Myth of Marshall's Monolith. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1965.

Goedecke, Robert. Justice Field and Inherent Rights. Review of Politics. April, 1965.

Grant, J. A. C. Felix Frankfurter: A Dissenting Opinion. UCLA Law Review. May, 1965.

Haimbaugh, George D., Jr. Free Press versus Fair Trial: The Contribution of Mr. Justice Frankfurter. University of Pittsburgh Law Review. March, 1965.

Hammett, Harold D. Separation of Church and State: By One Wall or Two? Journal of Church and State. Spring, 1965.

Hardin, Charles M. Issues in Legislative Apportionment. Review of Politics. April, 1965.

Hatcher, William H. John Marshall and States' Rights. Southern Quarterly. April, 1965.

Hindell, Keith. Civil Rights Breaks the Cloture Barrier. Political Quarterly. April-June, 1965.

Hobart, Charles W. Freedom, a Neglected Area for Social Research. Ethics. April, 1965.

Hyman, Jacob K., and Wade J. Newhouse, Jr. Standards for Preferred Freedoms: Beyond the First. Northwestern University Law Review. March-April, 1965.

Karlen, Delmar. Can a State Abolish the Civil Jury? Wisconsin Law Review. Winter, 1965.

Keeton, Morris. The Morality of Civil Disobedience. Texas Law Review. March, 1965.

Kramer, Daniel C. The Restraints of Schneider v. Rusk upon the Foreign Policy Powers of the "Political Branches": How Meaningful Are They? Temple Law Quarterly. Spring, 1965.

Kutler, Stanley I. Chief Justice Taft, National Regulation, and the Commerce Power. Journal of American History. March, 1965.

Legislative Apportionment. [Symposium.] State Government. Spring, 1965.

Loeb, Louis S. Judicial Blocs and Judicial Values in Civil Liberties Cases Decided by the Supreme Court and the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. American University Law Review. June, 1965.

Loevinger, Lee. Religious Liberty and Broadcasting. George Washington Law Review. March, 1965.

Lynd, Staughton. A Constitution Divided. Columbia University Forum. Spring, 1965.

Mamome, Russell B. Right to Counsel on Arrest: A Federal Exclusionary Rule against Confessions and Admissions Illegally Obtained in State Prosecutions. Western Reserve Law Review. May, 1965.

Marek, Edward F. Civil Disobedience in the Civil Rights Movement: To What Extent Protected and Sanctioned? Ibid.

McCloskey, H. J. Rights. Philosophical Quarterly. April, 1965.

Milchen, Joseph A. Unconstitutional Racial

Classification and De Facto Segregation. Michigan Law Review. March. 1965.

Nathanson, Nathaniel L. Constitutional Problems Involved in Adherence by the United States to a Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. Cornell Law Quarterly. Winter, 1965.

The New Constitutional Definition of Libel and Its Future. Northwestern University Law Review. March-April. 1965.

Paul, Roland A. The Act of State Doctrine: Revived but Suspended. *University of Pennsylva*nia Law Review. March, 1965.

Police Power to Stop, Frisk, and Question Suspicious Persons. Columbia Law Review. May, 1965.

Quick, Harry T. Public Accommodations: A Justification of Title II of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Western Reserve Law Review. May, 1965.

Required Information and the Privilege against Self-Incrimination. Columbia Law Review. April, 1965

Rice, Charles E. The Constitutional Right of Association. Hastings Law Journal. May, 1965.

Semerjian, Evan Y. Proposals on Wiretapping in Light of Recent Senate Hearings. Boston University Law Review. Spring, 1965.

Spanogle, John A., Jr. Immunity through Confession? Vanderbilt Law Review. December, 1964.

Sprecher, Robert A. The Lost [Second] Amendment. American Bar Association Journal. June, 1965.

Vines, Kenneth N. Southern State Supreme Courts and Race Relations. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1965.

Whyte, George K., Jr. The Use of Expert Testimony in Obscenity Litigation. Wisconsin Law Review. Winter, 1965.

Wright, Quincy. Reflections on the Sabbatino Case. American Journal of International Law. April, 1965.

Judicial Administration and Law Enforcement

Anderson, Leslie L. The Line between Federal and State Court Jurisdiction. Michigan Law Review. May, 1965.

Bailey, F. Lee. Federal Habeas Corpus—Old Writ, New Role: An Overhaul for State Criminal Justice. Boston University Law Review. Spring, 1965.

Boonin, Leonard G. The Logic of Legal Decisions. Ethics. April, 1965.

Breitel, Charles D. The Lawmakers. Columbia Law Review. May, 1965.

Brennan, William J., Jr. The United States Supreme Court: Reflections Past and Present. Marquette Law Review. Spring, 1965.

Currier, Thomas S. Time and Change in Judge-Made Law: Prospective Overruling. Virginia Law Review. March, 1965.

Desmond, Charles S. Current Problems of State Court Administration. Columbia Law Review. April, 1965.

Effective Assistance of Counsel for the Indigent Defendant. Harvard Law Review. May, 1965.

Finley, Robert C. Judicial Administration: What Is This Thing Called Legal Reform? Columbia Law Review. April, 1965.

Frank, John P. The Legal Ethics of Louis D. Brandeis. Stanford Law Review. April, 1965.

Frankel, Lionel H. Criminal Omissions: A Legal Microcosm. Wayne Law Review. Winter, 1965.

Handler, Joel F. The Juvenile Court and the Adversary System: Problems of Function and Form. Wisconsin Law Review. Winter, 1965.

Jaffe, Carolyn. The Press and the Oppressed—A Study of Prejudicial News Reporting in Criminal Cases. Journal of Criminal Law, Criminology, and Police Science. March, 1965. Part II. Ibid. June, 1965.

Jennings, James W. Preserving the Right to Confrontation—A New Approach to Hearsay Evidence in Criminal Trials. *University of Pennsylva*nia Law Review. March, 1965.

Jones, Harry LeRoy. American Emergence from Juridical Isolation. World Affairs. January-March, 1965.

Kaplan, John. The Prosecutorial Discretion—A Comment. Northwestern University Law Review. May-June, 1965.

Kim, Richard C. C. Capital Punishment: Time for a Stand. Journal of Church and State. Spring, 1965

LeFave, Wayne R., and Frank J. Remington. Controlling the Police: The Judge's Role in Making and Reviewing Law Enforcement Decisions. Michigan Law Review. April, 1965.

The Law of Citizen's Arrest. Columbia Law Review. March 1965.

Louisell, David W., and Bernard L. Diamond. Law and Psychiatry: Déiente, Entente, or Concomitance? Cornell Law Quarterly. Winter, 1965.

McCarthy, David J., Jr., and Jeanne J. Wahl. The District of Columbia Bail Project: An Illustration of Experimentation and a Brief for Change. Georgetown Law Journal. Spring, 1965.

Nagel, Stuart S., and Felix V. Gagliano. Attorney Characteristics and Courtroom Results. Nebraska Law Review. May, 1965.

Norris, Harold, and John T. Hammond. The Right to Counsel—A Study of the Defense of Indigent Persons Accused of Crime in Michigan. University of Detroit Law Journal. April, 1965.

Ori, Kan. The Politicized Nature of the County Prosecutor's Office, Fact or Fancy?—The Case in Indiana. Notre Dame Lawyer. April, 1965.

Paulsen, Monrad G. The Expanding Horizons of Legal Services—I. West Virginia Law Review. April, 1965.

The Res Judicata Effect of Suits against Government Officers in Litigation with the United States. Virginia Law Review. March, 1965.

Rottenberg, Simon. Liability in Law and Economics. American Economic Review. March. 1965.

Rumble, Wilfrid E., Jr. The Paradox of American Legal Realism. Ethics. April, 1965.

Schoenfeld, C. G. The Superego's Influence on the Law. DePaul Law Review. Spring-Summer, 1965.

Studies in Judicial Biography. [Symposium.] Vanderbilt Law Review. March, 1965.

Symposium: [Lawyers'] Professional Responsibility. Ohio State Law Journal. Winter, 1965.

Ulmer, S. Sidney. Toward a Theory of Sub-Group Formation in the United States Supreme Court. Journal of Politics. February, 1965.

Van Alstyne, William W. In Gideon's Wake: Harsher Penalties and the "Successful" Criminal Appellant. Yale Law Journal. March, 1965.

Winters, Glenn R. A Ministry of Justice: The Time to Act Is Now. Journal of the American Judicature Society. April, 1965.

Public Administration and Administrative Law

Brown, David S. When Nothing Succeeds Like [Executive] Excess. Public Personnel Review. July, 1965.

Burrus, Bernie R., and Ralph J. Savarese. Institutional Decision-Making and the Problem of Fairness in FTC Antitrust Enforcement. Georgetown Law Journal. Spring, 1965.

Cohen, Morris L. Publication of State Administrative Regulations—Reform in Slow Motion. Buffalo Law Review. Spring, 1965.

Elman, Philip. A Note on Administrative Adjudication. Yale Law Journal. March, 1965.

Glatt, Evelyn. The Demise of the Ballistics Division. Institute of Governmental Studies, University of California, Berkeley. 1964.

Hammitt, J. J. Government Archives and Records Management. American Archivist. April, 1965.

Landau, Martin, ed. Management Information Technology—Recent Advances and Implications for Public Administration. American Society for Public Administration. 1965.

Long, Thad G. The Administrative Process: Agonizing Reappraisal in the FTC. George Washinton Law Review. March, 1965.

Massey, John E. Labor-Management Cooperation in TVA. Public Personnel Review. July, 1965.

Organization of Pollution Control Programs. American County Government. May, 1965.

Wylie, Charles M. Current Problems of Administrative Research in Public Health. Journal of Public Health. May, 1965.

Political Parties, Elections, and Public Opinion

Alinsky, Saul. The Professional Radical. Harper's Magazine. June, 1965. Part II. Ibid. July, 1965

Bazelon, David T. Big Business and the Democrats. Commentary. May, 1965.

Burdette, Franklin L. The Politics of National Greatness. Maryland Magazine. March-April, 1965. Also: Congressional Record. April 29, 1965.

Carlsson, Gösta. Time and Continuity in Mass Attitude Change: The Case of Voting. Public Opinion Quarterly. Spring, 1965.

Carter, Richard F. Communication and Affective Relations. Journalism Quarterly. Spring, 1965.

Casdorph, Paul Douglas. Norris Wright Cuney and Texas Republican Politics, 1883-1896. Southwestern Historical Quarterly. April, 1965.

Cremins, James S. The Present Legal Status of the Communist Party, U. S. A. American Bar Association Journal. May, 1965.

Cutlip, Scott M., ed. Public Opinion and Public Administration. American Society for Public Administration. 1965.

Flinn, Thomas A., and Frederick M. Wirt. Local Party Leaders [in Ohio]: Groups of Like Minded Men. Midwest Journal of Political Science. February, 1965.

Glaser, William A. Television and Voting Turnout. Public Opinion Quarterly. Spring, 1965.

Greene, Marc T. America: The Domestic Scene. Quarterly Review. April, 1965.

Hall, Robert N. Lyndon Johnson's Speech Preparation. Quarterly Journal of Speech. April, 1965.

Hamilton, Charles V. Southern Judges and Negro Voting Rights: The Judicial Approach to the Solution of Controversial Social Problems. Wisconsin Law Review. Winter, 1965.

Handlin, Oscar. Reconsidering the Populists. Agricultural History. April, 1965.

Hart, Jim A. Election Campaign Coverage in English and U. S. Daily Newspapers. Journalism Quarterly. Spring, 1965.

Higgins, Jerry. Authoritarianism and Candidate Preference. Psychological Reports. April, 1965.

Isaacs, Joakim. Candidate Grant and the Jews. American Jewish Archives. April, 1965.

Jones, Charles O. The Republican Party in American Politics. The Macmillan Co. 1965.

Kintner, Robert E. Television and the World of Politics. Harper's Magazine. May, 1965.

Lindquist, John H. An Occupational Analysis of Local Politics: Syracuse, New York, 1880-1959. Sociology and Social Research. April, 1965.

McDowell, James L. The Role of Newspapers in Illinois' At-Large Election. Journalism Quarterly. Spring, 1965.

Munger, Frank, and James Blackhurst. Factionalism in the National Conventions, 1940-1964: An Analysis of Ideological Consistency in State Delegation Voting. Journal of Politics. May, 1965.

Nagel, Stuart S. Simplified Bipartisan Computer Redistricting. Stanford Law Review. May, 1965.

Peek, Ralph L. Curbing of Voter Intimidation in Florida, 1871. Florida Historical Quarterly. April, 1965.

Pomper, Gerald. New Jersey County Chairmen. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1965.

Rourke, Francis E. Urbanism and the National Party Organizations. Ibid.

Seabury, Paul. The Antic Politics of California. Harper's Magazine. June, 1965.

Sellers, Charles. The Equilibrium Cycle in Two-Party Politics. Public Opinion Quarterly. Spring, 1965

Smith, Paul A. The Games of Community Politics. Midwest Journal of Political Science. February, 1965.

State Power to Bind Presidential Electors. Columbia Law Review. April, 1965.

Stauffer, Robert B. Interest Group Theory: Variations in a Developing Country. Philippine Journal of Public Administration. October, 1964.

Steelman, Joseph F. Republicanism in North Carolina: John Motley Morehead's Campaign to Revive a Moribund Party, 1908-1910. North Carolina Historical Review. Spring, 1965.

Stevens, Walter W. Lewis Cass: Rhetorical Practices and Failures. Speech Monographs. March, 1965.

Welch, William. Voting and the Responsible Citizen. Midwest Quarterly. April, 1965.

Worsnop, Richard L. Extremist Movements in Race and Politics. Editorial Research Reports. March 31, 1965.

Young, Roy E. The Place System in Texas Elections. Institute of Public Affairs, University of Texas. 1965.

Economic and Social Functions

National Economy

Arnold, Thurman. Roosevelt's Contribution to the American Competitive Ideal. Centennial Review. Spring, 1965.

Berle, Adolf A. Reshaping the American Economy. Ibid.

Federal Non-Income Taxes: An Examination of Selected Revenue Sources. Tax Foundation. 1965.

Gallaway, Lowell E. The Foundations of the War on Poverty. American Economic Review. March, 1965.

Harris, Seymour E. Economic Fluctuations and Governmental Performance in the Sixties. UCLA Law Review. May, 1965.

Sneed, Joseph T. The Criteria of Federal Income Tax Policy. Stanford Law Review. April, 1965.

Stigler, George J. The Economist and the State. American Economic Review. March, 1965.

Natural Resources

Brooks, David B. Goals and Standards of Performance for the Conservation of Minerals: A Comment. Natural Resources Journal. May, 1965.

Clark, Robert Emmet. Groundwater Management: Law and Local Response. Arizona Law Review. Spring, 1965.

Federal Water Rights Legislation and the Reserved Lands Controversy. Georgetown Law Journal. Spring, 1965.

Foss, Phillip O. Problems in Federal Management of Natural Resources for Recreation. Natural Resources Journal. May, 1965.

Hargreaves, L. A., Jr., et al. The Property Tax on Forest Lands in Georgia. Georgia Forest Research Council. 1965.

—. Proposed Assessment Guide—Forest Lands in Georgia. Georgia Forest Research Council. 1965.

Landstrom, Karl S. Citizen Participation in Public Land Decisions. Saint Louis University Law Journal. Spring, 1965.

Lowitt, Richard. A Neglected Aspect of the Progressive Movement: George W. Norris and Public Control of Hydro-electric Power, 1913-1919. Historian. May, 1965.

Maga, John A. Air Resource Management in the San Francisco Bay Area. Institute of Governmental Studies, University of California, Berkeley. 1965.

Man and His Habitat: Problems of Water Pollution. [Symposium.] Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. May, 1965.

Myers, J. K., and R. C. Smith. Wood Products and Missouri's Forests. Research Center, University of Missouri. 1965.

Trelease, Frank J. Policies for Water Law: Property Rights, Economic Forces, and Public Regulation. Natural Resources Journal. May, 1965.

Agriculture

Floyd, John E. The Effects of Farm Price Supports on the Returns to Land and Labor in Agriculture. Journal of Political Economy. April, 1965.

Grove, Ernest W. State Variations in Farm Program Payments. Journal of Farm Economics. May, 1965.

Kirschner, Don S. Henry A. Wallace as Farm Editor. American Quarterly. Summer, 1965.

Business and Labor

The Antidumping Act—Tariff or Antitrust Law? Yale Law Journal. March, 1965.

Baier, Lowell E. Substantive Interpretations under the Antidumping Act and the Foreign Trade Policy of the United States. Stanford Law Review. March, 1965.

Bork, Robert H. The Rule of Reason and the Per Se Concept: Price Fixing and Market Division. Yale Law Journal. April, 1965.

Bridges, Benjamin, Jr. State and Local Inducements for Industry. Part I. National Tax Journal. March, 1965.

Cohen, Edward E. Meeting Competition under the Robinson-Patman Act: Effective Enforcement through Flexible Interpretation. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. March, 1965.

Cole, John P., Jr. Community Antenna Television, the Broadcaster Establishment, and the Federal Regulator. American University Law Review. June, 1965.

Conflicts of Jurisdiction between the Comptroller of the Currency and the Federal Reserve Board. Columbia Law Review. April, 1965.

Drotning, John E. NLRB Policy toward Employer Objections to Election Misconduct. Labor Law Journal. June, 1965.

Election Remedies under the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act. Harvard Law Review. June, 1965.

Fine, Sidney. Frank Murphy, the Thornhill Decision, and Picketing as Free Speech. Labor History. Spring, 1965.

——. The General Motors Sit-Down Strike: A Re-examination. American Historical Review. April, 1965.

Flags of Convenience and NLRB Jurisdiction. Northwestern University Law Review. May-June, 1965.

Fleischer, Arthur, Jr. "Federal Corporation Law": An Assessment. Harvard Law Review. April, 1965.

Forkosch, Morris D. Bargaining and Economic Pressure—The New Trilogy. Labor Law Journal. June, 1965.

Gibbons, Gerald R. Price Fixing in Patent Licenses and the Antitrust Laws. Virginia Law Review. March, 1965.

The Goals of Antitrust: A Dialogue on Policy. [Symposium.] Columbic Law Review. March, 1965.

Harris, Robert O. The National Labor Relations Board and Arbitration—The Battle of Concurrent Jurisdictions. Syracuse Law Review. Spring, 1965.

Hickey, Robert John. The Establishment and Administration of Pension Plans in the Labor Relations Process. Vanderbilt Law Review. December, 1964.

Kovarsky, Irving. Congress and Migrant Labor. Saint Louis University Law Journal. Spring, 1965.

————. The Supreme Court and the Secondary Boycott. Labor Law Journal. April, 1965.

Labor-Management: Its Continuing Role. [Symposium.] Current History. July, 1965. Labor-Management: The Story of the Federal Role. [Symposium.] Ibid. June, 1965.

Louis, Martin B. The Scope and Enforcement of Robinson-Patman Act Cease and Desist Orders. Villanova Law Review. Spring, 1965.

Meyer, Burton I. Racial Discrimination on the Jobsite: Competing Theories and Competing Forums. UCLA Law Review. May, 1965.

Miller, Glenn, Frederick A. Zeller, and Robert Miller. Some Factors Affecting the Role of the Public Employment Service. Labor Law Journal. April, 1965.

O'Hara, Francis R. The Foreign Agents Registration Act—"The Spotlight of Pitiless Publicity." Villanova Law Review. Spring, 1965.

Pokempner, Joseph K. Employer Free Speech under the National Labor Relations Act. Maryland Law Review. Spring, 1965.

Pollitt, Daniel H. The National Labor Relations Board and Race Hate Propaganda in Union Organization Drives. Stanford Law Review. March, 1965.

Pomper, Gerald. Labor Legislation: The Revision of Taft-Hartley in 1953-1954. Labor History. Spring, 1965.

Products Liability. [Symposium.] University of Illinois Law Forum. Winter, 1964. [1965.]

Products Liability—A Symposium. Southwestern Law Journal. March, 1965.

Products Liability and the Choice of Law. Harvard Law Review. May, 1965.

Rohan, Patrick J. Condominium Housing: A Purchaser's Perspective. Stanford Law Review. May. 1965.

Sandberg, Charles. Emergency Labor Disputes and the National Interest. Labor Law Journal. June, 1965.

Schmidt, Charles T., Jr. What Is the Current Status of Work Assignment Disputes? Ibid. May, 1965.

Siegel, David D. The Antitrust Civil Process Act: The Attorney-General's Pre-Action Key to Company Files. Villanova Law Review. Spring, Smith, Russell A., and Dallas L. Jones. The Supreme Court and Labor Dispute Arbitration: The Emerging Federal Law. Michigan Law Review. March, 1965.

Styn, Ronald L. The Antidumping Act: Problems of Administration and Proposals for Change. Stanford Law Review. April, 1965.

Tansey, John T., and F. Lee Ruck. Conditional

Broadcasting Licenses: Defining the Legal Perimeters. George Washington Law Review. March, 1965.

Turner, Donald F. Conglomerate Mergers and Section 7 of the Clayton Act. Harvard Law Review. May, 1965.

Tyler, Gus. The Legacy of the Jewish Labor Movement. Midstream. March, 1965.

Health, Education, and Welfare

Colteaux, John H. Hospital Staff Privileges: The Need for Legislation. Stanford Law Review. May, 1965.

Drury, James W. Recent Developments in Financing Public Libraries in Kansas. Governmental Research Center, University of Kansas. 1965.

Harrison, David C. Disposition of Urban Renewal Land to Sectarian Institutions of Higher Learning. Notre Dame Lawyer. April, 1965.

Howe, Florence. Mississippi's Freedom Schools: The Politics of Education. Harvard Educational Review. Spring, 1965.

Mackin, Paul J. Extended Unemployment Benefits. W. E. Upjohn Institute for Employment Research. 1965.

Pfeffer, Leo. The Price We Pay for Federal Aid. Midstream. March, 1965.

Scanlan, James P. The Morality of Deception in Experiments. Bucknell Review. March, 1965.

Symposium: De Facto School Segregation. Western Reserve Law Review. May, 1965.

Warren, J. Michael. Conservation and Rehabilitation of Housing. Michigan Law Review. March, 1965.

Military Affairs and National Security

Congress and the Communist Monolith: Communist-Front Organizations under the Internal Security Act. Yale Law Journal. March, 1965.

Risks of Nuclear Proliferation. [Symposium.] Foreign Affairs. July, 1965.

Rosenwald, Harold. Some Reflections on the Rules of Evidence in Military Courts. Texas Law Review. March, 1965.

Tarr, David W. Military Technology and the Policy Process. Western Political Quarterly. March, 1965.

Government Documents

Congress

House. Committee on Agriculture. Acreage-Poundage Marketing Quotas for Tobacco. Hearings before Subcommittee. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.

—————. Dairymen's Class I Base Plan. Hearings before Subcommittee. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.

- Egg Prices. Hearings before Subcommittee. 89th Cong., 1st. Sess. 1965.

 ———. Committee on Appropriations. Special Hearing on Silver Dollars. Hearings before Subcommittee. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.

 ———. Committee on Banking and Currency. Continuation of Authority for Regulation of Exports and Amending the Export Control Act of 1949. Hearings. Also House Report No. 434. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.

 ————. Housing and Urban Development Act of 1965. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also House Report No. 265. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.

 ————. Inter-American Development Bank Act Amendment. Hearings. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- ————. United States Quota Increase in the International Monetary Fund. Hearings. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- ———. Committee on the District of Columbia. Rapid Rail Transit for the Nation's Capital. Hearings before Subcommittee. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- ———. Committee on Education and Labor. Correctional Rehabilitation Study Act of 1965. Hearing before Subcommittee. Also House Report No. 381. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- ————. Economic Opportunity Amendments of 1965. House Report No. 428. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- Examination of the War on Poverty Program. Hearings before Subcommittee. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- ———. National Vocational Student Loan Insurance Act of 1965. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also House Report No. 308. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- Mine Safety Act. Hearing before Subcommittee. Also House Report No. 181. 89th. Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- Amendments. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also House Report No. 432. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- Coin Shortage. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also House Report Nos. 194, 195. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.

- ————. Federal Public Records Law. Hearings before Subcommittee. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- —————. Further Amending the Reorganization Act of 1949. Hearing before Subcommittee. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1965 (Bureau of Customs). Hearings before Subcommittee. Also House Report No. 311. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- Affairs. Policies, Programs, and Activities of the Department of the Interior. Hearings. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- Amendments. Hearings. Also House Report No. 253. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- Health Staffing, Continuation of Health Programs, and Group Practice. Hearings. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- ——. Committee on the Judiciary. Balance of Payments Voluntary Agreements. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also House Report No. 385. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- Patent Disclosure. Hearings before Subcommittee, 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.

- ——. Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. Oceanography—Ships of Opportunity. Hearing before Subcommittee. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- ———. Public Health Service Hospital Closings. Hearings. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- Exemption of Postal Field Service from the Whitten Amendment. Hearing before Subcommittee. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- Obscene Mail. Hearing before Subcommittee. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- Strengthening Financial Condition of Employees' Life Insurance Fund. Hearing before Subcommittee. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
 - -----. Committee on Public Works. Water

- Pollution Control Hearings on Water Quality Act of 1965. Hearings. Also House Report No. 215. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- ———. Committee on Veterans' Affairs. Legislative Programs of Veterans' Organizations, 1965. Hearings. 89th Cong., 1st. Sess. 1965.
- ———. Committee on Ways and Means. Duty Exemption for Returning American Residents. Hearings. Also House Report No. 366. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- Excise Tax Reduction Act of 1965. House Report No. 433. 89th Cong., 1st Sess.
- ————. Medical Care for the Aged. Hearings. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- Social Security Amendments of 1965. House Report No. 213. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- United States-Canada Automotive Products Agreement. Hearings. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- House and Senate. Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, Senate, and Committee on Education and Labor, House. National Arts and Humanities Foundations. Hearings. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- ——. Joint Committee on the Organization of the Congress. Organization of Congress. Hearings. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- ——. Joint Economic Committee. Background Material on Economic Impact of Federal Procurement—1965. Joint Committee Print. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- Senate. Committee on Aeronautical and Space Sciences. Space Launch Vehicles. Hearings. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- ------. Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. Acreage-Poundage Marketing Quotas for Tobacco. Hearings before Subcommittee. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- Banks. Hearings before Subcommittee. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- ——. Committee on Appropriations. Closing of Veterans' Administration Facilities. Hearings before Subcommittee. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- ——. Committee on Banking and Currency. Amend the Bank Merger Act of 1960. Hearings before Subcommittee. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- ———. Balance of Payments—1965. Hearings before Subcommittee. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.

- —————. Housing Legislation of 1965. Hearings before Subcommittee. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.

- ———. Committee on Commerce. Cigarette Labeling and Advertising. Hearings. Also Senate Report No. 195. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- ———. The Crisis in Passenger Train Service. Hearings. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.

- ——. Committee on the District of Columbia. District of Columbia Home Rule, Delegate to House of Representatives. Hearings. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- ——. Committee on Finance. Du Pont-Christiana. Hearings. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- ———. Social Security. Hearings. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- ———. Committee on Foreign Relations. Foreign Agents Registration Act Amendments. Hearing. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- ———. Committee on Government Operations. Catalog of Federal Aids to State and Local Governments. Committee Print. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- Policy. Hearings before Subcommittee. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- Policy: Selected Readings. Committee Print. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- Act of 1965. Hearings before Subcommittee. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- ______. Investigation into Federally Insured Banks. Hearings before Subcommittee, 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1965 (Bureau of Customs). Hearings before Subcommittee. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- Act of 1949. Hearing before Subcommittee. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- ——. Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. Saline Water Conversion. Hearings before Subcommittee. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- ————. Water Resources Research. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also Senate Report No. 127. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- ——. Committee on the Judiciary. Invasions of Privacy (Government Agencies). Hearings before Subcommittee. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
- Patent Office Fees. Hearing before Subcommittee. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.
 - ----- Voting Rights, Hearings. Also

Senate Report No. 162 (3 parts). 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.

------. Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. Cold War GI Bill—1965. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also Senate Report No. 269. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.

—————. Education of Handicapped Children. Hearing before Subcommittee. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.

Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also Senate Report No. 146. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.

and Youth Offenses Control Act of 1961. Hearings before Subcommittee. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.

———. The Migratory Farm Labor Problem in the United States. Senate Report No. 155. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.

—————. Proposed Closing of Veterans' Hospitals. Hearings before Subcommittee. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.

To Amend the Vocational Rehabilitation Act. Hearings before Subcommittee. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.

Committee on Public Works. Air Pollution Control. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also Senate Report No. 192. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.

Federal Installations, Facilities, and Equipment Pollution Control Act. Hearings and Equipment Pollution Control Act. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also Senate Report No. 128. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.

Water Quality Act of 1965. Hearing before Subcommittee. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.

1965 Cost Estimates for Completion of Interstate and Defense Highway System. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also Senate Report No. 187. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.

-----. Committee on Rules and Administration. Commission on Political Activity of Government Personnel. Hearing before Subcommittee. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.

Proposed Amendments to Rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate (Relating to Cloture). Hearings before Subcommittee. 89th Cong., 1st Sess. 1965.

Other Federal

Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations. Metropolitan Social and Economic Disparities: Implications for Intergovernmental Relations in Central Cities and Suburbs. 1965.

——. Relocation: Unequal Treatment of People and Businesses Displaced by Governments. 1965.

Department of Commerce. Bureau of the Census. City Government Finances in 1963-64. 1965.

———. Compendium of State Government Finances in 1964. 1965.

Governments: 1965. 1965.

———. Governmental Finances in 1963-64. 1965.

______. State Distribution of Public Employment in 1964. 1965.

_____. Summary of State Government Finances in 1964, 1965.

Executive Office of the President, Bureau of the Budget. War on Waste. 1965.

COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT AND CROSS-NATIONAL RESEARCH

Public Liberties in the New States. By David H. Bayley. (Chicago: Rand McNally, 1964. Pp. 152.)

India and Ghana both make use of preventive detention acts. How do these laws compare in their terms, in the use that is made of them, and in the validity of the arguments advanced in their justification? This book provides us with a welcome basis for answering such questions; or at least it gives us a start in that direction. It is not a systematic survey of public liberties in each of the new states; that would be a mammoth undertaking. But under the headings of "Personal Liberty," "Freedom of the Press," "Freedom of Association," "Freedom from Discrimination," "Economic Welfare and Human Rights," and "Agencies of Freedom," it does provide a large amount of descriptive material from many of the new states. Even more importantly, it discusses justifications, providing a considerable basis for evaluating, in the light of more evidence than can be encompassed within this slender volume, the state of public liberties in any given new nation and for reaching an intelligent conclusion as to whether the restrictions that are in effect can be justified. The author's own use of evaluative tools within the limits of the information available to him seems eminently reasonable.

Bayley is well aware of the difficulties: he sees no easy answers: yet he is not a defeatist. A few sentences will help to convey the flavor of his approach. "Since the dedication of the modernizing elite in the developing nations is often in question, democratic theory would lead one to the conclusion that democracy's homeostatic mechanisms are even more essential in the developing than in stable democratic situations. However, for the very reason that these mechanisms are needed, they are likely not to work. Indeed, precisely in order to create the requisites of democratic privileges widely enjoyed, the power of the court system and the effect of free elections may be curtailed." (p. 137) And again: "Those who sincerely try to utilize a measure of autocracy to tutor in freedom must realize that they must continually sow the seeds of their own demise. They are the new colonialists, and the measure of their achievement will be a second revolution of independence in the new states—the independence of the individual within a scheme of human rights." (p. 144) -J. ROLAND PENNOCK, Swarthmore College.

Sequel To Colonialism: The 1957-1960 Foundations for Malaysia. By WILLARD A. HANNA. (New York: American Universities Field Staff, Inc. 1965. Pp. 288. $7.50.)

Mohammed Marx and Marhaen: The Roots of Indonesian Socialism. By Jeanne S. Mintz. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1965. Pp. viii, 246. $6.00.)

These two books are quite different in scope and style, but both add, in their own way, to the gathering collection of material on two Southeast Asian protagonists, Malaysia and Indonesia. Willard Hanna's contribution is primarily a collection of his reports for the American Universities Field Staff on what was then Malaya, Singapore and Borneo. Written between 1957 and 1960, these onthe-spot reports present a panorama of events and places including party politics in Malaya and Singapore, rubber and tin development, early Indonesian-Malayan relations and a series of short descriptions of various places and problems in what became Malaysia. These include studies of Malacca, Brunei, Kuala Lumpur, Kedah, Perlis and the Pangkor racial troubles of 1959.

Hanna's very style is personal, often journalistic and full of editorial asides. There is little trouble in ascertaining his biases, although from the observation point of this reviewer's own prejudices his position is usually correct. Each report is dated and there is a feeling of immediacy about them which adds to the pleasure of reading the book. However, this system also leads to a certain redundancy as different reports re-explain various events. A more serious problem in the compilation of AUFS reports is that events have outdistanced or explained actions or personalities described as of 1957-1960. The use of footnotes or postscripts to explain these changes and clarifications would be of immense use.

One must forgive these minor faults, however, as the author has presented a good deal of valuable material, available previously only to AUFS subscribers. The early chapters display interesting insights into the complicated politics of the area while the last chapters do that as well as providing local portraits comparable to those found in the better travel magazines. Of particular interest are the biographies of Malaysian leaders. Perhaps this book is not always for the scholar, but it is a pleasure to read.

The book of Jeanne Mintz is described as a study of the roots of Indonesian socialism. It is something more than that, including as well a general description of Indonesian history and the political process. The first chapters present a survey of the rise of socialist power and particularly the Communist Party (PKI). This section tends to go over material that has been covered by others such as Brackman and Hindley. There are a number of new insights and the author disagrees with some of the interpretations of others such as George Kahin. A second section deals with the post-independence political parties and the author argues that "neither the doctrine nor the programs of Indonesia's socialist parties are concerned more than peripherally with economic policies," (p. 125). The final section, a study of the growth and pattern of Guided Democracy is one real contribution to our understanding of contemporary Indonesia. This is the first extended description of the operation of Sukarno's scheme and it clarifies a number of points covered only tangentially by other writers.

The book presents a scholarly survey of several vital points of Indonesian politics. A number of the author's interpretations are open to debate, but she usually backs her position with a strong case. Fast-moving events in that country have made some of her points out-of-date while others, such as her remarks on Partai Murba, have been borne out by those events. In the latter case Miss Mintz argued that the strength of Murba was in its relationship to Sukarno. This was later evidenced by the continuation in power of Murba men after the party was suspended. One statement in the conclusion is not supported by the evidence presented in the book when the author states, "Put bluntly [guided democracy] is a cloak for a power struggle, a façade built out of myths and slogans to shield a system of autocratic personalized rule." (p. 225) This may be true but it needs more proof.

Both of these books deserve consideration by the serious student of Southeast Asia.—Fred R. von der Mehden, University of Wisconsin.

Cleavages, Ideologies and Party Systems: Contributions to Comparative Political Sociology.

Edited by Erik Allardt and Yrjö Littunen.

(Helsinki: Transactions of the Westermarck Society, Volume X. Pp. 463. 14.20 Finnmarks.)

After an introductory description of international cooperation in political sociology, by Stein Rokkan, this important mixed bag falls into two major parts-dealing with consensus and cleavage and with party systems and party organizationfurther divided into approximate halves. Under the first major heading, five authors deal with changing conditions of ideology and partisanship: S. M. Lipset on political cleavages in developed and emerging polities, Mark Abrams on British party politics after the end of ideology, Radomir Lukić on political ideology and social development, Yrjö Littunen on social restraints and ideological pluralism, and Erik Allardt's theory of solidarity and legitimacy conflicts. Still under the first heading, three additional papers deal with dimensions of political alignment: Erik Allardt on patterns of class conflict and working class consciousness in Finnish politics, Roger Girod on the geography of the Swiss party system, and Stein Rokkan and Henry Valen on regional contrasts in Norwegian politics. In the second major part of the volume, four authors discuss party systems and the division of political power: S. N. Eisenstadt on bureaucratization, markets, and power structure, Szymon Chodak on societal functions of party systems in sub-Saharan Africa, Jerzy Wiatr's analysis of one-party systems, and Juan Linz' account of the Spanish political system. The final section includes five papers on party organization and patterns of political recruitment: Warren Miller on majority rule and representative government in the United States, Ulf Torgersen on the structure of urban parties in Norway during the late nineteenth century, James Cornford on the adoption of mass organization by the British Conservative Party, Junnosuke Masumi's profile of the Japanese Conservative Party, and Martti Noponen and Pertti Pesonen on legislative careers in Finland.—Marvin Rintala, Boston College.

Russia after Khrushchev. By Robert Conquest. (New York: Praeger, 1965. Pp. viii, 267. $5.00.)

The record indicates that all commentators on Soviet affairs were caught unaware by the sudden downfall of Chairman Khrushchev in October 1964. But some must have been more surprised than others. For since the removal of Khrushchev's major rivals from the ruling group in 1957, a lively dialogue over the nature of his power had occurred in various quarters. Some analysts deductively or intuitively contended that by 1958, Khrushchev had finally emerged as the absolute dictator of Kremlin policy, subject only to such restraints as he might care to impose upon himself. Others rejected this theory of the self-restrained dictator after they had inductively reasoned from contradictions in official conduct that certain associates of Khrushchev were disputing his viewpoint on important questions of policy and personnel, and occasionally thwarting his ambitions. The events surrounding Khrushchev's demise would appear to be more plausible in terms of an ongoing conflict situation like the one hypothesized by representatives of the latter-mentioned school of thought.

One such representative is Robert Conquest, whose Power and Policy in the USSR can profitably serve as a basic text for university courses on the subject. Several of the probabilities about past maneuvers in the Soviet system of closed politics which were stated in that work have, incidentally, been confirmed since its publication in 1961. The aim of Conquest's present book, completed in January 1965, is to offer a detailed appreciation of current-day Soviet realities and set forth the potentialities of national development. The most valuable chapter for purposes of instruction is the concise "Logic of Faction." Here the general laws of Soviet politics are clearly presented with well-deserved emphasis on the top bosses' utter ruthlessness, urge to supreme power, opportunities for negotiation of internal differences, and "general polarization on many essentials between a 'forward' and a 'conservative' attitude." This chapter should indeed be reflected upon by some post graduates in the field of Soviet politics.

The most controversial parts of this engrossing volume relate to political stability and prospects. While outlining numerous perspectives of the future, Conquest yet seems to believe that there are formidable limits to the adaptiveness of any Communist leadership in the USSR and its capacity to control the growing popular impulses toward democratic freedoms. He also has doubts about the leaders' ability permanently to calm their factional tempers. In conclusion, therefore, he does not exclude from the range of possibilities such notions as a breakdown of regime authority, the eruption of autonomous states from the Baltic to Kazakhstan, and a civil war featuring the spectacle of "a group of Central Committee members, like the minority of cardinals during the Great Schism, decamping to Leningrad or Kiev and electing an anti-Presidium!" This type of speculation at least has the merit of prompting discussion about the assumptions of less imaginative forecasters.

My biggest complaint about his writings is that by and large they always tend to minimize the importance of specific quarrels over policy matters in the Soviet hierarchy. Of course, "in general, power takes precedence over policy." But is not power sometimes jeopardized for the sake of imposing one or another policy conception? Concretely, I think misleading the assertion that the proposal of Professor Liberman on the use of a profit index for gauging the efficiency of industrial enterprises was opposed in 1962-63 merely because of "petty quasi-doctrinal habits at a rather superficial level." As spokesmen of the reformist wing of the CPSU argued at the time, Stalin, idol of the inner-party "conservatives," justified the practice of preferential development of heavy industry by making an ideological virtue of the chronic unprofitability of entire branches of that sector of the economy. We may hence infer that the implications of Liberman's profit scheme were disturbing to heavy engineering partisans at the highest level of the dictatorship.

Nonetheless, I respect Conquest's very serious approach to a difficult subject and recommend his latest work to both general readers and area specialists.—Sidney I. Ploss, University of Pennsylvania.

Republic in Suspense: Politics, Parties, and Personalities in Postwar Germany. By Klaus Boel-Ling. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1964. Pp. 276. $6.50.)

The author, a well known former editor of the Berlin daily Der Tagesspiegel, has been the political commentator of the North German Radio Network for a number of years. In this book he presents his readers with a critical-analytical history of the Federal Republic. His commentary accompanies the state in the heart of Europe (Herzland Europas) from the year, nay, from the moment Zero—Surrender 1945—to the accession of the chancellor and architect of the Wirtschaftswunder, Ludwig Erhard.

Perhaps the first and principal fact in German attitude toward the new and certainly rather small state to which the author can point is the affirmative and positive basic element: quite contrary to the average German's position when discussing the much bigger and much less damaged Republic of Weimar of some four decades ago. The Germans of the 9th of November (1918) had been able to pull their country away from the conquerors' grip, after the loss of her overseas possessions—which, by the way, the then victorious nations had since lost by granting independence, and of a few regions in Europe. It must be said, too, that eventually, in the Twenties and beginning Thirties, just before Hitler's coming to power, the Weimar Republic had reached an influence in the field of national and international Kultur Germany never had enjoyed since the days of the Weimar Olympians, Goethe and Schiller, whose great names were to protect the constitutional assembly of 1919—just as Beethoven and Bonn were to arouse kindly thoughts within and without Western Germany for the Federal Republic.

Of course, the defeat of 1945 was so absolutely complete, the country to such a degree tohu wa bohu (without form, and void) that any creative personality would have found a certain measure of adulation and admiration just because of that creative power.

Naturally, it would be an exaggeration to call the occupational authorities of the "allies" creative in—let us say—Nietzsche's sense who equated creativeness with, and even placed it above, moral righteousness. However, no lesser man than the great historian Meinecke applauded the allied endeavors and admonished his fellow Germans to assist the foreign occupiers in their attempt to root out the vestiges of nazism and to reestablish, as it were, to recreate Christian-Occidental morality within the boundaries of the Fatherland.

In the author's presentation, no doubt well justified by the events as they have evolved since, the second phase of German post-war history started with the famous speech that Secretary of State, James Burnes delivered at Stuttgart in September 1946. Boelling is of the opinion that by this speech the United States, with the western allies following, accepted Germany back into the community of the civilized Occident. Already future conflicts with the Soviet Union could be foreseen. Quite naturally, too, the doctrine of the general guilt of all the Germans had shown its weaknesses since the occupiers themselves found many thousands of the guilty nation in jails and concentration camps, although suddenly almost every German proclaimed his hatred for Hitler which he had to hide during the latter's evil reign.

There are arguments possible as to when the third phase of the Federal Republic started—a phase of recovery and prosperity which still is going on. The appointment of Adenauer, the creation of the new currency, the D-Mark, and Erhard's initiation of the Wirtschaftswunder, the joining of the NATO or the EEC:—each of those events enumerated and many others could be used as a starting mark. Yet, there can be no doubt that somehow Adenauer is to be regarded as the Bundesgründer just as Bismarck was to be regarded as the Reichsgründer. Der Alte had the almost charismatic quality of dwarfing all the other political personalities, including his successor. The early death of Kurt Schumacher, the leader of the socialist party, robbed that party and Germany of the only personality to rival Der Alte.

Boelling furnishes an excellent picture of conditions, parties and problems. The chief problem remains reunification which, of course, would close the third phase of the Federal Republic and that Republic itself insofar as it stands just for Western Germany. Reunification remains the loftiest aim of the Federal Republic: it is the latter's raison d'être and because of it Western Germany actually tries to be as democratic and as "western" as possible. It is the status of suspense which—a fascinating contradiction-many friends of Germany, and many good Germans, would like to see lasting as long as possible, practically for many generations to come. Suspense in permanence: it promises a Germany, firmly tied to the west and to western ideals and a peaceful coexistence in Central Europe.

A change in this status of suspense would assure dangerous uncertainty.

Boelling himself advocates a more perfect democratisation of the Federal Republic, a true and faithful adherence of its citizens to the western ideals so that one day both Germanies could be united in peace and liberty with the consent of all nations interested—even of the Soviets.

Here Boelling is carried away by his honorable patriotic feelings. The doctrine of the One Germany (Hallstein) is not backed up by the facts, and there is no doubt that the two Germanies have begun to live separately and go in different directions. The partition of the country is one of the prices the Germans have to pay for tolerating Hitler, adjusting to his reign if not actually backing him up, and enjoying the bygone super-greatness of Greater Germany. No peace treaty with either Germany has been signed yet. However, your reviewer thinks that its stipulations are already carried out somewhat like an effect before its cause.—Robert Rie, State University College, Fredonia, N.Y.

Ulbricht: A Political Biography. By CAROLA STERN. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc., 1965. Pp. xi, 231. $5.95.)

Among the men who control the Communist regimes of Eastern Europe Walter Ulbricht is unique in having held the top position in the DDR from the inception of the Communist regime in East Germany to this day. More than this: in the internecine warfare for position and leadership which went on in the German Communist party in the more than twenty years preceding his rise to power, Ulbricht likewise managed to be always in positions of influence, if not control. What manner of man is he? Is he a political genius, a born leader of men, or an opportunist who knows how to side with the mighty and profit from this?

The book under review, the first biography of Ulbricht in English, and the first political biography-as distinguished from East German panegyrics-in any language, answers this question with great clarity. What Hannah Arendt has called the "banality of evil" has found in Ulbricht its almost perfect Communist realization. Ulbricht is the apparatchik par excellence. He is not that opportunist who seeks power for power's sake; rather he goes for the jugular as "true believer" whose Weltanschuung-"narrow gauge Marxism," as the author calls it-was formed in the pre-World War I socialist educational environment of his youth. To this he has clung ever since. No doubt ever tempted him, and no supervening event, be it Nazism or Stalinism, the partition of Germany or the rise of nuclear powers, could affect his creed. By 1918/19, when the KPD established itself, he was the ready-made revolutionary bureaucrat. As East German boss he still believes that he puts unadulterated Marxism into practice. Whoever criticizes or opposes him is out of step and has to be destroyed. And if, as in 1953, the masses themselves rise against him, the masses must have been misled by "fascist agitators." As Bert Brecht put it at that time: "The people have lost the confidence of the government; therefore, the government dissolves the people."

It had always been like this. In the pre-Hitler period he rose to the top in the fashion customary with Communist parties: through the "apparatus" of the party bureaucracy. He went down to defeat with a party that consistently had taken "the fourth month of revolutionary pregnancy for the ninth." only to reappear, twelve years later, in the rear-guard of the victorious Soviet armies. In the meantime he again had chosen the right way to subsequent success, namely, exile in Moscow rather than in the West. More surprising than his eventual arrival at the top of the DDR leadership in the postwar period was his political survival of de-Stalinization, since he had been the most loyal of all the dictator's henchmen. But he apparently convinced post-Stalin leadership that they could rely on him, and, probably, that there was nobody to replace him. Surely the Moscow leaders are aware of the liabilities which his ruthless, oppressive, unimaginative, and often inept rule constitutes. They seem to be afraid that by sacrificing him they would risk their own control of East Germany. Thus, as the author points out, Ulbricht has always been the perfect "deputy", faithfully serving the precepts and policies of someone higher up, whether Marx and Lenin in the doctrinal sphere or Stalin, Khrushchev et al. in that of power. Only once did he kick, namely, when early post-Stalin leadership seemed to toy with the idea of "liberalizing" East-German rule in preparation for reunification; this is understandable since it would have involved Ulbricht's demise. But again he had placed his bets wisely, since Beria disappeared from the scene shortly thereafter.

Carola Stern's book is the model of a "political biography." It traces Ulbricht's political fate, and therewith that of German-Communism, through all the often incredible shifts and tergiversations of the "line." That there are hardly any intimate, more personal data testifies to the drab, colorless character of a perfect bureaucrat, a "spiritually warped German petty-bourgeois who has been helped to undeserved power by the upheavals of this century." No outstanding—or even mildly original—statement of his remains, but perhaps his memory will survive due to a feature of his outward appearance, his goatee, which gave rise to the immortal ditty:

Ziegenbart und Brille Sind nicht des Volkes Wille.

History sometimes goes in for bad jokes. A Walter Ulbricht the first to put in practice in Germany what the great German socialist dreamed of and hoped for? The incongruity must be clear even to most of those who sympathize with the DDR, and in this there may be some hope for a change.—John H. Herz, City College of the City University of New York.

Social Science Research on Latin America. Edited with a Preface and Introduction by Charles Wagley. (New York and London: Columbia University Press, 1964. Pp. xi, 338. $4.00.)

There must be some kind of law to the effect that the amount of academic concern which is devoted to a given subject varies in direct proportion to the inches of newspaper space directed thereto, and is in no way dependent upon or correlative with the scholarly insights which may be derived from its pursuit. In the case of Latin America, a few hardy specialists spent years trying to persuade a deaf academic world that their region of interest was rich in comparative data which might lead to the uncovering of important understandings about social phenomena. But it was not because of their cries that the community of scholars awoke to the existence of Latin America. It was because, in the spring of 1958, a vice president of the United States was assaulted by a mob; because, on January 1, 1959, Fidel Castro's revolution overthrew the regime of Fulgencio Batista and began a headlong dash into the arms of the U.S.S.R.; and finally, because many Latin Americans seem quite determined that the rest of the Hemisphere should also join the Cuban descent into the Soviet sphere.

In the present book, editor Charles Wagley, anthropologist and Director of the Institute of Latin American Studies at Columbia University, makes frequent allusion to the impact of political events on the development of scholarly interest about Latin America. Latin Americanists should be pleased that the foreign affairs of the United States have had this effect. One cannot but speculate, that so much was missed for so long. Must our academic interest always await the arrival of the morning paper? Is it not possible that valuable hypothesization and even theory may be derived from the comparative study of the political process of State Y, even before they spit on our vice president or threaten to join our opponents?

This volume provides a genuinely useful contribution to the rapidly expanding scholarly work on Latin America. There is an introduction by the editor, along with articles on scholarly literature about Latin American geography (James J. Parsons), historiography (Stanley J. Stein), anthropology (Arnold Strickcon), political science (Merle Kling), economics (Carlos Massad), sociology (Rex Hopper), and law (Kenneth L. Karst).

Wagley's publication statistics reveal that the strongest offerings on Latin America are made by history, anthropology, political science, and geography, in that order, with economics and sociology falling far behind. However, he persists in the belief, quite justified a few years ago, that the Latin-American interest of political scientists still falls behind that of geography. What was a fact now becomes a legend, and the legends die hard.

For the researcher who is concerned with new questions for examination, the book is full of valuable proposals. Almost every chapter contains a long list of rich suggestions for the development of significant research. There are certain topics that recur in each one, though with varying stress: (1) the impact of contemporary concern with methodology on Latin American studies, (2) the principal trends in writing on Latin America, and their proponents, (3) the work of Latin Americans themselves in the field, and (4) possible guidelines for the development of more meaningful research.

With exception of a few passages that are inevitable in a day when widespread misunderstanding of profound methodological proposals has led to the substitution of incomprehensible jargon for significant implementation of the proposals themselves, it is refreshing that this important bibliographical work is generally presented in a lucid style that demonstrates a balanced understanding of the need for scientific caution and care in the use of research tools, but still respects the contributions of older scholars. Most of the writers seem to appreciate that the older approaches to social science research were not so devoid of the virtues of scientism as we are sometimes led to believe; and that the new approaches may not always be so filled with scientific virtue or even so productive of final insight as they claim.

The book possesses a value that is peculiar to its type. It explores the present work of social scientists in a rather untrod field. To this more or less virgin Latin American territory it brings a review of contemporary behavioral method as well as a survey of the traditional literature. In this rather raw frontier of research, it enables us to compare the concerns of political science with those of sister disciplines. Partly because Professor Merle Kling is a Latin Americanist who is well schooled in our modern trends, and partly because scholarly work on Latin American politics and government is now undergoing significant expansion and improvement, the present volume should encourage gratification among political scientists regarding the state of their field in general and of their research on Latin America in particular.

Kling portrays contemporary political science as being aware of modern needs without being dogmatically critical of former contributions; and as having begun a meaningful application of that point of view to the Latin American scene. He omits mention of several works by authors who might have been thought significant; but his lists are not designed to be all-inclusive or exhaustive, and are certainly not intended to be the most important part of his contribution. His proposals for new research in Latin America are among the most potentially fruitful pages in the book.

The book, including Kling's article, is more useful as scholarly comment on a developing field than as bibliography. For that reason, all of its chapters should be extremely useful to all social scientists concerned with Latin America. The knowledge of the work of others in a common area of interest can provide a most significant contribution to comprehension of the needs, shortcomings, and merits of one's own specialty.—James L. Busey, University of Colorado, Colorado Springs.

Federal Government in Nigeria. By EME O. AWA. (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1964, Pp. vii, 349. $8.00.)

Education and Politics in Nigeria. By Hans N. Weiler, Ed. (Freiburg, Germany: Verlag Rombach, 1964, Pp. 294 $9.00.)

Eme Awa's contribution to the growing literature on African government involves a description and analysis of constitutional developments leading to independence, a description of the governments organized under the independence constitution of 1960, and an analysis of what he believes to be Nigeria's major political difficulties. It may be noted that much of the material has been covered elsewhere by the growing corps of Nigerian specialists, and by two Nigerian scholars in particular (see Kalu Ezera's Constitutional Developments in Nigeria, 1960, and Oluwole I. Odumosu's The Nigerian Constitution: History and Development, 1963). However, this is no more to be criticized than the constant appearance of new American government texts. The presentation does not always have the sharpness of other works on the same topics. The major points and the chronology are there, but their significance is often left implicit rather than made explicit. For instance, in dealing with the problems of the viability of the state, it is not emphasized that although British acquisition of territory began in 1862, it was not completed nor was unified administration established until 1914, nor that although independence came in 1960 most of the preparatory work was done during fifteen short years of worldwide tumult and change after 1945. Thus the work lacks some world and African perspective broader than the country itself.

Part I deals with the nature of politics, political parties, and particularly the constitutional development of the Federation of Nigeria. Emphasis is given to the number of ethnic groups, their jealous preservation of cultural and linguistic identity, the slow growth of a common nationalism, the retarded growth of national political parties, and the development of strong regional parties and leaders. The problem of unity is focused in terms of the disagreements over the number of major subdivisions into which the country should be divided. The author contends that it was the division of the country into three tremendous regions by the Richards constitution which was accepted by most Nigerians in the prelude to independence that is responsible for problems of constitutional development today. That tripartite federalism led to extreme regionalism and a weakening of the idea of central authority was evident in the national election debacle of December, 1964. Since this study was completed, however, a new constituent unit called the Mid-Western Region has been carved out of the Western Region bringing the present total to four. Awa gives a detailed analysis of the divisive forces but less attention to developments in national, political, and social integration and support for the central government.

Parts II and III, which in format resemble a typical American Government textbook, very usefully describe the organization, powers, and functions of the federal and regional governments. It is here that the author is at his best.

Part IV returns to the author's recurring theme, the federal relationship in terms of the fears of minorities, and the idea that the regions are too large for the development of national unity.

Hans Weiler's Education and Politics in Nigeria is a laudable bilingual effort to begin to come to grips on an interdisciplinary level with the reciprocal relationship between the development of political institutions and ideas, and the pattern and content of education in the most populous new African state. The editor points out that "a systematic analysis of this relationship under the specific conditions of a new state was considered premature . . ." and that it is a "rather random survey of the various ways in which the mutual relationship between education and politics in a new state may, and actually does, take shape" (p. 14). The book grew out of discussions of some research projects at the Arnold-Bergstraesser Institute at the University of Freiburg.

Phoebe and Simon Ottenberg and Rachel Yeld have looked into segments of Nigerian traditional society to investigate the social and political significance of education from the standpoints of anthropology and sociology. Political scientists Kenneth W. J. Post and James O'Connell examine the role of political groups and institutions in education. The relationship between education and the directions being taken by the new Nigerian elite are the concern of Hugh H. Smythe. Historian Helmuth Peets examines the role of education in British colonial policy and its impact in the present in Nigeria. Leonard John Lewis and Willfried E. Feuser devote their essays to the political implications of the educational system from the educationist point of view.

The essays in English by the Ottenbergs, Yeld, O'Connell, Post, Smythe, and Lewis are followed by summaries in German while English summaries are provided for the essays in German by Peets and Feuser. Also included are selected statistics on education in Nigeria and a selected bibliography on education and educational policy in Nigeria.

Both books are useful analyses of the problems of one of the world's more important new states.

—ROY OLTON, Western Michigan University.

East African Unity Through Law. By Thomas M. Franck. (New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1964. Pp. xi, 184. $7.50.)

"To those people who would wait until the countries [Tanganyika, Kenya and Uganda] are separately independent I say that they do not know human nature. You must rule out the question of federation after we take our seats as sovereign states in the United Nations." With this prophetic statement by Julius Nyerere, Professor Thomas M. Franck closes a significant book on the development of federal institutions in the former British territories of East Africa. Nverere's statement was prophetic because independence brought with it certain conditions that militated against the maintenance and establishment of federal institutions. The author explains that after these countries gained their independence, they began to harden "into the molds of their several sovereignties." In effect, the logic of national politics outweighed the logic of supranational institution and any proposed economic benefits that might derive from them.

Conflicting national interests over the creation of an East African federation were exacerbated by the opposition of Kwame Nkrumah to the scheme. For whatever reason, it appears that his blueprint for implementing the African desire for continental unity is more comprehensive than those of East African leaders such as Nyerere, Kaunda and Mboya. The author, utilizing the models ascribed to David Apter, places Nkrumah in the mobilization design (total mobilization of resources to tackle the continent's problems) and the latter three leaders into the consociational design (building story by story through regional cooperation to accomplish the pan-African mystique).

Opposition to federalism in East Africa was not due entirely to forces unleashed by independence. It was also an unfortunate legacy of the colonial period when federal institutions became equated by the Africans, and perhaps rightfully so, with European domination. A product of this era, too, was an equally persistent opinion held in Uganda and Tanganyika that Kenya would be the beneficiary, at their expense, of any federal union.

The impediments to establishing federalism in the area were many, but lest the impression be given that this is the major thrust of the book, it should be emphasized that the preponderant, and most significant portion, examines the buildingblocks of federation. Indeed, Professor Franck's presentation of events in the colonial period might be best described as a teleological design for federalism. He shows how a common market, free movement of persons, statutory uniformity for such matters as licensing of professions, integrated public services, central banking and a common court of appeal provided the furnishings in this era for "a sophisticated federation." With such a foundation upon which to build federal structures, the writer feels that Britain should have applied pressure to bring about a federation agreement before granting independence to the territories. Certainly, Britain had demonstrated previously little diffidence about intruding into the politics of the area. Whether such pressure would have rendered a successful result is a matter of conjecture, but Britain "held a fairly strong hand in 1960" which would have enabled it to "synchronize the plunge to independence of the East African territories." Such synchronization would have presumably made federalism a more obtainable goal.

The American Society of International Law, under whose auspices the book was written, must be gratified by it. The book is unusual because of the comprehensiveness of its appeal. It is valuable for its historical content and will be a welcome addition to the growing number of histories of Africa. Its contribution to the literature of federalism is most important and should open interesting areas of comparison with the federal and supranational systems in the more developed countries. To the student of British colonial affairs it will be unusually impressive because of the lucid manner in which Professor Franck treats the intricacies of British colonial administration.—CLAUDE D. DAVIS, Texas A. & M. University.

Bantustan: The Fragmentation of South Africa. By Christopher R. Hill. (London, New York: Oxford University Press, 1964. Pp. 112. $2.25.)

As Colin M. Tatz so ably demonstrated in his penetrating work, Shadow and Substance in South Africa: A Study in Land and Franchise Policies Affecting Africans, 1910-1960 (Pietermaritzburg: University of Natal Press, 1962), South African racial policy has been remarkably constant despite the variations in terminology and institutional arrangements. Professor Julius Lewin, the noted South African anthropologist at the University of the Witwatersrand (in Johannesburg). also came to the same conclusion in his unusually incisive volume, Politics and Law in South Africa: Essays on Race Relations (London: Merlin Press Ltd., 1963). Apartheid, for these two students of South Africa, is merely the continuation of traditional policies.

The Government of South Africa, naturally, rejects this point of view and points out that "separate development," a term which it now favors in preference to apartheid, is something altogether different, something better, than the previous policy that the international community found to be so abhorrent. This "new look" is clearly seen in a recent full-page advertisement the Information Service of South Africa placed in the March 31, 1965 issue of the Washington Post which declared that "In South Africa a great new social plan is at work. The creation of a community of politically independent, economically interdependent states.

Basic to this plan is the right of self-determination for each of the different nations, which constitute the multi-national population of South Africa."

The Assistant Director of the Institute of Race Relations in London, Christopher R. Hill, has recently visited the Republic of South Africa and has reported in this slim book on the difficulties and future prospects of the "politically independent, economically interdependent states" for Africans known as Bantustans. Bantustans may be defined as those territories which, over the years, have been reserved for the exclusive residence of the various African tribes in the Republic and which have been, or are scheduled to be, groomed for some type of limited home rule that, at some indeterminate date, may conceivably be transformed into fully independent and sovereign states. They are the institutional devices which the leaders of Afrikaner nationalism and the architects of apartheid hope to use to meet the mounting challenge of African nationalism with its claim for self-determination. In 1963, the Transkei, an African reserve lying on the southeastern coast of the Cape Province, received its grant of self-government, thus becoming the first Bantustan and the pilot project of the whole Bantustan program. This Xhosa-speaking area has its own chief minister, legislature, cabinet, flag, and national anthem, although the locus of real power still resides in Pretoria and Cape Town.

Hill has included in his book a discussion of the theory of apartheid, the practice of apartheid, the economic aspects of the Bantustans, the separate South African universities for the non-whites, the Bantustan experiment in the Transkei, the outlook for similar experiments in the province of Natal, and the prospects of the Bantustan program. In a postscript he deals with the achievements of the 1964 session of the Transkei Legislative Assembly and in two appendices provides information about the system of registration and voting in the Transkei and about the program of the opposition party in the Transkei. The book also contains a map of the African reserves in the Republic and one of the Transkei, as well as a table showing the expenditures contemplated under the Five Year Plan (1961-1965) for the development of African reserves.

The book does have a number of attractive features. First, Hill is able to handle his subject matter in a calm, unemotional manner, which is not altogether easy to do nowadays considering the well-nigh universal distaste for South African racial policies. He is not, however, oblivious to the conspicuous grievances of and hardships endured by the African peoples of South Africa under the rigors of the apartheid system, which all too often has a de-humanizing effect upon such peoples. Second, he is fully cognizant of the economic forces at work which, in the long run, go counter to the aims and plans of the engineers of apartheid. He makes it clear (p. 109) that, over the long run, the new Bantustan program will not prove to be a viable one. Third, he is keenly aware of the interrelationship of this policy to external political forces, such as African nationalism outside the Republic which make their weight felt in the forum of the United Nations, the possibility of sanctions against South Africa, and the possibility of future independence for the three British High Commission territories of Basutoland, Bechuanaland, and Swaziland. Fourth, his survey of African development within the framework of "separate development" includes an absorbing account of the so-called African "tribal colleges" at Turfloop, Fort Hare, and Nygoya which are intended to educate the future élites of the Bantustans. Finally, Mr. Hill provides an interesting and concise description of the drafting of the 1963 Transkei Constitution by the Recess Committee of the Transkei Territorial Authority.

Unfortunately, the book is marred by a number of deficiencies which, in all probability, are due to the haste with which it was published. Some of these shortcomings could be overcome were a second edition of the work issued at a later date. First, the book is not tightly organized enough and should have included chapter sub-headings to enable the general reader to follow the descriptions and the arguments. Second, at several places charts and diagrams could have been used to clarify certain institutional patterns, such as the Bantu Authorities system and the governmental structure of the Transkei. Third, the inclusion of a relatively simple chronology of relevant South African history would have given the work wider appeal for the non-specialist reader. Fourth, although the text is adequately footnoted, no bibliography has been appended. Fifth, Mr. Hill failed to include in the appendices the text of the 1963 Transkei Constitution to which the reader could have referred while attempting to follow his description of that document in the text. Sixth, the writer devoted scant attention to the Five Year Plan for the improvement of the African reserves, political developments in the Northern Transvaal Territorial Authorities, to the disturbances in Pondoland and Sekhukuneland, and to the extremely significant Odendaal Report (which envisages a Bantustan-type development for the Africans of South West Africa). Finally, his brief sketch of the theory of apartheid was altogether too shallow, as was his historical background of the land, labor, and franchise policies affecting Africans. For some unexplained reason, he did not appear to be familiar with some of the common secondary sources on these subjects, such as the one by Tatz mentioned earlier.

This book is not the first to appear on the subject, for it was preceded by Paul Ginewski's Bantustans: A Trek towards the Future (Cape Town: Human & Rousseau, 1961) and possibly by W. A. Bellwood's Whither the Transkei (Cape Town: Howard B. Timmins, 1964), which the reader will find reviewed in African Affairs (London), October, 1964 and January, 1965, respectively. Probably the most comprehensive and authoritative book on the Transkei will be that written by Professors Gwendolen M. Carter, Newell M. Stultz and Thomas G. Karis of Northwestern University, Brown University and C.C.N.Y., respectively, which is to be published in the very near future.-RICHARD DALE, Northern Illinois University.

South Africa: Crisis for the West. By Colin and Margaret Legum. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1964. Pp. 309. $6.95.)

Colin and Margaret Legum are sensitive and perceptive writers of South African origin who are deeply committed to the fight for racial justice in their homeland. Now living in London, they have written a powerful plea for intervention to force the Afrikaner Nationalist Government to abandon its segregationist policy of apartheid before it leads to a disaster with world-wide repercussions. It is a volume of 200 pages of incisive political and economic analysis of the internal power structure in South Africa, followed by a 100-page critique of the arguments for and against the use of sanctions. The Legum's analysis of the power structure is a contribution of permanent value, while the plea for sanctions may soon appear dated.

The book must be judged not as a dispassionate treatise in political science but as a timely and intelligent commentary on a critical issue. As such, it is highly readable and well-informed, and full of illuminating insights. Since the authors are engaged in special pleading, however, their tone is occasionally dogmatic and they naturally tend to avoid qualifications that might weaken their generalizations.

In their analysis of the power structure of "Afrikanerdom," the Legums present a series of short but valuable sketches of the electorate, the Broederbond secret society, the Dutch Reformed Churches, the intellectuals, the Party and its press, financial and special interest groups and the Afrikaner worker. As a good example of how the Afrikaner power structure operates, the authors might have mentioned the way in which Professor N. J. J. Olivier and other reform-minded Afrikan-er intellectuals were purged from the executive of the South African Bureau of Racial Affairs in August 1961.

One of the highlights of the treatment of "English-Speaking South Africa," is the Legum's sharp analysis of the South Africa Foundation, an organization composed mainly of white business leaders who claim to be non-political but really buttress the Government by presenting to the outside world a one-sided version of a booming South African economy.

The authors have attempted to double check the accuracy of their facts, but the statistics on the number of "non-white students in university" (p. 165), in 1963 seem much too low. Although they do not say sc, the Legums thereby imply that the official statistics of the Government are one hundred per cent too high (4837 non-white students vs. the Legum's 2400), which is not plausible.

When they turn to sanctions, the Legums state that they "share the general distaste for economic weapons as a means of settling international disputes," because the consequences of sanctions "cannot be easily foreseen or controlled." But, they contend, it is a question of alternatives—either international economic sanctions or a disastrous race war. The real issue, therefore, is to determine which of these alternatives holds the greater risks for the peoples of South Africa, the international community, and the West.

The argument of the authors contains several assumptions that cannot be substantiated. History may well prove them right, but the decision makers in the United States are not at present willing to employ sanctions on the basis of these assumptions. This is because of such factors as the natural limits of foreign policy in changing things outside our control; the higher priorities of the United States in Europe, Latin America and Asia; the built-in inertia of a giant bureaucracy; the official skepticism about the view that the South African imbroglio could escalate into a world-wide racial conflict; and the fact that the key words in the conservative American climate of opinion are "moderation," "stability," and "orderly progress" -concepts that are cut of tune with the revolutionary realities of Africa today.

Africa changes so rapidly, however, that it may well build up unbearable pressures, forcing the United States to vote for sanctions sooner or later in the U. N. Security Council even though Washington still considers them impractical and unwise. The Legums have many allies in the continuing campaign to develop such pressures.—Vernon McKay, School of Advanced International Studies of The Johns Hopkins University.

The South African Economy. By D. Hobart Houghton. (Cape Town, London, New York: Oxford University Press, 1964. Pp. x, 261. $4.10.)

As a member of the Economic Advisory Council to the Prime Minister of South Africa, Vice-President of the South African Institute of Race Relations, former President of the Economic Society of South Africa, and Professor of Economics at Rhodes University (in Grahamstown, South Africa), D. Hobart Houghton is eminently qualified to discuss the economic structure of the Republic of South Africa.

An exceptionally well-written book, The South African Economy is tightly organized into ten chapters covering such topics as agriculture, African migratory labor, transportation, mining, the balance of payments, manufacturing, wages, the national income, standards of living, foreign trade, labor policy, banking, population, labor, and resources. The central concept around which his analysis of the factors of production in the Republic is structured is taken from Walt W. Rostow's well-known study, The Stages of Economic Growth (A Non-Communist Manifesto), which depicts five levels or steps of economic development ranging from the traditional society to the age of high mass-consumption. The author avers that South African traditional society terminated in 1820, the date of the major wave of British emigration to the Cape. For approximately one hundred and ten years (1820-1933), South Africa remained in the second stage, meeting the variegated pre-conditions for its "economic take-off." The "take-off" into sustained economic growth lasted but a brief twelve years (from 1933 to 1945), and now South Africa has, in his estimation, gotten well into the penultimate stage known as "the drive to maturity," which he predicts will last until approximately 1993.

Professor Houghton is deeply concerned about this "drive to maturity" and elucidates the various obstacles South Africa faces in its search for greater affluence, such as the need to expand the manufacturing sector (to absorb not only the natural population growth but also those South Africans who, in the course of time, will leave mining and subsistence agriculture for other more promising sectors of the economy), to forge ahead with exports, to increase the productivity of the labor force, and, in general, to effect a more desirable allocation of economic resources. He is quite distressed, both as an economist and as a humanist, that "... racial attitudes and the political policies which they inspire will undermine the forces making for economic growth and destroy the momentum towards continuous progress. This would be doubly disastrous, because not only would it involve the sacrifice of higher standards of living so clearly within our grasp, but the possibility of peaceful racial co-existence would be greatly reduced by economic stagnation, poverty and unemployment, which must certainly increase social tensions." (p. 208)

What is the "solution" to these grave problems which this unusually thoughtful economist suggests? His "solution" represents an admirable and realistic synthesis of two schools of South African thought, the southern (or Cape liberal) and northern (or Transvaal, Orange Free State, and often Natal conservative) approaches, which have clashed time and again in South African history (usually to the detriment of the southern position). On the one hand, he endorses the southern position (expressed in part, at least, by the 1948 Fagan Commission Report) that the urbanized, detribalized, industrially oriented African is here to stay and that, in ever so many ways, he is in a pivotal position with respect to the future of South Africa. On the other hand, he does not reject completely the northern viewpoint (which is crystallized in part, at least, by the 1955 Tomlinson Commission Report) that the "true" home of the African is in his traditional tribal areas, such as the Transkei. He is aware of the potential benefits that the Transkei, for example, may offer to a limited number of its Xhosa inhabitants, and his attitude towards the Bantustan program is one of the most cautious optimism. Although he feels that this program can only deal with a relatively small percentage of the Africans in the Republic. it is nonetheless a feasible means of coping with the alarming poverty and inefficient subsistence agriculture of the African peasant.

The author would combine these two approaches by suggesting that the oligarchy of South Africa be gradually transformed into an achievement-oriented, rather than ascriptive-oriented, industrial democracy in which political decision-making power would be shared by all those South Africans, irrespective of race, who are fully committed to the modern exchange economy of the Republic. In addition to this "co-determination" policy, Professor Houghton suggests that the affluence of South Africa be utilized to provide for a more equitable distribution of the national wealth in terms of skills and productivity levels and implies that the "disinherited" of South Africa be extended the fullest opportunity to acquire and expand the necessary education and skills in order to participate in the modern sector of South African life. He realizes, of course, that such a transformation of the South African body politic would both give the modernizing African elites a direct stake in the viability of "their" mother country and would alleviate to no small extent the psychological disabilities (such as alienation or anomie) which beset the urban, Western-oriented African in the Republic. Such a "solution" appears to be practical, just, and remarkably farsighted. It will be interesting to observe the African response to such a proposal as well as that of the South African electorate.

In summary, then, Professor Houghton has done an admirable job of presenting an exceedingly complex subject with marked clarity. His book is undoubtedly one of the finest in the field of South African affairs and should be required reading for all those who are seriously interested in both the problems and prospects of this portion of Africa. The South African Economy is all the more valuable a work because of its complete index, solid bibliography, ample footnotes, numerous charts and graphs, and map. Indeed, it represents South African scholarship at its finest.—RICHARD DALE, Northern Illinois University.

Political Awakening in the Congo. By RENÉ LEMARCHAND. (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1964. Pp. x, 357. $7.95.)

The stormy course of Congolese independence since July, 1960 has served to focus more than usual attention on the Belgian system of colonial administration with its strengths and with its many and glaring shortcomings. In the present volume, Professor Lemarchand sets out "To unravel the tangled skeins of nationalist developments in the Congo during the terminal phase of Belgian colonial rule," and to provide "at least part of the factual and analytical background necessary to an understanding of contemporary developments."

In one aspect, at least, the book succeeds admirably. The presentation of the Belgian colonial structure and, in particular, the organization of the "colonat" vividly outlines the conservative nature of the Belgian business community in the Congo and its absolute blindness to the growth of African nationalism in the surrounding territories. The author cites from a Leopoldville newspaper of 1944 the statement that, "The European element . . . repudiates the principle of democratic equality and the political organization of the colony cannot, therefore, be based on this principle." A decade later, de Maleingreau's proposals for wider representation in the Conseil de Gouvernement revealed an equal insensitivity to the political ambitions of the African élite in the pat statement, "The whites are the sole guides and carriers of the civilization of this country." It is an unfortunate commentary on the acumen of the white community of southern Africa still a decade later that these same words could be echoed by the leader of the white minority party in Rhodesia.

Lemarchand's succeeding chapters on the impact of Western economic forces and on educational policy in the Congo fill in the picture of the Belgian position in the colony in greater detail. His observations on the educational system are particularly apt. In trying to suit education to the special needs and conditions of the Congo he points out that the administration failed to create the supra-ethnic patterns which would have encouraged the growth of a unified nationalist movement whose presence might have prevented the disintegration which followed independence.

The chapters dealing with the genesis and emergence of Congolese political parties and with their organization and operation are less satisfactory. While there can be no question of the difficulty of trying to sketch clearly in a few pages the tangled interaction of parties and personalities in the months preceding independence, Lemarchand's valiant attempt to combine historical account with functional analysis tends to be somewhat confusing rather than illuminating. To sort out the major political attitudes prevalent among African leaders in the pre-independence Congo is a major task which the author has not been able to accomplish fully. There is a tendency, moreover, to cite the views of particular individuals and to assume, without further explanation, that these views necessarily represented those of a larger group. It would appear also that little use has been made of the detailed material on Congolese parties which has appeared over the past two years from CRISP in Léopoldville and which sheds some light on hitherto unexplained facets of political conduct in the Congo.

The volume ends on a note of pessimistic doubt of the ability of the central government to create any sense of national unity in view of the open revolts in the interior and the increasing inroads of subversive foreign influences. Events which have taken place since the book was completed lead to a somewhat more hopeful picture although the deficiences of administration in the Congo may take years to rectify. There appears to be growing acceptance of the Tshombe regime by the members of the African community; Ivory Coast President Houphouët-Boigny's comment that Tshombe is as good a nationalist as Lumumba ever was (and even better because he is "constructive") is indicative of the moderate African view. Internally, Congolese stability is being improved (ironically) by the return of some fifty or more Belgian administrators to their former posts.

In a book otherwise remarkable for its accuracy, there are a number of editorial lapses. Occasional Gallicisms creep into the translations and into the text. It is hard to believe, moreover, that Raymond Scheyven, then Minister of Economic Affairs for the Congo, really did say in commenting on the loi fondamentale, "We have presented the Congolese with a political system similar to ours... where the head of state is irresponsible."

All in all, Lemarchand's analysis of the colonial background to the contemporary Congolese scene is perceptive and original; his material on Congolese parties had already been superseded by more recent and more detailed studies.—L. Gray Cowan, Columbia University.

Morrocco: Problems of New Power. By I. WILLIAM ZARTMAN. (New York: Atherton Press, 1964. Pp. xi, 276. $7.95.)

Destiny of a Dynasty: The Search for Institutions in Morocco's Developing Society. By I. WILLIAM ZARTMAN. (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1964. Pp. xi, 108. $3.00 cloth, $1.00 paper.)

After years of neglect by American scholars, North Africa is at last getting at least a part of the attention it deserves. Professor Zartman's two volumes are valuable additions to the growing list of analyses of Moroccan political development in the years before and after independence. In his Problems of New Power, Zartman has definitely adopted a methodological approach based on decision-making analysis; the second volume under consideration is in large degree composed of two further case studies in the organizational growth of Moroccan government. The latter two cases are more descriptive than those treated in Problems of New Power but the basic analytical structure remains much the same.

The method used in the longer book is to select five specific problems faced by the independent government of Morocco and to trace out in detail the decision-making process used in finding solutions to them. They cover major areas of governmental concern, diplomacy (the evacuation of American bases), the military (organization of the army), economic development (agrarian reform), education as a social problem (the Arabization of primary and secondary education) and politics (the organization of elections). Each of these questions is subjected to close scrutiny to determine not only who was responsible for decisions on them within the government but also the forces which were at work in Moroccan society which influenced those in whose hands the decision-making power lay.

Of the five cases studied, the first, evacuation of American bases, is the most successful in illustrating the complexity of the question and the limitations of choice, both internally and externally imposed, under which the Moroccan decision-makers were forced to operate. The second case, the organization of the army, is an excellent review of the elements present in the problem of the role of the military in the new state and of the personal role in the ultimate decisions played by the crown prince who, "rarely concerned himself with particulars, and when he did, it was with a characteristic impetuousness that was occasionally regrettable." The two cases dealing with economic and social problems are less successful as case studies because their subject matter is less susceptible of concrete delineation and the interplay of forces at work in the decision-making process is therefore less easy to evaluate.

The methodology employed by the author is of substantial help in pointing up the forces behind these decisions and the limited range of choice within which the Moroccan officials were forced to act. The method does not have quite the degree of originality claimed for it; it is hard to believe that, "This book is the first study to use the tools of decision-making analysis to examine an underdeveloped country's government." One has the impression, moreover, that despite the claims made for it, the methodology entails a great deal of purely descriptive writing which is sandwiched in between an opening and closing methodological comment for each chapter.

It is, moreover, somewhat difficult to reconcile the author's stricture in the introduction to Problems of a New Power that, "functional and institutional approaches are not only unhelpful; they are misleading, inappropriate, and suggestive of normative judgments about institutions not yet established" with the statement in the introduction to Destiny of a Dynasty, "It [Destiny] is an analysis of the state's deliberate search for institutions of government during the process of political development." If the institutional approach is really "unhelpful," as the author maintains, why does he contend that, "the approach used in this analysis . . . may even have relevance in a broader sense for studies of non-monarchical forms of government in the process of political development."?

In both volumes the methodological structure is useful, but it would appear to be only a secondary consideration compared to the value of the detailed information which has been assembled on Moroccan development. The study of the monarchy and its evaluation, as well as that of the formation of representative institutions in Morocco provides real insight into the struggle between tradition and modernisation and the value of the stabilizing force provided by the monarchy in a difficult period of transition. One might regret that other African states did not have a modernizing monarchy upon which to rely; it is clear that the charismatic nationalist leader is no substitute for a traditional ruler who can command the national respect given to the King of Morocco, at least in terms of the maintenance of post-independence stability of the regime.—L. GRAY COWAN, Columbia University.

Nationalism and Revolution in Egypt: the Role of the Muslim Brotherhood. By Christina Phelps Harris. (The Hague, London, Paris: Mouton & Co. for the Hoover Institution on War, Revolution, and Peace. Pp. 277.)

The Muslim Brotherhood was founded in 1928 by an Egyptian provincial school teacher named Hasan al-Banna, a fundamentalist who believed that Islam was being fatally undermined by the spread of European ideas and practices in Egypt and that as in past centuries Islam, as a system of social as well as theological prescriptions, must be regarded as the basis of a self-contained civilization. As the Brotherhood grew rapidly in strength it expanded its activities from religious preaching into educational, social welfare, industrial, and eventually political fields. In the latter the ardor of its mass following, its conspiratorial organization, its totalitarian aims, and Banna's leadership enabled the Brotherhood to emerge after 1945 as a powerful revolutionary force in an ill-governed country demoralized by severe economic and social problems. After the Brotherhood had assassinated two Egyptian prime ministers and the chief of the Cairo police. Banna was murdered in revenge in 1949. His successors survived to challenge the military regime of Gamal Abdul Nasser after the 1952 revolution, until in 1954 an attempt on Nasser's life led to the forcible suppression of the Brotherhood. Six of the leaders were hanged and hundreds of others jailed.

Apart from brief treatment of the Brotherhood's ideas and activities in various book chapters and articles, there have been only two substantial western-language studies: J. Heyworth-Dunne's Religious and Political Trends in Modern Egypt, admirably done but published four years before the Brotherhood's demise and long out of print, and the abominably translated English version of I. M. Husaini's detailed but one-sided apologetic, The Moslem Brethren: the Greatest of Modern Islamic Movements (1956). A Ph.D. dissertation on the Brotherhood written some years ago by Professor R. P. Mitchell of the University of Michigan, when eventually published, should become the definitive work on the subject.

In the meantime, while we wait for Mitchell's book, Professor Harris has provided an acceptable summary of some of the previously published research. Only the last 100 pages deal with the Brotherhood itself: the majority of the space is filled by three preliminary chapters. Two of these recount, along familiar lines, the main events of Egyptian diplomatic and political history from 1798 to about 1930; the third describes several of the main currents and issues of modern Islamic reform. These chapters are intended to set the rise of the Muslim Brotherhood in historical perspective, and to project it as the culmination of the growth of both political and religious sentiments of intransigeance against the western penetration of Egypt. This is an unexceptionable theme, but the diffusion of the author's attention in the first two chapters (competent though they are) and the lack of critical analysis in the third, tend to dissipate their relevance.

The most useful, though less well written, part of the book is the section on the Brotherhood itself, since here the material is not as widely familiar. These chapters present a good summary of Hasan al-Banna's career and describe the Brotherhood's organization, activities, and ideas. Here the author makes a number of sensible points. One is that the Brotherhood's economic enterprises and social welfare programs served to demonstrate their conviction that the Islamic religious commitment should inspire rather than retard material progress and social conscience. Related to this is her point that the Brotherhood and the military junta were natural rivals, not only as conspiratorial militants, but as purveyors of social and economic regeneration. But while the Brotherhood demanded a specifically Islamic form of government, they never made clear what they meant by this. Nor did they explain satisfactorily how a purely Islamic legal system could meet modern needs. Consequently, what was nominally a conflict of principles between them and the officers may better be viewed as simply a power struggle. The author stretches her point too far, however, in suggesting that it was anomalous for Muslim fundamentalists to use such western devices as printing presses and microphones. Finally, few will disagree with her that the Brotherhood's resort to terrorism was unconstructive.

The passages dealing with the 1952-1954 period appear to have been written no later than 1956, and much of the description and evaluation of Nasser's regime is badly out of date.—Malcolm H. Kerr, University of California, Los Angeles.

Independent Black Africa: The Politics of Freedom. Edited by William John Hanna. (Chicago: Rand McNally Co., 1964. Pp. 651.)

Thirty-two essays on various aspects of contemporary African politics by such authors as James Coleman, Thomas Hodgkin, David Apter, Lucian Pye, Edward Shils, Tom Mboya, and Julius Nyrere.—A. R.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON

COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT AND CROSS-NATIONAL RESEARCH

RICHARD L. MERRITT, WITH ELLEN B. PIRRO Yale University

General

Argyle, Michael and Peter Delin. Non-universal Laws of Socialization. Human Relations. 18:1 (February 1965), 77-86.

Guttman, Allen. Political Ideals and the Military Ethic. American Scholar. 34:2 (Spring 1965), 221-37.

Milne, R. S. Elections in Developing Countries. Parliamentary Affairs. 18:1 (Winter 1964-65), 53-60.

Sayre, Wallace S. Bureaucracies: Some Contrasts in Systems. Indian Journal of Public Administration. 10:2 (April-June 1964), 219-29.

Shils, Edward. Charisma, Order, and Status. American Sociological Review. 30:2 (April 1965), 199-213.

Willner, Ann Ruth and Dorothy Willner. The Rise and Role of Charismatic Leaders. Annals of the American Academy. Vol. 358 (March 1965), 77-88.

Zielinski, Janusz G. Centralization and Decentralization in Decision-Making. Economics of Planning. 3:3 (December 1963), 196-208.

Elites

Bobrow, Davis B. Soldiers and the Nation-State. Annals of the American Academy. Vol. 358 (March 1965), 65-76.

Van Riper, Paul P. and Darab B. Unwalla. Military Careers at the Executive Level. Administrative Science Quarterly. 9:4 (March 1965), 421-36.

——. Voting Patterns Among High-Ranking Military Officers. Political Science Quarterly. 80:1 (March 1965), 48-61.

Political Development

Ashford, Douglas E. Bureaucrats and Citizens. Annals of the American Academy. Vol. 358 (March 1965), 89-100.

Halpern, Manfred. The Rate and Costs of Political Development. Annals of the American Academy. Vol. 358 (March 1965), 20-28.

Huntington, Samuel P. Political Development and Political Decay. World Politics. 17:3 (April 1965), 386-430.

Ivanov, K. National-Liberation Movement and Non-Capitalist Path of Development. International Affairs (USSR). No. 5 (May 1965), 56-66.

Lauterbach, Albert. Government and Development. Journal of Inter-American Studies. 7:2 (April 1965), 201-26.

Levy, Marion J., Jr. Patterns (Structures) of Modernization and Political Development. Annals of the American Academy. Vol. 358 (March 1965), 29-40.

Malenbaum, Wilfred. Economic Factors and Political Development. Annals of the American Academy. Vol. 358 (March 1965), 41-51.

Politics of a Single-Party State. Round Table. No. 217 (December 1964), 30-39.

Pye, Lucian W. The Concept of Political Development. Annals of the American Academy. Vol. 358 (March 1965), 1-13.

Riemer, Neal. Democratic Theory and the New States: The Dilemma of Transition. Bucknell Review. 13:1 (March 1965), 1-16.

Silvert, K. H. Parties and the Masses. Annals of the American Academy. Vol. 358 (March 1965), 101-8.

Symmons-Symonolewicz, Konstantin. Nationalist Movements: An Attempt at a Comparative Typology. Comparative Studies in Society and History. 7:2 (January 1965), 221-30.

Szulc, Tad. The Latin American Revolution. Colorado Quarterly, 13:4 (Spring 1965), 369-78.

Vorys, Karl von. Toward a Concept of Political Development. Annals of the American Academy. Vol. 358 (March 1965), 14-19.

Weiner, Myron. Political Integration and Political Development. Annals of the American Academy. Vol. 358 (March 1965), 52-64.

Cross-National Research

Chu, Godwin C. Problems of Cross-Cultural Communication Research. Journalism Quarterly. 41:4 (Autumn 1964), 557-62.

Cutright, Phillips. Political Structure, Economic Development, and National Social Security Programs. American Journal of Sociology. 70:5 (March 1965), 537-50.

Ellis, William W. and John Salzberg. Africa and the U.N.: A Statistical Note. American Behavioral Scientist. 8:8 (April 1965), 30-32.

Fagen, Richard R. Mass Media Growth: A Comparison of Communist and Other Countries. Journalism Quarterly. 41:4 (Autumn 1964), 563-67.

 Countries. Journalism Quarterly. 41:1 (Winter 1964), 87-94.

Hall, Margaret and Christopher Winsten. Variations in Regional Averages of Census Data—Methodological Study. Review of Economics and Statistics. 47:1 (February 1965), 54-64.

Kahl, Joseph A. Some Measurements of Achievement Orientation. American Journal of Sociology. 70:6 (May 1965), 669-81.

Liu, William T. Achievement Motivation Among Chinese Youth in Southeast Asia. Asian Survey. 5:4 (April 1965), 186-96.

McClelland, David C. Padrões Motivadores No Sudeste Da Ásia Com Especial Referência Ao Caso Chinês. Sociologia. 26:3 (September 1964), 307-20.

Nixon, Raymond B. Freedom in the World's Press. Journalism Quarterly. 42:1 (Winter 1965), 3-14.

Onishi, Akira. Aggregate Economic Projections for the Developing Asian Countries. Developing Economics, 2:3 (September 1964), 254-70.

Wolfe, Wayne. Images of the United States in the Latin American Press. Journalism Quarterly. 41:1 (Winter 1964), 79-86.

Young, Frank W. and Isao Fujimoto. Social Differentiation in Latin American Communities. Economic Development and Cultural Change. 13:3 (April 1965), 344-52.

The United States and Canada

Scarrow, Howard A. Distinguishing between Political Parties—The Case of Canada. Midwest Journal of Political Science. 9:1 (February 1965), 61-76.

Latin America

Alexander, Robert J. Democratic Revolution in Venezuela. Annals of the American Academy. Vol. 358 (March 1965), 150-58.

Debrun, Michel. Nationalisme et politiques du développement au Brésil. Sociologie du Travail. 6:4 (October-December 1964), 351-80.

Estep, Raymond. The Latin American Nations Today: A Study of Political Developments since World War II. (Air University Documentary Research Study AU-284-19-RSI, 1964).

Furtado, Celso. Political Obstacles to Economic Growth in Brazil. International Affairs. 41:2 (April 1965), 252-66.

Halperin, Ernst. Racism and Communism in British Guiana. Journal of Inter-American Studies. 7:1 (January 1965), 95-134.

Johnson, Kenneth F. Political Radicalism in Colombia: Electoral Dynamics of 1962 and 1964. Journal of Inter-American Studies. 7:1 (January 1965), 15-26.

Lauterbach, Albert. Government and Development: Managerial Attitudes in Latin America. Journal of Inter-American Studies. 7:2 (April 1965), 201-25.

Lipman, Aaron. Social Backgrounds of the Bogotá Entrepreneur. Journal of Inter-American Studies. 7:2 (April 1965), 227-36.

McNelly, John T. and Eugenio Fonseca. Media Use and Political Interest at the University of Costa Rica. Journalism Quarterly. 41:2 (Spring 1964), 225-31.

Needler, Martin. Cabinet Responsibility in a Presidential System: The Case of Peru. Parliamentary Affairs. 18:2 (Spring 1965), 156-61.

Paulson, Belden H. Local Political Patterns in Northeast Brazil: A Community Case Study. (Madison, College of Agriculture, University of Wisconsin, 1964).

Ranis, Peter. Background to the 1965 Argentine Elections. World Today. 21:5 (May 1965), 198-209.

Snow, Peter B. Parties and Politics in Argentina: The Elections of 1962 and 1963. Midwest Journal of Political Science. 9:1 (February 1965), 1-36.

Sternberg, Hilgard O'Reilly. Brazil: Complex Giant. Foreign Affairs. 43:2 (January 1965), 297-311.

Therry, Leonard D. Dominant Power Components in the Brazilian University Student Movement Prior to April, 1964. Journal of Inter-American Studies. 7:1 (January 1965), 27-48.

The Transformation of the Political, Legal, and Social Systems of Suppressed Peasant Societies: The Vicos Case. American Behavioral Scientist. 8:7 (March 1965), 3-28.

Tugwell, Franklin. The Christian Democrats of Venezuela. Journal of Inter-American Studies. 7:2 (April 1965), 245-67.

Whitten, Norman E., Jr. Power Structure and Sociocultural Change in Latin American Communities. Social Forces. 43:3 (March 1965), 320-29.

Williamson, Robert C. Toward a Theory of Political Violence: The Case of Rural Colombia. Western Political Quarterly. 18:1 (March 1965), 35-44.

Western Europe

Kirchheimer, Otto. Der Wandel des Westeuropäischen Parteisystems. Politische Vierteljahresschrift. 6:1 (March 1965), 20-41.

Nadelmann, Kurt H. Non-Disclosure of Dissents in Constitutional Courts: Italy and West Germany. American Journal of Comparative Law. 13:2 (Spring 1964), 268-76.

The United Kingdom

Banks, Margaret A. Privy Council, Cabinet, and

Ministry in Britain and Canada. Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. 31:2 (May 1965), 193-205.

Barker, Anthony. 'The Most Important and Venerable Function': A Study of Commons Supply Procedure. Political Studies. 13:1 (February 1965), 45-64.

Bean, R. Militancy, Policy Formation and Membership Opposition in the Electrical Trades Union. Political Quarterly. 36:2 (April-June 1965), 181-90.

Bromhead, Peter. The British Constitution in 1964. Parliamentary Affairs. 18:2 (Spring 1965), 133-48.

Burrows, Henry. House of Lords—Change or Decay? Parliamentary Affairs. 17:4 (Autumn 1964), 403-17.

Hampton, William. Parliament and the Civil Service. Parliamentary Affairs. 17:4 (Autumn 1964), 430-38.

Hanson, A. H. The Purpose of Parliament, Parliamentary Affairs. 17:3 (Summer 1964), 279-95.

Jones, G. W. The Prime Minister's Power. Parliamentary Affairs. 18:2 (Spring 1965), 167-85.

Nettl, J. P. Consensus or Elite Domination: The Case of Business. Political Studies. 13:1 (February 1965), 22-44.

O'Leary, Cornelius. The Wedgwood Benn Case and the Doctrine of Wilful Perversity. Political Studies. 13:1 (February 1965), 65-78.

Punnett, R. M. The House of Lords and Conservative Governments 1951-64. Political Studies. 13:1 (February 1965), 85-88.

——. The Labour Shadow Cabinet, 1955-64. Parliamentary Affairs. 18:1 (Winter 1964-65), 61-70.

Schneider, Franz. Kabinettsreform und Machtverteilung in England. Zeitschrift für Politik. 12:1 (February 1965). 40-56.

Steck, Henry J. The Re-emergence of Ideological Politics in Great Britain: The Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament. Western Political Quarterly. 18:1 (March 1965), 87-103.

Windlesham, Lord. The Communication of Conservative Policy 1963-64. Political Quarterly. 36:2 (April-June 1965), 164-80.

France

Adam, Gérard. De la C.F.T.C. à la C.F.D.T. Revue Française de Science Politique. 15:1 (February 1965), 87-103.

Dreyfus, F. G. Un groupe de pression en action: Les syndicats universitaires devant le projet Billères de réforme de l'enseignement (1955-1959). Revue Française de Science Politique. 15:2 (April 1965), 213-50.

Emeri, Claude. Les institutions de la Ve République: état des travaux. Revue Française de Science Politique. 15:2 (April 1965), 297-330.

Hayward, J. E. S. Presidentialism and French Politics. Parliamentary Affairs. 18:1 (Winter 1964-65), 23-39.

King, Jerome B. Constitutionalism and the Judiciary in France. Political Science Quarterly. 80:1 (March 1965), 62-87.

Lancelot, Alain and Jean Ranger. Développements récents de la recherche électorale en France. Politico. 29:4 (December 1964), 763-86.

Lavau, Georges. Les clubs politiques. Revue Française de Science Politique. 15:1 (February 1965), 103-13.

Lehner, Gunthar. Jenseits von "Thron und Altar"—Religion und Politik in Frankreich heute. Frankfurter Hefte. 19:10, (October 1964), 691-98.

------.Jenseits von "Thron und Altar"—Religion und Politik in Frankreich heute. Frankfurter Hefte. 19:11 (November 1964), 780-84.

Moreau, Jacques. Le choix du M.R.P. Revue Française de Science Politique. 15:1 (February 1965). 67-86.

Smith, Alexander T. Algeria and the French Modérés: The Politics of Immoderation? Western Political Quarterly. 18:1 (March 1965), 116-34.

Williams, Philip M. De Gaulle's Challenger. Parliamentary Affairs. 17:3 (Summer 1964), 269-78

West Germany

Alleman, Fritz René. Election in West Germany. World Today. 21:5 (May 1965), 179-88.

Dirks, Walter. Das gesellschaftspolitische Engagement der deutschen Katholiken seit 1945. Frankfurter Hefte. 19:11 (November 1964), 761-73

Flechtheim, Ossip K. The Dismantling of Democracy in West Germany 1949-1964. German Foreign Policy (East Germany). 4:1 (1965), 72-76.

Härtling, Peter and Hellmut Jaesrich, ed. Die Bundesdeutschen: A Symposium. Monat. 17:200 (May 1965).

Lutz, Burkart. Les syndicats allemands au début des années 60. Sociologie du Travail. 6:1 (January-March 1964), 63-79.

Meyn, Hermann. Die Deutsche Partie—Ursachen des Scheiterns einer national-konservativen Rechtspartie im Nachkriegsdeutschland. Politische Vierteljahresschrift. 6:1 (March 1965), 42-57.

Parodi, Jeanne. Les doctrines économiques socialistes et l'action syndicale dans le mouvement ouvrier allemand d'aujourd'hui. Sociologie du Travail. 6:3 (July-September 1964), 279-95.

Public and Co-operative Economy in the Federal Republic of Germany: A Symposium. Annals of Public and Co-operative Economy. 36:1 (January-March 1965), 3-102.

Rézette, Robert. Le rôle des syndicats d'Allemagne de l'Ouest en tant que chefs d'entreprises. Revue Economique. 16:2 (March 1965), 276-92.

Richebächer, Kurt. Why Germany Missed Inflation. Banker. 65:468 (February 1965), 90-96.

Schuster, Hans. Bundesrepublikanische Geschichte im Zwischenakt. Merkur. 19:4 (April 1965), 301-17.

Vardys, V. Stanley. Germany's Postwar Socialism: Nationalism and Kurt Schumacher (1945-52). Review of Politics. 27:2 (April 1965), 220-44.

Will, Günter. Innere Führung. Wehrwissenschaftliche Rundschau. 15:2 (February 1965), 90-99.

Zeuner, Bodo. Zwischen Prinzipientreue und Pragmatismus. Frankfurter Hefte. 19:9 (September 1964), 607-14.

Italy

Alix, Christine. Le conflit du Haut-Adige. Revue Française de Science Politique. 15:2 (April 1965), 270-79.

Caranti, Elio. Le Amministrative del 22 novembre. Civitas. 16:1-2 (January-February 1965), 37-80.

Elections of November 1964. Italy, Documents and Notes. 13:6 (November-December 1964), 497-501.

Esposti, Gianluigi Degli. Le Giunte impossibili. Mulino. 14:2 (February 1965), 115-23.

Lamberg, Robert F. Das politische Testament Palmiro Togliattis. Aussenpolitik. 15:12 (December 1964), 849-56.

Lauzi, Giorgio. CGIL, socialisti e programmazione. Ponte. 21:2 (February 1965), 155-66.

Lepsius, M. Rainer. Immobilismus: das System der sozialen Stagnation in Süditalien. Jahrbücher für Nationalökonomie und Statistik. 177:4 (April 1965), 304-42.

Silverman, Sydel F. Patronage and Community-Nation Relationships in Central Italy. Ethnology. 4:2 (April 1965), 172-89.

Sindicati e programmazione nella fase attuale del capitalismo italiano. Tempi Moderni. 7:4 (July-September 1964), 7-74.

Tamburrano, Giuseppe. Strategia e dottrina del Partito socialista italiano dal 1956 ad oggi. Tempi Moderni. 7:4 (October-December 1964), 5-24.

Vochting, Friedrich. Die Frage einer Weiterführung der italienischen Südpolitik. Jahrbücher für Nationalökonomie und Statistik. 177:2 (February 1965), 118-31.

Zariski, Raphael. Intra-Party Conflict in a Dominant Party: The Experience of Italian Christian Democracy. Journal of Politics. 27:1 (February 1965), 3-34.

Other

Miguel, Amando de, and Juan Linz. Bureaucratisation et pouvoir dischétionnaire dans les entreprises industrielles espagnoles. Sociologie du Travail. 6:3 (July-September 1964), 258-78.

Miller, Kenneth E. The Danish Electoral System. Parliamentary Affairs. 18:1 (Winter 1964-65), 71-81.

Modiano, Mario S. Greek Political Troubles. World Today. 21:1 (January 1965), 33-42.

Symposium on Current Belgian Politics. Revue générale belge. 101:1 (January 1965), 17-98.

The Soviet Union and Eastern Europe

Chaudhuri, M. K. Problems of Perspective Planning in the German Democratic Republic. Economics of Planning, 4:2 (1964), 105-13.

Garthoff, Raymond. Military Power in Soviet Policy. Studies on the Soviet Union. 4:2 (1964), 5-18.

Harvey, Mose L. The Post-Khrushchev Soviet Leadership: Dilemmas and Alternatives. Orbis. 8:4 (Winter 1965), 745-60.

Heiman, Leo. New Soviet Leaders. Military Review. 45:4 (April 1965), 45-50.

Huebbenet, Georg von. Kossygin und die Industrie-Prioritäten. Aussenpolitik. 15:12 (December 1964), 843-48.

Keren, Michael. Industrial vs. Regional Partitioning of Soviet Planning Organization: A Comparison. Economics of Planning. 4:3 (1964), 143-60.

Kroef, Justus M. van der. The Communist Concept of "National Democracy." Studies on the Soviet Union. 4:2 (1964), 39-63.

Law and Legality in the USSR: A Symposium. Problems of Communism. 14:2 (March-April 1965), 1-144.

Majstrenko, I. W. Soviet Agricultural Policy After Khrushchev. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. 12:5 (May 1965), 22-25.

Maksimović, Ivan. Constitutional Socialism in Yugoslavia. Annals of the American Academy. Vol. 358 (March 1965), 159-69.

McFarlane, B. J. and I. Gordijew. Profitability and the Soviet Firm. Economic Record. 40:92 (December 1964), 554-68.

Mitzscherling, Peter. Zur Entwicklung der sozialen Struktur der mitteldeutschen Bevolkerung. Vierteljahrshefte zur Wirtschaftsforschung. :3 (1964), 281-301.

Prybyla, Jan S. The Economic Problems of Soviet Russia in Transition. Indian Journal of Economics. 45:177 (October 1964), 133-52.

Roustang, Guy. Développement Economique de l'Allemagne Orientale. Documents. 19:4 (July-August 1964), 69-75.

Schlesinger, Rudolph. Kontinuität und Dynamik in der Sowjetgesellschaft. Osteuropa. 15:1-2 (January-February 1965), 16-25.

Secomski, Kazimierz. On the Essence of Socialist Planning in Poland. Social Science Information. 3:4 (December 1964), 30-48.

Skrzypek, Stanislaw. The Political, Cultural, and Social Views of Yugoslav Youth. Public Opinion Quarterly. 29:1 (Spring 1965), 87-106.

Voronitsyn, S. The Social Stratification of the Working Class in the USSR. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. 12:4 (April 1965), 28-34.

Whiting, Kenneth R. The Debate Between Khrushchev and his Marshals. Air University Review. 16:3 (March-April 1965), 68-79.

Wolfe, Thomas W. Note on the Naming of a Successor to Marshal Birinzov. (RAND Corporation Paper P-3025, 1964).

Middle East and North Africa

Ayoub, Victor F. Conflict Resolution and Social Organization in a Lebanese Village. Human Organization. 24:1 (Spring 1965), 11-17.

Crawford, Robert W. Cultural Change and Communications in Morocco. Human Organization. 24:1 (Spring 1965), 73-77.

Gulick, John, ed. Dimensions of Cultural Change in the Middle East: A Symposium. Human Organization. 24:1 (Spring 1965), 1-104.

Howard, Harry N. Changes in Turkey. Current History. 48:285 (May 1965), 296-300.

Jabri, Marwan. Dilemma in Iran. Current History. 48:285 (May 1965), 277-80.

Langenderfer, Harold Q. The Egyptian Executive: A Study in Conflict. Human Organization. 24:1 (Spring 1965), 89-95.

Leiden, Carl. Political Instability in Syria. Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. 45:1 (March 1965), 353-60.

Lenczowski, George. Iraq: Seven Years of Revolution. Current History. 48:285 (May 1965), 281-89.

Nader, Laura. Communication Between Village and City in the Modern Middle East. Human Organization. 24:1 (Spring 1965), 18-24.

Sayigh, Rosemary. The Bilingualism Controversy in Lebanon. World Today. 21:3 (March 1965), 120-30.

Schuster, James R. Bureaucratic Transition in Morocco. Human Organization. 24:1 (Spring 1965), 53-58.

Stycos, J. Mayone. The Potential Role of Turkish Village Opinion Leaders in a Program of Family Planning. Public Opinion Quarterly. 29:1 (Spring 1965), 120-30.

Torrey, Gordon H. Nasser's Egypt. Current History. 48:285 (May 1965), 290-95.

Vernier, Bernard. Le rôle politique de l'armée de Syrie. Politique Etrangère. 29:5-6 (May-June 1964), 458-517.

Westwood, Andrew F. Politics of Distrust in Iran. Annals of the American Academy. Vol. 358 (March 1965), 123-35.

Willner, Dorothy. Politics and Change in Israel: The Case of Land Settlement. Human Organization. 24:1 (Spring 1965), 65-72.

Africa

Alberich, Julio Cola. La Explosiva Inestabilidad Africana. Revista de Politica Internacional. No. 77 (January-February 1965), 57-75.

Anglin, Douglas G. Brinkmanship in Nigeria: The Federal Elections of 1964-65. International Journal. 20:2 (Spring 1965), 173-88.

Ashford, Douglas E. The Elusiveness of Power: The African Single Party State. (Cornell Research Papers in International Studies. 3, 1965).

Azikiwe, Nnamdi. Essentials for Nigerian Survival. Foreign Affairs. 43:3 (April 1965), 447-61.

Berghe, Pierre L. van den. The Role of the Army in Contemporary Africa. Africa Report. 10:2 (March 1965), 12-17.

Blunt, M. E. "Carpet-crossing" (Nigeria). Parliamentary Affairs. 18:1 (Winter 1964-65), 82-91.

Bourlon, A. L'évolution politique du Sénégal. L'afrique et l'Asie. No. 4 (1964). 23-41.

Brown, Richard. Zambia and Rhodesia: A Study in Contrast. Current History. 48:284 (April 1965), 201-206.

Cliffe, Lionel. Tanzania: Myth and Reality. Current History. 48:284 (April 1965), 219-25.

Folson, B. D. G. Coussey and Local Government Structure in Ghana. Economic Bulletin of Ghana. 8:1 (1964), 3-17.

Glickman, Harvey. One-Party System in Tanganyika. Annals of the American Academy. Vol. 358 (March 1965), 136-49.

Harris, Richard. Nigeria: Crisis and Compromise. Africa Report. 10:3 (March 1965), 25-31.

Heron, Alastair. Zambia: Key Point in Africa. World Today. 21:2 (February 1965), 83-88.

Lemarchand, René. Village-by-Village Nation Building in Tanzania. Africa Report. 10:2 (February 1965), 11-13.

Le Quesne, C. M. French West Africa. African Affairs. 64:2 (April 1965), 78-90.

Lovell, Colin Rhys. The Republic of South Africa. Current History. 48:284 (April 1965), 226-40.

Murray, J. P. Zambia and the Future. African Affairs. 64:254 (January 1965), 17-24.

Peil, M. Ghanaian University Students: The Broadening Base. British Journal of Sociology. 16:1 (March 1965), 19-28.

Skurnik, Walter A. E. New Motifs in West Africa. Current History. 48:284 (April 1965), 207-12.

Whitaker, C. S. Three Perspectives on Hierarchy: Political Thought and Leadership in Northern Nigeria. Journal of Commonwealth Political Studies. 3:1 (March 1965), 1-19.

Zolberg, Aristide R. The Political Revival of Mali. World Today. 21:4 (April 1965), 151-59.

South and Southeast Asia

Allen, Richard. Recent Developments in Burma. Royal Central Asian Journal. 52:1 (January 1965), 6-19.

Ayub Khan, Mohammed. A New Experiment in Democracy in Pakistan. Annals of the American Academy. Vol. 358 (March 1965), 109-13.

Bhattacharya, S. Burma: Neutralism Introverted. Australian Quarterly. 37:1 (March 1965), 50-61.

Bombwall, K. R. The Finance Commission and Union-State Relations in India. Indian Journal of Public Administration. 10:2 (April-June 1964), 278-90.

Dasgupta, Satadal. Communication and Innovation in Indian Villages. Social Forces. 43:3 (March 1965), 330-37.

Farmer, B. H. Nine Years of Political and Economic Change in Ceylon. World Today. 21:5 (May 1965), 189-97.

-----. The Social Basis of Nationalism in Ceylon. Journal of Asian Studies. 24:3 (May 1965), 431-40.

Forrester, Duncan B. Parliamentary Privilege—An Indian Constitutional Crisis. Parliamentary Affairs. 18:2 (Spring 1965), 196-200.

Houn, Franklin W. The Communist Monolith versus the Chinese Tradition. Orbis. 8:4 (Winter 1965), 894-921.

Hudson, Geoffrey. Fifteen Years After—The Chinese State. China Quarterly. No. 21 (January-March 1965), 61-73.

Jan, George P. Communist China's Militia. Military Review. 45:3 (March 1965), 80-86.

Kroef, Justus M. van der. Indonesian Communism's "Revolutionary Gymnastics." Asian Survey. 5:5 (May 1965), 217-32.

Kuruvilla, P. K. Problems of Public Administration in Developing Countries with Special Reference to India. Canadian Public Administration. 8:1 (March 1965), 66-107.

Larguillier, Bernard. Le Laos ou 260 ans de malheur. Temps Modernes. 20:226 (March 1965), 1666-689.

Lev, Daniel S. The Politics of Judicial Development in Indonesia. Comparative Studies in Society and History. 7:2 (January 1965), 173-99.

Lewis, John Wilson. Revolutionary Struggle and the Second Generation in Communist China. China Quarterly. No. 21 (January-March 1965), 126-47. Mathur, P. C. Sociological Dimensions of Panchayati Raj. Indian Journal of Public Administration. 10:1 (January-March 1964), 58-72.

Morris-Jones, W. H. Parliament and Dominant Party: Indian Experience. Parliamentary Affairs. 17:3 (Summer 1964), 296-307.

Pak, Hyobom. Chinese Politics: The Nature of Its "Mass Image" Technique. Asian Survey. 5:4 (April 1965), 197-206.

Pauker, Guy J. Indonesia in 1964: Toward a "People's Democracy?" (RAND Corporation Paper P-3056, 1965).

Preuss, Wolf. Die Entwicklung der Volksrepublik China. Aussenpolitik. 15:10 (October 1964), 698-713.

Prybyla, Jan S. The Economy of Communist China. Dalhousie Review. 44:3 (Autumn 1964), 265-71.

Russett, Bruce M. and Coralie Bryant. The Citizen and His Society: Attitudes of the Indian People toward Government, Modernization and Each Other. Public Opinion Surveys of the Indian Institute of Public Opinion. 10:4-5 (January-February 1965), 3-58.

Schwartz, Benjamin. Modernisation and the Maoist Vision—Some Reflections on Chinese Communist Goals. China Quarterly. No. 21 (January-March 1965), 3-19.

Schwartz, Henry G. Red China's Army in Sinkiang. Military Review. 45:3 (March 1965), 69-79.

Stepanyants, M. T. Islamic Socialism: The Pakistan Way. Central Asian Review. 13:1 (1965), 55-60.

Stern, Robert W. The Sino-Indian Border Controversy and the Communist Party of India. Journal of Politics. 27:1 (February 1965), 66-86.

Vepa, Ram K. Changing Pattern of Panchayati Raj in Andhra Pradesh. Indian Journal of Public Administration. 10:4 (October-December 1964), 692-704.

Wilcox, Wayne. Politicians, Bureaucrats and Development in India. Annals of the American Academy. Vol. 358 (March 1965), 114-22.

Far East and Oceania

Chong-shik, Chung. Political Parties and Funds in Korea. Korean Affairs. 3:3 (December 1964), 286-95.

Chun, Choe. Politics and the Press in Korea. Korean Affairs. 3:3 (December 1964), 296-303.

McGeever, Patrick. The Japanese Electoral System. Parliamentary Affairs. 17:3 (Autumn 1964), 418-29.

Meller, Norman. Political Change in the Pacific. Asian Survey. 5:5 (May 1965), 245-54.

New Zealand: The Ombudsman in Action. Round Table. No. 218 (March 1965), 185-90.

Öi, Kai. Toward the Formation of a New Japanese Nationalism. Journal of Social and Political Ideas in Japan. 2:2 (August 1964), 16-20.

Seigen, Miyasato. Hopes and Realities in Okinawa. Japan Quarterly. 12:2 (April-June 1965), 161-67.

Tadao, Okada. The Unchanging Bureaucracy. Japan Quarterly. 12:2 (April-June 1965), 168-76.

Taikwhi, Lee. Urbanization and Its Political Implications in Korea. Korean Affairs. 3:3 (December 1964), 304-14.

Tong-woon, Park. Authoritarianism and Democracy in Korea. Korean Affairs. 3:3 (December 1964), 271-85.

Ward, Robert E. The Commission on the Constitution and Prospects for Constitutional Change in Japan. Journal of Asian Studies. 24:3 (May 1965), 401-30.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON

COMPARATIVE PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION

NIMROD RAPHAELI The University of Michigan

General Works

The Administrators: The Reform of the Civil Service. London: Fabian Society Tract 355, 1964.

Ching Sung, I. The Development of Chinese Newspapers and their Administration. The Chinese Journal of Administration. January, 1965.

Devereux, Robert. Requisites for Public Service: An XIth Century View. Personnel Administration. May-June, 1964.

Johnson, H. C. Concept of Bureaucracy in Cameralism. Political Science Quarterly. Summer, 1964.

Les Memoires de stage de l'Ecole Nationale d'Administration. Liste bibliographique (1946-1963). La Revue Administrative. Novembre-Decembre, 1964.

Pelz, Donald C. Survey Research in Public Administration. The Indian Journal of Public Administration. October-December, 1964.

Piper, D. C. and T. Cole (eds.) Post-Primary

Education and Political and Economic Development. Duke University Press, 1964.

Schaffer, B. B. Decision-Making and the Civil-Military Experience. Public Administration (Sydney). December, 1964.

Silvera, Victor. Le Droit de la fonction publique des anciens réssortissants d'états ou territoires décolonisés. La Revue Administrative. Nov.-Dec., 1964

Subramanian, V. Middle Range Models in Comparative Administrative Studies. The Indian Journal of Public Administration. October-December, 1964.

Tullock, Gordon. The Politics of Bureaucracy. Washington, D.C.: Public Affairs Press, 1965.

Weber, Max. Papers on Max Weber. American Sociological Review. April, 1965.

Bureaucratic Systems

Beloff, Max. Another Plowden Report. The Foreign and Commonwealth Services. Public Administration (London). Winter, 1964.

Brady, James R. Japanese Administrative Behavior and the "Sala." Philippine Journal of Public Administration. October, 1964.

Caldwell, G. H. Unity of Command: A Comparison of the Top Level Organization Structures of the Government of Canada and Large Scale Private Enterprises. Canadian Public Administration. December, 1964.

Dodd, C. H. Administrative Reform in Turkey. Public Administration (London). Spring, 1965.

Fortini, Napoléon. L'Administration au Sénégal. La Revue Administrative. Nov.-Dec., 1964.

Grant, C. H. The District Commissioner System in British Guiana. Journal of Commonwealth Political Studies. March, 1965.

Grassmuck, George and Kamal Salibi. Reformed Administration in Lebanon. Beirut: 1964. Distributed through the Center for Near Eastern and North African Studies, The University of Michigan, Ann Arbor.

Greel, H. G. Beginnings of Bureaucracy in China: The Origin of Hsien. Journal of Asian Studies. February, 1964.

Hodgetts, J. E. Challenge and Response: A Retrospective View of the Public Service of Canada. Canadian Public Administration. December, 1964.

Joiner, C. A. and R. Jumper. Organizing Bureaucrats: South Viet Nam's National Revolutionary Civil Servants' League. Asian Survey. April. 1963.

Kearney, R. N. and R. L. Harris. Bureaucracy and Environment in Ceylon. Journal of Commonwealth Political Studies. Op Cit.

Kozlov, Iu. M. The Relationship Between Collegial and One-Man Management in Soviet State

Administration at the Present Stage of Development. Soviet Law and Government. Fall, 1964.

Luchaire, F. The Political and Administrative System of the Territories of the Comores. Journal of Local Administration Overseas. April, 1965.

Muttalib, M. A. The Indian Union Public Service Commission. Public Administration (London). Winter, 1964.

McDowell, R. B. The Irish Administration, 1801-1914. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1964

Ridley, F. and J. Blondel. Public Administration in France. London: Routledge, 1964.

Robertson, John F. The Royal Commission on State Services in New Zealand. Public Administration (L). Spring, 1965.

Tunnoch, G. V. The Glassco Commission: Did It Cost More Than It Was Worth? Canadian Public Administration. September, 1964.

Personnel and Fiscal Administration

Addison, R. E. The Appraisal and Career Development Programme for Senior Personnel. Professional Public Service. January, 1965.

Balls, Herbert R. The Public Accounts, Their Purposes and Factors Affecting Their Form: An Administrative View. Canadian Public Administration. December, 1964.

Carson, John. What's Happened to Glassco? Public Personnel Review. April, 1965.

Dennis, M. L. Recruitment of Public Administrators. Public Administration (Sydney). December, 1964.

Eme, Awa. High Level Administration in the Public Services of Nigeria. Nigerian Journal of Economic and Social Studies. March, 1964.

Mora, Alberto H. and Francisco T. Morales. El servicio civil y la carrera administrative en Colombia. Bogota: Escuela Superior de Administracion Public, 1963.

Muttalib, M. A. The Indian Union Public Service Commission. Public Administration (L). Winter, 1964.

Pai Panandiker, V. A. Classification of Services in the Central Government. Indian Journal of Public Administration. Oct.-Dec., 1964.

Power, Hilton M. The British Civil Service; Its Present Methods of Recruitment and Promotion and their Implications for New States. New Zealand Journal of Public Administration. September, 1964.

Shrinagesh, J. M. Organization for Top Management. Indian Journal of Public Administration. July-September, 1964.

Administrative Responsibility and Control

Lord Bridges. The Relationships Between Ministers and the Permanent Departmental Head. Canadian Public Administration. September, 1964.

Crichton, Edward E. Arbitration Practices in the Australian Public Service. Public Personnel Review. April, 1965.

Hsieh, Erh Yi. The System of Punishment for Government Officials. The Chinese Journal of Administration. January, 1965.

Development Administration

Almond, Gabriel. Developmental Approach to Political System. World Politics. January, 1965.

Benerjee, Ajit M. Managerial Personnel for Public Enterprises. *Indian Journal of Public Ad*ministration. July-September, 1964.

Fuller C. and R. Chambers. Training for the Administration of Development in Kenya. Journal of Local Government Overseas. April, 1965.

Kuruvilla, P. K. Problems of Public Administration in Developing Countries with Special Reference to India. Canadian Public Administration. March, 1965.

Riggs, Fred W. Relearning Old Lessons: The Political Context of Development Administration. Public Administration Review. March, 1965.

Singh, K. N. Analysis of the Community Development Administration at Village, Block and District Levels. Journal of Local Administration Overseas. Op. Cit.

Sweetman, L. T. Prefects and Planning: France's New Regionalism. Public Administration (L). Spring, 1965.

Comparative Local Government

Akpan, E. E. The Development of Local Government in Eastern Nigeria. Journal of Local Administration Overseas. April, 1965.

Hudson, W. J. S. Local Government Reorganization in Isoko District, Zambia. Ibid., January, 1965.

Kirk-Greene, A. H. M. A Redefinition of Provincial Administration—The Northern Nigerian Approach. Ibid.

Nsarko, J. K. Local Government in Ghana. Oxford University Press, 1964.

Orde, M. H. Development of Local Government in Rural Areas in the Gambia. Journal of Local Administration Overseas. January, 1965.

Wraith, Ronald. Local Government in West Africa. London: George Allen & Unwin, 1964.

Seeley, H. C. Local Government Department Finance. Journal of Local Administration Overseas. October, 1964.

Young, Dennis A. The Report of the Manitoba Royal Commission on Local Government Organization and Finance. Canadian Public Administration. March, 1965.

INTERNATIONAL POLITICS, LAW AND ORGANIZATION

The Atlantic Alliance. By ALVIN J. COTTRELL AND JAMES E. DOUGHERTY. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1964. Pp. 248. $5.50).

This book is a political guide to the politics of NATO. It is the fault of the reviewer that this report comes a year late. Neither Professor Cottrell's nor Professor Dougherty's feet can be held to the critic's fire for what has happened in the past twelve months. One suspects, however, that both would be game for the try. For both are on record that NATO has proved its worth and both insist that confidence and not panic is the order of the day. This is not to say that criticism of the Alliance is shrugged off or that the authors believe in "justification by faith alone". They simply present a sturdy defense of NATO as a concept and as a program and ask those who would place it in disarray to measure the faults against the accomplishments and count the short straws.

The authors start the reader off with a thorough and clear discussion of the nature and scope of the North Atlantic Treaty and its organizational structure. In so doing, they bring into sharp focus current debates about nuclear strategy and the limits and possibilities of waging conventional warfare. They remind the reader that NATO has not only contained the Soviet military threat to Western Europe, but that it has also quietly and effectively prevented any potential German unilateral moves, a point sometimes ignored by critics. A short critique is made of the various proposals for disengagement, all of them boiling down to the fact that after disengagement there would be no power in Europe capable of opposing Russian will. Left generally undiscussed is the point that NATO policy has emphasized armament rather than arms control.

The book then moves from discussion of military doctrines to analysis of the economic integration of Western Europe, showing how this has developed and in the process invalidated, before European eyes, the Leninist thesis of the "contradictions of capitalism." The shield for this development has been and remains the nuclear umbrella of America and the soldiers of NATO. The problems which arise because of conflicting national policies within the European Community, the intra-NATO disputes, are also treated, though in limited detail.

Neither author feels that General de Gaulle will bring the NATO tent down. Indeed, if there is a major weakness in this otherwise excellent book, it is the too easy dismissal of the General as but a passing irritation. As "realists" neither author can accept the possibility that de Gaulle is the reincarnation of Vercingetorix and is thus a couple of thousand years old. His mischief making is almost at an end, they argue. This reviewer is less sanguine.

Cottrell and Dougherty therefore conclude that the Alliance can weather its "time of troubles" and that it is already well on the way to being the force that will create a true Atlantic Community, and, thus, it deserves to remain the linchpin of progressive American foreign policy. Theirs is a reasoned argument and one that offers NATO critics a fair and open challenge. This reviewer knows of no better guide to the politics of NATO.

—MILTON COLVIN, Washington & Lee.

China's Foreign Policy. By VIDYA PRAKASH DUTT (New York: Asia Publishing House, 1964. Pp. 336. $10.75.)

This study concentrates on Communist China's foreign policy in the years 1958-62 since this is the period when China's policy changed from "sweet reasonableness" to the new "hard line." In the two and a half years which have elapsed since there is little evidence of any substantial change in China's foreign policy so that the author's observations and conclusions appear valid even as applied to contemporary events.

The author sees a close relationship between domestic and foreign policy. In the domestic field the "hundred flowers" movement, which began in April, 1957, and lasted barely two months, resulted in disillusionment and shock, and was followed by drastic economic experimentation. The Great Leap Forward and the organization of the Communes were in full swing in the Fall of 1958. These radical domestic policies were reflected in a more radical foreign policy.

Among the factors influencing China's foreign policy is Mao's hatred of the United States which stands in the way of almost all of China's major objectives, a place in the U.N., unfettered trade, recovery of Formosa. A burning desire to achieve status, after a century of humiliation at the hands of Western "barbarians", is a strong factor in shaping China's foreign policy. Mao's "sense of humiliation and frustration constantly erupts in manifestation of aggressive nationalism whether within the Communist bloc or outside."

Mao's antagonism toward the United States centers on our protection of Taiwan. He bitterly opposes the two-China policy. Fuel was added to the flames when the United States backed the U.N. resolution supporting Tibet in December, 1959, and when we signed a Security Pact with Japan in January 1960. Any accommodation by the U.S.S.R. with the U.S. such as Khrushchev's visit with Eisenhower in September, 1959, was considered a great mistake. U.S. imperialism is the "deadly enemy of the people of the world." Eisenhower's visit to Taiwan in June, 1960, engendered a "national denunciation of U.S. imperialism, mankind's public enemy number one." This theme was stressed in press, radio, cinema, theater, handbills, organized military demonstrations. The President of the All China Federation of Trade Unions referred to Eisenhower's visit as the "gangster trip" made by the "God of plague."

The Kennedy administration was considered worse than the Eisenhower regime "because it was more subtle and clever in pursuing the same ends." The difference in method came not because the "nefarious imperialist robber" had "turned into"—"a benevolent Buddha of Mercy" but only because he was "more cunning," his gestures "more sophisticated."

China's relations with Russia are, of course, a crucial factor in her foreign policy. The Sino-Soviet Alliance of 1950 committed Russia to aid China if she were attacked by Japan or by any power based on Japan. With Stalin's death the Chinese felt that his mantle belonged on Mao's shoulders. Since Khrushchev did not concede this, the Alliance weakened.

A new economic agreement between Russia and China, signed in February, 1959, provided for $1,250 million in trade between the two countries, China to supply raw materials and Russia to furnish machinery and technical aid, including the nation's first experimental atomic reactor and cyclotron. At this time China did not stress her opposition to Khrushchev's peaceful coexistence policy. After the Russian leader had visited Eisenhower the following Fall he immediately flew to Peking seeking to win Chinese cooperation for a more peaceful stance. His efforts were fruitless. The Chinese leaders seemed not to fear a nuclear war. Mao in a conference with Nehru in Peking in 1955 is quoted as saying he was not "so struck by the danger of nuclear war." "What are a couple million people?"

The following year, however, at the 43rd anniversary of the October Revolution, China went along with the joint statement issued by the leaders of 81 Communist parties, which endorsed in general the Khrushchev policy. The rest of the Communist world was not ready to follow Chinese leadership. The deplorable agricultural situation in China caused doubts, "the 'big leap' had turned into an agonizing fox trot."

The split between China and Russia widened. China gave increased support to Albania, which had defied Moscow, and she repudiated the Soviet Union's stand on the search for disarmament. In the words of Professor Dutt "The Sino-Soviet split has almost reached the point of no return."

Other chapters of this book deal with China's relations with her neighbors in Asia with emphasis on the unprovoked attack on India, the increasing friendliness with Pakistan and Indonesia and the attempts to woo Japan.

The author also details China's efforts to win the support of the emerging African nations by stressing the racial aspects of their common effort to oppose white imperialism. She blames the U.S. for the situation in the Congo and she stresses the need for continued revolution even in the nations which have obtained "nominal" independence.

In summary this book presents a thorough and well documented study of China's foreign policy in the years 1958-1962. It brings into sharp relief the militant stance which China has adopted, and analyses the reasons therefore and its significance for the world at large.—HAROLD A. VAN DORN, Kent State University.

Communist China and Tibet: The First Dozen Years. By George Ginsburgs and Michael Mathos. (The Hague: Martin Nijhoff, 1964. Pp. ix. 218, Guilders 23.25).

Professor George Ginsburgs and Mr. Michael Mathos have written a comprehensive account of the first dozen years of Communist China's relations with Tibet. Their compilation is not a wholly scholarly work, for it lacks necessary documentation, first-hand observation, and sufficient use of Chinese Communist sources. It is true that students of contemporary China are handicapped by the restrictions that have been placed in their scholarly inquiries. Furthermore, there is a dearth of reliable Tibetan materials. The authors have therefore made a valiant attempt at the reconstruction and analysis of a difficult and crucial period of Sino-Tibetan relations.

The clearest statement of the thesis of the book is found in Chapter VI, entitled Epilogue: Peking-Lhasa-New Delhi, which had appeared in the September 1960 number of the Political Science Quarterly. The present work represents an enlargement and elaboration of that early thesis. The authors' main argument is that Sino-Tibetan relations and their ramifications must be understood primarily in geopolitical terms. For China, Tibet has not been independent of her influence and concern for hundreds of years. For India, Tibet has been a center of contention especially since the time of the establishment of British rule. Tibet had survived as an autonomous theocracy due to a delicate balance of power: the British acceptance of the reputed Chinese suzerainty and the Chinese acquiescence in British influence. This relationship was disturbed when the Chinese People's Republic came into being. British withdrawal from India, and the subsequent inability of India to sustain her influence made the Chinese resurgence in Tibet inevitable. The general apathy of the outside world and the isolationist attitude of the Tibetans reduced the scope of conflict to a struggle between the emerging Communist state and the feudalistic monarchy of the Dalai Lama. The outcome of the confrontation was hardly unexpected.

What makes Communist China and Tibet a worthwhile study is the detailed depiction of the manner in which the Chinese People's Republic extended its influence, and later established its rule, in Tibet. Although lacking in sufficient documentation, the conclusions are convincing by virtue of their logic and creative insight. Within the context of Mao Tse-tung's known policies toward ethnic minorities in the border regions of China, as well as set in the light of long-standing Chinese popular feelings about Tibet, one must agree that the authors have not misinterpreted the Communists' programs for the subjection of Tibet.

Moreover, operating within the legal framework of the Sino-Tibetan Agreement of 1951, Peking asserted an effort at strengthening Chinese military power in Tibet through a network of new roads and improved communications. It also executed systematically and adroitly political manipulations and social reforms that were aimed at weakening the resistance of the ruling elite and at gaining the support of the Tibetan peasants. Peking's willingness to do these things was the most important element fitting into the grand design of eventually transforming Tibet into an integral part of the Chinese state.

Skillfully the authors have shown that "the course of Sino-Tibetan relations since 1951 has passed through a number of distinct stages, differentiated by varying emphasis on alternate goals, changes in the modalities of operational strategy, shifts in the choice of tactics and executory instrumentalities." The retreat of the Chinese in 1957 and the response of Peking to the Tibetan uprising in March 1959 gave evidence of the Communist tactical flexibility and opportunism.

Besides adding to what is known about Peking's domestic and foreign policies, this work poignantly reveals the nature of international politics in Asia. Fittingly, the authors have placed the problems of Sino-Tibetan relations within the larger framework of the Sino-Indian struggle for Asian leadership. Finally, Ginsburgs and Mathos conclude by reviving the old proposition: "He who holds Tibet dominates the Himalayan piedmont; he who dominates the Himalayan piedmont threatens the Indian subcontinent; and he who threatens the Indian subcontinent may well have all of South Asia within his reach and, with it, all of Asia." How valid this axiom is remains to be proved.—Otis H. Shao, Florida Presbyterian College.

The United States and the United Nations. Edited by Franz B. Gross. (Norman, Okla.: University of Oklahoma Press, 1964. Pp. 356. $6.95.)

From the first page of the Preface to the last speech in the Appendix, the overall analytical framework of The United States and the United Nations is abundantly clear, a relatively "hardline" approach based on the concept of "protracted conflict" with Communism. Thus, the book equates a just world order with Western concepts of man and legality, and asks if the United Nations can help promote such an order, though it recognizes that most of the new states in the organization are non-Western and that few of them are now governed democratically. The Soviet Union is charged with continuing to seek a dictated universal peace by the ultimate destruction of nations opposed to Communism. Of Soviet behavior in the United Nations, it says: "Communists participating in any non-Communist organization seek to subvert it and thus bend it to their purposes or, failing that, to destroy it." Attributing to the Western democracies a view of the United Nations as a world organization for cooperation. peaceful settlement, and containment of aggression, it declares the United Nations is only an instrument of protracted conflict for the Communists. It suggests, therefore, that the United Nations must be an important battleground for the United States in that protracted conflict. It concludes, nonetheless, that Western survival depends less on the United Nations than on the development of regional political organizations to maximize the economic, military, and moral power of the Free World. Such a summary of the book's dominant theme is undoubtedly an over-simplification, but by eliminating verbal underbrush it may serve to clarify the point of view expressed.

In The United States and the United Nations, there is no consideration of any alternative analysis, no marshalling of pros and cons as is done so carefully on a variety of issues by Inis L. Claude, Jr., in Swords into Plowshares. A parallel summation of an alternative point of view is possible and not difficult to set down. To help build a just world order, the West may find it useful to be less insistent about acceptance of its own values and institutions and more aware of the values and institutions of others-and their interests, and ask if the United Nations can be of assistance in promoting a mutual exchange of ideas and increased. understanding. It may be that most of the new non-Western states are not governed democratically for excellent reasons; that, in fact, the basic prerequisites of democracy-if such there be-are presently lacking in many of them. If the Soviet Union still voices Communist doctrines with vigor, it has adjusted with some degree of pragmatism its internal institutions and its external behavior. It is unlikely that the somewhat trite, symbolic utterances on either May Day or the Fourth of July should be taken at full face value. If the words are an echo of 1848 or 1776, they have a 1965 meaning. The Western democracies found the United Nations an exceptionally useful world agency in the organization's early days, not only because of their cooperative nature but also because their influence dominated its councils and its votes helped protect a world balance of power favorable to the West. The United Nations is indeed one instrument employed by the Soviet Union, if not yet by the Chinese Communists, in its attempt to alter the old balance in recognition of new power relationships. The United Nations is, therefore, an important forum for planning peaceful change to rationalize emerging realities in order to reduce the likelihood of over-frustration and the escalation of conflict beyond limited war. If Western interests must in the short run be partially dependent upon regional and functional groupings for survival, over time it is from the functional as much if not more than from the regional groupings that the broad consensus required for further steps toward world community is likely to evolve. The future is not necessarily one of "protracted conflict," but it is quite likely to be one of prolonged competition.

Whatever the assessment of the book's overall analytical theme, or of any possible alternative analysis, The United States and the United Nations is well worth reading, for it provides a look at the U.N. from an American policy perspective through the eyes of thirteen experienced, wellknown, and even distinguished contributors. If most of the participants pay lip-service to the Cold War theme and to the concept of "protracted conflict", some of the individual analyses are considerably less constricted. Representative of a more flexible view which "surfaces" occasionally, but which is not carefully developed or considered in the book as a whole, is Norman D. Palmer's perceptive comment: "There seem almost no limits to what the United States can do by patience and persistence, coupled with a genuine desire to consider other countries' points of view and to reconsider its own policies in the light of these other viewpoints." After an "Introduction" by Robert Strausz-Hupé, Franz B. Gross explores "The United States National Interest and the United Nations": Hans Kohn, "Nationalism in the United Nations"; Waldo Chamberlain, "Arms Control and Limitation"; William P. Kintner, "The United Nations Record of Handling Major Disputes"; Palmer, "The Afro-Asians in the United Nations"; Arthur P. Whitaker, "The Latin-American Bloc"; Gross, "Western Europe and the United Nations"; and Harold Karan Jacobson, "Economic and Social Matters." In addition, the Appendix includes addresses by President John F. Kennedy, Senator Henry M. Jackson, Undersecretary of State George A. Ball, Secretary of State Dean Rusk, and Professor William Y. Elliott.

As did Ernest A. Gross in The United Nations: Structure for Peace, this book tends to justify many if not most past American policies in the U.N. Though there is discussion of blocs and caucus groups, the book largely ignores the informal politics at Turtle Bay stressed by Andrew Boyd in United Nations: Piety, Myth and Truth. It does not deal with problems of staffing the Secretariat, raised by Boyd and discussed at some length in Sidney D. Bailey's The Secretariat of the United Nations. An American U.N. strategy for the future is less positively defined than by Lincoln P. Boomfield in The United Nations and U.S. Foreign Policy. These things are not said in criticism but to help define the nature of the approach and subject matter limits. The book has both the advantages and disadvantages of multiple contributors. Its authors write as experts in their areas of concern, but there is a less organized progression of ideas than in Bloomfield's thought-provoking earlier effort.-Robert E. Elder, Colgate University.

The War—Peace Establishment. By ARTHUR HERZOG (New York: Harper and Row, 1965. Pp. xiii, 271. $4.95.)

Bewildered as are many other thoughtful people by the contradictions between governments' simultaneous pleas for disarmament and rearmament, by the mathematicians' recondite slide-ruleand-computer analyses of our defense policies, and by the numerous quarreling groups all of whom profess to have discovered the true road to world peace, Mr. Herzog decided to "... talk to the nation's leading theoreticians on war and peace of varying opinions, to see who they are, what they want and why, and ask them what hopes for permanent peace they foresee." Forearmed with preliminary acquaintance with their writings, he sought out one hundred or so of them for interviews in which he sought their answers to the fundamental questions of how to preserve the peace. There follows a 260-page report about what he found, written in the easy style of the professional journalist. At least one thing emerged clearly from the survey: if war is too important to be entrusted to the generals, the avoidance of war is too important to be entrusted either to them or to the statesmen or politicians. In this overview of the myriad avenues to peace and security, one looks almost completely in vain for the names of senators, cabinet officers, and other men in official life: it is the scientists and other civilian intellectuals who are at center stage.

Herzog starts off with the "deterrers," men who seek to preserve the peace by maintaining various levels of deterrent force. Here are surveyed the ideas of Strausz-Hupé and Teller, among others. The "analysts" (Kissinger, Schelling, Wohlstetter, Kahn) come in for extended treatment; then the realists (Morgenthau, Niebuhr) and the idealists in the Department of Defense and elsewhere; next the experimentalists (Bethe, Wiesner, Riesman) who wish to try a variety of approaches and international cooperative forms in the effort to attain lasting peace; and finally the "survivalists" (Cousins, Melman) and the pacifists (Pickus, Muste). In each case one is given a thumbnail sketch of the ideas involved in the particular school of thought.

One wonders just what public will be served by the overview accomplished in this book; presumably it is the general public which wishes vignettes of a wide variety of ideas. It is doubtful that the serious student of defense and peace policy will be much enlightened, for the book skips over a wide range of ideas in minimum time and is deficient in analysis, criticism, and comparison of ideas. The reader who wishes to pursue the subject more deeply will be unhappy over the lack of footnotes or of bibliographic guides to further reading.

This reader for one would have relished a book which delved more deeply into the views covered and which provided analysis of their strong and weak points. As it is, with the exception of off-hand editorial remarks here and there, the major burden of analysis falls on an all-too-short eight-page concluding appraisal in which the author, probably like most readers, concludes that there is greater wisdom and safety in a middle ground than in either extreme. Probably the general reader will be the one best satisfied by this book, and he will discover that the problems of war and peace are not to be as simply solved as some politicians aver at campaign time.—Hollis W. Barber, University of Illinois at Chicago Circle.

The Fourth Dimension of Foreign Policy: Educational and Cultural Affairs. By Phillip H.

COOMBS. (New York and Evanston: Harper & Row, 1964. Pp. xvi, 158. $3.50. Published for the Council on Foreign Relations)

This brief volume, one of a series of policy books of the Council on Foreign Relations, is in part a report on the expanding emphasis on educational and cultural factors in American foreign policy, but it is also an appeal for a greater appreciation of the human aspects of foreign policy and for a doubling of efforts in this dimension of our policy. While not deprecating the political, economic and military components of policy, the author suggests that our long-range influence in the world might be enhanced by a further increase in emphasis on educational and cultural exchange.

Mr. Coombs is uniquely qualified to write this report. When President Kennedy established the post of Assistant Secretary of State for Educational and Cultural Affairs, Coombs was the original appointee. He had previously served as educational program director with the Ford Foundation and is currently Director of the International Institute for Educational Planning in Paris. In preparing the book he was provided with a fifteenmember advisory committee and, in addition to sponsorship by the Council on Foreign Relations, he received aid and support from the Carnegie Corporation and The Brookings Institution.

The author reports on past developments and recent trends in educational and cultural exchange activities of the United States, and compares our efforts with those of France, the United Kingdom, Germany and the Soviet Union. He points out that private efforts in the United States have outweighed the governmental role, and that, relatively, we have given less emphasis to the human factor in foreign policy than have major European states.

In order to bolster his arguments for an expanded program in educational and cultural affairs Coombs has mustered the best objective evidence available. For this purpose he relies heavily on the report compiled for Congress in 1963 by the U. S. Advisory Commission on International Educational and Cultural Affairs, known as the Gardiner Commission. The Advisory Commission's report is based on thousands of interviews with participants in educational and cultural exchanges and with U.S. foreign service and education personnel. The conclusions speak of abundant and conclusive evidence of the contributions of educational and cultural programs to the long-range goals of American foreign policy.

In spite of this evidence one must be aware of the limitations of our knowledge of the real efficacy of such programs and of the difficulties of gathering empirical data to prove contributions to the goals of foreign policy. The goals are admittedly long-range and the educational and cultural contributions are inter-mixed in their effects with political, economic and military factors. The persons involved in interchanges may find difficulties both in being detached observers and in assessing the role of exchanges in the total pattern of evolving policy. Coombs' book is replete with normative statements and his appeal may have to rest more on intuititive opinion (to borrow his own phrase) than on scientifically demonstrable results and probabilities.

Despite these difficulties the author deserves a hearing from those who determine the course of U. S. foreign policy. He concludes his book with a blueprint for strengthening and better coordinating our program in educational and cultural affairs. The available evidence, logic, and informed opinion support his suggestions. Since the costs of doubling the program are relatively low, and since the prospects for positive returns are as high as they are for many of our conventional aspects of foreign policy, Coombs' strong recommendations are worthy of full consideration by the Congress and the Administration.— A. LeRoy Bennett, University of Delaware.

An End to Arms. By Walter Millis. (New York: Atheneum, 1965. Pp. vi, 301. $5.95.)

Despite its title, this book is not about disarmament. Rather, in the words of the author, "it is an examination into the possibility of a demilitarized international society" in which disarmament and demilitarization are viewed as distinct if related processes. Sponsored by the Center for Study of Democratic Institutions, the subtitle claims that An End to Arms is a new vision of the end of the arms race and the beginning of a demilitarized world. That Mr. Millis has vision there can be no doubt; whether it is grounded in a sufficiently realistic and accurate framework, however, may be questioned by professional students of international politics.

The book opens with the familiar thesis developed by Millis and others regarding the end of the organized war system brought about by the advent of nuclear weapons. The author then develops a succinctly written historical sketch of the rise of the militarized international system which is blamed for the Franco-Prussian War and World War I. Millis argues that disillusionment with the militarized system began shortly after 1919 and was unfortunately interrupted by the emergence of military-populist dictatorships that revived the old system and precipitated World War II. In this connection, a most controversial assumption is advanced which forms the basis for his later vision of a demilitarized world: that the struggle for power at the international level arises primarily out of the breakdown of domestic order rather than from the clash of opposing national interests. While some correlation exists between domestic instability and international disorder, Millis propounds it as an absolute without recognizing that stable national states conflict over the allocation of international resources.

More controversial are the author's assumptions and data which form the bases of his vision of a fully demilitarized world. Arguing that the language of international politics is antiquated because it fails to reflect the increasing disutility of force, Millis calls for a new conceptual system to fit "observable facts." He is particularly critical of those who cling to the conceptual system of the arms-tensions dilemma. But suppose this system is a fairly accurate reflection of the problem? Millis insists that it is not and suggests a clarification based on a reexamination of the interrelationship between law, coercion, and power.

In several chapters he explores these concepts in the hope that the theoretical discussion will break the circularity of the arms-tensions dilemma and pave the way for the acceptance of his practical proposals for a demilitarized international system. These chapters are stimulating and incisive but they are also replete with questionable assumptions: that the diffusion of nuclear weapons to additional states will not materialize; that the major power centers of the world will continue to be stable indefinitely; that the power struggle among nations results from conflict over the control of the future rather than out of concrete rivalries of the present; that conflicts over contemporary tangible interests are reconcilable since they do not involve power competition; that both the United States and the Soviet Union genuinely desire general and complete disarmament.

On the basis of these and other assumptions the author describes his new vision of world order in the final chapter. It turns out to be a not particularly novel scheme for "limited" world government in which Millis projects an Orwellian glimpse of the international system of 1984, but with a utopianism that rivals the Clark-Sohn proposals. Through an intuitive prophecy of the course of world affairs to 1980, in which no major war occurs but armed forces establishments continue to menace world peace, we are informed that the nations of the world will become so dissatisfied with the dangers of the system that they will convene conferences in Moscow and Washington in 1980 to modify it.

A transformed United Nations equipped with a veto-free supranational police authority will be created to preserve more securely a demilitarized system which has existed since 1945; judicial machinery will be strengthened to resolve any future disputes; and a general and comprehensive program for disarmament will be instituted, leaving nation-states with only national police forces. National police forces, however, are to be the major coercive agencies in the demilitarized system since Millis assumes international conflict to be the result of the inadequacy of police to restrain revolutionary elements. As a consequence, the supranational police authority is to be small and relied upon only in those comparatively rare instances where intervention may be required to preserve domestic order.

The traditional pattern of idealistic arrangements for the control of international conflict and violence is thus reversed. In the Millis plan demilitarization of the international environment is assumed to be a reality as a result of the excessive costs of nuclear or conventional force by major powers; therefore the emphasis is not on disarmament but on preserving the nonviolent character of the international system through a coercive supranational authority buttressed by national police forces. Yet the interconnection between demilitarization and disarmament is recognized since supranational arrangements are to be followed by a gradual and general disarmament of nuclear and conventional weapons.

This reviewer would argue that the gravest weakness of An End to Arms is the conception of power in military terms and in the consequent simplistic notion that armaments alone are the principal cause of the international power struggle. Many analysts emphasize in recent studies that the nature of international conflict should be approached eclectically on the assumption that its roots are multiple. Others would stress the necessity of political accommodation as prerequisite to disarmament and question the assertion that since nuclear weapons have not been used since 1945 we are now in a demilitarized international system. They might cite as recent evidence the willingness of the United States to risk wider war through the employment of repeated and heavy conventional air strikes over North Viet Nam.

Even if it is admitted that the use of force as a means of attaining national objectives is less rational than in any preceding historical era, there may be a vital flaw in the author's prophecy of a transition from the highly armed system of 1965 to an incipiently disarming world of the 1980's. It could be plausibly argued that if the world is able to survive from 1945 to 1980 without nuclear annihilation, motivations among nation-states for drastically transforming the system, however insecure, may not be nearly so high as Millis predicts.—Ronald J. Yalem, University of Southern California.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON

INTERNATIONAL LAW AND RELATIONS

RICHARD L. MERRITT Yale University

ARTICLES

International Politics

Theory and General

Afriat, S. N. People and Population. World Politics. 17:3 (April 1965), 431-40.

Algosaibi, Ghazi A. R. The Theory of International Relations: Hans J. Morgenthau and his Critics. Background. 8:4 (February 1965), 221-56.

Brzezinski, Z. K. Peaceful Engagement, A Plan for Europe. Encounter. 24:4 (April 1965), 15-33.

Buehrig, Edward H. The Institutional Pattern of Authority. World Politics. 17:3 (April 1965), 369-85.

Galtung, Ingrid Eide. Technical Assistance and Public Opinion. Journal of Peace Research. 1:1 (1964), 19-35.

Galtung, Johan. Summit Meetings and International Relations. Journal of Peace Research. 1:1 (1964), 36-54.

Goodman, Jay S. The Concept of "System" in International Relations Theory. Background. 8:4 (February 1965), 257-68.

Hanrieder, Wolfram F. Actor Objectives and International Systems. Journal of Politics. 27:1 (February 1965), 109-32.

Herz, John H. The Relevancy and Irrelevancy of Appeasement. Social Research. 31:3 (Autumn 1964), 296-320.

Kautsky, John H. Myth, Self-fulfilling Prophecy, and Symbolic Reassurance in the East-West Conflict. Journal of Conflict Resolution. 1:1 (March 1965), 1-17.

Klausen, Arne Martin. Technical Assistance and Social Conflict. Journal of Peace Research. 1:1 (1964), 5-18.

Landheer, Bart. The Image of World Society and the Function of Armaments. Journal of Peace Research. 1:3-4 (1964), 232-41.

Mangold, K. P. Lenin's Cardinal Rules of Poverty and Recall: Neglected Ideological Weapons for the West. Orbis. 8:4 (Winter 1965), 955-71.

Maurseth, Per. Balance-of-Power Thinking from the Renaissance to the French Revolution. *Jour*nal of Peace Research. 1:2 (1964), 120-36.

Ruge, Mari Holmboe. Technical Assistance and Parliamentary Debates. *Journal of Peace Re*search. 1:2 (1964), 77-94.

Singer, J. David. Data-Making in International Relations. Behavioral Science. 10:1 (January 1965), 68-80.

Taylor, Carl E. Health and Population. Foreign Affairs. 43:3 (April 1965), 475-86.

Turner, Frederick C. The Implications of Demographic Change for Nationalism and Internationalism. Journal of Politics. 27:1 (February 1965), 87-108.

Political Sociology and Behavior

Galtung, Johan. Foreign Policy Opinion as a Function of Social Position. Journal of Peace Research. 1:3-4 (1964), 206-31.

——. A Structural Theory of Aggression. Journal of Peace Research. 1:2 (1964), 95-119.

Harsanyi, John C. Bargaining and Conflict Situations in the Light of a New Approach to Game Theory. American Economic Review. 55:2 (May 1965), 447-57.

Holsti, Ole R., Richard A. Brody, and Robert C. North. Affect and Action in International Reaction Models. Journal of Peace Research. 1: 3-4 (1964), 170-90.

Jenkner, Siegfried. On the Application of Integration and Conflict Models in Research on Communist Social and Ruling Systems. Modern World. (1963/1964), 117-27.

Lerner, Melvin J. The Effect of Preparatory Action on Beliefs Concerning Nuclear War. Journal of Social Psychology. 65:2 (April 1965), 225-31.

Mack, Raymond W. The Components of Social Conflict. Social Problems. 12:4 (Spring 1965), 388-97.

Pool, Ithiel de Sola, and Allan Kessler. The Kaiser, the Tsar, and the Computer: Information Processing in a Crisis. American Behavioral Scientist. 8:9 (May 1965), 31-38.

Smoker, Paul. Fear in the Arms Race: A Mathematical Study. Journal of Peace Research. 1:1 (1964), 55-64.

Triska, Jan F. and David D. Finley. Soviet-American Relations: A Multiple Symmetry Model. Journal of Conflict Resolution. 9:1 (March 1965), 37-53.

War, Defense, Arms Control

Altmann, Rüdiger. Eine neue Strategie. Monat. 17:199 (April 1965) 7-13.

Amme, Carl H., Jr. Nuclear Control and the Multilateral Force. U.S. Naval Institute Proceedings. 91:4 (April 1965), 24-35.

Aron, Raymond. Logica e Paradossi della

Teoria Strategica. Mulino. 14:4 (April 1965), 339-49.

Ball, George W. NATO and World Responsibility. Atlantic Community Quarterly. 2:2 (Summer 1964), 208-17.

Birrenbach, Kurt. Partnership and Consultation in NATO. Atlantic Community Quarterly. 2:1 (Spring 1964), 62-71.

Brosio, Manlio. OTAN 1965. Revue des deux Mondes. No. 5 (1 March 1965), 3-8.

Combaux, E. Analyse spectrale de la force multilatérale. Revue de Défense Nationale. 21:1 (January 1965), 21-39.

Dyckman, John W. Some Regional Development Issues in Defense Program Shifts. Journal of Peace Research. 1:3-4 (1964), 191-203.

Fink, Clinton F. More Calculations about Deterrence. Journal of Conflict Resolution. 9:1 (March 1965), 54-65.

Frye, Alton. Space Arms Control. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. 12:4 (April 1965), 30-32.

Gerasimov, G. The First Strike Theory. International Affairs (USSR). No. 3 (March 1965), 39-45.

Glagolev, Igor. Concerning the Reduction of Military Expenditures. Journal of Peace Research. 1:3-4 (1964), 204-205.

Hassel, Kai-Uwe von. Organizing Western Defense. Foreign Affairs. 43:2 (January 1965), 209-16.

Hinterhoff, Eugene. MLF oder ANF—Zum Problem der gemeinsamen Streitmacht. Aussenpolitik. 16:3 (March 1965), 181-91.

Jung, Ernst. Das Verbot des Ersteinsatzes von Kernwaffen. Aussenpolitik. 15:11 (November 1964), 768-77.

Kohl, Wilfred L. Nuclear Sharing in NATO and the Multilateral Force. *Political Science Quar*terly. 80:1 (March 1965), 88-109.

Larus, Joel. To Reduce the Possibility of Nuclear Catastrophe. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. 12:4 (April 1965), 33-35.

Leontief, Wassily. Disarmament, Foreign Aid and Economic Growth. Journal of Peace Research. 1:3-4 (1964), 155-67

Lucien, René. L'Aspect économique de la défense de l'Europe. Revue de Défense Nationale. 21:2 (February 1965), 223-28.

Örvik, Nils. Soviet Approaches on NATO's Northern Flank. International Journal. 20:1 (Winter 1964-65), 54-67.

Reznichenko, V. and A. Sidorenko. Soviet Tactics on the Nuclear Battlefield. Military Review. 45:6 (June 1965), 76-80.

Ries, John C. NATO Reorganization: A Critique and Analysis. Western Political Quarterly. 18:1 (March 1965), 64-72.

Rosi, Eugene J. How 50 Periodicals and the Times Interpreted the Test Ban Controversy.

Journalism Quarterly. 41:4 (Autumn 1964), 545-56. Schelling, T. C. Strategic Analysis and Social Problems. Social Problems. 12:4 (Spring 1965), 367-78.

Slessor, John. Multilateral or Multinational. Atlantic Community Quarterly. 2:2 (Summer 1964), 285-91.

Vandevanter, E., Jr. Coordinated Weapons Production in NATO: A Study of Alliance Processes. (RAND Corporation Memorandum RE-4169-PR, November 1964).

Waterkamp, Rainer. Die Politik gegenseitigen Beispiels im Vorfeld der Abrüstung. Frankfurter Hefte. 20:3 (March 1965), 183-90.

Wedge, Bryant and Cyril Muromcew. Psychological Factors in Soviet Disarmament Negotiation. Journal of Conflict Resolution. 9:1 (March 1965), 18-36.

Werthern-Beichlingen, Thilo. MLF: Coalition ou Intégration? Documents. 19:5 (September-October 1964), 15-27.

Wilson, Harold. Britain and the ANF. Survival. 7:2 (March-April 1965), 52-54.

Wolfe, Thomas W. Soviet Influences on an Arms Control Environment. (RAND Corporation Paper P-2995, 1964).

———. Trends in Soviet Thinking on Theater Warfare, Conventional Operations, and Limited War. (RAND Corporation Research Memorandum RM-4305-PR, 1964).

International Community Development Political Integration and Disintegration

Haviland, H. Field, Jr. Building a Political Community. International Organization. 17:3 (Summer 1963), 733-52.

Hoffman, Stanley. Discord in Community: The North Atlantic Area as a Partial International System. International Organization. 17:3 (Summer 1963), 521-49.

Kitzinger, Uwe. Regional and Functional Integration—Some Lessons of Brussels. Journal of Common Market Studies. 3:2 (February 1965), 118-23.

The Atlantic Community; and Western European Integration

Allais, Maurice. Preface to a Policy of Atlantic Unity. Atlantic Community Quarterly. 2:3 (Fall 1964), 350-66.

Birgi, Nuri. The Unfolding Alliance. Atlantic Community Quarterly. 2:3 (Fall 1964), 408-12.

Bloemer, Klaus. Amerika-Politik nicht ohne Frankreich. Aussen-politik. 16:2 (February 1965), 96-104

Borch Herbert von. Die Krise des atlantischen Bündnisses, Merkur. 19:1 (January 1965), 67-77.

Colonna, Guido. The State of the Alliance. Atlantic Community Quarterly. 2:3 (Fall 1964), 397-407.

Cox, R. W. The Study of European Institutions: Some Problems of Economic and Political Organization. Journal of Common Market Studies. 3:2 (February 1965), 102-17.

Ehrhardt, Carl A. Die grosse Belastungsprobe der EWG. Aussenpolitik. 15:12 (December 1964), 811-21.

Erler, Fritz. The Alliance and the Future of Germany. Foreign Affairs. 43:3 (April 1965), 436-46.

Foch, René. An Example of Atlantic Partnership: EURATOM. Atlantic Community Quarterly. 2:1 (Spring 1964), 72-80.

Gamarnikow, M. Poland, West Germany and the Common Market. Poland and Germany. 9:1 (January-March 1965), 3-14.

Grosser, Alfred. Divergences franco-allemandes. Revue de Défense Nationale. 21:1 (January 1965), 13-20.

Hallstein, Walter. Some of our 'faux problèmes' in the EEC. World Today. 21:1 (January 1965), 10-23.

Harned, Joseph. Atlantic Asembly—A Genesis. Journal of Common Market Studies. 3:2 (February 1965), 183-89.

Hoffman, Stanley. European Process at Atlantic Crosspurposes. Journal of Common Market Studies. 3:2 (February 1965), 85-101.

Huizinga, J. H. Which Way Europe? Foreign Affairs. 43:3 (April 1965), 487-500.

Kaspar, Claude. Der schweizerische Fremdenverkehr gegenüber den europäischen Integrationsbestrebungen. Aussenwirtschaft. 18:4 (December 1963), 371-83.

Kawalkowski, Al. Arguments pour une initiative française. Politique Etrangère. 29:5-6 (May-June 1964), 445-57.

Lambert, J. R. The European Economic Community and the Mediterranean Area. World Today. 21:4 (April 1965), 160-68.

Lorenz, Werner. General Principles of Law: Their Elaboration in the Court of Justice of the European Communities. American Journal of Comparative Law. 13:1 (Winter 1964), 1-29.

Marchal, André. Le problème de la supranationalité dans l' "Europe des Six." Rivista internazionale di Scienze economiche e commerciali. 12:2 (February 1965), 135-42.

Marjolin, Robert. The Common Market: Inward or Outward? Atlantic Community Quarterly. 2:2 (Summer 1964), 233-39.

Meyer-Burckhardt, Martin. Von der EWG zu einer Internationalen Agrarpolitik. Aussenpolitik. 16:3 (March 1965), 174-80.

Mozer, Alfred. Perspektiven der EWG-Politik

Neue Rundschau. 76:1 (1965), 77-88.

Munk, Frank. The Atlantic Community and World Community. Atlantic Community Quarterly. 2:1 (Spring 1964), 53-61.

Overstreet, Alan Burr. The Nature and Prospects of European Institutions. Journal of Common Market Studies. 3:2 (February 1965), 124-68.

Schneider, Erich. Planung, Programmierung und Koordinierung in der Europäischen Wirtschaftsgemeinschaft. Weltwirtschaftliches Archiv. 93:1 (1964), 1-22.

Segni, Antonio. A Goal of Basic Importance. Atlantic Community Quarterly. 2:1 (Spring 1964), 5-9.

Segré, Claudio. Orientaciones de politica monetaria en la Comunidad Económina Europea. Revista de Economia y Estadistica. 8:2 (1964), 173-92.

Spaak, Paul-Henri. Europe, 1964. Atlantic Community Quarterly. 2:2 (Summer 1964), 165-70.

——. A New Effort to Build Europe. Foreign Affairs. 43:2 (January 1965), 199-208.

Strauss, Franz Josef. An Alliance of Continents. International Affairs. 41:2 (April 1965), 191-203.

-----. How Can Progress in European Integration be Achieved? Atlantic Community Quarterly. 2:3 (Fall 1964), 389-95.

Ungerer, Werner. Die Assoziierungspolitik der EWG. Aussenpolitik. 15:10 (October 1964), 685-97.

Weber, Wilhelm. Argumente für eine engere Assoziierung Österreichs mit der EWG. Aussenwirtschaft. 18:4 (December 1963), 358-70.

Wolfers, Arnold. Integration in the West: The Conflict of Perspectives. International Organization. 17:3 (Summer 1963), 753-70.

The Soviet Bloc

Alexeyev, A. and L. Ivanova. Prospects of Economic Development before the CMEA Countries. International Affairs (USSR). No. 3 (March 1965), 18-25.

Carlisle, Donald S. The Sino-Soviet Schism. Orbis. 8:4 (Winter 1965), 790-815.

Clemens, Walter C., Jr. The Sino-Soviet Dispute—Dogma and Dialectics on Disarmament. International Affairs. 41:2 (April 1965), 204-22.

Conzelmann, Paulwalter. EWG und COME-CON. Schmollers Jahrbuch. 83:6 (1963), 669-95.

Coser, Lewis. The Breakup of the Soviet Camp. Dissent. 12:2 (Spring 1965), 213-25.

Kerven, Daniel. La Chine Communiste et l'URSS. Politique Etrangère. 29:5-6 (May-June 1964), 531-52.

Nowak, Jan. The Stalinist Underground in Poland. East Europe. 14:3 (March 1965), 2-6.

Stolte, Stefan C. Comecon's Nineteenth Conference. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. 12:5 (May 1965), 17-21.

The State of Communist Parties Throughout the World: A Symposium. Survey. No. 54 (January 1965), 51-196.

Other Regional Arrangements and Developments

Elias, T. O. The Charter of the Organization of African Unity. American Journal of International Law. 59:2 (April 1965), 243-67.

Greening, W. E. Crisis in French Canada. The Yale Review. 54:3 (March 1965), 375-82.

Labib, Subhi. Nationsbildung im arabischen Orient. Saeculum. 15:4 (1964), 350-64.

Martinez Montero, Homero. The Republic of Central America; an Old Dream, a New Hope. Americas. 17:3 (March 1965), 18-23.

Plischke, Elmer. Integrating Berlin and the Federal Republic. Journal of Politics. 27:1 (February 1965), 35-65.

Rivkin, Arnold. The Organization of African Unity. Current History. 48:284 (April 1965), 193-200

Ryan, Claude. The French-Canadian Dilemma. Foreign Affairs. 43:3 (April 1965), 462-74.

Schiff, Mortimer. Separatism in Quebec. Midstream, 11:1 (March 1965), 69-78.

Schmitter, Philippe C. and Ernst B. Haas. Mexico and Latin American Economic Integration. (University of California, Berkeley, Institute of International Studies, Research Series No. 5, 1964).

Shepherd, George W., Jr. The Khartoum Conference; New Confrontation on the Southern Sudan. Africa Report. 10:4 (April 1965), 12-16.

International Law and Organization

International Law

Amerasinghe, Chittharanjan F. State Breaches of Contracts with Aliens and International Law. American Journal of International Law. 58:4 (October 1964), 881-913.

Falk, Richard A. The Complexity of Sabbatino. American Journal of International Law. 58:4 (October 1964), 935-51.

Fenwick, C. G. Recognition de facto—in Reverse Gear. American Journal of International Law. 58:4 (October 1964), 965-67.

Isard, Walter and Julian Wolpert. Notes on Social Science Principles for World Law and Order. Journal of Peace Research. 1:3-4 (1964), 242-51.

Kreuter, Heinz. Die Rechtsstellung Berlins. Geschichte in Wissenschaft und Unterricht. 16:2 (February 1965), 99-116.

Kröger, Herbert. The Potsdam Agreement and the Western Powers' Responsibility. German Foreign Policy (East Germany). 4:1 (1965), 23-31.

Lester, A. P. River Pollution in International

Law. American Journal of International Law. 57:4 (October 1963), 828-53.

Sinha, S. Prakash. Perspective of the Newly Independent States on the Binding Quality of International Law. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. 14:1 (January 1965), 121-31.

Weil, Gordon L. The Evolution of the European Convention on Human Rights. American Journal of International Law. 57:4 (October 1963), 804-27.

Weissberg, Günter. Maps as Evidence in International Boundary Disputes: A Reappraisal. American Journal of International Law. 57:4 (October 1963), 781-803.

Wright, Quincy. Reflections on the Sabbatino case. American Journal of International Law. 59:2 (April 1965), 304-14.

The United Nations and Specialized Agencies.

Bolz, Lothar. University—Aim of the United Nations. German Foreign Policy (East Germany). 4:1 (1965), 3-11.

Chiu, Hungdah. Succession in International Organizations. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. 14:1 (January 1965), 83-120.

Curtis, Gerald L. The United Nations Observation Group in Lebanon. *International Organiza*tion. 18:1 (Winter 1964), 738-65.

Fenwick, Charles G. The Organization of American States. American Journal of International Law. 59:2 (April 1965), 315-20.

Gardner, Richard N. GATT and the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development. International Organization. 18:1 (Winter 1964), 685-704

Georges-Picot, G. La Réforme des Nations Unies. Revue de Paris. 72:3 (March 1965), 68-81.

Gross, Leo. The Jurisprudence of the World Court: Thirty-Eighth Year (1959). American Journal of International Law. 57:4 (October 1963), 751-80.

Heathcote, Nina. United Nations and Nation-Building. International Journal. 20:1 (Winter 1964-65), 20-32.

Kunugi, Tatsuro. State Succession in the Framework of GATT. American Journal of International Law. 59:2 (April 1965), 268-90.

Manzer, Ronald A. The United Nations Special Fund. International Organization. 18:1 (Winter 1964), 766-89.

Menon, M. A. K. Universal Postal Union. International Conciliation. No. 552 (March 1965).

Potter, Pitman B. Contemporary Problems of International Organization. American Journal of International Law. 59:2 (April 1965), 291-303.

Schachter, Oscar. The Quasi-Judicial Role of the Security Council and the General Assembly. American Journal of International Law. 58:4 (October 1964), 960-64.

Simsarian, James. Outer Space Co-operation in the United Nations. American Journal of International Law. 57:4 (October 1963), 854-67.

Skubiszewski, Krzysztof. Forms of Participation of International Organizations in the Lawmaking Processes. International Organization. 18:1 (Winter 1964), 790-805.

Zoll, Werner. Der Niedergang der Vereinten Nationen. Aussenpolitik.16:4 (April 1965), 227-36.

The International Economy

International Economic Problems and Policies

Aschinger, F. Der amerikanisch-französische Gegensatz in der Währungsfrage. Aussenwirtschaft. 20:1 (March 1965), 33-47.

Craven, J. Howard. Some Aspects of Applying the Theory of Comparative Advantage to the Emerging International Economy. Western Economic Journal. 3:1 (Fall 1964), 52-64.

Dach, Joseph. Legal Nature of the Euro-Dollar. American Journal of Comparative Law. 13:1 (Winter 1964), 30-43.

Dauphin-Meunier, Achille. Le Marché de l'Euro-dollar (Il mercato dell' eurodollaro). Rivista internazionale di Scienze economiche e commerciali. 12:3 (March 1965), 211-29.

Gilbert, Milton and Warren McClam. Domestic and External Equilibrium: European Objectives and Policies. American Economic Review. 55:2 (May 1965), 189-99.

Grubel, Herbert G. The Case against an International Commodity Reserve Currency. Oxford Economic Papers. 17:1 (March 1965), 130-35.

Hein, J. Monetary Policy and External Convertibility: The German Experience, 1959-1961. Economia Internazionale. 17:3 (August 1964), 509-35.

Jungenfelt, K. G. Raw Materials in International Trade. Ekonomisk Tidskrift. 66:1 (March 1964), 1-25.

Kindleberger, Charles P. Trends in International Economics. Annals of the American Academy. Vol. 358 (March 1965), 170-79.

Mikesell, Raymond F. Debt Servicing Capacity and International Lending. Rivista internazionale di Scienze economiche e commerciali. 12:3 (March 1965), 230-45.

Oniki, H. and H. Uzawa. Patterns of Trade and Investment in a Dynamic Model of International Trade. Review of Economic Studies. 32:89 (January 1965), 15-38.

Seers, Dudley. International Aid: The Next Steps. Journal of Modern African Studies. 2:4 (December 1964), 471-90.

Stein, Herbert. The Evolving International Monetary System and Domestic Economic Policy. American Economic Review. 55:2 (May 1965), 200-207.

Stein, J. L. International Short-Term Capital Movements. American Economic Review. 55:1 (March 1965), 40-66.

Sterling under Strain. Round Table. No. 218 (March 1965), 106-13.

Triffin, Robert. The Sterling Crisis in Wider Perspective. The Banker. 65:468 (February 1965), 79-83.

Weber, Max. Die internationale Währungspolitik vor dem Europarat. Aussenwirtschaft. 20:1 (March 1965), 48-67.

Economic Development

Balassa, B. The Capital Needs of the Developing Countries. Kyklos. 17:2 (1964), 197-206.

Crucillo, Cornelio V. Foreign Aid in Planned Economic Development. Economic Research Journal. 11:1 (June 1964), 4-17.

Dubey, Vinod. Food Aid and Economic Development in Underdeveloped Countries. Indian Journal of Economics. 45:177 (October 1964), 167-98.

Kaldor, Nicholas. International Trade and Economic Development. Journal of Modern African Studies. 2:4 (December 1964), 491-512.

Kunkel, John H. Values and Behavior in Economic Development. Economic Development and Cultural Change. 13:3 (April 1965), 257-77.

Seers, Dudley. The Stages of Economic Development of a Primary Producer in the Middle of the Twentieth Century. Economic Bulletin of Ghana. 7:4 (1963), 57-69.

Watson, Andrew and Joel B. Dirlan. The Impact of Underdevelopment on Economic Planning. Quarterly Journal of Economics. 79:2 (May 1965), 167-94.

National Policies and Issues

The United States

Baldwin, Hanson W. Slow-Down in the Pentagon. Foreign Affairs. 43:2 (January 1965), 262-80.

Barzun, Jacques. The Man in the American Mask. Foreign Affairs. 43:3 (April 1965), 426-35.

Byung-kyu, Kang. Failure of American Far Eastern Policy. Korean Affairs. 3:3 (December 1964), 315-45.

Clubb, O. Edmund. Sino-American Relations and the Future of Formosa. Political Science Quarterly. 80:1 (March 1965), 1-21.

Fleming, D. F. What is our Role in East Asia? Western Political Quarterly. 18:1 (March 1965), 73-86.

Hendrick, James Pomeroy. The United States Antidumping Act. American Journal of International Law. 58:4 (October 1964), 914-34.

Hoskins, Halford L. The U.S. in the Middle East: Policy in Transition. Current History. 48:285 (May 1965), 257-62.

Johnson, Dudley W. The Current Balance-of-Payments Deficit of the United States Government Policy: A Study in Policy Conflict and "Trade-Off." Western Economic Journal. 3:1 (Fall 1964), 65-85.

Johnson Leland L. U.S. Business Interests in Cuba and the Rise of Castro. World Politics. 17:3 (April 1965). 440-59.

Riga, P. The Alliance for Progress: An Appraisal. World Justice. 6:3 (March 1965), 296-316.

Stratton, James H. Sea-Level Canal: How and Where. Foreign Affairs. 43:3 (April 1965), 513-18.

Tarr, David W. Military Technology and the Policy Process. Western Political Quarterly. 18:1 (March 1965), 135-48.

White, Merrill A. Some Considerations of United States Foreign Policy Toward Eastern Europe: 1941-1964. Polish Review. 10:1 (Winter 1965), 3-42.

Canada

Pearson, Lester B. Good Neighborhood. Foreign Affairs. 43:2 (January 1965), 251-61.

Latin America

Debray, Régis. Le castrisme: la Longue Marche de l'Amérique Latine. Temps Modernes. 20:224 (January 1965), 1172-1237.

Gutiérrez-Girardot, Rafael. Lateinamerika und die cubanische Revolution. Merkur. 19:3 (March 1965), 272-84.

Monbeig, Pierre, ed. Amérique Latine-Europe 1964: A Symposium. Tiers-Monde. 5:19 (July-September 1964).

Western Europe

Agriculture and Commonwealth. Round Table. No. 218 (March 1965), 144-150.

Chauvel, Jean. Le Sud-est Asiatique et la Politique Française. La Revue des Deux Mondes. No. 8 (15 April 1965), 481-93.

Christophersen, Jens A. Realpolitikk eller moralpolitikk—et utenrikspolitisk dilemma. Samtiden. 73:9 (1964), 549-63.

Critchley, Julian. Ending the Myth of Nuclear Independence. Crossbow. 8:31 (April-June 1965), 29-30

Doernberg, S. Bonn's Atomic Ambitions. International Affairs (USSR). No. 3 (March 1965), 9-13.

Erhard, Ludwig. European Policy of the German Federal Government. Atlantic Community Quarterly. 2:3 (Fall 1964), 377-88.

Fackler, Maxim. The Franco-German Treaty: The End of Hereditary Enmity. World Today. 21:1 (January 1965), 24-32.

Hayter, Teresa. French Aid to Africa—its Scope and Achievements. International Affairs. 41:2 (April 1965), 236-51.

Hogg, Quinton. Britain Looks Forward. Foreign Affairs. 43:3 (April 1965), 409-25.

Jarvie, Ian. Far East: Backing the Americans. Crossbow. 8:31 (April-June 1965), 37-38.

Krosby, H. Peter. Norway in NATO: A Partial Commitment? International Journal. 20:1 (Winter 1964-65), 68-78.

Labour's Commonwealth Secretariat. Round Table. No. 217 (December 1964), 6-13.

Le Marec, Pierre. Les préalables à la réunification allemande. Revue de Défense Nationale. 21:2 (February 1965), 208-22; and 21:3 (March 1965), 372-85.

Maudling, Reginald. Economics of Foreign Policy. Crossbow. 8:31 (April-June 1965), 34-36. Memnon. Vers la révision. Revue générale belge. 101:2 (February 1965), 93-100.

Mende, Erich. La République Fédérale et l'unité nationale allemande. Politique Etrangère. 29:5-6 (May-June 1964), 421-32.

Pélissier, René. Spain's Discreet Decolonization. Foreign Affairs. 43:3 (April 1965), 519-27.

Rose, Saul. Labour's Pax Britannica. Political Quarterly. 36:2 (April-June 1965), 131-41.

Tron, Ludovic. L'armement de la France. Revue des deux Mondes. No. 7 (1 April 1965), 321-33.

Warner, Geoffrey. Gaullist Foreign Policy. World Today. 21:3 (March 1965), 112-19.

Soviet Union and Eastern Europe

Galay, Nikolai. The Limits of the Soviet Potential. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. 12:5 (May 1965), 26-31.

——. The Soviet Approach to the Modern Military Revolution. Studies on the Soviet Union. 4:2 (1964), 28-38.

——. The Soviet Armed Forces on the Threshold of a New Era. Bulletin of the Institute for the Study of the USSR. 12:4 (April 1965), 15-19.

Gehlen, Michael P. The Politics of Soviet Foreign Trade. Western Political Quarterly. 18:1 (March 1965), 104-15.

Glejdura, Stefan. La Politica Exterior de la U.R.S.S. (1962-1965). Revista de Politica Internacional. No. 77 (January-February 1965), 19-56. Goldman, Marshall I. A Balance Sheet of Soviet Foreign Aid. Foreign Affairs. 43:2 (January 1965), 349-60.

Karcher. Aspects des puissances militaires soviétique et chinoise. Revue de Défense Nationale. 21:3 (March 1965), 386-400.

Kruczkowski, A. The Foreign Policy of People's

Poland. International Affairs (USSR). No. 1 (January 1965), 42-48.

Mackintosh, Malcolm. Implications of the Sino-Soviet Dispute. Studies on the Soviet Union. 4:2 (1964), 19-27.

Meyer-Landrut, Andreas. Zum Deutschland-Bild der Sowjets. Aussenpolitik. 15:12 (December 1964). 834-42.

Nielsen-Stokkeby, Bernd. Moskau zwischen Nationalismus und Internationalismus. Aussenpolitik. 16:3 (March 1965), 163-73.

Ray, Hemen. The Policy of Russia towards Sino-Indian Conflict. Political Quarterly. 36:1 (January-March 1965), 92-104.

Sanakoyev, Sh. Internationalism and Socialist Diplomacy. International Affairs (USSR). No. 5 (May 1965), 19-27.

Singh, L. P. Changing Soviet Strategy and Tactics in ECAFE. Studies on the Soviet Union. 4:2 (1964), 64-71.

Welch, William. The Puzzle of Soviet External Goals. South Atlantic Quarterly. 64:2 (Spring 1965), 157-65.

Wiles, Peter. Economic War and the Soviet-Type Economy. Osteuropa Wirtschaft. 10:1 (March 1965), 27-42.

Wolfe, Thomas W. Impact of Khrushchev's Downfall on Soviet Military Policy and Detente. (RAND Corporation Paper P-3010, 1964).

"Force de Frappe." (RAND Corporation Research Memorandum RM-4359-ISA, 1965).

The Middle East

Chauvel, Jean-François. Le choix de Nasser. Revue de Paris. 72:4 (April 1965), 96-102.

Issawi, Charles. The Arab World's Heavy Legacy. Foreign Affairs. 43:3 (April 1965), 501-12.

Laqueur, Walter Z. Bonn, Cairo, Jerusalem: The Triple Crisis. Commentary. 39:5 (May 1965), 29-38.

Meyer-Ranke, Peter. Nasser am Tor des sozialistischen Lagers. Aussenpolitik. 16:3 (March 1965), 153-62.

Psomiades, Harry J. The Cyprus Dispute. Current History. 48:285 (May 1965), 269-76.

Simpson, Dwight J. Israel: The State of Siege. Current History. 48:285 (May 1965), 263-68.

Africa

Anstey, Roger. The Congo Rebellion. World Today. 21:4 (April 1965), 169-76.

Décolonisation et Indépendance du Rwanda et du Burundi. Chronique de Politique Etrangère. 16:4-6 (July-November 1963), 445-708.

Markowitz, Marvin D. and Herbert F. Weiss. Rebellion in the Congo. Current History. 48:284 (April 1965), 213-18.

Molnar, Thomas. Neo-Colonialism in Africa? Modern Age. 9:2 (Spring 1965), 175-86.

Soper, Tom. Independent Africa and its Links with Europe. African Affairs. 64:254 (January 1965), 25-31.

South and Southeast Asia

Abdullah, Mohammad. Kashmir, India and Pakistan. Foreign Affairs. 43:3 (April 1965), 528-35.

Ansprenger, Franz. China in Afrika. Dokumente. 21:1 (February 1965), 29-38; and 21:2 (April 1965), 109-18.

Bell, Coral. South East Asia and the Powers. World Today. 21:4 (April 1965), 137-50.

Buchan, Alastair. The Security of India. World Today. 21:5 (May 1965), 210-16.

Carver, George A., Jr. The Real Revolution in South Viet Nam. Foreign Affairs. 43:3 (April 1965), 387-408.

Chiu, Hungdah. Communist China's Attitude Towards Nuclear Tests. China Quarterly. No. 21 (January-March 1965), 96-107.

Deviller, Philippe. Le conflit entre la Malaysie et l'Indonésie. Politique Etrangère. 29:5-6 (May-June 1964), 553-73.

Halperin, Morton H. Chinese Nuclear Strategy. China Quarterly. No. 21 (January-March 1965), 74-86.

Halpern, A. M. China in the Postwar World. China Quarterly. No. 21 (January-March 1965), 20-45.

McFarlane, Bruce. India: The Political Economy of Crisis. Australian Quarterly. 37:1 (March 1965), 9-23.

Smoker, Paul. Sino-Indian Relations: A Study of Trade, Communications and Defense. Journal of Peace Reasearch. 1:2 (1964), 65-76.

Taylor, Alastair M. Sukarno—First United Nations Drop-out. International Journal. 20:2 (Spring 1965), 206-13.

Warner, Geoffrey. Escalation in Vietnam—The Precedents of 1954. International Affairs. 41:2 (April 1965), 267-77.

Far East and Pacific

Australia: Geographical Basis of Foreign Policy. Round Table. No. 218 (March 1965), 177-84.

Briessen, Fritz van. Traditionalismus und Kommunismus in Ostasien. Aussenpolitik. 15:11 (November 1964), 751-67.

Sakata, Shōichi, et al. A Statement by Scientists Concerning the Call of Nuclear Submarines at Japanese Ports. Journal of Social and Political Ideas in Japan. 2:2 (August 1964), 103.

Storry, G. R. Japan's Position as a World Power. World Today. 21:5 (May 1965), 217-22.

DOCTORAL DISSERTATIONS IN POLITICAL SCIENCE

IN UNIVERSITIES OF THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA*

COMPILED BY WILLIAM C. SEYLER

Deputy Secretary, Department of Internal Affairs, Commonwealth of Pennsylvania

I. DISSERTATIONS IN PREPARATION

ADDITIONS, CHANGES, AND DELETIONS SINCE THE 1964 LISTING

POLITICAL PHILOSOPHY, THEORY AND METHODOLOGY

Additions

Larry L. Adams, The Political Psychology of Edmund Burke. California (Santa Barbara).

Claude Ake, A Machiavellian Model of Political Integration. Columbia.

Howard Ball, Moral Responsibility and "Social Justice": An Examination of the Supreme Court's Ethical Valuations As Seen in Selected "Equal Protection" Cases, 1940-1964. Rutgers.

Darryl H. Baskin, The Ideas of Political Community, Citizenship, and the Public Interest in Selected American Political Thinkers. California (Berekley).

Jane H. Bayes, The Concept of Participation in Politics. California (Los Angeles).

Leonard Billet, The Political Prerequisites of Economic Development. California (Los Angeles).

Stanton Burnett, Machiavelli's History of Florence. New School.

William I. Buscemi, Arthur F. Bentley: His Influence on American Political Science (An

* Similar lists have been printed in the REVIEW annually since 1911, except for 1915-19, 1921 and 1923-24; full citations are given in the 1955 list, XLIX 792.

Items which appeared in the September, 1964 list and which are still in preparation without change are not repeated in this listing. The present listing contains only additions, changes, and deletions. Additions are those items which were reported in preparation for the first time; changes are those items which have had a change in name, title, or classification; and deletions are those items which are no longer in preparation.

The lists printed in the Review are based on information from departments giving graduate instruction in political science; to avoid misunderstandings, entries are not accepted from individual candidates for degrees. The subject matter classification of an entry by the department concerned, if given, is followed. Each entry is listed under one classification only.

For a fuller note about coverage and subject matter classification, and for references to dissertation lists in cognate fields, see the 1960 list, LIV, 816.

For a chart which classifies, by subject category, the numbers of dissertations completed and in progress, 1951 through 1957, see this REVIEW, LII, 916.

Abstracts of some of the theses listed as completed may be found in "Dissertation Abstracts," published bi-monthly by University Microfilm, Ann Arbor, Michigan. Analysis of the Development of the Group Theory of Politics from Bentley to the Present). Notre Dame.

Charles Butterworth, Reason and Rhetoric: A Study of Averroe's Commentary on Aristotle's Rhetoric. Chicago.

Irving C. Carrig, The Political Implications of Descartes' Epistemology. Chicago.

Leo S. Chang, An Investigation into the Relationship Between the Nature of Human Political Behavior and Epistemology in Hans Kelsen's Pure Theory of Law. Georgetown.

Richard A. Chapman, Self-Interest and the State in Hume and Hobbes. California (Los Angeles).

Peter N. Crossland, A Comparison of Classical and Contemporary Democratic Theory with Reference to the Significance of Voting and Elections, Duke.

Martin Edelman, Democratic Theories and the Constitution. California (Berkeley).

Charles S. Edwards, Hugo Grotius: Theory and Implications. Princeton

Winston P. Fan, The Political Philosophy of K'ang Yu-wei: A Sociological Study of Religious Syncretism. Michigan State.

Adolph B. Fields, The Adjustment of the French Intellectual to Current Trends in French Political Life. Yale.

Fred Frohock, The Relationship Between Classical Political Philosophy and Contemporary Behavioral Theory. North Carolina.

John F. Gallagher, The Theoretical Basis of American State Legislation Dealing with Church-State Relationships. Pennsylvania

George J. Graham, Jr., Consensus: An Explication for Normative and Empirical Theory. Indiana.

John A. Gueguen, The Roger Williams—John Cotton Debate on Tolerance: A Study of the Relations between Politics and Religion. Chicago.

George S. Haggar, The Political and Social Thought of G.D.H. Cole. Columbia.

Mark Hagopian, The Political Theory of George Santagyana. Boston University.

Arnold Hall, Contemporary Asia Political Theory.

Claremont.

- Robert A. Heineman, Approaches to a Science of Politics and the Problem of Social Control: An Inquiry into the Thought of Some Representative Thinkers. American
- John D. Holm, A Comparison of Marxism and African Socialism: A Study in Ideologies of Transition. California (Los Angeles).
- George A. Kelly, Migrating Utopia: Paradigms of the Fulfilled Political Order (1760-1830). Harvard.
- Farshi K. Koshbafe, Attitude of Winston Churchill Toward Communism. Illinois.
- Young Kun Kim, Master and Servant in Hegel. Columbia.
- William J. Kirsch, Contemporary European Protestant Thought on Natural Law. Illinois.
- Aaron Kirschenbaum, Agency in Roman Law. Columbia.
- Paul M. Leary, The Romantic Reaction: Politics and Utopia in Contemporary Social Criticism. Rutgers.
- Harlan J. Lewin, Charisma: A Critique of the Concept. California (Berkeley).
- John A. Long, Pluralism and the Group Approach to the Study of Politics: English Political Pluralism Reconsidered. Missouri.
- John W. McDonald, Jr., Milovan Djilas: Communist Heretic—Unique or Traditional. Columbia.
- Robert J. McKenna, Contemporary American Protestant Thought on Church and State. Catholic University.
- Robert McShea, The Political Philosophy of Spinoza. Columbia.
- Harris Mirkin, The Domestication of Conflict: The 'Right of Revolution' in America. Princeton.
- Richard Muller, The Open Society: A Critique. Indiana.
- Willard Mullins, Ideology and Theory in Practical Politics. Washington (Seattle).
- Deane D. Neubauer, On the Theory of Polyarchy. Yale.
- John F. Newman, A Conceptual Analysis of Community Studies, 1953-1963. Florida.
- Raymond L. Nichols, Modern Intellectuals and Politics: Julien Benda and the Case of France. Princeton.
- Walter T. Odell, The Political Theory of Civiltá Cattolica as Developed from 1850-1870. Georgetown.
- John L. Pierce, The Revival of Natural Law Thought in Post-War Germany. Duke.
- Edward L. Plafkin, Freedom, Law and Crisis. California (Berkeley).
- Thomas A. Quaynor, Negritude. Southern Illinois. Leonard Rosenberg, The Political and Juridical Thought of William Patterson. New School.
- Israel Rosenfield, Freud and Ethics, Princeton.

- Richard H. Schweitzer, Jr., The Federalizing Process and Political Integration: A Quantitative Analysis. California (Los Angeles)
- Richard T. Scully, Alexis de Toqueville's Concept of Freedom. Virginia.
- Abdelmonem Shaker, Islamic Concepts and Socio-Political Thought in Contemporary Arab Life. New York University.
- Alfred L. Stocki, The Political and Sociological Theory of Lester Frank Ward. Brown.
- Corey B. Venning, The Political Writings of Joseph Alsop. Chicago.
- Richard R. Warner, The Political Thought of Richard E. MacIver. American.
- John L. Washburn, An Analysis of the Political Significance of the Thought of B.F. Skinner. Duke.
- Morris M. Wilhelm, The Political Philosophy of Friedrich von Havek. Columbia.
- George R. Wills, The European Policies of General DeGaulle, Duke.
- Mitchell H. Zimmerman, Lower-Class Mobilization and Democratic Organization: A Participant-Observer Study of a Southern Civil Rights Group. Princeton.

Changes

- Jerome Boime, Violence and Myth: A Study of Georges Sorel. Chicago.
- Vilma A. Cavallaro, Antonio Gramsci—His Political Philosophy. New York University.
- Adolph B. Fields, Student Politics in France: l'Union Nationale des Etudiants de France. Yale. Charles I. Lumsden, Contemporary Ideology, An Analysis of Castroism. Toronto.
- Alasdair Morrison, Individuals and Collectivities. Chicago.

Deletions

- Spyros Dialismas, The Origins and Development of Athenian Democracy. American.
- Cecil H. Williams, On the Use of Nuclear Weapons: A Christian Perspective. Virginia

GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS OF THE UNITED STATES AND ITS DEPENDENCIES

- Weldon V. Barton, Interstate Compacts in the Policy Process. Florida State.
- Jonathan L. Bayer, Legislative Attitude Toward Foreign Aid: A Case Study of Congress and United States Aid to Yugoslavia, the 87th and 88th Congress. Pennsylvania.
- Robert E. Cecile, Crisis Decision-Making in the Eisenhower and Kennedy Administrations. Oklahoma.

- George Cole, The Decision to Prosecute. Washington (Seattle).
- Rev. Royden B. Davis, S. J., The United States Commission on Civil Rights, 1957-1963: Its Place and Functions as an Executive Factfinding Commission. Georgetown.
- Owen deLong, Dean Acheson as Secretary of State. Harvard.
- Charles W. Dunn, The Interrelations of the Congress and the Presidency During Crisis Situations: A Communications Model. Florida State.
- Charles C. Fishburne, U.S. Policy toward Iran 1959-1963. Florida State.
- Sister M. Annunciation Flannelly, RSHM, The Role of the White House Office in the Administrations of President Dwight Eisenhower and President John F. Kennedy. Notre Dame.
- David A. Frier, Conflict of Interest in the Eisenhower Administration. Southern Illinois.
- Robert S. Gilmour, Policy-Making for the National Forests. Columbia.
- Carolyn S. Griffis, A Study of the Variables Affecting the Efficacy of the Presidential Veto: The Housing Act of 1959. Florida.
- Fred W. Grupp, The John Birch Society in Wisconsin. Pennsylvania.
- Jonathan P. Hawley, The Politics of National Park Establishment: A Comparative Study of the Sleeping Bear Sand Dunes of Michigan and the Ozark Rivers Basin of Missouri. Missouri.
- Thomas A. Henderson, Congressional Supervision of Administration: The House Committee on Government Operations, 1946-1963. Columbia.
- Richard D. Humphrey, Patterns of Recruitment to the U.S. House of Representatives: A Study of Six Selected Congresses. Chicago.
- Lynne B. Iglitzin, The Anatomy of Violence: The Role of Violence in the Social System. Bryn Mawr.
- Charles C. Jones, An Analysis of the Organization, Policies, Purposes, and Functions of the Peace Corps. West Virginia.
- Bernard W. Klein, Political Partisanship in Four State Legislatures. Michigan State.
- Thomas Landye, The Politics of Desegregation. Chicago.
- Mary K. Lepper, Demands and Supports for the Moscow Test Ban Treaty. Florida State.
- Christopher A. Leu, The Quest for Consensus in U.S. Foreign Aid Policy: A Study of the Roles and Relation of Congress and The Executive with Reference to Aid to Africa, 1957-1964. California (Los Angeles).
- Marilyn McCurtain, An Investigation of the Voter's Decision Process and His Political Behavior. Washington (Seattle).
- Bhanwar L. Maheshwari, Foreign Aid and the - Policy Process, 1963. Pennsylvania.

- J. Carl Metz, The President's Veto Power, 1889-1964: An Instrument of Executive Leadership. Pittsburgh.
- Ronald C. Moe, COMSAT: The Politics of Communications Satellites. Columbia.
- James E. Moran, Catholic Church Involvement in Selected Issues in American Politics. Maryland.
- Wayne Muller, An Analysis of Recent Political Activism in the Presbyterian Church. Washington (Seattle).
- David S. Myers, Foreign Affairs and the Presidential Election of 1964. Maryland.
- Roger M. Nichols, Voter Motivation in Two Florida Primary Elections. Florida State.
- Dennis J. O'Keefe, A Study of Decision-Making in the House District Committee. Maryland.
- Thomas A. Parnell, Jr., The Legislative Process under Presidents Woodrow Wilson, Franklin Roosevelt, and Lyndon Johnson. New York University.
- Rebecca R. Polland, The Impact of Political Transition on the Administration of Federal Food Surplus Distribution Programs. California (Berkeley).
- Laurellen Porter, The Interrelations of Foreign and Domestic Policy. Illinois.
- Winston Riddick, The Politics of National Highway Policy, 1953-1965. Columbia.
- Donald L. Robinson, The Negro Question in American Politics, 1776-1808. Cornell.
- Ira S. Rohter, Radical Rightists and Negative Voters: An Empirical Comparative Study of Their Attitudes, Values, and Social and Personality Characteristics. Michigan State.
- Robert W. Russell, The United States Congress and the Power to Use Military Force Abroad. Fletcher School.
- Gordon T. Saddler, The President's Appalachian Commission: Selective Aspects of Institutions and Processes with Respect to Natural and Human Resource Development. West Virginia.
- Orville Schmidt, The Political Aspects of the Communications Satellite Program. West Virginia.
- Marilyn Shapiro, The Philanthropic Foundation in Public Affairs. Columbia.
- Kenneth Sherrill, Regional Variations in the U.S. Political Culture. North Carolina.
- Norman L. Simmons, An Analysis of the Opposition to the United States Arms Control Policies.

 American.
- William C. Spragens, A Conflict Analysis of the Press Coverage of Congressional Elections. Michigan State.
- John L. Stanley, The Negro and Politics: New York State, 1820-1860. Cornell.

- George T. Sulzner, III, The Politics of the U.S. Civil Rights Commission. Michigan.
- Ralph J. Thomson, U.S. Policy and Pressure in Western Europe: The European Defense Community and the Multilateral Nuclear Force. Fletcher School.
- Larry J. Warner, American Federal Judges: A Study in Socio-Economic Backgrounds and Decision Making. Princeton.
- Jerry B. Waters, The Agricultural Policy Stalemate: A Study in the Conflict of Beliefs and Values. Michigan State.
- Hugh S. Whitaker, The Right to Vote: The Effects of Negro Enfranchisement in Selected Mississippi Counties. Florida State.

Changes

Benjamin T. Hourani, Lawyers and Politics: A Study in Political Involvement. Michigan State.

CONSTITUTIONAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE LAW IN THE UNITED STATES

Additions

- Donald F. Anderson, The Legacy of Succession: A Study of William Howard Taft. Cornell.
- Edward N. Beiser, Reapportionment in the Lower State and Federal Courts. Princeton.
- A. Stephen Boyan, Jr., The Expanding Judicial View of the Free Exercise of Religion Clause. Chicago.
- Herbert J. Brown, The "Economic Constitution": The Political Process and the Development of Judicial Responsibility for Anti-Trust Policy. Columbia.
- Truett L. Chance, Presidential Attitudes Towards Judicial Review. Texas.
- William J. Daniels, Attitudes of Lower Courts Toward the United States Supreme Court: The Lower Courts Practice Discretion. Iowa.
- Margery Elfin, The Nature and Effect of de facto Segregation Rulings on Three Selected Communities in New York State. Columbia.
- Gerald L. Hallworth, Constitutional Law and Police Practices in a Texas City. Texas.
- Jerome J. Hanus, The Writ of Certiorari as a Political Instrument. Maryland.
- Gerald E. Kerns, Innovation and Imitation in the Constitutional Decisions of John Marshall: The Hamiltonian Impact. Indiana.
- Joseph Lesser, The Port of New York Authority and the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives. Columbia.
- Martin A. Levin, The Criminal Judiciary in Two Cities. Harvard.
- Doyle Mathis, The Eleventh Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Georgia.

- Kenneth F. Mott, Indirect State Aid to Education: The Continuing Challenge. Brown.
- Richard Nunez, Impact of Public Authorities upon Local Government in New York State. Syracuse.
- Marian Oberfast, The New York City Superintendent of Schools and His Interest Group Constituency, 1950-1965: A Study in the Effects of Instability. Columbia.
- Paul K. Pollock, Justice William O. Douglas: Liberalism and the Law. Cornell.
- Charles Pulver, The Judicial Rights of the Indigent Under the Federal Statutes. Syracuse.
- Robert L. Rabin, Constitution, Court and Community: The Problem of Racial Stability in the Northern Urban Schools. Northwestern.
- Stephen Sachs, The Supreme Court and National Emergency. Chicago.

Changes

- Luther W. Odom, Justice Holmes and the Reasonable-Man Rule. Texas.
- Bruce Wilson, The Right to Vote: An Autopsy of the 15th Amendment. Claremont.

AMERICAN STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

- Robert Agranoff, Organization Theory and Political Parties: A Study of State Party Organization. Pittsburgh.
- Betty Jo Bailey, The Citizens' Housing and Planning Council of New York. Columbia.
- Charles G. Bell, Suburban Political Behavior in Los Angeles County, Southern California.
- David R. Berman, Problems of Relief in the Legislative Reapportionment Cases: An Analysis of Lower Court Decisions 1962-65. American.
- David Brower, Public Control of the Physical Development of Small Cities. Indiana.
- John Cook, County Financial Administration in Pennsylvania. Pennsylvania.
- Donald Epstein, The Political Influence of the Mass Media. Princeton.
- Lawrence Fahey, Politics of Education in California. Claremont.
- William V. Ford, A Community Decides: Policy-Making in Arlington County, Virginia. American.
- Donald L. Fowler, Presidential Elections in South Carolina: 1948 through 1960. Kentucky.
- Douglas Fox, Puerto Ricans in New York City Politics. Columbia.
- Kenneth Gervais, Negro Leadership in Los Angeles: A Study of Minority Political Leadership. Claremont.

- Jack Goldsmith, The Role of the Initiative as a Tactic of Interest Group Politics in California. California (Los Angeles).
- W. Robert Gump, A Functional Analysis of Patronage: The Case of Ohio. Ohio State.
- Thomas F. Hadac, The Growth of Political Areas: The Missouri-Illinois Metropolitan District. Princeton.
- Leland E. Hall, The 1964 Illinois At-Large Election of the House of Representatives. Illinois.
- Samuel B. Hamlett, The Metropolitan Problem in Tarrant County, Texas. Texas.
- Ronald D. Hedlund, The Socialization of Legislators into the Iowa General Assembly. Iowa.
- Clyde House, The North Carolina Fund: An Experiment in Private-Public Poverty Policy Making in North Carolina. North Carolina.
- David A. Johnston, The Budget Process in Ohio: Alternative Approaches. Ohio State.
- Michael Lipsky, Rent Strikes and the Politics of Low-Income Housing in New York City. Princeton.
- Peter Loder, Factors That Account for Local Government Autonomy in the United States. Pennsylvania.
- John E. Mueller, Reason and Caprice: Ballot Patterns in California, California (Los Angeles).
- Gunnar P. Nielsson, Denmark and European Economic Integration: A Small Country at the Cross Roads. California (Los Angeles).
- Saul Orkin, New Jersey Democratic Party Politics, 1949-1953: A Case Study in Leadership Succession. Columbia.
- Ernestine Patterson, The St. Louis Human Relations Council. Saint Louis.
- Janet W. Patton, Intergovernmental Decision Process: A Case Study of Selected Provisions of the Appalachian Regional Development Act of 1965 as Implemented in West Virginia. California (Berkeley).
- Chester B. Rogers, The Relationship of Governmental Structure to Policy Outcomes: An Examination of Different Local Government Structures. Northwestern.
- Alan Shank, New Jersey Reapportionment Politics: An Examination of the Strategies of Apportionment Solutions on Legislative Power. Rutgers.
- Reuben J. Snow, The Local Expert as a Conflict Manager in Municipal and Educational Government. Northwestern.
- Charles P. Sohner, Representation Theory and Apportionment Models: A Study of California Constituency. Southern California.
- Jean E. Spencer, Representation: Its Nature and Function in the Governmental Setting, with Special Reference to Local Government in Maryland. Maryland.

- Donald Sprengel, Gubernatorial Influence and Authority in North Carolina. North Carolina.
- Jean Stichcombe, A Study of Political Influence in an Industrial City: The Impact of the Reform Tradition in Toledo. Michigan.
- Leonard A. Stitelman, Non-Partisan Muncipal Elections—A Case Study (Boulder). Colorado.
- Donald G. Tannenbaum, Government and Negro Ghettos in New York City. New York University.
- Glenn Thomas, The St. Louis Bar Association. Saint Louis.
- Meredith W. Watts, Jr., The Response of State Legislative Representation to Social and Economic Change. Northwestern.
- John D. Wenum, Spatial Growth and the Central City: Problems, Potentials and the Case of Phoenix, Arizona. Northwestern.
- H. Dwight Wilson, Centralization and Democracy: A Study in the Theory of Local Government. Michigan.
- Thomas D. Wilson, Representation on County Governing Boards. Illinois.
- Fred W. Zuercher, The California State Superintendent of Public Instruction: A Study in Politics and Administration. California (Los Angeles).

Deletions

Herbert C. Phillips, Depressed Areas Legislation and West Virginia Politics. Pittsburgh.

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

Additions

- James E. Anderson, Canadian Party System: Coalitions and Competition. Princeton.
- David C. Davies, The Development of Canadian Socialist Thought. Toronto.
- Brian T. Donaldson, The Liberal Party in Ontario. Toronto.
- William H. McConnell, Judical Review of Prime Minister Bennett's New Deal Legislative Programme. Toronto.
- Harold J. Sutphen, Canadian-American Defense Cooperation 1945-1963. Fletcher School.
- John W. Warnock, Jr., An Analysis of Canada's Present and Future Role in NATO. American.

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION

- K. Abdel-Kawi, The Administrative Philosophy of Leonard D. White. New York University.
- Anis-ud-din Ahmed, Administrative Reorganization in Pakistan. Southern California.
- Joan Aron, Administrative Obstacles to Metropolitan Regional Cooperation. New York University.

- Allan Austin, Local Administration in Peru. New York University.
- Morris Bloom, An Evaluation of Pupil Transportation in New York City. New York University.
- Abraham P. Chess, The Role of Civilians in a Police Agency. New York University.
- Neil K. Coleman, A study of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints as a Social System: Its Structure and Maintenance. New York University.
- James L. Cox, Development and Administration of Water Supply Programs in Metropolitan Denver. Colorado.
- John S. Cutlar, An Analysis of Public Service Internship Programs in Selected Governmental Agencies. New York University.
- Harry Diamond, A Systems Approach to the Administration of Criminal Justice. Southern California.
- Robert L. Dove, The Problems of Administration and Coordination in the Protection of Civil Rights in America. Duke.
- Stanley Drabek, Headquarters-Field Relationships In The Ontario Department of Lands & Forests. Toronto.
- Harvey Flumenhaft, Alexander Hamilton on the Executive. Chicago.
- Stephen Fraser, The Strengthening of Local Government in Yugoslavia: Administrative Decentralization and the Commune. Johns Hopkins.
- Lawrence S. Graham, Public Personnel Administration in Brazil: An Analysis of Conflicting Values. Florida.
- Martha J. Harris, Organization for Federal Personnel Program Evaluation: With Particular Reference to the U.S. Veterans Administration.

 American.
- Warren Hatcher, A Study of Administrative Behavior in Relation to the Use of Budget as a Management Tool in a City General Hospital.

 New York University.
- John Hunger, Administrative Officers in North Dakota. Indiana.
- Nasir Islam, A Comparative Analysis of the Compensation System for Public Officials in Commonwealth Countries with Special Reference to Ghana, India, Nigeria and Pakistan. Southern California.
- William S. Koschny, An Analysis of the Ramifications and Effects of the Postal Modernization Program on the Postal Unions in the Post Office Department since 1952. American.
- Jackson M. McClain, State Capital Budgeting. Alabama.
- James Marshall, Effects of In-service Training Program on Styles of Operation of Local Government Officers. Connecticut.
- Robert J. Massey, Information for Research Man-

- agement: An Analysis of Information Needed for Application of Economic Choice in Planning and Procuring Contract Research and Description of Relevant Information Available in a Federal Research Support Agency. American.
- William Moffitt, Water and Government: Water Resource Management in a Small City. Southern California.
- Lawrence B. Mohr, Determinants of Extent of Non-Traditional Activity in Local Health Departments. Michigan.
- Charldean Newell, A Theoretical Model of Political Threat and Administrative Decision-Making Style. Texas.
- Eugene A. Olsen, The Organization, Administration and Finance of Area Vocational-Technical Schools in the State of Connecticut. New York University.
- Edwin D. Palmer, Negro Leadership and the Civil Rights Crisis: New York City 1964. New York University.
- Joseph C. Pilegge, Jr., The Role of Federal, State, and Local Governments in Planning for Selected Developmental Programs. Maryland.
- Gedaliah A. Rabinowitz, The Role of the Kibbutz in Israel's Development. New York University.
- Karl R. Rasmussen, A Comparative Study of the Coordination of Delinquency Prevention Services in Selected Neighborhoods in New York City. New York University.
- John A. Rehfuss, Metropolitan Multi-Purpose District Legislation for California—A Case Study. Southern California.
- Harold E. Riehm, State Supervision of County Revenues in Colorado—1965. Colorado.
- Zahid Shariff, An Analysis of the Treatment of Comparative Public Administration in Comparative Politics Scholarship. New York University.
- Mujib Sheikh, Executive Use of Time in a Comparative Study of Brazil, Pakistan and America. Southern California.
- Arnold Steigman, Mayor Council Government: A Case Study. New York University.
- Octavio J. Tocchio, Legislation and Law Enforcement for the Protection of the Physically Battered Child. American.
- Carol Twersky, The Role of the Press in the Executive Branch of the New York City Municipal Administration. New York University.
- Ernest Voss, Suggested Graduate Curriculum in Medical Care Administration. Southern California.

Changes

*Donald R. Norton, Organization and Administration of Municipal Courts in Colorado Home Rule Cities. Colorado. Catherine Papastathopoulos, Western Bureaucratic Behavior: An Empirical Analysis of American State Executives. Iowa.

FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

- Abdelkader Abbadi, Moroccan Labor Movement as a Mobilization System. California (Berkeley).
- David Abbott, Political Alienation in Mexico and Italy. North Carolina.
- Robert Abrams, The Local Soviets under Bolshevik Rule, 1917-1921. Columbia.
- Paul R. Abramson, Education and Political Socialization: A Case Study of English Educational Reform. California (Berkeley).
- James C. Akins, French Policy in Afrique Noire: 1956-60. Harvard.
- Gayle Avant, Venezuelan Land Reform: A Case Study. North Carolina.
- Andrew Baggs, Phenomena Common to Creation of Popular Front Coalitions: The French Election of November, 1962. North Carolina.
- Krishna Bahadoorsing, Trinidad Electoral Politics. Indiana.
- Clinton Bailey, The Palestine Arabs in The Politics of Jordan. Columbia.
- Thomas Bastedo, The Cultural Community as a Political Interest Group in Selected Areas of North India. Duke.
- Lawrence Beer, The Public Welfare and Freedom of Expression in the Constitution of Japan. Washington (Seattle).
- Thomas J. Bellows, Political Parties in Singapore with Special Emphasis on the First Months of the Malaysian Federation. Yale.
- George W. Benz, Soviet Foreign Policy Toward the U.S., 1945-1947: The Evolution from Cooperation to a Policy of Hostility. Fletcher School.
- Willard Berry, An Administrative Study of Selected Districts in West Pakistan. Duke.
- Howard L. Biddulph, Soviet Interpretations of the Formation of Marxism. Indiana.
- James A. Bill, The Politics of Modernization in Iran—A Group-Class Analysis. Princeton.
- Ervin Birnbaum, State and Religion in Israel: The Politics of Compromise. Columbia.
- Michael J. Brenner, Technocratic and Political Leadership in a Mature Industrial Society: Their Implications for European Integration. California (Berkeley).
- Wilson B. Brown, Governmental Measures Concerning Exportation in Peru: A Study of Policy and Its Making, 1945-1962. Fletcher School.
- Josef Burger, Indian Students and American Education. Wisconsin.

- David Butler, Assumptions about Political Development in U.S. Foreign Policy toward Latin America, 1961-65. Harvard.
- Douglas P. Bwy, A Comparative Study of Governmental Instability in Latin America. Northwestern.
- Barbara Calloway, A Study of Urban Politics in Enugu, Nigeria. Boston University.
- H. Carl Camp, Caudillismo: The Dynamics of Power. Washington (St. Louis).
- Paul Cassidy, West German Political Culture.
 North Carolina.
- Woodley L. Chapman, The Politics of British Education Since 1944. Columbia.
- Everett Chard, The System of Local Government in Kenya, with Special Attention to Integration and Economic Development in the Local Areas. California (Berkeley).
- Pi-chao Chen, The Developments of the Population Policy in Communist China: A Case Study in Decision-Making in Communist China. Princeton.
- Don Chenoweth, Civil Procedure in the USSR. Saint Louis.
- John N. Collins, Xenophobia in Ghanian Foreign Relations. Northwestern.
- Richard E. Combs, Jr., The Role of Ideology in Postwar Soviet Policy Determination. California (Berkeley).
- Thomas Cooke, The Contemporary Foreign Policy of Venezuela. American.
- Joseph Crowley, The Kenya Independence Movement: 1960-1963. Washington (Seattle).
- Jyotirindra Das Gupta, Groups Politics and Language Policy in India. California (Berkeley).
- Martinus R. Doornbos, Primordial Groups in National Politics. California (Berkeley).
- Sara Jo Edelstein, The British Labour Party and Unilateralism—1956-1961. California (Los Angeles).
- David D. Edwards, A Theory of Arms Control. Harvard.
- Carolyn M. Elliott, Group Politics in Andhra Pradesh, India. Harvard.
- Paul S. Ello, The Peasant and the Commissar: The Politics of Agricultural Development in the Democratic Republic of North Vietnam and the Democratic Republic of North Korea. Iowa.
- Victor L. Emanuel, The Chilean Christian Democratic Party—an Ecological Analysis of Its Development. Harvard.
- Cynthia H. Enloe, The Politics of Ethnic Pluralism: The Case of Malaysia. California (Berkelev).
- John T. Farr, The Withering Away of the State in the Soviet Union in Theory and Practice. Texas.
- Adnan Fawwaz, The Role of Lebanon in the - Power Struggle of the Contemporary Arab World American:

- Daniel Figgins, Social Backgrounds and Perspectives of Peruvian and Foreign Agents of Agrarian Reform. Syracuse
- John A. Fitzgerald, The Systematic Analysis of Non-Western Political Systems: A Critique. Chicago.
- Edith Frankel, Political Control of Literature in the Soviet Union. Columbia.
- Joseph R. Franklin, The Role of the Military Establishment in the Congo (Brazzaville). American.
 - Zygmunt Friedemann, America Through the Polish Looking Glass (The Images of America in Poland). Brown
- Timothy Gamelin, A Study of Administration in Selected Districts in East Pakistan. Duke.
- Lela A. Garner, The Philippine Claim to North Borneo. Fletcher School.
- David S. Gibbons, Some Key Aspects of Political Modernization: What Do We Know? Princeton.
- Irene Gilbert, The Politics of Tradition and Modernity in India: The Amalgam in Bengal and Madhya Pradesh. Chicago.
- George W. Grayson, Jr., Chilean Christian Democratic Party: Genesis, Development and Ideology. Johns Hopkins.
 - Sanford D. Greenberg, United States Policy Toward the Republic of South Africa 1945-1964. Harvard.
 - Joseph Ha, North Korean Agriculture As a Reflection of Soviet and Chinese Models: A Political and Legal Study. Columbia.
 - Syed M. Haider, The Judicial Supervision of Administrative Discretion in Pakistan. Duke
 - Kenneth I. Hanf, Role of Bureaucratic Agencies in Political Process of Federal German Republic, Especially Their Relationships with Social-Economic Interest Groups. California (Berkeley).
 - William A. Harper, A Comparative Study of American and British Electoral Politics. Tufts.
 - Theodore Harrison, The Effect of the Congo Crisis on Soviet Foreign Policy, 1960-1963. Fletcher School.
 - Margaret I. Haupt, Australian Policy Towards the West Irian Dispute. Fletcher School.
 - Jon P. Heggan, Political Socialization in the Educational System of Colombia. Illinois.
 - Erik P. Hoffmann, The Administration of Agitation and Propaganda in the Soviet Union, 1959-1963. Indiana.
 - Emmett J. Holland, A Study of Bolivian Foreign Relations 1935-1946. American.
 - Donald L. Horowitz, Political Community in Multiracial Societies. Harvard.

- Mab Huang, A Study of the Rural Commune in China as a Social Unit, 1958-1963. Columbia.
- Asrar Husain, A Comparative Study of the Distribution of Legislative Powers in India, Pakistan, Nigeria and Malasia. Duke.
- Lars H. Hydle, The Press and Politics in Nigeria. Columbia.
- Ronald Inglehart, The Political Socialization of "Europeans". Chicago.
- John A. Jacobsohn, Bolivian Nationalism as Seen by Bolivian Writers. Maryland.
- Leonard Jeffries, Political Integration in Ivory Coast Republic: A Study of the Relationship between the Mass Party and Local Administration in Selected Areas of an Emerging Nation. Columbia.
- A. Collins Jenko, Yugoslavia: The Problem of Unification. Boston University.
- Richard E. Johnston, Federalism: A Study in Comparative Constitutional Law. Texas.
- Mack H. Jones, The Comparative Influence of the Permanent Members of the Security Council in the Conflict Resolution Process: 1946-1965. Illinois.
- George Kacewicz, The Polish Government-in-Exile. Indiana.
- Wasyl Kalynowych, The Soviet Concept of Human Rights. Indiana.
- Tetsuya Kataoka, The Great Leap Forward: A Study of Communism. Chicago.
- Richard J. Kestler, Policies of the British Conservative Party towards African Colonialism, 1945-1964: Ohio State.
- Nadia Khalaf, British Policy in the Administration of the Sudan: 1899-1951. Duke.
- Arthur Klinghoffer, African Socialism and Socialism in Africa: Sub-Saharan Africa in Soviet Perspective, 1955-1964. Columbia.
- Jon P. Kraus, The Politics of the Single Party System in Ghana: The Evolution of the Structures and Functions of Political Control and Mobilization, 1949-1965. Johns Hopkins.
- Clifford E. Landers, The União Democrática Nacional in the State of Guanabara: An Attitudinal Study of Party Membership. Florida.
- Rudolph Larzar, Ideological Adjustment of the British Labour Party: 1945-1964. North Carolina.
- Peter D. Latimer, Economic and Social Change Under the Alliance for Progress: The Colombian Response. Fletcher School.
- Manwoo Lee, The Politics of Instability: Crises of Political Legitimacy in Argentine Politics. Columbia.
- Robert H. Legvold, Soviet Policy Toward West Africa in the Post-Colonial Period. Fletcher School.
- Harold Levy, The Hindu Code Bill: Social Mod-

- ernization through Legislation in British India and in Independent India, Chicago.
- Sherman Lewis, The Politics of Agrarian Reform in Peru. Columbia.
- Winslow Lincoln, Central American Union: The Organization of Central American States and its Common Market. Claremont
- Lawrence Littwin, Foreign Policy Decision Making in Chile. New York University.
- Theodore D. Long, Japan's Science Policy. Columbia.
- Jerry K. Loveland, The Establishment of the Instruments of Modern Rule in Western Samoa. American.
- Dennis McNutt, West African Independence: An Examination of British and French Colonial Policy. Claremont.
- Eleanor Main, The Impact of Urbanization: A Comparative Study of Urban and Non-Urban Political Attitudes and Behavior. North Carolina.
- Yogendra K. Malik, The Failure of the Attempt by Trinidadian East Indian Social Elite to Form a Viable Mass Party. Florida.
- Robert Mantel, A Study of Austrian Neutrality. Columbia.
- Ann B. Matasar, Labor Transfer in Western Europe: The Problem of Italian Workers in Switzerland. Columbia.
- Richard L. Maullin, Political Recruitment and Socialization of Youth in the Mexican Partido Revolucionario Institucional. California. (Los Angeles).
- Peter H. Melvin, Ritualism as Political Action in the Democratic and Totalitarian Societies. California (Berkeley).
- Constantine Menges, The Politics of Agrarian Reform in Chile, 1958-1964: The Role of Parties and Interest Groups. Columbia.
- N. David Milder, The New Managerial Class in France. Cornell.
- Ernest N. Morin, Price Control and British Politics. Illinois.
- Fred L. Morrison, Judicial Process in Switzerland:
 A Study of the Swiss Federal Court. Princeton.
- William D. Muller, The Parliamentary Activity of Trade Union MP's, 1959-1964. Florida.
- Jeremiah Murphy, Coalition Formation in Denmark. Indiana.
- Robert Myhr, The Role of the University Student in Brazilian Politics. Columbia.
- Mohammed A. Nawawi, Regional Government and Administration in South Sumatra, Indonesia. Princeton.
- James L. Nichols, Minority Nationality Cadres in Communist China. Stanford.
- Norman Nicholson, The Political Effect of PL-480 Food Grain Assistance to India. Cornell.

- Norma C. Noonan, Khrushchev and Nehru: Peaceful Coexistence or Expediency. Indiana.
- Eric Nordlinger, The Working-Class Tories: A Study in English Political Culture. Princeton.
- Stephen Oren, A Comparative Analysis of the Political Roles of Three Indian Religious Groups: Kerala Christians, Mysore Lingayats, Punjabi Sikhs. Columbia.
- Roger K. Paget, Development of Political Thought in Java. Cornell.
- Roger F. Pajak, Soviet Military Aid: An Instrument of Soviet Foreign Policy Toward the Developing Countries. American.
- Yung Ho Park, The Electoral Reform Law of 1962: A Case Study of the Japanese Policy-Making Process. Illinois.
- James L. Payne, Political Party Conflict in Colombia. California (Berkeley).
- James F. Petris, The Role of the Middle Class in Chilean Modernization. California (Berkeley).
- David L. Porter, The Role of Workers' Self-Management in the Political Development of Algeria. Columbia.
- David E. Powell, Organized Anti-Religious Propaganda in the Soviet Union, 1959-1963. Yale.
- Adam Przeworski, Economic Development, Articulation of Interests, and Integration. Northwestern.
- William Richter, Indian Federalism and Linguistic Policy. Chicago.
- Carey G. Rickabaugh, The Politicization Function of Agrarian Associational and Institutional Interest Groups: A Bolivian Case Study. Maryland.
- Riordan Roett, Political Development and Institutional Conflicts in Northeast Brazil. Columbia.
- Marvin L. Rogers, The Determinants and Consequences of Political Consciousness Among Malay Villagers. California (Berkeley).
- Leonard Rushfield, Indian National Security Policy, 1947-1964. Columbia.
- Dorothy H. M. Sampas, The Controversy over the Major Political Causes of the French Collapse in 1940. Georgetown.
- Ina Schlesinger. The Pioneer Organization: The Evolution of Citizenship Education in the Soviet Union. Columbia.
- Edward J. Schmutzer, Political Parties and Their Development in the Netherlands East Indies in the 1920's. California (Santa Barbara).
- Joel Schwartz, The Young Communist League (1954-1962): A Case Study of Group Cooperation and Conflict in Soviet Society. Indiana.
- Donald Searing, Political Culture and Political Stability: Britain and France. Brown.
- Robert S. Sharlet, E.B. Pashukanis and the Politics of Soviet Law, 1924-1938. Indiana.

- Philip A. Shellhaas, Neighborhood Participation in the Administration of the Soviet State: A Study of Voluntary Neighborhood Organizations in the Soviet Union. Columbia.
- Harvey G. Simmons, The French Socialist Party, 1956-1964. Cornell.
- Richard Simpson, The Political Recruitment of Urban Influentials in Sierra Leone. Indiana.
- Elehie N. Skoczylas, The Internal Development of the Soviet Union. Toronto.
- Robert McKain Smith, The Revolutionary Doctrine of Communist China. American.
- Mario Spalatin, Croatian Party of the Right, 1868-1918. Indiana.
- Wallace Spaulding, Ceylon and the Communist Bloc: 1956-65. Pennsylvania.
- Herbert F. Steeper, American Attitudes and Policies Toward Austria, 1938-1955: From the German Anschluss to Austrian Independence. Fletcher School.
- Evelyn P. Stevens, Information and Decision-making in Mexico. California (Berkeley).
- Philip D. Stewart, The Oblast Party Organization —A Study of Local Politics Under Khrushchev. Indiana.
- Rodney P. Stiefbold, Electoral Process and Political System: The Case of the Second Austrian Republic. Columbia.
- K. Larry Storrs, The Making of Brazil's New Foreign Policy 1960-1961. Cornell.
- Sister Mary Grace Swift, OSU, Political Orientation in Soviet Ballet. Norte Dame.
- William Taubman, From Bureaucrats to Volunteer—Mass Participation in City Government in the U.S.S.R. Columbia.
- Patricia Taylor, French Ideology and Consensus in Relation to the Establishment of the Fifth Republic. Connecticut.
- Chang Teh-Kuang, Communist China's Foreign Policy: Concept and Formulation. American.
- Elaine M. Themo, Sources of Indian and Mestizo Discontent in Peru and Manifestations of that Discontent in the Twentieth Century. American.
- Abigail Thernstrom, Ideology and Politics in Nasser's Egypt. Harvard.
- Donald R. Thurston, The Japan Teachers Union as a Pressure Group. Columbia.
- Maynard J. Toll, The Marshalls, Marianas, and Carolines under Germany, Japan, The United States. Johns Hopkins.
- Csanad Toth, The Political University: The Political Behavior of Colombian Students in the Past Decade. Georgetown.
- Andrew C. Tuttle, West Indian Federation: Politics and Prospects. Claremont.
- Norman J. Vig, The Politics of Civil Science in Great Britain. Columbia.

- R. Harrison Wagner, U.S. Economic Policies Concerning Latin America 1945-1961. Harvard.
- Fred E. Wagoner, Political Dynamics in Africa: A Comparison of the Political Systems in Rwanda and Burundi and Its Impact on United States Policy. American.
- Millidge Walker, Administration and Local Government in Indonesia. California (Berkeley).
- William J. L. Wallace, The Restatement of Socialism in Britain, 1947-1961. Cornell.
- Yu san Wang, Nationalist China and Japan, 1949 —Present, Pennsylvania.
- John Waterbury, The Organization of Political Support for the Moroccan Monarchy: The Modification of a Multi-Party System. Columbia.
- Harvey Waterman, The Sources of French Foreign Policy. Chicago.
- Peter Wengert, Patterns of Administrative Reform Politics in Metropolitan Paris, 1958-1965.
 Columbia.
- Herbert Werlin, The Nairobi City Council: A Study in Comparative Local Government. California (Berkeley).
- William R. Westlake, An Institutional Approach to Inter-American Military Relations. Fletcher School.
- Christopher W. Wheeler, Interest Groups in Swedish Politics: Selected Case Studies. Columbia.
- Nathan N. White, A Decision-Making Study of Foreign Policy Formation in Japan, Using Her Relations with China as a Case. California (Berkeley).
- Loree A.R. Wilkerson, A Study of Socio-Economic Characteristics of the Senior Government Executives of Honduras. Florida.
- Albert P. Williams, Industrial Diversification and Venezuelan Public Policy. Fletcher School.
- Robert S. Wood, Multilateral Diplomacy under Parliamentary and Presidential Democracy: The Fourth and Fifth French Republics. Harvard.
- Peter Yaremko, Polish Post-war Communism: The First Phase of Władysław Gomulka, Indiana.
- Dieter K. Zschock, Manpower Planning and Education in Colombia. Fletcher School.

Changes

- William J. Casey, The Political Implications of Some Military Civic Action Projects in Selected Latin American Countries. Florida.
- William T. Daly, Ideology and Policy in a Revolutionary Regime: A Case Study of Nazi Foreign Policy. Princeton.
- David A. Gugin, Achievement and Ascription: Personnel Recruitment in Uganda. Wisconsin.
- Fred M. Hayward, The Formation of Predomi- nantly Politically Oriented Organizations in Africa. Princeton.

- George K. Ikeda, The Political Dynamics of a Japanese Prefecture: Ishikawa. Harvard.
- Karl Ryavec, The Administrative System and Personnel of the People's Republic of China and of the Soviet Union, a Comparison. Columhia.
- Joan Barth Urban, International Communism and the Italian Communist Party, 1943-1956. Harvard.
- Steven Warnecke, The Development of the Political Role and Administrative Standards of the German Civil Service since 1949, Columbia,
- Howard J. Wiarda, The Aftermath of the Trujillo Dictatorship: The Emergence of a Pluralist Political System in the Dominican Republic. Florida.

INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION POLITICS AND LAW

- J. O. Akintunde, Nigeria and the United Nations. McGill.
- William F. Ansberry, Arms Control and Disarmament: A Study of East-West Deadlock, 1950-1965. Cincinnati.
- W. Badour, Factors Shaping the Foreign Policy of the People's Republic of China. McGill.
- Nicholas O. Berry, The Rules of International Relations: A Study of the Philippines-United States 1962 War Claims Issue. Pittsburgh.
- Richard Blue, Political Implications of Foreign Aid in India. Claremont.
- John R. Boettiger, The Uses of Force in American Diplomacy. Columbia.
- Bernard J. Brungs. Hostages, Prisoner Reprisals, and Collective Penalties: The Development of International Law with Respect to Collective and Vicarious Punishment. Georgetown.
- Frederick Cervantes, Khrushchev's Assertion of Party Primacy: The Institution of Political Power and Legitimacy in the Soviet Union. Washington (Seattle).
- Richard W. Chadwick, Theory Development Through Simulation: A Comparison of Some Structural Components of Simulated International Processes and Contemporary Internation Behavior. Northwestern.
- Charles L. Cochran, Recognition of States and Governments by John F. Kennedy: An Analysis. Tufts.
- Edward M. Collins, The Pursuit of Power: Soviet Strategy and Policy under Khrushchev. Georgetown.
- Dawson Crim, The Limitations of the United Nations in Coping with International Crises: A - Case Study of the Cyprus Crisis of 1964. Virginia. Kenneth A. Dahlberg, The Common Market Commission and the Politics of Integration. Colorado.

- Ibrahim Darwish, Factionalism in Revolutionary Elites. American.
- Charles H. Daugherty, Brazilian-Soviet Relations: Two Case Studies in Foreign Policy Decision Making. Georgetown.
- John P. de Gara, Institutional Aspects of East-West Trade: The Role of International Organizations, Princeton.
- Robert A. DeLapp, Changing Aspects of National and International Jurisdiction with Special Reference to Deep Sea Fisheries in the Northwest Atlantic Area. M.I.T.
- Gerald E. Dirks, The Canadian Attitude Towards the Financing of International Organizations. Toronto.
- Michael C. Downs, Five Years of Soviet Participation in the International Labor Organization, 1960-64. Natre Dame.
- Bahram Farzanegan, A Study of United States Reactions and Responses to the Emergence and Adjustment of the Non-West in the International Political System. American.
- Alejandro M. Fernandez, International Law in Philippine Relations: 1898-1946. Duke.
- Robert L. Fischelis, The University as an Agency of Political Socialization in a Communist Society: The Structure and Organization of the Humboldt University and its Impact on Political Attitudes and Loyalty in East Germany. Yale
- Robert O. Freedman, Political Implications of Intra-Block Economic Relations—A Study of Economic Warfare and Economic Integration within the Communist Bloc. Columbia.
- Jonathan Galloway, Space Communications and United States Foreign Relations. Columbia.
- Isebill W. Gruhn, Functional Integration: The CCTA Experience. California (Berkeley).
- Henry Han, International Legislation (Methods and Procedures with Special Reference to the United Nations). Columbia.
- Joseph T. Hart, Gaming as a Research Tool in International Relations. American.
- Martin Hauser, A Cybernetic Theory of Values: Theoretical Derivation and Application in a Case Study Examining the Relationship Between Gandhi's Values of Passive Resistance and Political Actions Undertaken During the Drive for Swaraj. Iowa.
- John L. Houk, Counterinsurgency Support Among Affected Peoples: The Identification of Some Factors Which May Be Exploited to Motivate Population Support of Counterinsurgency as an Instrument of Policy. Southern California.

- Ramon B. Hulsey, The Soviet Image of Japan. Columbia.
- James M. Hurley, International Aspects of U.S. Civil Aviation Policy since World War II. Catholic University.
- George Jabbour, The Attitudes of Arab States Toward the U.N. Peace Keeping Operations. American.
- Abel Jacob, The Role of the Intermediate State in Developmental Cooperation: Israel's Role in Africa. California (Los Angeles).
- E. Luther Johnson, Freedom from Alliances— Contemporary Swedish Views Toward International Relations. American.
- Roger E. Kanet, The Soviet Union, the Neutrals, and the United Nations. Princeton.
- David A. Kay, The New Nations in the United Nations: A Study in the Exercise of Political Influence in the United Nations, 1960-1964. Columbia.
- Rais Khan, Radio Cairo and Egyptian Foreign Policy, 1956-60. Michigan.
- Ray B. Knapp, Strategic Diplomacy in the Nuclear Age: The Communicative Process. Southern California.
- Wilfrid L. Kohl, The French Nuclear Force and Alliance Diplomacy, 1954-1965. Columbia.
- Eugene J. Kolb, The Agenda Problem of the United Nations Security Council and General Assembly. Yale.
- Richard H. Kraemer, High Ranking Military Officers' Conception of Their Own Role in Foreign-Policy Making. Texas.
- George L. Kraft, The International Control of Nuclear Weapons: A Comparative Analysis of Policy Preferences. Michigan.
- John Ladenburger, The Evolution of the Political Philosophy of John Foster Dulles 1914-1953. Connecticut.
- Chae Jin Lee, Communist China's Policy in Laos. California (Los Angeles).
- Russell J. Lenge, Feelings of Alienation Expressed in the Actions and Reactions of States Within the International System with Particular Emphasis on the Inter War Period. American.
- Jack W. Lewis, United States Military Aid Programs in Latin America since 1958. Ohio State.
 Hsien-Tung Liu, Pre-1917 Russian-Chinese Border Relations. Claremont.
- Jadwiga Lopez, Public Opinion Polls in Foreign Policy. Johns Hopkins.
- Robert McGeehan, American Policy and German Rearmament. Columbia.
- Robert G. McKelvey, Counter-Insurgency: The Case of the Boer War. Columbia.
- William F. McLoughlin, Universalism and Regionalism: A Comparison of the Development Decade and the Alliance for Progress as Meth- ods of Promoting Economic and Social Development. American.

- Ahmed Abdul Majid, Some Effects of the Selected Resolutions of the United Nations General Assembly on International Law. New York University.
- Thomas B. Manton, U Thant: A Political Biography. American.
- Leon C. Martel, Jr., Russian War Aims and United States Foreign Policy, 1941-1942. Columbia.
- James G. Mellen, The Foreign Relations of the AFL-CIO. Iowa.
- Donald E. Milstein, Canada and Peacekeeping.

 Michigan.
- Clovis C. Morrisson, Jr., The Emerging European Law of Human Rights. Colorado.
- Jawdat Mufti, Peaceful Coexistence and Its Contribution to the Development of International Law and Cooperation. American.
- Urabi Mustafa, The United States and the Hashimite Kingdom of Jordan, 1946-1964. American.
- Charles Nelson, Intragovernmental Organizations and Strategies of a Political Integration: The Organization of Economic Cooperation and Development as a Case Study. Indiana.
- William A. Nighswonger, Counterinsurgency and the Agency for International Development in Viet-Nam, American.
- P. C. Noble, Regionalism in International Organization: Theory and Practice. McGill.
- Hanley Norment, American Policy Toward Decolonization in Africa. Michigan.
- Nicholas G. Onuf, The Development of International Law by Codification. Johns Hopkins.
- Ukachi Onyewu, Nation-Building in Nigeria— Anglo-Nigerian Roles 1900-1950. American.
- Byung Koo Pak, The Cuban Problem in the Organization of American States: A Model for Collective Decision-Making. Florida State.
- Bruce Perry, Senator J. William Fulbright's Views on International Affairs and the Formulation, Conduct, and Substantive Content of U.S. Foreign Policy. Pennsylvania.
- Andrew J. Pierre, Britain, France and the Independent Nuclear Deterrent: An Analysis of the Incentives and Dis-incentives for the Creation and Continuation of an Independent Nuclear Weapons Capability as Reflected in the Public Debate over the British and French Experiences, 1939-1964. Columbia.
- Edward Platt, Political Factors Affecting Austria's Entry into the European Free Trade Association. Connecticut.
- Donald J. Puchala, Community Formation in Western Europe. Yale.
- Gene E. Rainey, The Concept of Peace in United States Foreign Policy Since World War II. American.

- Robert Randle, The Influence of Science upon the Ideas of Power in Modern International Politics. Columbia.
- Lillian L. Randolph, A Study of the Nature, Process, and Results of International Bargaining, Including that Between and Among Nations as well as Among Members of Alliances. California (Berkeley).
- David P. Rawson, The Role of the United Nations in the Political Development of Ruanda-Urandi. American.
- Barbara A. Rearden, British and American Perspectives: Expectations of War and of a Nazi-Soviet Pact of Diplomatists and Politicians, 1938-1939. Columbia.
- Rudolph R. Reeder, United States Relations with Argentina 1943-1948: An Ethical Case Study. American.
- Irvin M. Rice, A U.S. Foreign Policy Towards Thailand. American.
- Zeller Robertson, Jr., Soviet/Mexican Relations: Application of Paradigm. California (Los Angeles).
- David Robison, Conceptions Underlying American Policy Toward German Reunification, 1944-1965. Columbia.
- Ram Roy, The Process of Foreign Policy Formation in the United States—Indian Wheat Bill as a Case Study. Claremont.
- Henry C. Rucker, III, An Analysis of Ethnic Discrimination in South Africa. American.
- Louis G. Sarris, The Greek and Vietnamese Communist Insurgencies: A Critical and Comparative Analysis. American.
- Bernard Schechtermann, The American Over-Seas Establishment: A Comparative Analysis of Its Quantative and Qualitative Development. Indiana.
- Joelle Schroder, The Politics of Part-time Education in the Soviet Union: A Study of the Primary and Secondary Part-time Schools. Yale.
- John E. Schwarz, Political Integration and the European Parliament. Indiana.
- N. Shilling, Ideological Factors in the League of Arab States: 1944-1956. McGill.
- Solomon I. Slonim, South West Africa and the United Nations: An Attempt to Enforce International Responsibility. Columbia.
- Alden C. Small, The United Nations and South Africa: A Study in Parliamentary Diplomacy. Fletcher School.
- Denia W. Stairs, The Role of Canada in the Korean Crisis. Toronto.
- James A. Stegenga, The United States View of

- United Nations Military Forces. California (Los Angeles).
- Ralph Stiewe, The United Nations and the Greek Question: A Study of the Handling of the Problem by the UN Security Council and the General Assembly. Columbia.
- C. Frederick Stoerker, The Church's Material Aid Program in India: A Case Study in Church-State Relations. Missouri.
- D. Storer, The Role of Voluntary Association in Nigerian Politics. McGill.
- Philip A. Thibideau, NATO and Nuclear Weapons: A Dilemma for the United States. Michigan.
- James E. Todd, The Security Council of the United Nations. Iowa.
- William Van Cleave, The Effects of Nuclear Weapons Proliferation on the Diplomatic Balances, Claremont.
- John J. Weltman, Technological Necessity and Technological Prediction: Studies in Nineteenth and Twentieth Century Arms Technologies. Johns Hopkins.
- Miles D. Wolpin, The Influence of the Cuban Revolution Upon Chilean Politics and Foreign Policy, 1959-1965. Columbia.
- Muhammed Yakan, Lebanon's Politics in Inter-Arab Relations. Michigan.
- John Yuan-shi Yin, A Comparative Study of Sino-Soviet Theories of War. Southern California.
- Tony Yinger, Cuba—Core Interests of the United States and the U.S.S.R. Claremont.
- Chong Kun Yoon, The Red Army in the Rise and Fall of the Kiangsi Soviet Republic. American.

Changes

- Berhanykun Andemicael, The Role of Non-Aligned States in East-West Disarmament Negotiations. Columbia.
- Herbert E. Cheever, Jr., Human Rights and Domestic Jurisdiction: The Case of Race Relations in South Africa in the U.N. Iowa.
- Marian E. Krogmann, The Promotion of Human Rights Through the International Labor Organization. Iowa.
- Ronald S. Pugsley, The United States and UNC-TAD: A Study in Conflicting Pressures. Michigan.
- Eugene D. Shapiro, Indian Foreign Policy: An Empirical Definition of Non-Alignment and the Indian National Interest. New York University.
- Wesley B. Truitt, The Troops to Europe Decision: The Politics and Diplomacy of a Military Commitment. Columbia.

II. DISSERTATIONS COMPLETED SINCE THE LAST LISTING

POLITICAL PHILOSOPHY, THEORY AND METHODOLOGY

- Clark C. Abt; B.S., M.I.T., 1951; M.A., Johns Hopkins, 1952; Ph.D., M.I.T., 1965. The Termination of General War. M.I.T.
- Anwar Barkat; A.B., Forman Christian College, Punjab University, 1954; Leonard Theological College, 1958; S.T.M., Union Theological Seminary, 1960: M.A., Duke, 1963; Ph.D., ibid., 1965.
 The fellowship of Socialist Christians: A Study in Christian Socialism. Duke.
- Helaine Blumenfeld; A.B., Michigan, 1955; M.A., ibid., 1956; Ph.D., Columbia, 1965. John Locke:
 A Science of Ethics. Columbia.
- Adam Brimke; M.A., St. Andrews, 1950; Ph.D., Slavonic Studies (Montreal), 1953; Ph.D.,
 McGill, 1964. Poland's Own Road to Socialism:
 A Study in Political Realism. McGill.
- Joyotpaul Chaudhuri; B.A., Central State College, Oklahoma, 1958; M.A., Oklahoma, 1961; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. The Politics and Jurisprudence of F.S.C. Northrop. Oklahoma.
- Glen D. Dealy, B.A., University of Washington, 1957; M.A., George Washington, 1958; Ph.D., California (Berkeley), 1965. Political Philosophy and the Latin American Tradition. California (Berkeley).
- Mason Drukman: B.A., San Francisco State, 1958; M.A., California (Berkeley), 1960; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. Community and Purpose in America. California (Berkeley).
- John P. East; B.A., Earlham College, 1953; LL.B., Illinois, 1959; Ph.D., Florida, 1964. The Political Philosophy of Richard S. Childs: An Analysis and Critique. Florida.
- Anne E. Freedman; B.A., Douglass College, 1959; M.A., California (Berkeley), 1960; Ph.D., Iowa, 1964. The Controlled Society. Iowa.
- Gerald Friedberg; A.B., Cornell, 1960; Ph.D., Harvard, 1965. Marxism in the United States: John Spargo and the Socialist Party of America. Harvard.
- Linda K. Gerber; B.A., Penn State, 1957; M.A., ibid., 1959; Ph.D., Pennsylvania, 1964. Antidemocratic Movements in the United States since World War I. Pennsylvania.
- John G. Gunnell; B.A., Tufts, 1955; M.A., California (Berkeley), 1961; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. Political Philosophy and Time. California (Berkeley).
- H. P. Habib; B.A., American University (Beirut), 1955; M.A., Fordham, 1957; Ph.D., McGill,
 1964. A Case Study in Egyptian Conservation:
 Ismail Rasha Sidgi. McGill.
- Franklin P. Huddle; BFA, Arizona, 1937; A.M.,

- Brown, 1939; Ph.D. American 1965. The Limited Nuclear Test Ban Treaty and the United States Senate. American.
- Isaac Kramnick; A.B., Harvard, 1959; A.M., ibid., 1962; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Lord Bolingbroke: Political Thought and the Augustan Age. Harvard.
- Paul F. Kress; B.S., Wisconsin, 1956; M.S., ibid.,
 1958; Ph.D., California (Berkeley), 1965. The Concept of Process in American Political Science. California (Berkeley).
- James H. Lare; A.B., Occidental, 1955; M.B.A., Cornell, 1957; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. The New Democrats. Cornell.
- Edward A. Leonard; B.A., Oglethorpe, 1961;
 M.A., Emory, 1962; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. Theoretical Alternatives to the Violence Sanction, 1933-63: A Critique. Emory.
- Charles H. McCall, Jr.; B.A., Indiana, 1957;
 M.A., Yale, 1959; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Paths to Political Participation. Yale.
- Richard M. Merelman; B.A., George Washington, 1960; M.A., Illinois, 1961; Ph.D., Yale, 1965. Mass Culture and Political Ideology: The Television Western. Yale.
- Dale A. Neuman; A.B., Kenyon College, 1958; Ph.D., Northwestern, 1964. Work, Leisure, and Political Behavior: A Study of the Interrelationships of Occupational, Leisure, and Political Time and Activity within Three Occupations. Northwestern.
- Robert E. Newton; B.A., Iowa, 1956; M.A., Catholic University, 1959; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Judicial Self-Restraint in the Opinions of Felix Frankfurter in Non-Civil Liberties Cases Concerning Federal Constitutional Limitations on State Powers of Government. Catholic University.
- Thomas C. Pocklington; B.A., Toronto, 1958; Ph.D., Indiana, 1965. Philosophy Proper and Democratic Political Philosophy. Indiana.
- John M. Power; B.A., University of Melbourne, 1961; A.M., Harvard, 1963; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Individual Freedom: A Study in the Psychology of Political Theory. Harvard.
- Nicolas Protyniak; B.A., Roosevelt University, 1957; M.A., ibid., 1959; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. The American Anti-Imperialism Movement: 1898-1912. Indiana.
- Knud Rasmussen; B.A., University of Copenhagen; M.A., Cornell; Ph.D., Rutgers, 1965. The Political Philosophy of Soren Kierkegaard. Rutgers.
- Kenneth Reshaur; A.B., University of Manitoba, 1959; M.A., University of New Brunswick, 1961; Ph.D., Duke, 1965. Michael Polanyi: The Political Relevance of His Thought. Duke.

- Paul Roazen; A.B., Harvard, 1958; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Freud and Political Thought. Harvard.
- Jane T. Schneider; A.B., Michigan, 1960; A.M., ibid., 1961; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Revolutions in the Making: 'Spontaneity' and 'Sophistication' in Italian Social Movements Up to 1922. Michigan.
- John J. Schrems; B.A Aquinas College, 1958;
 M.A., Catholic University, 1960; Ph.D., ibid.,
 1965. The Political Philosophy of Ernest Cassirer: A Study in Modern Liberal Political Thought. Catholic University.
- David C. Schwartz; A.B., Brooklyn College, 1960; M.A., ibid., 1962; Ph.D., M.I.T., 1965. Political Recruitment: A Comparative Essay in Theory and Research M.I.T.
- Duane E. Smith; A.B., California (Berkeley), 1960; A.M., Harvard, 1962; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Philosophies of Political Participation. Harvard.
- Alma D. Sorensen; B.S., Utah State University, 1960; A.M., Illinois, 1962; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Toward a Theory of Ideology in Political Life. Illinois.
- Kirk S. Thompson; B.A., Stanford, 1954; M.A., ibid., 1958; Ph.D., California (Berkeley), 1965.
 On Montesquieu: Social Science and Politics in the Spirit of the Laws. California (Berkeley).
- Walter E. Volkomer; A.B., Rutgers, 1955; A.M., ibid., 1959; Ph.D., ibid., 1963. The Political Philosophy of Jerome N. Frank. Rutgers.
- Eduard A. Ziegenhagen; B.S., Wisconsin, 1957; M.S., ibid., 1959; Ph.D., Illinois, 1965. Perceived Inconsistencies Regarding Self and Ethnocentric Political Leadership. Illinois.

GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS OF THE UNITED STATES AND ITS DEPENDENCIES

- Robert L. Anderson; B.A., Florida, 1958; M.A., ibid., 1961; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. Negro Suffrage in Relation to American Federalism. Florida.
- Ronald B. Bailey; B.S., Florida A. and M. University, 1958; M.A., Illinois, 1959; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. The Admission of Alaska into the United States: Adjustments in the Federal System. Illinois
- Frank L. Baird; B.A., New Mexico, 1948; M.A., ibid., 1951; Ph.D., Texas, 1964. Congress's Role in Regulation: Radio and Television Programming. Texas.
- Philip F. Beach; A.B., University of Washington, 1959; M.A., Northwestern, 1962; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. Natural Resources Policy and "The Public Interest." Northwestern.
- Robert L. Casier; B.A., California (Santa Barbara), 1949; M.A., ibid., 1954; Ph.D., ibid., 1965.
 The Senate Filibuster: Its Procedural and Strategic Aspects. California (Santa Barbara).

- Everett F. Cataldo; B.S., College of the Holy Cross, 1957; M.A., Boston College, 1959; Ph. D., Ohio State, 1965. The House Committee on Ways and Means: The Policy-Making Role of a Congressional Committee. Ohio State.
- William O. Chittick; B.A., South Dakota State College, 1959; Ph.D., Johns Hopkins, 1964. The Domestic Information Activities of the Department of State. Johns Hopkins.
- Aage R. Clausen; B.A., Macalester, 1957; A.M., Michigan, 1958; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. Policy Dimensions in Congressional Roll Calls: A Longitudinal Analysis. Michigan.
- Leon S. Cohen; B.S., Wayne State University, 1960; Ph.D., North Carolina, 1965. The Southern Negro: A Model of Ethnic Political Assimilation. North Carolina.
- Robert B. de Janes; B.A., George Washington, 1957; M.A., Tennessee, 1959; Ph.D., Virginia, 1965. Southern Neo-Isolationism: Case Studies in Foreign Aid and Reciprocal Trade. Virginia.
- Jack D. Fleer; A.B., Oklahoma Baptist University, 1959; M.S., Florida State, 1961; Ph.D., North Carolina, 1965. Congressional Committees and the Making of Military Policy: Authorizations and Appropriations for Major Weapons Systems in the Legislative Process. North Carolina.
- Irwin N. Gertzog; A.B., Union College, 1954; Ph.D., North Carolina, 1965. The Role of the President in the Midterm Congressional Election. North Carolina.
- Sheldon Goldman; A.B., New York University, 1957; M.A., Harvard, 1964; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Politics, Judges, and the Administration of Justice. Harvard.
- Marshall N. Goldstein; B.A., Florida, 1955; Ph.D., North Carolina, 1964. Political Involvement Among American Law Students. North Carolina.
- James E. Gregg; B.A., Lebanon Valley College, 1950; M.A., California (Santa Barbara), 1954; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Newspaper Editorial Endorsements: Their Influence on California Elections, 1948-1962. California (Santa Barbara).
- Wilbert J. Heffernan, Jr.; B.A., Virginia Polytechnic Institute, 1953; M.A., Duke, 1955; M.S.W., Michigan, 1958; Ph.D., North Carolina, 1965. Public Assistance as a Governmental Function: A Case Study of Professional and Official Attitudes. North Carolina.
- John J. Iselin; A.B., Harvard, 1956; B.A., University of Cambridge, 1958; M.A., ibid., 1962;
 Ph.D., Harvard, 1965. The Truman Doctrine: A Study in the Relationship Between Crisis and Foreign Policy-making. Harvard.
- Thomas P. Jahnige; B.A., Yale, 1960; Ph.D., Clare-

- mont, 1965. Congress and Space: The Committee System and Congressional Oversight of NASA. Claremont.
- Robert N. Johnson; B.A., Colgate, 1947; M.A., Florida, 1956; Ph.D., Johns Hopkins, 1964. The Development of Out-Party Institutions: A Case Study of the Democratic Party, 1952-1960.
 Johns Hopkins.
- William Johnson; B.A., Wheaton, 1959; M.A., California (Berkeley), 1960; Ph.D., Claremont, 1965. The Political Party as an Institution. Claremont.
- Robert W. Langran; B.S., Loyola University, 1956; M.A., Fordham, 1959; Ph.D., Bryn Mawr, 1965. Abington School District v. Schempp: Its Impact Upon Religion and Politics. Bryn Mawr.
- William F. Levantrosser; B.A., Michigan, 1950; M.A., ibid., 1951; M.A., Rutgers, 1964; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Building a National Military Reserve: Patterns of Legislative Policy-Making Rutgers.
- J. Mark Mobius; B.F.A., Boston University, 1958; M.S., ibid., 1959; Ph.D., M.I.T., 1964. Communication Processes and United States Government Policy: The Development of Communication Satellite Policy in the Executive Branch. M.I.T.
- Stephen V. Monsma; A.B., Calvin, 1958; M.A., Georgetown, 1960; Ph.D., Michigan State, 1965.
 Informal Groups in the Legislative Process: A Study of the Michigan House of Representatives. Michigan State.
- Morris J. Levitt; B.A., Pace College, 1960; M.A., North Carolina, 1962; Ph.D., Maryland, 1965.
 Political Attitudes of American Women: A Study of the Effects of Work and Education on Their Political Role. Maryland.
- Byron L. Nupp; B.A., Loyola College, 1943; M.A., American, 1960; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Transportation Policy Formation in the Federal Government 1948-60: A Test of an Administrative Theory. American.
- Howard A. Palley; A.B., Brooklyn College, 1957;
 M.S., Yeshiva, 1959; D.S.S., Syracuse, 1963.
 Health Insurance Plan of Greater New York Versus Organized Medicine: A Study of the Conception and Application of Economic Freedom of Choice in the Field of Medicine. Syracuse.
- Robert L. Piper; A.B., Transylvania College,
 1954; M.A., Syracuse, 1959; Ph.D., ibid., 1965.
 Candidates for the Presidential Nomination: A Role Analysis. Syracuse.
- Quentin L. Quade; B.S., Creighton, 1957; M.A., Notre Dame, 1958; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. A Second Dimension of Leadership: The Truman Administration in Foreign Policy. Notre Dame.
- Leo M. Snowiss; B.A., Pennsylvania, 1959; M.A.,

- Chicago, 1960; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Chicago and Congress: A Study of Metropolitan Representation. Chicago.
- David Stern; B.A., Pomona, 1949; M.A., California (Berkeley), 1960; Ph.D., Claremont, 1965.
 Congress, Politics, and Taxes: A Case Study of the Revenue Act of 1962. Claremont.
- Donald F. Sullivan; B.S., Georgetown, 1950;
 M.A., Johns Hopkins, 1952; Ph.D., Oklahoma, 1964. The Civil Rights Programs of the Kennedy Administration: A Political Analysis. Oklahoma.
- Timothy A. Williams; A.B., Davidson College, 1954; Ph.D., North Carolina, 1965. The Political Setting of Large Scale Military Retirement. North Carolina.

CONSTITUTIONAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE LAW IN THE UNITED STATES

- Don R. Bowen; B.A., Kansas, 1959; Ph.D., Yale, 1965. The Explanation of Judicial Voting Behavior from Sociological Characteristics of Judges. Yale.
- William C. Burris; A.A., Wingate College, 1952;
 B.S., Wake Forest College, 1954; M.A.T.,
 Emory, 1955; Ph.D., North Carolina, 1965. John
 J. Parker and Supreme Court Policy: A Case Study in Judicial Control, North Carolina.
- Wallace F. Caldwell; B.A., Washington State, 1956; M.A., Washington (Seattle), 1959; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. Uses of the Administrative Process by States to Secure Civil Rights. Washington (Seattle).
- Ira H. Carmen; A.B., New Hampshire, 1958; A.M., Michigan, 1959; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. State and Local Motion Picture Censorship and Constitutional Liberties with Special Emphasis on the Communal Acceptance of Supreme Court Decision-Making. Michigan.
- Edward M. Goldberg; A.B., Brooklyn College, 1953; A.M., New Mexico, 1956; Ph.D., Pennsylvania, 1965. The Constitutional Law and Politics of Legislative Apportionment. Pennsylvania.
- Charles V. Hamilton; B.A., Roosevelt College, 1951; J.D., Loyola, 1954; M.A., Chicago, 1957; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. Southern Federal Courts and the Right of Negroes to Vote: 1957-1962. Chicago.
- Richard M. Johnson; A.B., Miami, 1956; A.M., American, 1961; Ph.D., Illinois, 1965. Separation of Church and State: The Dynamics of Supreme Court Decision-Making. Illinois.
- Leonard G. Miller; B.A., Johns Hopkins, 1957;
 M.A., ibid., 1959; Ph.D., Chicago, 1964. Double Jeopardy and the Federal System. Chicago.
- William K. Muir, Jr., B.A., Yale, 1954; J.D.,

- Michigan, 1958; M.A., Yale, 1962. Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Law and Attitude Change. Yale.
- Marvin Schick; B.A., Brooklyn College, 1956;
 M.A., New York University, 1961; Ph.D., ibid.,
 1965. The United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit: A Study of Judicial Behavior. New York University.
- Nahum Spector; B.A., Brooklyn College, 1962;
 M.A., New School for Social Research, 1954;
 M.B.A., New York University, 1957; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Political Party Affiliation and National Antitrust Policy. New York University.
- Eber A. Spencer, Jr.; A.B., Tufts, 1949; M.A.,
 New Hampshire. 1951; Ph.D., Columbia, 1964.
 The Role of Federal District Courts in Securing Obedience to Supreme Court Mandates. Columbia.
- Emory F. Via; B.A., Emory, 1946; M.A., Chicago, 1956; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. Judicial Action: County Units and Apportionment. Chicago.

AMERICAN STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

- Robert A. Barrett; B.A., Hamline, 1960; M.A., American, 1962; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Council Politics: A Study of the Policy Making Process in the Minneapolis City Council. American.
- Robert H. Binstock; A.B., Harvard, 1956; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Ethnic Politics and the Reform Ideal. Harvard.
- Nancy Arone Bord; B.A., Smith, 1961; Ph.D.,
 M.I.T., 1965. Redevelopment in Boston: A Study of the Politics and Administration of Social Change. M.I.T.
- Todd H. Bullard; A.B., West Liberty State College, 1953; M.A., West Virginia, 1956; Ph.D., Pittsburgh, 1964. The West Virginia Labor Federation and the West Virginia Legislature, 1957-1961. Pittsburgh.
- Robert F. Carter; B.S., State University College (New Paltz), 1952; M.S., State University College (Albany), 1955; D.D.S., Syracuse, 1965. The American Labor Party in New York State, 1945-1954. Syracuse.
- Ronald C. Cease; B.A., Reed, 1953; M.A., Syracuse, 1954; Ph.D., Claremont, 1965. Area-wide Local Government in the State of Alaska: The Genesis, Establishment and Organization of Borough Government. Claremont.
- Robert J. Clarke; B.A., Depaul, 1954; M.A., Notre Dame, 1957; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. The Problem of Annexation with Specific Reference to Grand Rapids. Notre Dame.
- Mary M. Conway; B.S., Purdue, 1957; M.A., California (Berkeley), 1960; Ph.D., Indiana,
 1965. Party and Constituency in the Indiana
 General Assembly: A Case Study of Party Responsibility. Indiana.

- J. Clarence Davies, 3d; A.B., Dartmouth, 1959; Ph.D., Columbia, 1965. Neighborhood Groups and Urban Renewal. Columbia.
- Bernice M. Deutrich; A.B., George Washington, 1951; M.A., American, 1954; Ph.D., ibid., 1962.
 Southeastern Wisconsin's Four Largest Cities—
 Their Budget and Related Financial Practices.
 American.
- Daryl R. Fair; Millersville State Teachers College, 1959; A.M., Pennsylvania, 1962; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 1933-1963: A Case Study in Judicial Behavior. Pennsylvania.
- Charles E. Halt; B.S., State Teachers College (Slippery Rock), 1934; M. Ed., Penn State, 1940; D.S.S., Syracuse, 1965. Joseph F. Guffey: New Deal Politician from Pennsylvania. Syracuse.
- Jack E. Holmes; B.A., Wyoming, 1939; M.A., ibid., 1945; Ph.D., Chicago, 1964. Party, Legislature, and Governor in the Politics of New Mexico, 1911-1963. Chicago.
- Albert C. Johns; B.A., Chapman, 1948; M.A., Claremont, 1963; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. The Search for Power in California Real Estate. Claremont.
- Melvin A. Kahn; B.A., Florida, 1952; M.A., Chicago, 1958; Ph.D., Indiana, 1964. Labor and the Law-making Process: The Case of Indiana. Indiana.
- David C. Leege; B.A., Valparaiso University, 1959; Ph.D., Indiana, 1965. The Place of the Party Nominating Convention in a Representative Democracy: A Study of Power in the Indiana Democratic Party's State Nominating Conventions, 1956-62. Inciana.
- Bruce D. McDowell; B.A., American, 1957;
 M.C.P., Georgia Institute of Technology, 1959;
 Ph.D., American, 1965. Federal-Local Relationships in Programs of Community Development and Redevelopment. American.
- Stanislaw J. Makielski, Jr.; B.C.P., Virginia, 1960; Ph.D., Columbia, 1964. The Politics of Zoning in New York City: 1910-1960. Columbia.
- George J. Mauer; B.A., Oklahoma State University, 1958; M.P.A., Kansas, 1960; Ph.D., Oklahoma, 1964. Legislative Apportionment in Oklahoma, 1907-1964. Oklahoma.
- Jerome Mushkat; B.A., Syracuse, 1953; M.A., ibid., 1954; D.S.S., ibid., 1965. Tammany Hall: A Study in Pragmatic Politics, 1816-1865. Syracuse.
- Burton W. Onstine; A.B., Reed College, 1954;
 M.A., Washington, 1959; Ph.D., North Carolina,
 1965. Informal Groups in the North Carolina
 House of Representatives. North Carolina.
- Kenneth T. Palmer; B.A., Amherst, 1959; M.A., Penn State, 1961; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. The Legis-

- lative Committee System in Pennsylvania. Penn State.
- Francine F. Rabinovitz; B.A., Cornell, 1961; Ph.D., M.I.T., 1965. Politics and Planning: On the Role of the Expert in Urban Development. M.I.T.
- John B. Richard; A.B., Wyoming, 1957; A.M., ibid., 1958: Ph.D., Illinois, 1965. State Administration and Water Resources in Wyoming. Illinois.
- Fred Roach; B.A., Iowa State, 1949; Ph.D., Claremont, 1965. Political Community in the Developing Desert. Claremont.
- Donald B. Rosenthal; B.A., Brooklyn College, 1958; M.A., Chicago, 1960; Ph.D., ibid., 1963.
 Labor Politics in Three Cities: Political Action in Detroit, Chicago and Los Angeles. Chicago.
- Leonard I. Ruchelman; A.B., Brooklyn, 1954; Ph.D., Columbia, 1965. Career Patterns of New York State Legislators. Columbia.
- Morley Segal; B.A., San Francisco State, 1957;
 M.A., ibid., 1959; Ph.D., Claremont, 1965. The Role and Function of the Legislative Staff in the California Assembly. Claremont.
- Alvin D. Sokolow; B.S., Illinois, 1956; M.A., ibid., 1958; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. Folk Society Politics: Conflict and Organization in Two Rural Illinois Counties. Illinois.
- Allen Spitz; B.A., New Mexico, 1952; M.A., Michigan State, 1954; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. The Hawaiian Homes Program: A Study in Ideological Transplantation. Michigan State.
- Marvin G. Weinbaum; A.B., Brooklyn, 1957;
 M.A., Michigan, 1958; Ph.D., Columbia, 1965. A Minority's Survival: The Republican Party of New York County, 1897-1960. Columbia.
- Wayne F. Young; B.A., Miami University, 1934;
 M.A., Missouri, 1947; Ph.D., Oklahoma, 1964.
 Oklahoma Politics: With Special Reference to the Election of Oklahoma's First Republican Governor. Oklahoma.
- Joseph Zikmund; A.B., Beloit College (Wisconsin), 1959; M.S., Wisconsin, 1961; Ph.D., Duke, 1965. Comparative Electoral Behavior of Selected Metropolitan Suburbs in the Northeast and Midwest: 1948-1960. Duke

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

- Gad Horowitz; B.A., University of Manitoba, 1958; M.A., McGill, 1959; Ph.D., Harvard, 1965. Canadian Labor in Politics—The Trade Union and the CCF-NDP 1937-62. Harvard.
- Allan Kornberg; A.B., Manitoba, 1952; A.M., Michigan, 1962; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. Some Differences in Role Perceptions Among Canadian Legislators. Michigan.
- William E. Lyons; B.S., Millersville State; M.A.,

- Temple; Ph.D., Penn Satte. The New Democratic Party in the Canadian Political System. Penn State.
- Walter L. White; A.B., Western Ontario, 1951;
 A.M., Toronto, 1952; Ph.D., Michigan, 1965.
 The Treasury Board in Canada. Michigan.

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION

- Mohamed Said Ahmed; B. Com., University of Cairo, 1954; M.A. in P.A., American University, 1958; D.P.A., Southern California, 1965. The Autonomy of Public Enterprises in Developing Nations. Southern California.
- Louis Alper; B.B.A., Hofstra, 1953; M.P.A., New York University, 1957; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Differences in Selected Factors Between Supervisors and Non-Supervisors. New York University.
- Louis P. Beleky; B.A., New York University, 1959; M.P.A., ibid., 1960; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. The Organization State: A Study in the Behavorial Variables of Efficacy in Organization for Economic and Social Development. New York University.
- Jay D. Bostwick; B.A., City College of New York, 1953; M.S., New York University, 1958; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Public Opinion Related to Citizens Participation in a Social Welfare Program. New York University.
- Willard C. Carpenter; B.A., Michigan, 1953;
 M.A., Los Angeles State, 1960; Ph.D., Claremont, 1965. The Politics of Aid and Development with Major Reference to South Asia. Claremont.
- James I. Clark; B.S., Michigan, 1939; M.S., Southern California, 1960; Ph.D., New York University, 1964. A Critical Evaluation of Some Electronic Computer Uses in Urban Design. New York University.
- James P. Clarke; A.B., Columbia, 1949; M.S., New York University, 1954; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Codes of Ethics in the Public Service. New York University.
- Eugene H. Czajkoski; A.B., Syracuse, 1948; D.P.A., New York University, 1964. The Administration of Probation and Parole Services With a View Toward Philosophical Mission and With an Evaluation of Functional Specialization. New York University.
- James W. Davis; A.B., Harvard, 1957; M.P.A., Michigan, 1962; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. Executive Roles in Technical Bureaus: A Study of Senior Executives in Five Scientific and Technical Bureaus of the Federal Government. Michigan.
- Oliver E. Dial; B.A., San Diego State, 1959; M.S., ibid., 1962; Ph.D., Claremont, 1965. The Impact of China's Refugees on the Administration of the Colony of Hong Kong. Claremont.

- Roman Ferber; B.A., Hunter, 1958; M.P.A., New York University, 1959; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Worker's Councils in Poland: An Administrative Study of a Worker's Organization in a Communist Satellite Country. New York University.
- Joseph R. Fiszman; B.A., St. John's University, 1948; M.A., Emory, 1956; Ph.D., Michigan State, 1964. The U.S. Labor Attache: Expectations and Reality. Michigan State.
- Anne Fonaroff; B.A., Goucher College, 1932; Ph.D., New York University, 1964. A Study of Executive Development in Four Selected New York City Agencies. New York University.
- Max B. Franc; B.A., Saint Norbert College, 1950;
 M.A., Wisconsin, 1953; M.P.A., New York University, 1960; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. A Conceptualization for Effective Management of Public Housing for the Elderly. New York University.
- Henry L. Guttenplan; B.S., City College of New York, 1940; M.S., ibid., 1959; D.P.A., New York University, 1965. The Role of The Police Laboratory in a Law Enforcement Agency: A Comparative Organizational Study. New York University.
- Alden N. Haffner; B.A., Brooklyn, 1948; O.D., Penn. State College of Opt., 1952; M.P.A., New York University, 1960; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. The Practice of Optometry: A Study of Conflicts in Public Policy. New York University.
- Kamal M. Hagras; B.A., University of Cairo, 1951; M.A., Inter. University of Paris, 1955; Ph.D., New York University, 1965. United Nations Conference on Trade and Development: A Case Study in U.N. Diplomacy. New York University.
- Chester G. Hall, Jr.; A.B., Columbia, 1940; M.A., American, 1959; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. The United States Civil Service Commission: An Arm of the President or of Congress? American.
- Martha J. Harris; B.S., Pittsburgh, 1942; M.A., George Washington, 1953; Ph.D., American, 1965. Organization for Federal Personnel Program Evaluation: With Particular Reference to the U.S. Veterans Administration. American.
- Daniel Henning; B.S., Bowling Green State University, 1957; M.S., Michigan, 1959; D.S.S., Syracuse, 1965. A Political and Administrative Study of National Park Service Wildlife Management Policy at Rocky Mountain National Park. Syracuse.
- Harland L. Hill; B.S., Missouri, 1941; M.S., State College of Washington, 1950; D.P.A., Southern California, 1964. Explorations in Administrative Decision-Making. Southern California.
- Norman Hopmayer; B.S., Northwestern, 1940; M.A., ibid., 1941; M.P.A., New York University, 1959; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. University Governance:

- An Administrative Case Study of Seton Hall University. New York University.
- Salvatore Imbrogno; B.S., New York University, 1952; M.S.S., ibid., 1957; D.P.A., ibid., 1965. Subsidy in New York State to Voluntary Child Care Agencies. New York University.
- William L. Jones; B.A., Pittsburgh, 1958; M.A., Emory, 1959; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. Central Government-Local Government Relations in Planning and Redevelopment: A Comparison of Great Britain and the United States. Emory.
- Mohammed Humayun Khan; B.A., (Hons.), Cambridge, 1953; M.A., ibid., 1957; M.P.A., Southern California, 1964; D.P.A., ibid., 1965. Authority Behavior: An Empirical Approach to Comparative Public Administration. Southern California.
- Walter E. Langway; B.S., New York University, 1949; M.P.A., ibid., 1953; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. The Employment Security Program in Sweden and Its Possible Applications to the United States. New York University.
- Samuel A. Lawrence; B.A., Harvard, 1950; M.A., American, 1958; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Federal Maritime Policies: An Appraisal of the Responsiveness of a Government-Industry Program to Changing National Needs. American.
- Robert G. Leh; B.A., Lafayette, 1952; M.A., Pennsylvania, 1955; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. Compulsory Arbitration of Civil Dispute in Pennsylvania. Pennsylvania.
- Chi Shad Liang; B.A., National University, Chen Chi, 1946; M.P.A., New York University, 1958; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. The Civil Service in the Republic of China: A Critical Analysis of its Development and Character. New York University.
- Richard L. McAnaw; B.S., Northeast Missouri
 State College, 1955; M.A., Missouri, 1957;
 Ph.D., Iowa, 1964. The State Administrators.
 Iowa.
- Arthur Mann; B.A., Long Island University, 1948;
 M.A., New York University, 1950; D.P.A., ibid., 1965. Background of Administrative Policies of the State Employment Services Regarding the Placement of Former Offenders. New York University.
- Philip L. Martin; B.S., Virginia Polytechnic Institute, 1956; M.A., North Carolina, 1959; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Administrative Decision-Making in Two Federal Offices Located in Virginia. North Carolina.
- William P. Maxam; B.A., Indiana State, 1954;
 M.A., ibid., 1955; Ph.D., American, 1965. The Federal Civil Defense Program 1946-1962: A Study in Organization and Administration. American.

- John P. Meekison; A.B., University of British Columbia, 1961; B.A. Sci., ibid., 1959; M.A., ibid., 1962; Ph.D., Duke, 1965. Mental Health Organization and Programs in the United States, with Special Reference to North Carolina. Duke.
- Mohamed Gamal Nassouhy; B.Sc., School of Social Work (Cario), 1943; M.P.A., New York University, 1959; D.P.A., Southern California, 1965. Local Autonomy Under National Planning: The Egyptian Experience. Southern California.
- Kenichi Nishimoto; B.A., California, 1935; M.A., American, 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1963. Program Committees of the Department of the Interior. American.
- Chung Soo Park; B.S., Georgetown, 1958; M.A., American, 1961; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Government by Contract: Its Implications for Federal Personnel Administration. American.
- David Phillips; B.A., Principia College, 1949;
 L.L.B., John Marshall Law School, 1954;
 M.P.A., Syracuse, 1956; D.P.A., ibid., 1964.
 Federal-State Relations and the Control of Atomic Energy. Syracuse.
- Irving Rosenthal; B.A., City College of New York, 1952; M.P.A., Cornell, 1956; Ph.D.,
 American, 1965. Administration of External Technical Assistance with Special Reference to the Government of Turkey. American.
- Lloyd A. Rowe; B.A., Maine, 1952; M.G.A., Pennsylvania, 1956; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Budgetary Decision Making in the City of Philadelphia. Pennsylvania.
- Harold Rubin; B.S., City College of New York,
 1949; M.P.A., Syracuse, 1956; D.P.A., ibid.,
 1964. New York State's Retirement Program: A Critical Analysis. Syracuse.
- Conrado de Regla Santos; A.B., Philippines, 1958; LL.B., ibid., 1959; B.S., ibid., 1959; M.P.A., ibid., 1961; Ph.D., Michigan, 1964. A Formulation of the Concept of Authority in Political and Bureaucratic Terms. Michigan.
- Harry A. Schatz; B.S., Boston University, 1938;
 M.S., ibid., 1939; Ph.D., New York University, 1965. Board-Executive Staff Relationships in Voluntary Social Agencies. New York University.
- Gilbert B. Siegel; B.S., Southern California, 1952;
 M.S., ibid., 1957; Ph.D., Pittsburgh, 1964. The Central Executive Staff Agency in the Federal Republic of Brazil: A Study of the Administrative and Political Significance of the Development of the Departmento Administrativo do Servico Publico. Pittsburgh.
- T. McNider Simpson; B.A., Randolph-Macon, 1949; M.A., Chicago, 1956; Ph.D., Johns Hopkins, 1965. Government and Central Bank: A Comparative Analysis. Johns Hopkins.

- Abraham A. Stern; B.A., Yeshiva, 1948; M.S., ibid., 1950; Ph.D., New York University, 1964. Supervisory Practices in Representative Voluntary and Public Social Welfare Agencies in New York City. New York University.
- Robert D. Stevens; B.A., Syracuse, 1942; B.S., Columbia, 1947; M.A., American, 1954; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. The Use of Microfilm by the United States Government, 1928-1945. American.
- Bommiredda V. Subbiah; B.A., University of Madras, 1936; M.P.A., New York University, 1960;
 Ph.D., ibid., 1965. A National Planning Policy for India: (To Meet the Pressures of Population). New York University.
- Joseph A. Uveges; B.A., Ohio Northern, 1961; M.A., Florida, 1962; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. The Politics of Council-Manager Government in Ohio. Florida.
- Orion F. White, Jr.; B.A., Texas, 1960; Ph.D., Indiana, 1964. The Bureaucratic Game in the Political Arena—An Analysis of the Environment of American Bureaucracy. Indiana.
- Byong-Man Yoon; B.A., University of Seoul,
 1958; M.P.A., New York University, 1960;
 Ph.D., ibid., 1964. Entropy in Human Systems:
 A Theoretical Model of Organizational Dysfunctions. New York University.

FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

- Kamel Abu-Jaber; B.A., Syracuse, 1960; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. The Arab Ba'th Socialist Party: History, Ideology and Organization. Syracuse.
- Mustafa Ahmed; B. Com., Cairo University, 1955;
 M.P.A., Pittsburgh, 1959; D.P.A., Syracuse, 1964. An Analysis of the Development of the Egyptian Bureaucracy. Syracuse.
- Nack Young An; A.B., Berea College, 1961; Ph.D., Virginia, 1965. The French Presidency and the 4th Republic. Virginia.
- Charles F. Andrain; B.A., Whittier College, 1959;
 M.A., California (Berkeley), 1961; Ph.D., ibid.,
 1964. Political Concepts of African Leaders.
 California (Berkeley).
- Alan Arian; B.A., Western Reserve, 1961; M.A., Michigan State, 1963; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Ideological Changes in Israel: A Study of Legislators, Civil Servants and Students. Michigan State.
- Paul J. Best; B.A., Fairfield University, 1961; M.A., Fordham, 1963; Ph.D., New York University, 1965. The Origins and Development of Insurance in Imperial and Soviet Russia. New York University.
- Brig Bhushan; B.A., Allahabad, 1940; M.A., ibid., 1945; Ph.D., American, 1965. Fundamental Rights in India: A Socio-Political Study. American.

- Albert Boiter; A.E., Furman, 1942; M.A., Louisville, 1947; Ph.D., Columbia, 1965. Social Courts in the USSR. Columbia.
- Bruce M. Borthwick; B.A., Syracuse, 1959; A.M., Michigan, 1960; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. The Islamic Sermon As A Channel of Communication in Syria, Jordan and Egypt. Michigan.
- Marguerite G. Vouvard; A.B., Northwestern, 1958; A.M., Radcliffe College (Harvard), 1960; Ph.D., Harvard, 1965. The Labor Movement and the European Communities. Harvard.
- Paul R. Brass; B.A., Harvard, 1958; M.A., Chicago, 1959; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. The Congress Party Organization in Uttar Pradesh: The Transformation from Movement to Party in an Indian State. Chicago.
- Paul Brown; B.A., La Verne College, 1959; M.A., Sacramento State, 1960; Ph.D., Claremont, 1965. Ideological Origins of Modern Argentine Nationalism. Claremont.
- Fedor I. Cicak; LL.D., University of Zagreb, 1940; M.A., Indiana, 1956; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. The Communist Party of Yugoslavia between 1919-34: An Examination of Its Formative Process. Indiana.
- Mary A. Cisar; B.A., Ohio State, 1959; M.A., ibid., 1962; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Patterns of West German Development Aid Policy. Ohio State.
- Nguyen Huu Chi; License en Droit, University of Saigon, 1961; M.A., Michigan State, 1962; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Political Socialization and Political Change. Michigan State.
- Yu-Ju Chih; B.A., National University of Peking, 1940; M.A., California (Berkeley),
 1950; M.A.,
 Yale,
 1961; Ph.D., Indiana,
 1965. The Political Thought of Ch'en Tu-Hsiu. Indiana.
- Henry A. Christopher; B.A., Boston, 1951; Ph.D., Northwestern, 1964. The Political Behavior of the Military in Latin America. Northwestern.
- Robert H. Clarke; A.B., DePauw University, 1958; M.A., Princeton, 1960; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. The Politics of French Agricultural Syndicalism. Princeton.
- James D. Cochrane; B.A., Morningside College, 1960; M.A., Iowa, 1961; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. Political Aspects of the Formation and Functioning of the Central American Program of Economic Integration. Iowa.
- Edwin M. Coulter; B.A., Furman University, 1962; Ph.D., Virginia, 1965. Diplomacy of the Sino-Indian Border Dispute, 1950-62. Virginia.
- James F. Creagan; B.A., Notre Dame, 1962; Ph.D., Virginia, 1965. The Minority Parties of Mexico in the Role of Opposition. Virginia.
- Ralph E. Crow; A.B., Western Reserve, 1948; A.M., Michigan, 1949; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. The Civil Service of Independent Syria: 1945-58. Michigan.

- Mohamed I. Dakrouri; Diploma in Law & Police Science, Cairo Police College, 1950; B.A., Alexandria University, 1959; M.A., North Carolina, 1963; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. The Development of Particular Political and Economic Influences in Emerging Nations: Socialism and Nationalism in the Arab Case Study. North Carolina.
- Wonmo Dong; B.A., Yonsei University, 1957;
 M.A., Kentucky, 1960; Ph.D., Georgetown, 1965.
 Japanese Colonial Policy and Practice in Korea, 1905-1910: A Study in Assimilation. Georgetown.
- Horst Duhnke; B.A., California (Berkeley), 1950; M.A., ibid., 1951; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. German Communism in the Nazi Era. California (Berkeley).
- Walter R. Duncan; A.B., California, 1959; A.M.,
 Fletcher School, 1962; M.A.L.D., ibid., 1963;
 Ph.D., ibid., 1964. Education and Ideology: An Approach to Mexican Political Development.
 Fletcher School.
- Robert L. Eckelberry; A.B., American, 1959; M.A., Central Missouri State, 1961; Ph.D., Nebraska, 1964. The Swedish System of Proportional Representation. Nebraska.
- Frank Eckelt; B.A., New York University, 1948; M.A., ibid., 1952; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. The Rise and Fall of the Bela Kun Regime in 1919. New York University.
- Henry H. Esterly; A.B., Muhlenberg, 1939; M.A.,
 Clark, 1948; Ph.D., Columbia, 1965. Japanese
 High Seas Fisheries and the International Politics of the Occupation, 1945-1951. Columbia.
- William G. Fleming; A.B., San Diego State, 1958;
 M. Sc., London School of Economics, 1960;
 Ph.D., Northwestern, 1964. The District Commissioner and Tribal Administration in Uganda:
 A Study of the Relationship Between African Political Systems and Colonial Policy Achievement, Northwestern.
- Richard M. Fontera; B.A., Columbia, 1956; M.A., New York University, 1958; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. Cultural Pluralism and Communism: The Development of the Government of India Act of 1935. New York University.
- Albert Gastman; A.B., Columbia, 1949; M.A., ibid., 1953; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. Surinam and the Netherlands Antilles under the Charter of the Kingdom. Columbia.
- Charles G. Gati; B.A., Indiana, 1961; M.A., ibid., 1961; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. The Populist Current in Hungarian Politics, 1935-1944. Indiana.
- Minton F. Goldman; A.B., William and Mary, 1955; A.M., Northwestern, 1956; A.M., Fletcher School, 1957; M.A.L.D., ibid., 1958; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. Origins and Development of the Colonial Conflicts Resolved by the Anglo-French Entente of 1904. Fletcher School.

- David Gray; B.A., Pennsylvania, 1952; M.A., ibid., 1954; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. The Foreign Policy Process in the Emerging African Nation: Nigeria. Pennsylvania.
- John J. Grotpeter; B.S., St. Louis, 1960; M.A., Duke, 1961; Ph.D., Washington (St. Louis), 1965. Political Leadership and Political Development in the High Commission Territories. Washington (St. Louis).
- Roderick T. Groves; B.S., Wisconsin, 1958; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Administrative Reform in Venezuela 1958-64. Wisconsin.
- Mickey T. Haggard; B.A., Texas, 1950; M.A., ibid., 1955; Ph.D., California (Berkeley), 1965. The Political System of the Mongolian People's Republic. California (Berkeley).
- John P. Haithcox; B.A., Oberlin College, 1955;
 M.A., California (Berkeley), 1959; Ph.D., ibid.,
 1965. Nationalism, Communism, and Twentieth Century Jacobism: Royist Tactics in India,
 1927-40. California (Berkeley).
- Eui Young Ham; B.A., Yunsei University, 1957; M.A., Wisconsin, 1959; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Ideology in the Foreign Policy of Japanese Socialism. Wisconsin.
- Roger P. Hamburg; A.B., Michigan, 1956; M.A., Chicago, 1958; Ph.D., Wisconsin, 1965. The Soviet Union and Latin America 1953-63. Wisconsin.
- Paul Hamori; B.A., Peter Pazmany (Hungary), 1951; A.M., Michigan, 1959; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. Soviet Influences on the Establishment and the Character of the Hungarian People's Republic, (1944-1954). Michigan.
- Abdelaziz Hamzaoui; Dip., University of Paris, 1958; A.M., Fletcher School, 1960; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. Independent Tunisia: Economic Planning and Growth, Analysis and Appraisal. Fletcher School.
- Donald C. Hellman; B.A., Princeton, 1955; M.A., California (Berkeley), 1960; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Japanese Foreign Policy and Domestic Politics: The Peace Agreement with the Soviet Union. California (Berkeley).
- Edward L. Hoyt; B.S., M.I.T., 1957; M.S., ibid., 1958; A.M., Fletcher School, 1962; M.A.L.D., ibid., 1963; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. The Dilemma of Argentine Development: Frondizi's Economic Policy, 1958-1962. Fletcher School.
- Nguyen Manh Hung; License en Droit, University of Saigon, 1960; M.A., Virginia, 1963; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. The Tunisian Foreign Policy. Virginia.
- M. Mahfuzal Huq; M.A., Dacca, 1954; LL.B., ibid., 1957; Ph.D., Columbia, 1964. The Electoral System of Pakistan: An Analysis of the Problems of Minority Representation. Columbia.

- Barbara W. Jancar; A.B., Smith, 1956; Ph.D., Columbia, 1965. The Twenty-second Congress and the All-People's State in Czechoslovakia. Columbia.
- George D. Jenkins; B.A., Whittier College, 1958; Ph.D., Northwestern, 1965. Politics in Ibadan. Northwestern.
- Sheridan W. Johns; A.B., Amherst College, 1957; A.M., Harvard, 1959; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Marxism-Leninism in a Multi-Racial Society: The Origins and Early History of the Communist Party of South Africa, 1914-1933. Harvard.
- Willard R. Johnson; A.B., California (Los Angeles), 1957; A.M., Johns Hopkins, 1961; Ph.D.,
 Harvard, 1965. Cameroon Reunification: A Case Study in Political Union of Several Africas.
 Harvard.
- Hong Nack Kim; B.A., Seoul National University, 1956; M.A., Georgetown, 1960; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. The Communist United Front Movement in China; 1931-1937. Georgetown.
- Sondra Z. Koff; A.B., Wells College, 1958; M.A., Syracuse, 1960; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. The Italian Socialist Party, 1945-1961. Syracuse.
- Stephen P. Koff; A.B., Indiana, 1950; M.A., Columbia, 1953; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. The Anti-War Elements in the British Labour Party: 1906-1922. Columbia.
- Roman Kolkowicz; B.A., University of Buffalo, 1954; M.A., Chicago, 1958; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. The Political Role of the Soviet Military. Chicago.
- Eldon Lanning; B.S., Northwestern, 1960; Ph.D., Virginia, 1965. The Bolivian Revolution of 1952 and the Cuban Revolution of 1959: Case Studies in the Theory of Revolution. Virginia.
- Paul H. Lewis; B.A., Florida, 1961; Ph.D., North Carolina, 1965. The Politics of Exile: The Case of the Partido Revolucionio Febrerista: Paraguay's 'Left.' North Carolina.
- Michael F. Lofchie; B.A., Harvard, 1958; M.A., California (Berkeley), 1960; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. Constitutional Change and Political Conflict in Zanzibar. California (Berkeley).
- Sylvia R. Margulies; A.B., Brooklyn College, 1959; M.S., Wisconsin, 1961; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. The Pilgrimage to Russia, 1925-37. Wisconsin.
- John Markakis; A.B., Brooklyn, 1958; M.A., Columbia, 1960; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Pan-Africanism: The Idea and the Movement. Columbia.
- William R. Martin; B.A., Princeton, 1954; M.A.,
 Oklahoma, 1957; Institut Certificate, Graduate
 Institute of International Studies, Geneva, 1958: Ph.D., Oklahoma, 1964. Crisis Institutions and the Law in France. Oklahoma.
- Peter Mayer; B.A., San Jose State, 1959; M.A., California (Berkeley), 1961; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. The Communist Theory of Unity: A Study in

- the Breakdown of Political Communication. California (Berkeley).
- John E. Means; Ph.B., Detroit, 1955; Ph.D., Georgetown, 1965. A Study of the Influence of Islam in Northern Nigeria. Georgetown.
- Ellen P. Michiewicz; B.A., Wellesley College, 1960; M.A., Yale, 1961; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Adult Political Education in the U.S.S.R.: The Political "Enlightenment" System of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union. Yale.
- Robert F. Miller; A.B., Michigan, 1957; A.M., Harvard, 1959; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. The Machine-Tractor Station as an Institution for the Organization and Control of Soviet Agriculture. Harvard.
- Ronald C. Monticone; B.A., Maryland, 1959;
 M.A., ibid., 1952; Ph.D., New York University, 1965. Poland 1953-1957: A Study in De-Stalinization. New York University.
- Heyward Moore, Jr.; A.A., Mars Hill College,
 1954; A.B., North Carolina, 1956; M.A., Florida,
 1958; Ph.D., North Carolina, 1964. Congressional Committees and the Formulation of Foreign Aid Policy. North Carolina.
- Yoshio Murakami; B.A., Keio, 1960; A.M., Fletcher School, 1961; M.A.L.D., ibid., 1962; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. Japanese-American Negotiations, 1940-41: With Special Reference to the Diplomatic Negotiations in Washington, April-October 1941. Fletcher School.
- Stephen D. Olynyk; B.A., City College of New York, 1955; M.A., Georgetown, 1959; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Soviet Federalism in Theory and Practice. Georgetown.
- Charles J. Orlebeke; A.B., Calvin, 1957; M.A., Michigan State, 1959; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. The Liberal Party of Australia in New South Wales: A Study of the Political Party as an Office-Seeking Organization. Michigan State.
- Charles J. Parrish; A.B., Florida, 1955; M.A., ibid., 1960; Ph.D., North Carolina, 1964. The Politics of Economic Development: Bolivia and Chile. North Carolina.
- René Peritz; B.A., Temple, 1955; M.A., Pennsylvania, 1956; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. The Evolving Politics of Singapore: A Study of Trends and Issues. Pennsylvania.
- Joseph A. Peters; B.A., Penn State, 1947; M.A., Pennsylvania, 1950; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. Stalin's Nationality Policy: An Interpretation. Pennsylvania.
- George H. Quester; A.B., Columbia, 1958; A.M., Harvard, 1964; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Counterforce/Countervalue: 1900-1945. Harvard.
- Peter Ranis; B.A., Brandeis University, 1958;
 Ph.D., New York University, 1965. Parties, Politics and Peronism: A Study of Post-Peron Ar-

- gentine Political Development. New York University.
- Nimrod Raphaeli; B.A., New School of Law and Economics (Tel Aviv), 1958; M.P.A., Pittsburgh, 1961; Ph.D., Michigan, 1965. Development Planning in Iraq, Israel, Lebanon and the United Arab Republic. Michigan.
- Robert C. Richter; B.A., Hamilton College, 1951; M.A., New York University, 1959; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. French Attitudes and Policy Toward Poland 1944-1964. New York University.
- Phyllis J. Rolnick; B.A., Cornell, 1956; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Socialist Ideology In Peasant Society. Cornell.
- Howard L. Rosenthal; B.S., M.I.T., 1960; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. Contemporary French Politics and Sub-Strata Analysis. M.I.T.
- Ronald I. Rubin; B.A., New York University, 1961; M.A., Brown, 1963; Ph.D., New York University, 1965. The Controversies Over the Objectives of the United States Information Agency According to Congress, the Executive Branch and the Agency. New York University.
- William Safran; A.B., CCNY, 1953; M.A., ibid., 1955; Ph.D., Columbia, 1964. Health Insurance in West Germany: A Case Study in Interest Group Politics. Columbia.
- Giacomo A. Sani; Grad., University of Padua, 1955; Ph.D., California (Berkeley), 1965. Professional Groups and Organization Tension. A Study of Inter-Group Relationships in an Italian Public Agency. California (Berkeley).
- Seymour Scheinberg; B.A., Los Angeles State, 1958; M.A., Claremont, 1960; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. The Development of Bhutan and Its Role in Sino-Indian Relations. Claremont.
- Carl L. Schweinfurth; B.S., Oregon, 1952; M.A., Florida, 1954; Ph.D., Southern Illinois, 1964. A Case Study in the Failure of Moderation in Spanish Politics: Martinez de La Rosa, January 15, 1834 to June 15, 1835. Southern Illinois.
- Robert B. Shaw; B.A., Denison University, 1938; M.B.A., Harvard, 1939; Ph.D., New York University, 1965. The Problem of Railway-Highway Co-ordination and Motor Carrier Regulation in India. New York University.
- Lawrence L. Shrader; B.A., Missouri, 1950; M.A., California, 1954; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. The Social Basis of Political Leadership in Rajasthan and Maharashtra. California (Berkeley).
- Sondang P. Siagian; B.A., Berea College, 1960;
 M.P.A., Indiana, 1962; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. The Development and Problems of Indigenous Bureaucratic Leadership in Indonesia. Indiana.
- William N. Simonson; B.A., William and Mary, 1951; A.M., Fletcher School, 1953; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. Nazi Infiltration in South America, 1933-1945. Fletcher School.

- Kenneth N. Skoug, Jr.; A.B., Columbia College, NYC, 1953; M.A., George Washington, 1957; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. The Eastern Policy of the German Social Democratic Party in a Period of Party Reorganization and International Crisis, 1958-1960. George Washington.
- Tobias Soebekti; Bachelor of Law, University of Indonesia, 1952; Doctorandus, State Academy for Taxation, Rotterdam, Netherlands, 1955; M.P.A., Indiana, 1963; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. Some Facets of the Income Tax Administration in Indonesia, With Reference to Those in the United States. Indiana.
- Paul G. Stephenson; B.S., Tennessee, 1959; M.A., ibid., 1961; Ph.D., Emory, 1965. Costa Rican Government and Politics. Emory.
- Ernest Stern; A.B., Queens, 1955; A.N., Fletcher School, 1956; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. The Role of Government in the Economic Development of Turkey, 1948-1960. Fletcher School.
- Dae Sook Suh; A.B., Texas Christian, 1956; M.A., Indiana, 1958; Ph.D., Columbia, 1964. Korean Communism and the Rise of Kim. Columbia.
- Michael W. Suleiman; A.B., Bradley, 1960; M.S., Wisconsin, 1962; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Political Parties in Lebanon. Wisconsin.
- Ta Van Tai; LLB, University of Saigon, 1960;
 M.A., Virginia, 1964; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. The Role of the Military in the Developing Nations of South and Southeast Asia. Virginia.
- Rolf H. W. Theen; A.B., Manchester College, 1959; M.A., Indiana, 1962; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. Petr Nikitich Tkachev: A Study in Revolutionary Theory. Indiana.
- James D. Thomas; B.S.F.S., Georgetown, 1955;
 M.A., Claremont, 1961; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Indian Federalism and the Constituent Assembly:
 Some American Comparisons. Claremont.
- Rudolf L. Tökés; A.B., Adelbert, 1959; M.A., Columbia, 1961; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. The Communist Party of Hungary: Its Origins and Role in the Revolutions of 1918-1919. Columbia.
- James R. Townsend; B.A., Omaha, 1953; M.A., California (Berkeley), 1957; Ph.D., ibid., 1965.
 Mass Political Participation in Communist China. California (Berkeley).
- William A. Welsh; B.S.J., Northwestern, 1961; M.A., ibid., 1962; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. The Political Role of the Intellectual Elite in Bulgaria. Northwestern.
- E. Victor Wolfenstein; B.A., Columbia College, 1962; M.A., Princeton, 1964; Ph.D., ibid., 1965.
 The Revolutionary Personality. Princeton.
- Manfred Wolfson; B.A., Chicago, 1950; M.A.,ibid., 1953; Ph.D., California (Berkeley), 1965.The SS Leadership. California (Berkeley).
- Denis Worrall; B.A., Capetown (South Africa), 1957; M.A., ibid., 1959; Ph.D., Cornell, 1965.

Nigerian Federalism: Genesis and Development. Cornell.

INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION POLITICS AND LAW

- Fawzi Abu-Diab; B.S., Tristate College, University of Michigan, 1954; A.M., Pennsylvania, 1956; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Lebanon and the United Nations, 1945-1958. Pennsylvania.
- Yonah Alexander; B.A., Roosevelt University,
 1954; A.M., Chicago, 1955; Ph.D., Columbia,
 1965. The Recruitment of United Nations Technical Assistance Experts. Columbia.
- Salvatore A. Arcilesi; A.B., The Citadel, 1955; Ph.D., Virginia, 1965. U.S. Policy in Iran, 1954-1960. Virginia.
- Michael H. Armacost; A.B., Carleton, 1958; M.A., Columbia, 1961; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. The Thor-Jupiter Controversy: A Case Study of Inter-Service Rivalry and Weapons Innovation. Columbia.
- Abraham Askhenasi; A.B., Columbia, 1955; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. The Berlin SPD's Differentiation from the Foreign Policy of the Federal German Social Democratic Party (1948-1960). Columbia.
- Robert H. Bailie; B.S., Georgetown, 1952;
 A.M.T., Harvard, 1957; Ph.D., Pittsburgh, 1964.
 The UNESCO Relations Staff of the Department of State: A Study of Agency Response to Public and Private Pressures. Pittsburgh.
- David A. Baldwin; A.B., Indiana, 1958; M.A.,
 Princeton, 1961; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Soft Loans and American Foreign Policy: 1943-1962.
 Princeton.
- Michael Barkun; B.S.J., Northwestern, 1960;
 M.A., ibid., 1963; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Toward a Theoretical Framework for Decentralized Law.
 Northwestern.
- Sharon Boen; B.A., Florida, 1955; Ph.D., Virginia, 1965. The Leadership Role of the Secretary-General in Times of International Crisis. Virginia.
- George A. Brinkley; A.B., Davidson, 1953; M.A., Columbia, 1955; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. Allied Intervention and the Volunteer Army in South Russia, 1917-1921. Columbia.
- North C. Burn; B.A., University of Washington, 1943; A.M., Fletcher School, 1948; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. U.S. Base Rights in the British West Indies, 1940-62. Fletcher School.
- Duncan H. Cameron; A.B., Harvard, 1956; LL.B.,
 Columbia, 1959; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Panama's Unusual Guest. The Canal Zone in United States-Panamanian Relations. Columbia.
- Choung Il Chee; B.S., Georgetown, 1956; M.A., New York University, 1961; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. National Regulation of Fisheries in International Law. New York University.

- Peter Ping-Chii Cheng; B.A., Taiwan University, 1954; M.A., Minnesota, 1960; Ph.D., Southern Illinois, 1964. A Study of John Dulles' Diplomatic Strategy in the Far East. Southern Illinois.
- Joseph Churba; B.A., Brooklyn, 1957; M.A., Columbia, 1959; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. U.A.R.-Israel Rivalry Over Aid and Trade in Sub-Saharan Africa: 1957-1963. Columbia.
- Michael J. Coyne; B.A., Colorado, 1959; M.A., American, 1962; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Participation of the Soviet Union in the International Telecommunication Union. American.
- John St. G. Creaghe; B.A., Colorado, 1943; M.A., Maryland, 1960; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Personal Qualities and Effective Diplomatic Negotiation. Maryland.
- Ibrahim M.M. Darwish; Licence en droit, Alexandria, 1957; Diploma of Administrative and Financial Sciences, Cairo, 1959; Ph.D., American, 1965. A Study of the Problem of Factionalism Among Selected Revolutionary Elites. American.
- Jean-Robert Leguey-Feilleux; B.A., Florida, 1950; M.A., ibid., 1951; Ph.D., Georgetown, 1965. The Status of Guerrillas in the Law of War. Georgetown.
- Otto Feinstein; B.A., Chicago, 1950; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Foreign Investment and the Development of Venezuela. Chicago.
- Haluk N. Goze; License, Istanbul; M.A., American, 1959; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. Modernism and Traditionalism in the Ottoman Empire 1790-1922. American.
- Philip Green; B.A., Swarthmore College, 1954; M.P.A., Princeton, 1960; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Social Science and Nuclear Deterrence. Princeton.
- Maxine J. Heller; A.B., Wellesley, 1958; Ph.D., Columbia, 1965. The Treatment of the Defeated War Leaders. Columbia.
- Charles F. Herman; B.A., DePauw, 1960; M.A., Northwestern, 1963; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Crises in Foreign Policy-making: A Simulation of International Politics. Northwestern.
- Ray C. Hillam; B.A., Utah, 1955; M.A., George Washington, 1958; Ph.D., American, 1964. Insurgent Communism: The Problem of Counter-Measures in Malaya, Vietnam and The Philippines. American.
- H. Allan Hovey, Jr.; A.B., Swarthmore, 1948; M.A., Columbia, 1950; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Interparliamentary Consultation and Atlantic Cooperation. Columbia.
- John J. Iannuzzi; B. Ed., Duquesne, 1951; M. Ed., Pittsburgh, 1952; Ph.D., Catholic University, 1965. Iraq, 1920-1958: The Development of the Social Infrastructure of an Emerging Country. Catholic University.

- Birabhongse Kasemsri; B.A., Hons., Oxford 1957; A.M., Fletcher School, 1958; M.A.L.D., ibid., 1959; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. State Responsibility with Respect to Damage Caused by Private Individuals to Private Alien Individuals on Its Territory: The Preventive Obligation in International Law. Fletcher School.
- Jung Gun Kim; B.A., Kansas City, 1958; M.A., George Washington, 1961; Ph.D., Maryland, 1965. Non-Member Participation in International Organizations. Maryland.
- Theodore J. Klein; B.A., St. Francis; M.A., Georgetown, 1957; Ph.D., American, 1965. Race Relations in the Republic of South Africa through 1962: A Study of the Fundamental Elements. American.
- Howard Lentner; B.S., Miami, 1958; M.A., Syracuse, 1959; Ph.D., ibid., 1963. The Political Role of the UN Secretary General. Syracuse.
- Joseph E. McCarthy; B.S., U.S. Military Academy, 1945; M.A., Maryland, 1960; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. An Illusion of Power: The Concept and Evolution of American Foreign Policy Toward Viet-Nam. Maryland.
- Donald L. McQueen; B.A., Iowa State, 1949; M.A., ibid., 1951; Ph.D., American, 1965. Nationalism in Uzbekistan. American.
- Ismail S. Makled; B. Comm., University of Cairo, 1959; M.A., Pittsburgh, 1962; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. Comparative International Behavior in the Suez Crisis: A Perspective Study. Pittsburgh.
- Gary L. Maris; A.B., Stetson University, 1962; M.A., Duke, 1964; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Some Aspects of International Law in United States-Cuban Relations: 1898-1964. Duke.
- Pritam Merani; B.A., Johns Hopkins, 1958; M.A., ibid., 1961; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. India's Territorial Disputes: A Legal Analysis. Johns Hopkins.
- Claire Nader; A.B., Smith, 1950; M.A., Columbia, 1954; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. American Natural Scientists in the Policy Process: Three Atomic Energy Issues and Their Foreign Policy Implications. Columbia.
- Henry T. Nash; B.A., Haverford, 1949; M.A., Pennsylvania, 1949; Ph.D., New York University, 1965. United States Government Attitudes Towards Disarmament. New York University.
- Kenneth L. Neff; B.A., Denver, 1954; M.A., Johns Hopkins, 1956; Ph.D., American, 1965. An Analysis of Indonesian Educational Planning Emphasizing its Applicability for Attacking Overall National Development Problems. American.
- Bum-Joon Lee Park; B.A., Kentucky, 1956; Ph.D., American, 1965. The British Experience of Counterinsurgency in Malaya: The Emergency, 1948-1960. American.
- James W. Pratt; A.B., Kenyon, 1947; LL.B.,

- Michigan, 1950; M.A., Columbia, 1954; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. Leadership Relations in United States Foreign Policy Making: Case Studies 1957-1960. Columbia.
- Mohyieddin I. Quandour; B.A., Earlham College, 1960; M.I.S., Claremont, 1962; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. Muridism: A Study of the Caucasian Wars of Independence, 1819-1859. Claremont.
- Naeem G. Rathore; B.S., Michigan, 1952; M.A., Columbia, 1955; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Indian Nationalist Agitation in the United States: A Study of Lala Lajpat Rai and the India Home Rule League of America, 1914-1920. Columbia.
- David R. Reagan; B.A., Texas, 1959; A.M.,
 Fletcher School, 1962; M.A.L.D., ibid., 1962;
 Ph.D., ibid., 1964. American-British Strategic Planning for Coalition Warfare Prior to the Entrance of the United States into World War II.
 Fletcher School.
- Richard L. Renfield; B.A., Harvard, 1953; M.A., Maryland, 1959; Ph.D., American, 1965. The Foreign Relations of the European Coal and Steel Community as Viewed by the Common Assembly. American.
- Eric Roman; B.A., Hunter College, 1958; M.A., New York University, 1959; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. The Ruhrkampf in History. New York University.
- Ernest E. Rossi; B.A., Duquesne, 1953; M. Litt., Pittsburgh, 1955; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. The United States in the 1948 Elections in Italy. Pittsburgh.
- Benjamin G. Ruckberg; B.A., Oberlin College, 1953; D.S.S., Syracuse, 1964. The Foreign Policy Roles of Recent Soviet Doctrines on the "Fight for Peace". Syracuse.
- Jerome N. Slater; B.A., Alfred University, 1956;
 M.A., Yale, 1958; Ph.D., Princeton, 1965. The Role of the Organization of American States in United States Foreign Policy, 1947-1963. Princeton.
- Zdenek Slouka; PH.D., Columbia, 1965. International Custom and the Continental Shelf. Columbia.
- Jean E. Smith; B.A., Princeton, 1954; Ph.D., Columbia, 1964. Defense of Berlin. Columbia.
- William Spencer; B.A., Princeton, 1948; M.A., Duke, 1950; Ph.D., American, 1965. The Mosul

- Question in International Relations. American.
- Arthur Stein; B.A., Penn State, 1957; M.A., Pennsylvania, 1962; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. India's Policy Toward the Soviet Union, 1953-62. Pennsylvania.
- Stanley M. Stein; M.A., American, 1961; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. German-Polish Relations from Munich Conference to the Fourth Partition of Poland. American.
- John D. Stempel; B.A., Princeton, 1960; M.A., California (Berkeley), 1963; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Policy and Decision Making in the Department of State: The Vietnamese Problem. California (Berkeley).
- Yasushi Sugiyama; B.A., Florida, 1956; M.A., ibid., 1957; Ph.D., Maryland, 1964. Japan's Relations with Communist China, 1949-1963. Maryland.
- Raymond Tanter; B.A., Roosevelt University, 1961; M.A., Indiana, 1964; Ph.D., ibid.,1964. Dimensions of Conflict Behavior Within and Between Nations, 1958-60. Indiana.
- Ronald J. Terchek; B.A., Chicago, 1958; M.A., ibid., 1960; Ph.D., Maryland, 1965. The making of the Test Ban Treaty in the United States. Maryland.
- Robert D. Tice; B.S., Memphis State College, 1957; M.A., Saint Louis, 1959; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. Geopolitics and the Ladakh Boundary. Saint Louis.
- Maung Ye Tut; B.A., University of Rangoon, 1956; M.A., Georgetown, 1960; Ph.D., ibid., 1965. The Afro-Asian Group in the United Nations, 1955-1962. Georgetown.
- Robert Weiner; B.A., Brandeis University, 1960;
 M.A., New York University, 1961; Ph.D., ibid.,
 1965. Polycentrism in the United Nations: A Case Study of the United Nations Operations in the Congo. New York University.
- Theodore D. Wyly; A.B., Florida, 1951; A.M., Florida State, 1956; A.M., Fletcher School, 1958; M.A.L.D., ibid., 1958; Ph.D., ibid., 1964. Foreign Relations of the United States with France from 1919 to 1929. Fletcher School.
- Oran R. Young; B.A., Harvard, 1962; M.A., Yale, 1964; PhD., ibid., 1965. Third Party Intervention in International Crises. Yale.

NEWS AND NOTES

PROGRAM COMMITTEE: 1966 ANNUAL MEETING

The deadline for papers to be submitted to section chairmen is November 1, 1965. (The June issue announcement of a December 1 deadline was incorrect.)

Commencing with Volume 60 (March 1966), Austin Ranney, of the University of Wisconsin, will become Managing Editor of this Review, succeeding Harvey C. Mansfield, who will relinquish the post upon the issuance of the December 1965 number. At the same time, James W. Prothro, of the University of North Carolina, will succeed Austin Ranney as Book Review Editor.

Editorial correspondence relating to the September and December issues should be addressed to the Columbus office, as hitherto. After September 15, address such correspondence, touching later issues, to Austin Ranney, North Hall, University of Wişconsin, Madison, Wis.; and send books intended for review to James W. Prothro, Department of Political Science, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, N.C.

PROFESSIONAL CONFERENCES

The Southern Political Science Association at its annual meeting in San Diego in April, elected the following officers for 1965-66: president, George S. Blair, Claremont Graduate School; vice-president, Thomas McEnroe, California State College at Los Angeles; secretary, Richard Gripp, San Diego State College; treasurer, Richard Harvey, Whittier. Named to the executive council were: Frank Way, University of California at Riverside; Gerald Rigby, University of Southern California; Tom Trombetus, Long Beach State College; James Lare, Occidental College; Richard Longaker, UCLA; Gordon Baker, University of California at Santa Barbara; and John L. Groom, Redlands.

The American Society for Political and Legal Philosophy held its annual meeting in Washington, D.C., on April 24-25, 1965. Richard B. Brandt, chairman of the department of philosophy at the University of Michigan, was chosen president-elect. J. Roland Pennock of Swarthmore College and John W. Chapman of the University of Pittsburgh were named editor and associate editor, respectively, of Nomos, the annual publication of the Society.

It has been the practice of the Society to meet with philosophers, political scientists and lawyers. In the future, depending upon the topic selected for consideration at the annual meeting, the Society will meet in conjunction with the annual meetings of other social science disciplines.

Forthcoming volumes of Nomos will deal with equality, which was the topic of the Washington meeting, and with representation, the topic of the joint meeting with the American Political Science Association in September.

The department of government at the University of Texas sponsored a conference on the "Role of the Intellectual in Politics" in April. Papers were read by: Gunnar Heckscher, professor of political science at the University of Stockholm and parliamentary leader of the Swedish Conservative Party; Senator Eugene J. McCarthy, Minnesota; Klaus Mehnert, professor of political science at the Institute of Technology, Aachen; Francisco Miro Quesada, Peruvian Ambassador to the United Nations; Representative John Brademas, Indiana; Sir Denis Brogan, professor of political science and philosophy at Peterhouse, Cambridge University; Daniel Cosio Villegas, Mexican delegate to the United Nations Economic and Social Council; and Merle Fainsod, professor of government at Harvard.

The first of a series of Socialist Scholars Conferences took place on the campus of Rutgers—the State University, on September 11 and 12. Persons interested in future conferences should write to Professor Marvin Gettleman, Department of History and Economics, Polytechnic Institute of Brooklyn, 333 Jay Street, Brooklyn, New York 11201.

At its twenty-third annual meeting in April, the Midwest Conference of Political Scientists elected the following new officers: Clara Penniman, University of Wisconsin, president; Orville Alexander, Southern Illinois University, vice-president; Stephen T. Early, Jr., DePauw University, secretary-treasurer; Merle Kling, Washington University, editor of Midwest Journal of Political Science; and as members of the executive council, Willard N. Hogan, University of Nebraska and William H. Flanigan, University of Minnesota.

The 1966 meeting of the Conference will be held at the University of Chicago April 28 to 30. The program chairman is S. Sidney Ulmer, University of Kentucky.

OTHER ACTIVITIES

Millsaps College, Jackson, Mississippi, has received a grant from the Field Foundation to support an Oral History of Contemporary Mississippi Life. This project will be under the direction of Gordon G. Henderson, chairman of the department of political science. Transcripts of the interviews collected, including interviews of major figures in Mississippi politics, will be available on inter-library loan.

The first issue of the New York State Political Review will appear in September. It will include most of the papers presented at the meeting of the N.Y. State Political Science Association meeting in April.

Arizona State College will become Northern Arizona University in 1966.

New York University and the Joint Committee on the Near and Middle East of the American Council of Learned Societies and the Social Science Research Council sponsored a conference on "Social Growth and Democracy" in New York from May 27 to May 29. The conference brought together scholars and men immediately familiar with Turkish affairs to study the impact of social growth on politics. Kemal Karpat, New York University, was the director of the conference.

The Overseas Educational Service has received a $300,000 grant from the Carnegie Corporation. The grant will enable OES to broaden its contacts with American faculty and administrators and to work with more institutions abroad. Although OES recruits educators for all the developing areas, the initial emphasis has been on Africa, where many new institutions are now being built and the need for expatriate staff is still the most urgent.

To develop its roster of potential candidates, OES works with many professional organizations and with other national and international groups of similar purpose, in addition to making contact with faculty members who register directly with OES.

OES is sponsored jointly by the National Academy of Sciences, the American Council on Education, and Education and World Affairs, with the cooperation of the American Council of Learned Societies, the Social Science Research Council, the Institute of International Education, and the Canadian Universities Foundation.

Qualified persons who are interested in serving abroad are invited to write to Overseas Educational Service, 522 Fifth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10036.

The Society for Religion in Higher Education is offering a number of post-doctoral fellowships to encourage the growing interest in the relation of scholarship in religion to scholarship in other fields of study. These fellowships are made possible through a grant from The Danforth Foundation.

Grants are available to: (1) scholars in the humanities, social and natural sciences for a year of study in religion and (2) scholars in religion for a year of study in another discipline.

These fellowships are open to scholars in any institution of higher learning in the United States or Canada without respect to discipline, religious affiliation or non-affiliation. Scholars applying for the grants must have a Ph.D. degree or its equivalent plus at least three years of teaching experience. Preference will be given to scholars under 50 years of age.

The maximum stipend is $8,500. Stipends will be based on experience, present salary and availability of other resources.

Completed applications must be received by the Society by December 1, 1965. Application forms and additional information may be secured from: Lawrence P. DeBoer, Executive Director, The Society for Religion in Higher Education, 400 Prospect Street, New Haven, Connecticut 06511.

Under the direction of Gerard J. Mangone, professor of political science and associate dean of the Maxwell Graduate School of Syracuse University, twenty members of the Second Maxwell Institute on the United Nations met at the Villa Serbelloni at Bellagio, Italy in August, 1965. Representing ten countries, the participants discussed the conduct of foreign policy through the United Nations.

Opportunities for overseas research by three scholars in the humanities and social sciences will be offered annually by the International Honors Program beginning in 1966-67. The program will field a small select group of American honor students and three preceptors for an academic year of comparative foreign study. The countries visited will be chosen by the preceptors. A division of responsibility among preceptors will enable each scholar to devote approximately two-thirds of his time to his own research. Interested scholars may contact Dr. Paul Conner, 401-1903 Hall, Princeton, N.J.

The University of Virginia Library and the Stettinius Fund, Inc., announce the microfilm publication of the State Department scrapbooks of Edward R. Stettinius, Jr., Under-Secretary (1943-44) and Secretary of State (1944-45). These scrapbooks comprise more than 1500 pages of clippings from magazines and newspapers throughout the United States and encompass the Dumbarton Oaks Conference, the transition in the State Department from Cordell Hull to Stettinius, the events of January and February 1945, the Yalta Conference, the Mexico City Conference, and the United Nations Conference in San Francisco. Together these scrapbooks provide a unique source for the study of public attitudes toward American diplomacy 1944-45. The two microfilm reels are available for $15.00 each or $25.00 for the set. Orders and inquiries should be addressed to: Stettinius Fellow, Manuscripts Division, University of Virginia Library, Charlottesville, Virginia.

The 1965 Legislature of the State of New York has established 90 fellowships in honor of former Governor Herbert H. Lehman. The annual awards are to be known as the New York State Herbert H. Lehman Fellowships in Social Sciences and Public and International Affairs. Applicants for the awards must be citizens of the United States, but need not be residents of the State of New York. The fellowships carry annual stipends of $5,000 if the recipient is matriculated for a doctoral degree and has completed at least one year of graduate study, otherwise the award will be for $4,000. The deadline for applications is December 1, 1965. Winners will be announced on March 15, 1966. For further information and application forms write to the Regents Scholarships and Examination Center, The State Education Department, Albany, New York 12224.

MORLEY AYEARST, New York University, visited Cairo in February for two weeks as a member of a team of university professors from the State of New York to investigate possibilities for student and teacher exchange and opportunities in Middle Eastern affairs.

PETER BACHRACH has returned to his position at Bryn Mawr College after a sabbatical leave in England.

HANS H. BAERWALD will be director of the University of California Overseas Study Center, Tokyo, Japan, September 1965-July, 1966.

ERWIN W. BARD, Brooklyn College of the City University of New York, has returned from eighteen months as senior adviser to the Institute of Public Administration (New York) at the National Office of Organization and Training of the Peruvian government in Lima. He also lectured at the Faculty of Economics of the University of Buenos Aires in the program for public administration assisted by Columbia University.

HENRY BIENEN has returned to the University of Chicago following a year of teaching and research at Makerere University College in Kampala, Uganda, under the auspices of the University of Chicago.

BERNARD E. BROWN, Brooklyn College of the City University of New York spent 1964-65 on research in Senegal and other West African countries.

EDWARD H. BUEHRIG, Indiana University, will be on leave during 1965-66. He has received an SSRC grant and will spend five months at UNRWA headquarters in Beirut, Lebanon, conducting research.

FRANKLIN L. BURDETTE, University of Maryland, has been elected chairman of the board of editors of World Affairs.

James Busey, University of Colorado, will be on leave from the University during 1965-1966. He will assume teaching responsibilities at the University of Colorado-Colorado Springs Center.

George A. Codding, Jr., University of Colorado, has been awarded a university faculty research fellowship for the academic year 1965-66.

RITA W. COOLEY, New York University, has been awarded a Fulbright Lectureship at the Amerika Institut, University of Innsbruck, Austria, for 1965-66.

FRANK DARLING, University of Colorado, will be on leave 1965-66 under the Fulbright-Hayes Educational Exchange Act as a lecturer at the Lyceum of the Philippines.

James C. Davies, University of Oregon, attended a seminar on the formation of Latin American elites at the University of Montevideo, Uruguay, June 6-12, 1965.

DAVID DERGE, Indiana University, spent some time in Sierra Leone studying the effectiveness of Peace Corp training.

ROLAND H. EBEL, Newcomb College, Tulane University, will be on leave 1965-66 to conduct research in Guatemala under an SSRC grant.

PRESTON W. EDSALL, North Carolina State University at Raleigh, attended the internship evaluation conference held in Puerto Rico in April.

HERBERT EMMERICH, University of Virginia, presided at the XIII International Congress of Administrative Sciences in Paris, France, July 19-24.

JOSEPH R. FISZMAN, University of Oregon, will be on leave during 1965-66 to do research in Czechoslovakia and Poland on a grant from the Inter-University Travel Grant Committee.

GISBERT H. FLANZ, New York University, will continue to serve as advisor to the Administrative Improvement Research Commission of the Republic of Korea. He spent the summer in Seoul.

WILLIAM J. FOLTZ, Yale University, has received a Yale junior faculty fellowship, and will be on leave during the calendar year 1966.

ELLEN FREY-WOUTERS, Brooklyn College of the City University of New York was on an SSRC research leave in Europe during the spring term.

WALTER GOLDSTEIN, Brooklyn College of the City University of New York, spent the summer in Europe under a research fellowship from the Mershon Center at Ohio State University.

ALBERT GORVINE, director of the Research Center for Comparative Politics and Administration of Brooklyn College of the City University of New York, served as delegate from the U. S. A. to a CENTRO Conference on The Role of Local Government in National Development in Ankara, Turkey, in February, 1965. He delivered a paper on "Local Government in National Development: a New Role and National Responsibility." In June-July, 1965 he served as consultant to the Philippine Executive Academy at Baguio.

DARRELL P. HAMMER, Indiana University, has been awarded an SSRC grant that will allow him to do research in the Russian area during 1965-66.

Gordon G. Henderson, Millsaps College, has received a post-doctoral fellowship from the National Center for Education in Politics which will enable him to serve on the staff of Governor Samuel Goddard of Arizona for a twelve-month period beginning September 1965.

JERRY HOUGH, University of Illinois, has received a research grant from the Russian Research Center of Harvard University. He will spend the year in Cambridge and later visit the Soviet Union.

MICHAEL HUDSON, Brooklyn College of the City University of New York, will be on leave during 1965-66, as a research associate of the Center for International Affairs at Harvard University.

JOHN HUTCHINSON, UCLA, spent the summer doing research in Washington, D. C., under grants from the University.

PHILIP E. Jacob, University of Pennsylvania, participated in conferences held in India with other collaborators in the International Studies of Values in Politics, a program of cross-cultural behavioral research being conducted jointly by the University of Pennsylvania and social research insitutions in India, Yugoslavia and Poland.

JACK T. JOHNSON, Indiana State University, has been granted a one-year leave of absence to serve as special assistant to Earl McGrath at the Institute of Higher Education, Columbia University.

ROBERT N. KEARNEY, Duke University, has received an award from the American Council of Learned Societies for his study of "Communalism and the Language Problem in Ceylon."

MELVILLE T. KENNEDY, Jn., has returned to Bryn Mawr College after a sabbatical leave.

MALCOLM KERR is on leave from UCLA and is spending the academic year in Egypt.

James D. Kitchen has a year's leave of absence from San Diego State College and will teach at Forman Christian College in Lahore, Pakistan.

EDWARD A. KOLODZIEJ, University of Virginia, has been awarded an autumn semester research grant by the Rockefeller Foundation.

SAMUEL KONEFSKY, Brooklyn College of the City University of New York, pursued field study in Great Britain during the 1965 spring semester under a grant from the Rockefeller Foundation.

Wolfgang H. Kraus, The George Washington University, was elected vice-president for political science by the American Society of Political and of Legal Philosophy at its annual meeting. He also participated in the Fifth International Conference on World Politics which was held at the Hague in September, 1965. The conference was devoted to Eastern European developments.

VUKAN KUIC, University of Alabama, is on leave with the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions, Santa Barbara, California, during the academic year 1965-66.

WLADYSLAW W. KULSKI, Duke University, conducted research in France during the summer.

MARTIN LANDAU, Brooklyn College of the City University of New York, will be senior specialist in public administration at the Institute of Advanced Projects at the East-West Center, Honolulu, Hawaii, for the academic year 1965-66.

CARL H. LANDÉ, visiting professor, Ateneo de Manila, Philippines, has received an award from the American Council of Learned Societies, for his study, "A Study of Philippine Politics."

ROBERT E. LANE, Yale University, has received a senior faculty fellowship from the University, and will be on leave during the 1965-66 academic year.

CHONG-SIK LEE, University of Pennsylvania, will be on research leave during 1965-66 under a grant from the Rockefeller Foundation.

Gertrude Leighton, Bryn Mawr College, who has been combining with her regular duties at Bryn Mawr a research appointment in law and psychiatry at the University of Pennsylvania Law School during the years 1959-65, will be on sabbatical leave in 1965-66.

WILLIAM F. LEVANTROSSER, Rutgers—The State University, has been awarded a post-doctoral fellowship by the Mershon Center for Education in National Security at Ohio State University for the academic year 1965-65.

J. Gus Liebenow, Indiana University, visited Sierra Leone to investigate the effectiveness of the training given Peace Corps personnel. He also conducted field work in Ghana, Nigeria and East Africa under a summer grant from Indiana University.

CHARLES S. LIEBMAN has been awarded a crossdisciplinary fellowship from the Society for Religion in Higher Education. He will be on leave from Yeshiva University (1965-66) and will serve as a visiting scholar in the Department of Religion at Columbia University. JOHN P. LOVELL, Indiana University, did field work in Korea this past summer.

SERIF ARIF MARDIN, University of Ankara, will spend 1965-66 at the Institute of Turkish Studies at Columbia University.

LUCIAN C. MARQUIS, University of Oregon, has been awarded a Fulbright lectureship at the Institute of Political Science of the University of Turin, Italy, for 1965-66.

MARTIN MEADOWS, American University, served at the University of the Philippines during 1964-65 as the recipient of a Fulbright award.

PHILIP MONYPENNY will be on sabbatical leave from the University of Illinois during the year 1965-66. He will spend most of the year in Urbana in research and writing.

GEORGE E. VON DER MUHL, University of Chicago, is spending the current academic year in research and instruction at Makerere University College, Kampala, Uganda.

STUART NAGEL returned to the University of Illinois in September after a year divided between the Center for Advanced Study in California and the East-West Center in Hawaii.

HAROLD NIEBURG is on research leave from the University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee for the academic year 1965-66.

GERHART NIEMEYER, University of Notre Dame, taught at the Institute on Communism and Constitutional Democracy at Vanderbilt University.

DAVID M. OLSON, University of Texas, will be on leave during the 1965-66 academic year and will participate in the APSA's study of Congress, as well as conduct other research. He spent the 1965 summer in Sweden doing field work.

NORMAN J. PADELFORD, University of Pennsylvania, edited the special United Nations anniversary issue of International Organization which commemorated the 20th anniversary of the signing of the U. N. Charter. The issue carried 25 articles by scholars and authorities from the U. S. and abroad appraising the accomplishments and prospects of the United Nations.

NORMAN D. PALMER, University of Pennsylvania, has been appointed a member of the Committee on International Education of the College Entrance Examination Board. He also participated in the annual Institute of World Affairs sponsored by the Cincinnati Council on World Affairs.

KENNETH PREWITT, University of Chicago, will conduct research and teach at Makerere University College, Kampala, Uganda.

R. K. RAMAZANI, University of Virginia, won the 1964 prize for the best book manuscript in the competition held by the Association of Middle East Studies.

DAVID C. RAPAPORT will be on leave from UCLA during the fall and spring semesters and will engage in research in England during the latter.

DONALD R. REICH, Oberlin College, will be on research leave during 1965-66.

JOHN S. RESHETAR, JR., University of Washington, was on leave during the spring.

F. W. Riggs, Indiana University, read a paper at a conference on problems of modernization in Asia at Korea University at Seoul.

JOSEPH S. ROUCEK, University of Bridgeport, has been elected president of Delta Tau Kappa, the International Social Science Honorary Society.

ALVIN Z. RUBINSTEIN, University of Pennsylvania, was awarded a John Simon Guggenheim Memorial Foundation Fellowship for 1965-66 which permits him to undertake research in Yugoslavia.

BRUCE M. RUSSETT, Yale University, has received a Yale junior faculty fellowship and will be on leave for the 1965-66 academic year.

JAMES R. SCARRITT, University of Colorado, will be on leave during 1965-66. He has been awarded a faculty research fellowship for research in Zambia and Rhodesia.

LAWRENCE SCHEINMAN, UCLA, will conduct research in Europe during 1965-66 under an SSRC grant.

KARL M. SCHMITT, University of Texas, will be on leave during 1965-66. He will participate in and coordinate a study for the Department of State on political forces in Latin America.

ROBERT E. Scott, University of Illinois, attended a conference on Social Science in Latin America held at Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, in March, 1965. The conference was sponsored by the SSRC.

PRESSLEY S. SIKES, Indiana University, having reached the retirement age for administrative duties, has returned to full time duties with the department of government.

RICHARD G. SMOLKA, the American University, has accepted a faculty fellowship in state and local politics from NCEP and will be on leave for academic year 1965-66.

RICHARD F. STAAR, Emory University, presented a paper at the International Symposium held at Munich, West Germany, on October 20-22, 1964. The subject was "The Impact of the Modern Military Resolution on Soviet Strategy and Foreign Policy."

George Stambuk, The George Washington University, has been granted leave of absence to conduct research under an SSRC grant.

RICHARD N. SWIFT, New York University, attended an institute on "Nuclear Science and World Politics," sponsored by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace and the Oak Ridge Institute of Nuclear Science at Oak Ridge, Tennessee in April. He also attended a conference on the United Nations at Bellagio, Italy, in August.

HENRY TEUNE, University of Pennsylvania is spending the fall term in Yugoslavia, Poland and India under the auspices of the University's International Cooperative Studies of Values in Politics.

TANG TSOU, The University of Chicago, was awarded the 1965 Gordon J. Laing Prize for his book, America's Failure in China, 1941-1950.

RICHARD L. WALKER, University of South Carolina, will spend the academic year 1965-66 doing research at the Academia Sinica in Taipei, Taiwan, on a Fulbright research grant and an SSRC grant.

FREDERICK M. WATKINS, Yale University, has received a senior faculty fellowship from the University and will be on leave during 1965-66.

FREDERIC A. WEED, San Jose State College, will return to full-time teaching after six years in the post of department chairman.

H. Bradford Westerfield, Yale University, will do research during 1965-66 at the Washington Foreign Policy Center in Washington, D. C.

DAVID WILSON, UCLA, spent the 1965 spring semester in Thailand.

BENJAMIN F. WRIGHT, University of Texas, has resigned his position as director of special programs in the College of Arts and Sciences and has returned to full-time teaching duties in the department.

QUINCY WRIGHT, consultant at the University of Virginia, attended the meeting of the Legal Committee of the World Federation of the United Nations Associations in Amsterdam, and the Institute of International Law Conference in Warsaw.

I. WILLIAM ZARTMAN, University of South Carolina, spent the summer doing research in Belgium, Morocco and Senegal on an SSRC grant.

Correction

The June issue incorrectly announced the appointment of Franz Michael as director of the Sino-Soviet Institute at Georgetown University. Professor Michael is the associate director of the Institute for Sino-Soviet Studies at the George Washington University. Kurt L. London is the director of the Institute.

STAFF CHANGES

NEW APPOINTMENTS

David W. Abbott, assistant professor, Brooklyn College of the City University of New York.

ROBERT ABRAMS, instructor, Brooklyn College of the City University of New York.

ABID A. AL-MARAYATI, assistant professor, Arizona State University; fermerly with the Center for Middle Eastern Studies at Harvard.

WILLIAM C. BAUM, assistant professor, Grand Valley State College, Michigan, September 1965; formerly of Creighton University.

HENRY BIENEN, instructor, University of Chicago.

RICHARD N. BLUE, assistant professor, University of Minnesota.

Paul N. Brass, assistant professor, University of Washington, September 1965.

BERNARD E. BROWN, professor, Brooklyn College of the City University of New York.

ALLEN W. CAMERON, instructor, Bates College.

WILLIAM R. CAMPBELL, instructor, University of Rhode Island.

ROBERT K. CARLEY, assistant professor, Grand Valley State College.

DWIGHT M. CARPENCER, assistant professor, Arizona State University.

EVERETT CATALDO, assistant professor, State University of New York at Buffalo; formerly of the Ohio State University.

SHIRLEY CHAPMAN, assistant professor, Texas Technological College; formerly of Vassar College.

Mary Cisar, assistant professor, California State College at San Bernardino.

RICHARD P. CLAUDE, assistant professor, University of Maryland.

ROBERT E. CLEARY, associate professor, American University; formerly of George Peabody College.

HARRY CLOR, instructor, Kenyon College.

MICHAEL COHEN, instructor, State University of New York at Binghamton.

STEPHEN COHEN, University of Illinois.

JULES COHN, assistant professor, New York University.

Frank Colon, assistant professor, Lehigh University; formerly of Villanova University.

MIRIAM CONANT, assistant professor, Columbia.

JAMES E. CONNER, instructor, Columbia College.

James L. Cox, lecturer, University of Maryland.

JOHN P. CRECINE, assistant professor, University of Michigan.

JOHN CRITTENDEN, associate professor, Indiana State University; formerly of the University of Buffalo.

Morris Davis, associate professor, University of Illinois; formerly of Tulane University.

LYLE A. DOWNING, assistant professor, Emory University; formerly of University of California.

DON W. DRIGGS, associate professor, University of Nevada; formerly of Stanislaus State College.

MARTIN D. DUBIN, associate professor, Northern Illinois University; formerly of Roosevelt University.

MARTIN EDELMAN, assistant professor, UCLA.

EUGENE EIDENBERG, assistant professor, University of Minnesota.

CHARLES F. ELLIOTT, assistant professor, George Washington University; formerly of the University of California.

ROBERT H. EVANS, assistant professor, University of Notre Dame, February 1966.

KUANG-HUAN FAN, assistant professor, University of Idaho.

A. Belden Fields, University of Illinois.

George Fischer, associate professor of sociology, Columbia University; formerly of Cornell University.

MICHAEL GEHLEN, assistant professor, Purdue University; formerly of Oregon State University.

EDWARD B. GLICK, associate professor, Temple University; formerly of Bendix Corporation's Arms Control Projects office.

Paul Godwin, assistant professor, Washington University.

MARSHALL N. GOLDSTEIN, associate professor, University of Hawaii.

George Goodwin, Jr., professor, University of Massachusetts, Boston Campus.

LAWRENCE GRAHAM, assistant professor, University of Texas.

RODERICK T. GROVES, assistant professor, Northern Illinois University.

JOHN E. GUENDLING, assistant professor, Arkansas Polytechnic College; formerly of Purdue University.

DAVID A. GUGIN, University of Georgia.

JOHN G. GUNNELL, assistant professor, State University of New York at Albany.

Donald L. Herman, assistant professor, Grand Valley State college.

KLAUS J. HERRMANN, associate professor, Sir George Williams University, Montreal; formerly of American University.

S. Kenneth Howard, assistant professor and assistant director of the Institute of Government, University of North Carolina.

CHUN-TU HSEUH, associate professor, University of Maryland.

John Hutchinson, associate professor, UCLA, July 1964.

BERNARD K. JOHNPOLL, University of Saskatchewan, Regina campus; formerly of Hartwick College.

WILLIAM C. JOHNSON, assistant professor, Northern Illinois University.

RALPH G. Jones, professor, Texas Technological College; formerly of the University of Arkansas.

DAVID JOHDAN, assistant professor, University of Virginia; formerly of Pennsylvania State University.

SUNGJOOK JUNN, assistant professor, Grand Valley State College; formerly of Mercer College.

MARK KESSELMAN, assistant professor, Columbia.

WILLIAM J. KIRSCH, assistant professor, Arizona State University.

ALLAN KORNBERG, assistant professor, Duke University; formerly of Hiram College.

RICHARD KRAEMER, instructor, University of Texas.

YASUMASA KURODA, instructor, University of Southern California; formerly of Montana State College.

Sanford A. Lakoff, associate professor, State University of New York at Stony Brook; formerly of Harvard University.

WILIAM W. LAMMERS, instructor, University of Southern California.

Paul Leary, assistant professor, Dartmouth College; formerly of Rutgers.

EDWARD A. LEONARD, assistant professor, Texas Western College of the University of Texas; formerly of Emory University.

TILDEN J. LEMELLE, assistant professor, Northern Illinois University.

THEODORE J. LOWI, associate professor, University of Chicago; formerly of Cornell University.

JACK LEWIS, instructor, Duke University.

ALDEN LIND, assistant professor, University of North Carolina; formerly of the University of Oregon.

EDGAR LITT, associate professor, University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee; formerly of Boston College.

JOHN H. LUNDE, instructor, Valparaiso University.

HARVEY C. MANSFIELD, professor, Columbia University; formerly of the Ohio State University.

WILLIAM R. MARTY, assistant professor, Memphis State University.

JOHN D. MAY, assistant professor, University of Chicago; formerly of Yale University.

JAMES P. McClellan, assistant professor, Emory University; formerly of the University of Alabama.

RUTH A. MILLER, instructor, Whittier College.

R. Stephen Milne, professor and chairman of the department, University of British Columbia; formerly of the University of Singapore.

R. Stephen Milne, University of British Columbia: professor and chairman of the department.

RAY MOREY, assistant professor, Denison University.

George E. von der Muhl, assistant professor, University of Chicago.

FRANK MUNK, professor, Portland State College; formerly of Reed College.

NORMAN K. NICHOLSON, assistant professor, Northern Illinois University.

NICHOLAS D. U. ONYEWU, assistant professor, University of Maryland.

A. F. K. Organski, professor, University of Michigan; formerly of Brooklyn College of the City University of New York.

GORDON PLATT, University of Iowa, February 1966; formerly of the University of South Dakota.

SANDRA S. POWELL, instructor, American University.

Kenneth Prewitt, assistant professor, University of Chicago.

DONALD J. PUCHALA, associate professor and research associate in the Institute of War and Peace Studies, Columbia; formerly of the University of New York at Buffalo.

THEODORE PUTTERMAN, assistant professor, University of Washington.

RICHARD S. RANDELL, assistant professor, University of Nebraska.

ROBERT F. RANDLE, instructor, Columbia.

JOHN C. RIES, JR., assistant professor, University of California.

ROBERT S. ROBINS, assistant professor, Tulane University.

IRA S. Rohter, assistant professor, University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee.

FRED ROUCH, associate professor, Arizona State University; formerly of Claremont Graduate School.

WILLIAM SAFRAN, assistant professor, University of Colorado; formerly of Brooklyn College.

BURTON M. SAPIN, associate professor, University of Minnesota; formerly Foreign Affairs Officer on the Politico-Military Affairs Staff of the Office of the Deputy Under-Secretary of State for Political Affairs.

EDWARD V. SCHNEIER, assistant professor, Princeton University; formerly of Johns Hopkins University.

JOEL SCHWARTZ, assistant professor, University of North Carolina.

WALTER A. E. SKURNIK, assistant professor, University of Colorado, Denver Center; formerly of Pennsylvania Military College.

ALLAN P. SINDLER, professor, Cornell; formerly of Duke University.

BHEKPATI SINKA, assistant professor, Indiana State University.

DUANE SMITH, assistant professor, University of California.

Paul A. Smith, associate professor, State University of New York at Binghamton; formerly of Grinnell College.

LEO M. Snowiss, assistant professor, UCLA.

ALLAN A. SPITZ, assistant professor, Washington State University; formerly of the University of Hawaii.

DONALD SPRENGEL, University of Iowa.

ARTHUR B. STEIN, assistant professor, University of Rhode Island.

GLENN E. TINDER, professor, University of Massachusetts, Boston campus.

RICHARD H. ULLMAN, associate professor, Princeton University; formerly of Harvard University.

John Washburn, instructor, Lehigh University.

MARVIN WEINBAUM, assistant professor, University of Illinois; formerly of Colby College.

HERBERT WEISS, assistant professor, New York University.

G. Robert Wills, assistant professor, Arizona State University.

DESMOND P. WILSON, assistant professor, Emory University; formerly of M.I.T.

John C. Withey, assistant professor, Whittier College.

ALBERT WOHLSTETTER, professor, University of Chicago; formerly of the University of California.

James H. Wolfe, assistant professor, University of Maryland.

E. VICTOR WOLFENSTEIN, assistant professor, UCLA.

ROY YOUNG, assistant professor, San Jose State College.

GEORGE T. Yu, associate professor, University of Illinois; formerly of the University of North Carolina.

TEMPORARY AND VISITING APPOINTMENTS

RICHARD E. ASHCRAFT, acting assistant professor, UCLA.

RICHARD D. BAKER, University of Oklahoma: visiting assistant professor, Newcomb College, Tulane University.

PHILLIPS BRADLEY, visiting professor, Berea College (Kentucky), 1965-66.

HENRY BRETTON, University of Michigan: visiting professor, University College, Nairobi, Kenya.

ELLIS O. BRIGGS, San Francisco State College; visiting professor, University of South Carolina, spring 1965.

DAVID BUTLER, Nuffield College, Oxford, England: visiting professor, University of Michigan, summer 1965.

Mary U. Carlson, instructor, Valparaiso University.

Wallace F. Caldwell, Kansas State University: visiting professor, University of Washington, summer 1965.

Milton Colvin, Washington and Lee University: visiting professor, National War College.

PERCY E. CORBETT, visiting professor, Columbia University.

JOHN A. CRAMPTON, Lewis and Clark College: visiting professor, University of Washington, summer 1965.

JEAN DANIELSON, visiting assistant professor, Newcomb College, Tulane University.

PAUL T. DAVID, University of Virginia: visiting scholar, Brookings Institution, summer 1965.

Carlos A. Echanove T., Mexico City: San Diego State College.

RUPERT EMERSON, Harvard: visiting professor, UCLA, spring 1965.

LEON D. EPSTEIN, University of Wisconsin: visiting professor, University of Washington, summer 1965.

Peter G. Fish, instructor, Oberlin College.

AHMAD GHOREICHI, visiting assistant professor, University of Colorado.

MAURE GOLDSCHMIDT, Reed College: visiting professor, University of Washington, summer 1965.

CHARLES R. GREEN, Oregon State University: visiting professor, University of Washington, summer 1965.

MILTON HOBBS, Indiana University: visiting lecturer, University of Illinois.

PAUL W. HOWERTON, visiting professor, American University.

ROBERT S. JORDAN, George Washington University: visiting professor, University of Sierra Leone.

Majib Khadduri, Johns Hopkins University: visiting professor, Columbia.

WILLIAM LEWIS, Department of State: visiting professor, University of Michigan.

Louis S. Loeb, American University: visiting associate professor, University of California at Davis, summer 1965.

Gordon Means, Gustavus Adolphus College: University of Iowa.

LYNN MILLER, acting assistant professor, University of California.

DEAN MEYERS, acting instructor, Indiana State University.

WILLIAM C. OLSON, Library of Congress: visiting professor, and research associate in the Institute of War and Peace Studies, Columbia.

Benjamin Rivlin, Brooklyn College: visiting professor, Columbia.

C. NEALE RONNING, visiting associate professor, School of Advanced International Studies, Johns Hopkins University.

Kenneth S. Sherrill, instructor, Oberlin College.

LELAND STAUBER, Indiana University: visiting lecturer, University of Illinois.

WILLIAM P. TUCKER, University of Puerto Rico: visiting professor, University of Colorado.

URBAN WHITAKER, San Francisco State College: visiting professor, University of South Carolina.

RENE DE VISME WILLIAMSON, Louisiana State University: visiting professor, Duke University, summer 1965.

I. WILLIAM ZARTMAN, University of South Carolina: visiting associate professor, New York University.

DINA ZINNES, Indiana University: research associate, Center of International Studies, Princeton University.

OTHER APPOINTMENTS

Peter Bachrach, Bryn Mawr: chairman of the department, 1965-66.

HANS H. BAERWALD, UCLA: vice chairman of the department.

Burron R. Brazil, San Jose State College: chairman of the department.

JOHN C. BUECHNER, University of Colorado: assistant director, Bureau of Governmental Research and Services.

DWIGHT M. CARPENTER, Arizona State University: assistant director, Bureau of Government Research.

Murray Edelman, University of Illinois: chairman of the department, to replace Charles B. Hagan who will be on sabbatical leave.

PRESTON W. EDSALL, North Carolina State University at Raleigh: chairman of the new department of politics.

RUSSELL H. FIFIELD, University of Michigan: acting director, Center for South and Southeast Asian Studies.

HARRY J. FRIEDMAN, University of Hawaii: chairman of the department.

LEONARD GOODALL, Arizona State University: director of the Bureau of Government Research.

ROBERT HORWITZ, Kenyon College: professor and chairman of the department.

PAUL H. Howerton, American University: director, Center for Technology and Administration.

WILLIAM S. LIVINGSTON, University of Texas: acting chairman, fall semester, 1965-66.

RAYMOND A. MOORE, University of South Carolina: acting head of the department.

DONALD C. MUNDINGER, Valparaiso University: dean, College of Arts and Sciences.

FRED MUNK, Portland State College: associate director, Central European Studies Center.

JOSEPH C. PALAMOUNTAIN, Skidmore College: president of the College.

JAMES R. ROACH, University of Texas: director of special programs in the College of Arts and Sciences.

ROBERT C. SPENCER, University of Rhode Island: professor and chairman of the department.

JOSEPH L. SUTTON, Indiana University: dean, College of Arts and Sciences.

C. S. WHITAKER, JR., UCLA: associate dean, Graduate Division.

RESIGNATIONS AND RETIREMENTS

RONALD F. HOWELL, associate professor, resigned from Emory University.

FRANK MUNK retired as professor at Reed College.

R. W. van Wagenen, professor, resigned from American University to become Chief of Training for the World Bank.

PROMOTIONS (WITH NEW RANK)

JABIR A. ABBAS, Marshall University: assistant professor.

PAUL W. CONNER, Princeton University: assistant professor.

PHILIP E. CONVERSE, University of Michigan: professor.

L. GRAY COWAN, Columbia: professor.

DAVID DANELSKI, Yale University: associate professor.

REV. RAYMOND DERRIG, St. Louis University: associate professor.

H. Sydney Duncombe, University of Idaho: associate professor.

RALPH EISENBERG, University of Virginia: associate professor.

DARYL R. FAIR, Rider College: assistant professor.

RICHARD A. FALK, ALBERT G. MILBANK, Professor of International Law and Practices, Princeton University.

GISBERT H. FLANZ, New York University: professor.

THOMAS A. FLINN, Oberlin: professor.

A. LEE FRITSCHLER, American University: assistant professor.

IRWIN N. GERTZOG, Yale University: assistant professor.

Myron Q. Hale, Ohio State University: associate professor.

Joseph Hamburger, Yale University: professor.

RICHARD B. HARVEY, Whittier College: associate professor.

MURRAY C. HAVENS, University of Texas: associate professor.

CHARLES F. HERMANN, Princeton University: assistant professor.

WALTER D. JACOBS, University of Maryland: associate professor.

HAROLD K. JACOBSON, University of Michigan: professor.

ELIJAH BEN-ZION KAMINSKY, Arizona State University: associate professor.

W. MARVIN KENDRICK, Yale University: assistant professor.

DAVID KETTLER, Ohio State University: associate professor.

JACOB LANDYNSKI, New School for Social Research: associate professor.

CHONG-SIK LEE, University of Pennsylvania: associate professor.

W. DUANE LOCKARD, Princeton University: professor.

Leo B. Lott, Ohio State University: associate professor.

MARTIN D. MEADOWS, American University: associate professor.

ROBERT J. MORGAN, University of Virginia: professor.

WALTER F. MURPHY, Princeton University: professor.

STUART NAGEL, University of Illinois: associate professor.

Benjamin Nimer, George Washington University: professor.

GLENN D. PAIGE, Princeton University: associate professor.

SIMON D. PERRY, Marshall University: associate professor.

James R. Roach, University of Texas: professor.

J. DAVID SINGER, University of Michigan: professor.

Roy D. Sloan, University of Nebraska: associate professor.

George Stambuk, George Washington University: associate professor.

W. J. STANKIEWICZ, University of British Columbia: professor.

DONALD E. STOKES, University of Michigan: professor.

JOHN H. STRANGE, Princeton University: lecturer.

HENRY TEUNE, University of Pennsylvania: associate professor.

NORMAN C. THOMAS, University of Michigan: associate professor.

MYRON WEINER, MIT: professor.

H. Bradford Westerfield, Yale University: professor.

IN MEMORIAM

WILLIAM M. GRIFFIN, associate professor of Government and Foreign Affairs at the University of Virginia, died on May 24, 1965 after a long illness. He was graduated from the Jacksonville, Texas, High School in 1942, entered the Marine Corps in the same year and served until 1946. He received a B.A. degree in government from Sam Houston State College in 1949, the M.A. from the same institution the following year, and the Ph.D. from the University of Texas in 1951.

Griffin's professional experience included two years of teaching in high school, a year as instructor in political science and research associate in the Bureau of Governmental Research and Service at Florida State University, and three years at the University of South Dakota where he was Assistant Professor of Government and Research Associate in the Governmental Research Bureau. He joined the staff of the University of Virginia in July 1960 and, in addition to his Associate Professorship, served as Assistant Director of the Institute of Government, and Assistant Editor of the University of Virginia News Letter.—Weldon Cooper

MIGUEL JORRIN, professor of government and director of the Division of Foreign Studies at the University of New Mexico died suddenly of a heart attack, May 7, 1965.

EUGENE D. OVERSTREET, associate professor of International Affairs and a member of the Institute for Sino-Soviet Studies at the George Washington University, died of cancer in Washington, D.C. on May 17, 1965, at the age of forty. He received his Ph.D. from Columbia University and was a co-author with Marshall Windmiller of Communism in India. At the time of his untimely death, Dr. Overstreet was working on a new book, Communism in the New States, and a book of documents on Communism in the developing countries.

Before joining The George Washington University in 1963, he had taught at Swarthmore College, at the University of California, and at Michigan State University. From 1953 to 1955, he had held a Ford Foundation Research Fellowship to India. In the summer of 1960, and during the academic year of 1961-62, he was in the Soviet Union on a research grant to study Soviet Trade Unions under the auspices of the State Department's US-USSR Cultural Exchange Program.

The profession has suffered a serious loss through the early death of this able scholar.—The Political Science Department, The George Washington University

REUBEN G. STEINMEYER, who, for most of his lifetime, dedicated himself wholeheartedly to the profession of teaching, died suddenly of a heart attack on April 25, 1965.

He was born in Bridgewater, South Dakota, on January 22, 1899. After attending public schools in Chicago, he graduated from Capital University and Theological Seminary in Columbus, Ohio, and became an ordained Lutheran minister. In 1929 he took the B.A. degree at The American University, and received his Ph.D. in international relations also there in 1935.

He was appointed at the University of Maryland in February, 1935. Since that time, except for a short period of service with the War Production Board during World War II, he devoted three decades to the development of its Department of Government and Politics. On two occasions—when that Department first was established, and again late in World War II—he was the University's sole Professor of Political Science.

He not only witnessed, but also contributed substantially to, the growth of the University of Maryland for more than a quarter of a century. He served it in many ways in addition to his classroom teaching. He participated in the responsibilities of many University, College, and Departmental Committees, including the Faculty Senate for five years. He became one of the major purveyors of good will by delivering more than 2,000 special lectures to professional, educational, civic, fraternal, and other associations, averaging nearly seventy such lectures a year. Finally, during the past decade and a half he directed to completion the studies of some thirty-five graduate students. Also, he was a member of the National Council of Pi Sigma Alpha and held office as well in the District of Columbia Political Science Association. His wife-the late Catheryn Seckler-Hudson, who preceded him in death by exactly two years-was equally well known in the profession.—Elmer PLISCHKE

WILLIAM H. VATCHER, JR., professor of Political Science at San Jose State College, died May 18, 1965 of injuries received early in January during a visit to San Francisco. Professor Vatcher received his academic training at Stanford University, from which he received his Ph.D. in international relations in 1950. His interests in that field were widespread. His first book, Pannunjom, was concerned with the Korean truce negotiations. More recently, Praeger published his study of Afrikaner nationalism. At the time of his death he had completed another manuscript for a text on public opinion.

Dr. Vatcher was a congenial colleague and an influential teacher as well as a serious scholar. His loss will be felt deeply by the profession.—FRED-ERIC A. WEED

OFFICERS OF THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION

President

DAVID B. TRUMAN Columbia University President-Elect

GABRIEL A. ALMOND Stanford University

Vice Presidents

SAMUEL H. BEER Harvard University Marian D. Irish Florida State University JAMES L. McCAMY University of Wisconsin

Secretary

MALCOLM E. JEWELL University of Kentucky Treasurer

Max M. Kampelman Washington, D.C.

Executive Director

EVRON M. KIRKPATRICK 1726 Massachusetts Ave., N.W. Washington, D.C., 20036 Associate Director
Don G. Tacheron

Managing Editor, APSR
HARVEY C. MANSFIELD
The Ohio State University

COUNCIL

Above-named Officers ex officiis

Indiana University
FREDERIC CLEAVELAND
University of North Carolina
KARL W. DEUTSCH
Yale University
LEON EPSTEIN
University of Wisconsin
LAWRENCE J. R. HERSON
Ohio State University
ROBERT G. McCloskey
Harvard University
RICHARD E. NEUSTADT

BYRUM CARTER

Columbia University
LUCIAN PYE
Massachusetts Institute of Technology

MARVER H. BERNSTEIN
Princeton University
JAMES S. COLEMAN
University of California, Los Angeles
DAVID EASTON

University of Chicago CHARLES D. FARRIS University of Florida

ERNST B. HAAS

University of California, Berkeley

WARREN E. MILLER
University of Michigan
JOSEPH TANENHAUS
New York University
JOHN C. WAHLKE

State University of New York, Buffalo

FORMER PRESIDENTS

FRANK J. GOODNOW ALBERT SHAW FREDERIC N. JUDSON JAMES BRYCE A. LAWRENCE LOWELL WOODROW WILSON SIMEON E. BALDWIN ALBERT BUSHNELL HART W. W. WILLOUGHBY JOHN BASSETT MOORE ERNST FREUND JESSE MACY MUNROE SMITH HENRY JONES FORD PAUL S. REINSCH LEO S. ROWE WILLIAM A. DUNNING HARRY A. GARFIELD JAMES W. GARNER CHARLES E. MERRIAM

CHARLES A. BEARD WILLIAM B. MUNRO JESSE S. REEVES JOHN A. FAIRLIE BENJAMIN F. SHAMBAUGH EDWARD S. CORWIN WILLIAM F. WILLOUGHBY ISIDOR LOEB WALTER J. SHEPARD FRANCIS W. COKER ARTHUR N. HOLCOMBE THOMAS REED POWELL CLARENCE A. DYKSTRA CHARLES GROVE HAINES ROBERT C. BROOKS FREDERIC A. OGG WILLIAM ANDERSON ROBERT E. CUSHMAN LEONARD D. WHITE

JOHN M. GAUS WALTER F. DODD ARTHUR W. MACMAHON HENRY R. SPENCER QUINCY WRIGHT JAMES K. POLLOCK PETER H. ODEGARD LUTHER H. GULICK PENDLETON HERRING RALPH J. BUNCHE CHARLES McKINLEY HAROLD D. LASSWELL E. E. SCHATTSCHNEIDER V. O. KEY, JR. R. TAYLOR COLE CARL B. SWISHER EMMETTE S. REDFORD CHARLES S. HYNEMAN CARL J. FRIEDRICH C. HERMAN PRITCHETT

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION'S

Personnel Service ...

The American Political Science Association's Personnel Service operates as a "clearing house," bringing together political scientists seeking positions and prospective employers. Registration in the service is open to all members of the Association. Here are the details of its operation.

Position Openings

- A Newsletter is mailed monthly to those Association members seeking positions through the Personnel Service. There are presently about 700 members in the Personnel Service.
- The Newsletter lists, by code number, position openings and job descriptions.

Referral of Applications

- Biographical data sheets and letters of reference are maintained in an individual file for all of those registered with the Personnel Service.
- These materials are mailed, on request, to prospective employers listing job openings in the Newsletter.

Employers Using the Service

- · Any employer may use the Association's Personnel Service.
- Types of positions listed include teaching and research on the university level, research and administrative positions with professional organizations, research and administrative positions with federal, state and local government agencies.
- There is no cost to the advertising institution.

Registration Fee

• An annual fee of $5.00 entitles members of the Association to register with the Personnel Service.

For further information concerning registration write to:

Director, Personnel Service
The American Political Science Association
1726 Massachusetts Avenue N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036

APSA CHARTER FLIGHTS TO EUROPE

FLIGHT A—Approximately June 15 to September 1, 1966

FLIGHT B—Approximately August 1 to 31, 1966

For the seventh successive summer, the Association will provide chartered air service to Europe for its members.

Both flights will originate at New York International Airport and arrive on the continent of Europe. The cost per seat will be under $275.00

Final details will reach every APSA member in several weeks. Persons wishing to make reservations now may write directly to the Association, in care of the Director, Charter Flight Programs, 1726 Massachusetts Ave. N.W., Washington, D.C.

INDIAN JOURNAL OF PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION

Official Organ of the Indian Institute

oţ

Public Administration, New Delhi

(Published quarterly since Jan. 1955)

Subscription: Annual: Rs.12 or £1 10s.

Single Copy: Rs.3.00 or 7s.6d.

For fuller information and subscription, please write to: The Administrative Officer, Indian Institute of Public Administration, Indraprastha Estate, Ring Road, New Delhi-1.

Now ready

The Political Vocation

Edited by PAUL TILLETT

Professor of Political Science and Associate Director,
Eagleton Institute of Politics, Rutgers University

FOCUSING ON the moral problems of political participation and on defining the conditions of effective political action, The Political Vocation brings together sixtyfive of the most perceptive writings by ancients, moderns, and contemporaries. Presenting the most realistic and the most idealistic, the most cynical and the most elevated views of the responsibilities (and irresponsibilities) of politicians, the book reveals what patterns, if any, emerge as to the how, why, and under what conditions individuals choose the political calling; the steps they take in their ascent to power; the existence of a "political personality"; the milieu and the imperatives of political life; and the seeming gulf between the behavior of politicians as they perceive themselves and the way in which they are enjoined to behave. PARTIAL CONTENTS MAX WEBER Politics as a Vocation; ARIS-TOTLE The Pursuit of Virtue; PAUL DOUGLAS Ethical Problems of Politicians; NORTON LONG The Political Act as an Act of Will; JERRY VOORHIS Why Did You Run for Congress?; EDWARD J. FLYNN Personal Reflections on Bosses and Machines: THEODORE ROOSEVELT The Practical Reformer: REINHOLD NIEBUHR The Christian in Politics; RICHARD L. NEUBERGER The Day We Passed the Oath Bill: JOHN F. KENNEDY Special Message on Conflicts of Interest: CLIFFORD P. CASE Promotion of Public Confidence in the Integrity of Congress and Executive Branch; WILLIAM L. BENTON The Big Dilemma: Conscience or Votes; and fifty-three others.

Recently published

American Politics and Government

Essays in Essentials
Edited by STEPHEN K. BAILEY

outstanding in that it is an introduction both to American government and to political science, American Politics and Government brings together contributions by twenty-one authorities. They employ the concepts of political science to make the governmental process—on local, national, and international levels—intelligible to student and layman alike.

In the process, they also introduce the reader to the dominant themes and methods of American political science today. Their exposition is lucid, sophisticated in method, and engaging in its frank confrontation of the problems of American democratic government.

$5.00; paperback classroom edition, $2.95

BASIC BOOKS, Inc., Publishers
404 Park Avenue South, New York, N.Y. 10016

THE COMMONWEALTH IN THE WORLD

Third Edition

By J. D. B. MILLER

A new revised edition of a book considered by The American Political Science Review to be "a landmark in the analysis and explanation of the nature and position of the contemporary Commonwealth." The American Historical Review called it "an interesting, penetrating, and frank survey of what remains of a once powerful empire." $5.50

THE REVOLUTION OF THE SAINTS

A Study in the Origins of Radical Politics
By MICHAEL WALZER

In this historical and sociological study of the radical political response of the Puritans to disorder, the author sees Puritanism, in sharp contrast to some generally accepted views, as the political theory of intellectuals and gentlemen attempting to create a new government and society. $6.95

CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE AND NATIONAL SECURITY BY HARRY HOWE RANSOM

"A provocative, analytical discussion of our intelligence apparatus and of its essential role in forming national policy."—Newsweek. "Most convenient for the political scientist to use. . . . In several ways the book marks a stage which none of its predecessors had reached."—American Political Science Review. Third printing. $5.00

THE LOGIC OF COLLECTIVE ACTION Public Goods and the Theory of Groups

By MANCUR OLSON, JR.

This book develops an original theory of collective action that cuts across traditional disciplinary lines. Applying the tools of the economist, Mr. Olson examines the extent to which each of the individuals who share a common interest finds it expedient to help bear the burdens necessary to achieve the common goal. Harvard Economic Studies, 124, $4.50

THE SCIENTIFIC ESTATE

By DON K. PRICE

Has science become so powerful that it cannot be controlled by democratic processes? Writing from first-hand experience on governmental planning committees and on two presidential advisory panels, the Distinguished Dean of the Harvard Graduate School of Public Administration investigates the effect of science and technology on the American political and economic system. Belknap Press. $5.95

THE COMMUNIST CONQUEST OF CHINA

A History of the Civil War, 1945-1949 By LIONEL MAX CHASSIN

Translated by TIMOTHY OSATO AND LOUIS GELAS

Based on intelligence reports of the French Air and Naval attachés and the Second Bureau, this is the first authoritative and comprehensive history in English of the Communist conquest of China, written by a senior French officer who is also a historian and specialist in Chinese affairs $5.95

ADMINISTRATION OF A REVOLUTION

Executive Reform in Puerto Rico under Governor Tugwell, 1941-1946 By CHARLES T. GOODSELL Foreword by CARL J. FRIEDRICH

This study describes and analyzes the significant contribution made to the dramatic development of Puerto Rico by Rexford G. Tugwell, governor of the island from 1941 to 1946. It was his sweeping administrative reforms that transformed an incompetent colonial bureaucracy into a vigorous, effective, and modern instrument of government. Harvard Political Studies. $4.95

THE RISE OF NATIONALISM IN CENTRAL AFRICA The Making of Malawi and Zambia, 1873-1964 By ROBERT I. ROTBERG

In the first comprehensive and thoroughly documented study of the political development and rise of nationalism in Central Africa, the author presents the full story of the background and successful efforts of the peoples of Malawi and Zambia to achieve self-government. Center for International Affairs. $8.75

THE INTERNATIONAL POLITICAL SCENE

Coming early in 1966 . . .

NATIONS AND MEN:

INTERNATIONAL POLITICS TODAY

Ivo D. Duchacek, City College of New York

A provocative study of the human factor in politics—man—as he is, not as he should be. Analyzes the complex interaction of the international system of states, nations and men, developing six major themes which include the nuclear stalemate and emerging China. A stimulating text for an introductory course in International Politics and important reading for the interested layman.

February 1966

384 pp.

$4.95 (tent.)

UNDERSTANDING FOREIGN POLICY

Martin C. Needler, University of Michigan

A straightforward survey of U.S. foreign policy—with a point of view free of bellicosity. Balanced and timely, the book deals with every relevant topic, from European integration to the current conflict in Viet Nam. Excellent introduction to the field.

January, 1966

288 pp.

$4.95 (tent.)

New this year

POLITICAL UNIFICATION: A COMPARATIVE STUDY OF LEADERS AND FORCES

Amitai Etzioni, Columbia University

Why does a political union succeed or fail? What forms of leadership and what conditions are responsible for the outcome? Professor Etzioni develops a paradigm—"more than a perspective but less than a theory"—of unification, then examines four contemporary, supranational communities on a comparative basis.

May 1965

365 pp.

$3.95 paper $6.00 cloth

THE GOVERNING OF MEN: AN INTRODUCTION TO POLITICAL SCIENCE, SECOND EDITION

Austin Ranney, University of Wisconsin

This crisply written survey of contemporary political science focuses on the attitudes and activities of people as they engage in the political process. Makes excellent uses of the many studies in public opinion and political behavior made in various nations during the past two decades. Highly readable and informative for both undergraduate and concerned citizen. 640 pp.

March 1966

$7.50 (tent.)

POLITICAL PARTIES: A READER

Donald G. Herzberg and Gerald Pomper, Rutgers University March 1966 480 pp.

$5.50 (tent.)

GOVERNMEN

Available in 1966 . . .

AMERICAN

POLITICS

Recently Published . . .

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT ANNUAL 1965-1966

Donald G. Herzberg, Editor Director, Eagleton Institute of Politics, Rutgers, The State University

This latest volume in a distinguished series follows the format of its predecessors in presenting detailed analyses of selected major trends and events in key areas of government and politics.

1965

152 pp.

$2.50 paper

AMERICAN DEMOCRACY IN THEORY AND PRACTICE: ESSENTIALS OF NATIONAL, STATE, AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT, THIRD EDITION

Robert K. Carr, Oberlin College; Walter F. Murphy, Princeton University; Marver H. Bernstein, Princeton University

The new Third Edition is designed to cover succintly the newest and most important aspects of American federal, state and local government, while retaining the stimulating features of earlier editions, such as editorial clips, maps, charts, and graphs.

1965

672 pp.

$8.50

AMERICAN POLITICAL DICTIONARY

Jack C. Plano and Milton Greenberg, both of Western Michigan University

1100 entries organized in subject matter chapters paralleling typical course patterns provide an efficient review device and a comprehensive dictionary of the technical language of government and politics. Definitions are amplified by brief statements of the historical and current significance of the terms.

1962

396 pp.

$3.95 paper $5.95 cloth

POLITICS . . .

New Books in Political Science

THE RIGHT TO VOTE

Politics and the Passage of the Fifteenth Amendment by WILLIAM GILLETTE, the University of Connecticut This is the first book to examine thoroughly the politics behind the passage and ratification of the Fifteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Its relevance to the constitutional and political issues raised by today's civil rights struggle is evident throughout. In a broader context the book provides a deeper understanding of how the American legislative and political systems work. After exploring the background of the Fifteenth Amendment, the author describes the sustained struggle for ratification it faced both in the State legislatures and Congress. $4.50

THE HISTORY OF TREATIES AND INTERNATIONAL POLITICS

Part I: An Introduction to the History of Treaties and International Politics; The Documentary and Memoir Sources

by Mario Toscano, Director of the Institute of Treaties and International Politics, University of Rome Primarily a study of documentary and private diplomatic sources relevant to the First and Second World Wars, this book analyses a wide range of primary literature not only in major European nations, Russia, and America but in over fourteen other countries as well. This work, containing the history of official intercourse between nations, is designed to guide and accompany any scholarly study of international relations. $13.50

ECONOMICS AND LIBERALISM IN THE RISORGIMENTO

A Study of Nationalism in Lombardy, 1814-1849

by Kent Roberts Greenfield, The Johns Hopkins University This revised edition, a landmark study of the movement that made Italy a nation-state, includes a new chapter on capital and credit. The book explores economic life, culture, and public communication in Lombardy. A new introduction by Rosario Romeo, of the University of Rome describes it as a turning point in thought about the history of modern Italy. "This book remains the single most important work by an American on modern Italian history."—H. Stuart Hughs, Professor of History, Harvard University.

THE JOHNS HOPKINS PRESS THE JOHNS HOPKINS PRESS

and POLICIES

from The Johns Hopkins Press

Introducing JOHNS HOPKINS PAPERBACKS a new series of originals and reprints from America's oldest university press. High in quality, low in price, these range over all the arts and sciences. New titles will be added every spring and fall.

FOREIGN POLICY AND THE DEMOCRATIC PROCESS by MAX BELOFF, Oxford University "...it deserves a wide audience."—American Political Science Review "...his inquiry leads to two questions of the most general bearing. What is to be the future form of national conflicts, and what their future weapons and techniques, when the nuclear weapons have removed the sanction of total war?"—The Economist. A distinguished historian "...particularly effective in his warnings against being mislead by historical analogies that may not be applicable to current problems."—The Mississippi Valley Historical Review. JH-11/$1.45

THE FEDERALIST—A classic on Federalism and Free Government by Gottfree Dietze, Professor in Comparative Government at The Johns Hopkins University "This analysis is easily among the most perceptive and scholarly treatments of the nearly one-and-three-quarter-centuries-old essays"—The Law Library Journal. "... not only analyzes the Federalist but also synthesizes most Federalist research... no political theorist or student of democracy can afford to miss it."—Journal of Politics "... it is fantastic to note that Dietze's Federalist is the first book ever written on the subject in this country..."—Harper's Magazine.

JH-8/$2.45

DISCORD AND COLLABORATION—Essays on International Politics by Arnold Wolfers, the School of Advanced International Studies of The Johns Hopkins University "One essay from Professor Wolfers is worth the whole output of some university departments."—Economist "The volume contains sixteen essays some of which have long since become classics... new ones radiate the same brilliance and multifaceted light. To read them is an exciting intellectual experience."—The American Political Science Review "... balanced and well-considered thoughts on international relations, power, and national security."—Foreign Affairs.

JH-10/$2.25

CHANGING EAST-WEST RELATIONS AND THE UNITY OF THE WEST Edited with a Preface by ARNOLD WOLFERS Nine British, French, German, and American experts comment on the split between Moscow and Peking, the Central European problems, particularly Germany, de Gaulle's design for Europe and the West, and the future of the North Atlantic Alliance. "The discussion by the authors is highly informed and perceptive. . . For anyone deeply concerned about the state of the world and in what direction we may be moving. . "—The New Republic.

THE JOHNS HOPKINS PRESS THE JOHNS HOPKINS PRESS
BALTIMORE

INTERNATIONAL POLITICS IN A REVOLUTIONARY AGE

W. W. KULSKI, Duke University

Focusing on the tensions reshaping world politics in this century, the author analyzes the ideological conflicts, discordant national interests and the social and economic factors that underlie today's revolutionary transformations. Close attention is given to the problems of the underdeveloped nations—the "Third World"—and their role in today's power struggle. The problem of power as a factor in international relations is analyzed with skill and sophistication. Extensive bibliographies.

672 Pages

$6.95

THE MAKING OF FOREIGN POLICY: EAST AND WEST

KURT LONDON, George Washington University

The author scans the policy machinery of the main protagonists of the East-West conflict—United States, Russia, China, Great Britain, France—and shows how each power creates and implements its foreign policy in conformity with the basic elements that determine its course. Special emphasis is given to the vital roles of intelligence and propaganda in the making and implementation of policy, and the agencies and media employed are carefully defined.

368 Pages

Paperbound

$1.95

THE INTEGRATION OF POLITICAL COMMUNITIES

KARL W. DEUTSCH, Yale University; PHILIP E. JACOB, HENRY TEUNE, JAMES V. TOSCANO, WILLIAM L.C. WHEATON, University of Pennsylvania

Integrated political behavior at the metropolitan and international levels is explored in ten essays that result from an interdisciplinary seminar held at the University of Pennsylvania in 1961-62. Findings are based on empirical studies in a wide range of fields, including communications, international relations, planning and regional science, local government, social structure, social psychology and cultural anthropology.

220 Pages

Paperbound

$1.95

A CENTURY OF RUSSIAN FOREIGN POLICY, 1814-1914

BARBARA JELAVICH, Indiana University

From the highpoint of 1814 to the catastrophe of 1914 the remarkable continuity of the Russian course is traced as successive rulers developed and extended guidelines originally laid down by Peter the Great. An introductory chapter surveys the period from Peter through Napoleon, and a concluding chapter points to the survival of certain drives and objectives in the foreign policy of Soviet Russia today. Maps and bibliographies.

320 Pages

Paperbound

$1.85

JUSTICE AND THE SUPREME COURT

ROCCO J. TRESOLINI, Lehigh University

Majority or dissenting opinions in eight celebrated cases are skillfully measured against the minds and personalities of the justices who wrote them. Centers mainly on the civil rights aspects of the Court's work not covered by most texts. Clearly and simply written; excellent supplementary reading for courses in American Government, Constitutional Law and Civil Rights.

"Tresolini, in his eight cases, writes an entrancing story in terms of majority opinions and dissents as to the growth of our precious liberties."

—Morris L. Ernst

205 Pages

Paperbound

$1.45

Write for Examination Copies

J. B. LIPPINCOTT COMPANY

College Department, East Washington Square, Philadelphia, Pa. 19105

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

PRAEGER

Paperbacks That Matter

AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY SINCE WORLD WAR II

SECOND REVISED EDITION

By JOHN W. SPANIER. The newly revised edition of this standard work is particularly important, for it records and analyzes substantial changes in American policy under Presidents Kennedy and Johnson. John W. Spanier is Associate Professor of Political Science at the University of Florida. 279 pp. U-503/$2.25

THE AMERICAN SYSTEM OF GOVERNMENT

FOURTH REVISED EDITION

By ERNEST S. GRIFFITH. Completely revised and expanded to include vital new material on the judiciary, the 1964 elections, and changes in governmental structure under Kennedy and Johnson, this re-edited, newly revised edition more than ever deserves to be called "a triumph of compression . . . excellent."—International Affairs.

192 pp. U-502/$1.95 October

GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS IN THE TWENTIETH CENTURY

REVISED EDITION

By GWENDOLEN M. CARTER and JOHN H. HERZ. This "well-written, concise study of modern governments" (Library Journal)—an analysis of both developed and developing nations—has been largely rewritten, with special emphasis on emerging nations which could be described as neither democratic nor totalitarian when the original edition appeared in 1961. 240 pp. U-504/$1.95

RUSSIAN POLITICAL INSTITUTIONS

REVISED EDITION

By DEREK J. R. SCOTT. "The most useful introductory survey of the subject in English that has so far been produced."—MAX BELOFF, in Parliamentary Affairs. This completely new edition will be revised throughout to account for changes during the Khrushchev decade and since his ouster.

ca. 272 pp. U-509/$2.25 December

PERMANENT REVOLUTION

Totalitarianism in the Age of International Civil War SECOND EDITION

By SIGMUND NEUMANN. With a New Introduction by HANS KOHN. "PERMANENT REVOLUTION (1942), long out of print, stands out as a classic study of the social structure of totalitarian rule. It is high time that it be made available once more, for it has lost none of its immediacy and relevance."—from Professor Kohn's Introduction.

424 pp. U-540/$2.95

111 Fourth Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10003

Please mention The American Political Science Review when writing to advertisers

Essential Reading and Reference

STALIN'S RUSSIA An Historical Reconsideration

By DR. FRANCIS B. RANDALL, Sarah Lawrence College. Regarding Stalin as perhaps the most important political leader in history, Dr. Randall discusses the development and function of his unique ideology, and the influence of that ideology on the millions living within his distinctive totalitarian regime. Everything, from the policy of forced collectivization to the dictator's fascination with organized chess, is reviewed and examined in the light of the most recent research.

November 1965 $6.95 tent.

THE INTELLIGENCE OF DEMOCRACY Decision Making through Mutual Adjustment

By CHARLES E. LINDBLOM, Yale University. Many Americans believe that a high level of rationality and coordination in government requires a relatively high degree of central control. Dr. Lindblom examines the less conventional and never yet exhaustively explored thesis that dispersion is quite consistent with rationality and that fragmented decision making can be coordinated without a central coordinator. Comparisons and analogies drawn from the market system and from democracy support the traditional American belief in decentralization.

$7.50

MEN OF IDEAS: A Sociologist's View

By LEWIS A. COSER, Brandeis University. "In this broadly conceived and well-written book, Lewis Coser makes a valuable contribution to our knowledge and understanding of the dilemma of the intellectual. His major concern is with the problems posed for today's men of ideas by the pressures of bureaucratized mass society . . . a highly literate, sensitive and balanced analysis marked by a scope and depth which guarantee it enduring value."—Boston Sunday Herald $6.95

CRISIS IN WORLD COMMUNISM Marxism in Search of Efficiency

By FRANK O'BRIEN, the Committee for Economic Development. An up-to-date study of the struggle of Stalin's successors to solve Russia's economic and agricultural problems. The author argues that the Communists are currently failing in their efforts to surpass the capitalist world because of flaws inherent in Marxist doctrines, and because of overblown and unrealistic standards the author terms "Marxist Romanticism." This is a thorough analysis of what is known about the economic problems and policies of the communist world.

$4.95

Available at your bookseller or directly from . . .

THE FREE PRESS

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

from THE FREE PRESS

AMERICAN NATIONAL SECURITY A Reader in Theory and Policy

Edited by MORTON BERKOWITZ, Brooklyn College, and P. G. BOCK, the International Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences. The contributions of outstanding social scientists in the fields of national security theory, research, and policy are brought together for the first time in this comprehensive reader. Designed to give students a sense of unity in this field, it encompasses virtually all the more recent work of leading social scientists emphasizing the political aspects of national security and international policies. "... another addition—one of considerable importance—to books dealing with the problem of national security. ..."—Hanson W. Baldwin, The New York Times $9.95

Now available in FREE PRESS PAPERBACK Editions

THE WEB OF GOVERNMENT Revised Edition

By ROBERT M. MacIVER, The New School for Social Research. In this newly revised edition, Professor MacIver brings up to date his classic analysis of the nature, evolution, and functions of the state by examining new political trends and ideologies. Among the areas explored are: present trends in the U.S.S.R.; the nuclear arms race; the population explosion; government planning; The United Nations; the civil rights struggle; the Congo; and the Common Market. $2.95

THE NERVES OF GOVERNMENT Models of Political Communication and Control

By KARL W. DEUTSCH, Yale University. The theory that government is more a problem of steering than of power provides the basis for this new analytical framework for political study. It represents a significant contemporary shift in emphasis from the study of "muscles"—arms, manpower, money—to the study of "nerves," the channels of communication by which the exercise of power is controlled. "Besides being a profound and challenging book, The Nerves of Government provides genuine reading pleasure in its wealth of insights. . ."—Anatol Rapoport, University of Michigan, The Annals of The American Academy of Political and Social Science $6.50

PRESIDENTIAL TIMBER A History of Nominating Conventions, 1868-1960

By HERBERT A. EATON. An absorbing volume that students of American history will turn to for both reference and enjoyment. The political background of each convention; its strategy, personalities, and the reasons for the failure or triumph of the candidates are discussed in separate chapters. An account of the selection of each vice-presidential candidate is also included. "It is a splendid book!"—The Washington Sunday Star $7.95

A DIVISION OF THE MACMILLAN COMPANY

60 Fifth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10011

Please mention The American Political Science Review when writing to advertisers

PARTIME WORK AVAILABLE

PH.D. preferred, M.A. considered, as a field interviewer for a market research organization specializing in interviewing "highly educated audiences."

In the course of an average year, Mendota interviewers see about one of ten of the nation's physicians and a large proportion of its lawyers, engineers, editors, administrators, business executives and school principals.

High interview rate plus bonus for complete assignments. Merit raises with experience. Work assignments adjustable to available time. Any location in the United States.

If you are interested and meet these qualifications, please write for application forms.

MENDOTA RESEARCH GROUP

31 Sylvan Avenue ENGLEWOOD CLIFFS, NEW JERSEY

Institute for American Universities AIX/EN/PROVENCE

(Southern France)

(Under the auspices of the Université d'Aix-Marseille founded 1409 and provisionally chartered by the Board of Regents of the University of the State of New York.)

An experienced institution for overseas study offers colleges and universities wishing to assure for their students the benefits of guidance and supervised study abroad three programs: EUROPEAN AND MEDITERRANEAN STUDIES For majors in the Social Sciences, Humanities and Arts with courses given in English or French. Appropriate courses at the Faculté des Lettres, the Institut d'Etudes Politiques, and the Faculté de Droit.

FRENCH HONORS PROGRAM For French specialists, exclusively in French, at the Faculté des Lettres of the Université de Aix-Marseille for students of high calibre having the support of their Department and their Dean. Weekly supplementary tutorials and seminars after six weeks' intensive preparation.

ADVANCED FRENCH For French majors at the Institut d'Etudes Françaises with complementary courses by professors of the Université for the Diploma and Certificates of the Institut and credit hour recommendations from the Institut.

Qualified students earn: Transcript certifying courses and hours taken, with mid-semester and semester examination grades (Normally 30 credit hours).

Certificate of European Studies

Certificates or Diploma of the Institut d'Etudes Françaises.

For details, and information on accompanied groups, write to:

The Director Institute for American Universities 2 bis, rue du Bon-Pasteur Aix-en-Provence, France.

HANDBOOK OF ORGANIZATIONS

Edited by JAMES G. MARCH . University of California, Irvine

Emphasizes contemporary organization theory and covers the entire field of organizations with a thoroughness and wide range of viewpoints not previously available. Articles were written especially for this volume by authorities who drew together social science research on all types of organizations.

Contributors to the HANDBOOK OF ORGANIZATIONS are:

Dorwin Cartwright, Influence, Leadership, Control

Donald W. Taylor, Decision Making and Problem Solving

Robert T. Golembiewski, Small Groups and Large Organizations

Arthur Stinchcombe, Social Structure and Organizations

Karl S. Weick, Laboratory Experimentation with Organizations

W. Richard Scott, Field Methods in the Study of Organizations

Kalman J. Cohen and Richard M. Cyert, Simulation of Organizational Behavior

William H. Starbuck, Mathematicals and Organization Theory

Joseph L. Massie, Management Theory

Thomas Marschak, Economic Theories of Organization

William H. Starbuck, Organizational Growth and Development

Harold Guetzkow, Communications in Organizations

Abraham Zaleznik, Interpersonal Relations in Organizations

Julian Feldman and Herschel Kanter, Organizational Decision Making

Amitai Etzioni, Organizational Control Structure

Stanley H. Udy, Jr., The Comparative Analysis of Organizations

Arnold S. Tannenbaum, Unions

Joseph A. Schlesinger, Political Parties

Robert L. Peabody and Francis E. Rourke, Public Bureaucracies

Kurt Lang, Military Organizations

Vernon K. Dibble, The Organization of Traditional Authority: English County Government, 1558-1640

Charles Perrow, Hospitals: Technology, Structure, and Goals

Charles E. Bidwell, The School as a Formal Organization

Donald R. Cressey, Prison Organizations

William R. Dill, Business Organizations

Herbert A. Shepard, Changing Interpersonal and Intergroup Relationships in Organizations

Harold J. Leavitt, Applied Organizational Change in Industry

Chadwick J. Haberstroh, Organization Design and Systems Analysis

Spring 1965 • 1200 pages • $20.00

RAND MCNALLY & COMPANY

College Department • Box 7600 • Chicago, Illinois 60680

PATHWAYS TO PARLIAMENT: CANDIDATE SELECTION IN BRITAIN

by Austin Ranney

An exploration of the fascinating and devious ways by which the British Labour, Liberal and Conservative Parties select their Parliamentary representatives. Professor Ranney offers a precise analysis of the British scene, based on the application of modern behavioral research methods.

314 pages

$6.50

CONTRACT LAW IN AMERICA: A SOCIAL AND ECONOMIC CASE STUDY

by Lawrence M. Friedman

This examination of legal practice in the field of contract law in the state of Wisconsin is the first to test abstract theories of the nature of contract in a specific social context. Professor Friedman examines the effect upon litigation of social and economic changes over a hundred-year span.

292 pages

$6.50

DEVELOPMENT OF THE LABOR MOVEMENT IN MILWAUKEE

by Thomas W. Gavett

The first detailed history of the most successful American attempt to ally socialism with the labor movement, this study offers an illuminating discussion of the effects of the alliance and the reasons for its ultimate disintegration.

264 pages

$5.00

LABOR, MANAGEMENT AND SOCIAL POLICY ESSAYS IN THE JOHN R. COMMONS TRADITION

edited by Gerald G. Somers

A volume of essays by prominent authorities on labor history, collective bargaining, and labor-social legislation, in the spirit of John R. Commons—the founder of "institutional economics."

318 pages

$6.00

THE UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN PRESS P.O. Box 1379 • Madison, Wisconsin 53701

POLITICAL PARTICIPATION

LESTER W. MILBRATH • Northwestern University

In a direct and comprehensive manner, this text summarizes and integrates the literature about how and why people become involved in politics. Participation is studied in relation to environmental stimuli, personal factors, political setting, and social position.

1965 • 195 pages • $1.75 paper • $3.50 cloth

POLITICAL BEHAVIORALISM AND MODERN JURISPRUDENCE

THEODORE L. BECKER • University of Hawaii

This monograph critically surveys main currents of judicial behavioralism from the view-point of a social scientist. The author tests the relationship between role-playing and decision-making and develops an empirically testable working theory of judicial decision-making.

1965 • 192 pages • $2.50 paper • $5.00 cloth

POLITICAL PARTIES: A Behavioral Analysis

SAMUEL J. ELDERSVELD . University of Michigan

An intensive theoretical and empirical study of American party elites and major party structures in the metropolitan Detroit area. Combines sociological and psychological factors to explain the nature of party leadership and organization; concentrates on the environmental conditions of society; emphasizes the importance of the motivational basis of political leadership.

1964 • 613 pages • $8.00

THE PRESIDENT: Roles and Powers

Edited by DAVID E. HAIGHT and LARRY D. JOHNSTON . Hunter College

...

As a general introduction to the important aspects of the Presidency, the book deals with the historical development and the present characteristics of the office. Conflicting views and interpretations bring out controversial questions and encourage thoughtful discussion and debate. Suitable as text or supplementary reader.

1965 • 400 pages • $3.75 paper

RAND MCNALLY & COMPANY

College Department • Box 7600 • Chicago, Illinois 60680

Please mention The American Political Science Review when writing to advertisers

DISCRIMINATION AND THE LAW

Edited by VERN COUNTRYMAN

With a Foreword by ERWIN N. GRISWOLD

A group of lawyers and legal scholars assess the achievements of due processes of law in four basic areas—employment, education, public accommodations, and housing. Both specific cases and general principles are discussed, the essential theme being the constitutional law of race discrimination, especially the sources of federal power under the Fourteenth Amendment. The writers weigh the relative merits of the exercise of legislative and judicial power, of government action and private litigation. Each paper in this volume is followed by two critiques and a summary of the ensuing discussion.

192 pages

TRENDS IN CONSUMER CREDIT LEGISLATION

By BARBARA A. CURRAN

A carefully documented and detailed survey of the many consumer credit arrangements and the statutes regulating them. Miss Curran describes and compares provisions governing consumer instalment loans and credit sales, in force in all states, as well as statutes covering the related topics of credit insurance, debt pooling, wage assignment and garnishment, and bankruptcy.

448 pages $8.50

THE GARDEN AND THE WILDERNESS

Lectures on Religion and Government in American Constitutional History Bu MARK DE WOLFE HOWE

Howe asserts that the Supreme Court's interpretation of Jefferson's figure of speech, "a wall of separation between church and state," has been inadequate and even misleading. He contends that the First Amendment is concerned not primarily with ecclesiastical interference with public or private interests but with the protection of "the garden of the church" from "the wilderness of the world." While the author applauds most recent Court decisions on church-state matters, he does take issue with the manner in which the Court has sometimes distorted ideas in the past.

$4.50

RELIGION AND THE PUBLIC ORDER, 1964

Edited by DONALD A. GIANNELLA

This annual review summarizes significant developments in church-state relations during the past year. The present volume covers the relationship between freedom of religion and freedom of speech; the constitutionality of "shared time"; political techniques of the churches in the public forum; birth control and the law. Reviews of recent books are included.

288 vages

UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS Chicago/London

HUMAN BEHAVIOR AND INTERNATIONAL POLITICS

Edited by J. DAVID SINGER . University of Michigan

Articles and excerpts by recognized sociologists, psychologists, and other social scientists are applied to international relations through introductions which correlate the selections to specific problems. Dr. Singer designates critical issues, indicates dangers, and discusses the uses and limits of a behavioral-science approach to international relations.

1965 • 466 pages

INDEPENDENT BLACK AFRICA: The Politics of Freedom

Edited by WILLIAM JOHN HANNA • Special Operations Research Office

A comparative and interdisciplinary approach to African politics. This collection of readings delves into the conflicts caused by introducing educational, economic, and political changes without racial equality. The unity program—consisting of the political messiah, the mass political organization, and the centripetal government—is covered in detail.

1964 • 651 pages • $8.50

COMPONENTS OF DEFENSE POLICY

Edited by DAVIS B. BOBROW . Princeton University

Discusses strategic alternatives to war and the roles of various population segments in determining policy. This comprehensive, four-part discussion sets boundaries and catalogues problems within the social science section of defense analysis. The selections enumerate questions of defense policy, relate analysis to present knowledge, and locate gaps in the knowledge.

1965 • 445 pages • $3.95 paper

TOWARD A STRATEGY OF PEACE

Edited by WALTER C. CLEMENS, JR. • Massachusetts Institute of Technology

An anthology of essays which examine obstacles to peace and suggested approaches to a strategy of peace. Immediate, medium-range, and long-term problems and prospects are considered.

1965 • 264 pages

RAND MCNALLY & COMPANY

College Department • Box 7600 • Chicago, Illinois 60680

Please mention The American Political Science Review when writing to advertisers

Free Government in the Making:

Readings in American Political Thought Third Edition

By ALPHEUS THOMAS MASON, Princeton University

To portray the meaning and significance of the American political tradition, Professor Mason has brought together 180 statements by men who were instrumental in its making, from precolonial times to the present. Introductory essays for the chapters place the readings in the continuity of American political thought. The Third Edition brings the study fully up to date and supplies fresh materials in other areas. "By far the best volume of its kind on the market."—Alex B. Lacy, Jr., Tulane University 1965 952 pp. $7.50

The Democratic Civilization

By LESLIE LIPSON, University of California, Berkeley

Within the framework of a general analysis of politics, this book makes a fresh appraisal of the democratic record, its achievements and limitations. The author presents a notably comprehensive synthesis of the social, political, and philosophical aspects of democracy, examining each aspect in itself and in relation to the others. "A superb contribution to the discipline."—Erwin L. Levine, Skidmore College 1964 632 pp. $7.50

Ideas and Diplomacy: Readings in the Intellectual

Tradition of American Foreign Policy

Edited with commentary by NORMAN A. GRAEBNER, University of Illinois

A collection of 180 significant statements by men who determined or defined the direction of American foreign policy from colonial times to the present. Twelve interpretive essays by Professor Graebner examine the major phases in American diplomatic thinking. "A most impressive consideration of the analytical and ideological aspects of American foreign policy."—James A. Gathings, Bucknell University 1964 912 pp. $8.50

Elements of Democratic Government

Fourth Edition

By J. A. CORRY, Queen's University, and HENRY J. ABRAHAM, University of Pennsylvania

Equality in America:

Religion, Race, and the Urban Majority

By Alan P. Grimes, Michigan State University

1964 144 pp. paperbound $1.50 clothbound $4.00

Oxford University Press / 417 Fifth Ave. / New York, N.Y. 10016

Please mention The American Political Science Review when writing to advertisers

Men at the Top: A Study in Community Power

By ROBERT PRESTHUS, Cornell University

1964 496 pp

paperbound $2.95

clothbound $8.50

Political Parties in a New Nation:

The American Experience, 1776-1809

By WILLIAM NISBET CHAMBERS, Washington University

1963 240 pp.

paperbound $1.75

clothbound $4.50

Political Freedom:

The Constitutional Powers of the People

By Alexander Meiklejohn

192 pp.

Galaxy Books 145

paperbound $1.75

A Biography of the Constitution of the United States:

Its Origin, Formation, Adoption, Interpretation

By Broadus Mitchell, Hofstra University, and Louise Pearson Mitchell, Mills College of Education

1964 400

400 pp.

paperbound $2.50

clothbound $6.75

Democracy in France Since 1870

Fourth Edition

By DAVID THOMSON, Cambridge University

1964 350 pp.

paperbound $2.00

The Judicial Process:

An Introductory Analysis of the Courts of the United States, England, and France

By HENRY J. ABRAHAM

1962 384 pp.

paperbound $2.50

The Law of Nations:

An Introduction to the International Law of Peace

Sixth Edition

By J. L. BRIERLY. Revised by SIR HUMPHREY WALDOCK, Oxford University

1963 460 pp.

$4.50

Oxford University Press / 417 Fifth Ave. / New York, N.Y. 10016

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

Foreign Aid and Politics in Nepal

A Case Study

By Eugene B. Mihalk, United States Agency for International Development (AID). Because of its strategic position, the Himalayan kingdom of Nepal has received economic aid from an extraordinarily large number of countries and organizations. In this detailed study of the aid programs and their effects, Mr. Mihaly reaches the startling conclusion that the impact of foreign aid has probably harmed Nepal's long-range prospects for economic growth and political stability.

R.I.I.A. $6.75

The Arab Cold War

A Study of Ideology in Politics

By MALCOLM KERR, University of California. This essay is an interpretation of inter-Arab affairs since 1958, the year of the creation of the United Arab Republic. Since then there has been a complicated series of shifts in alignment, e.g., Syrian withdrawal from the union with Egypt, the civil war in the Yemen, and the two Arab summit conferences of 1964. The author explains these and other events in the light of divergent political and ideological forces operating in the Arab world and the tactical requirements of the Egyptian revolution.

Chatham House Essays. $1.40

The Glass Curtain Between Asia and Europe

A Symposium on the Historical Encounters and the Changing Attitudes of the Peoples of the East and the West

Edited by RAGHAVAN IYER, St. Antony's College, Oxford. This important collection of essays stems from a radio discussion of 1959 between Dr. Arnold Toynbee and Dr. Raghavan Iyer. Dr. Iyer believes that it is only realistic to recognize the presence of some sort of Glass Curtain between Asia and Europe, "a distorting sense of distance, if not actually of alienation." His distinguished contributors have been invited to participate from a variety of viewpoints in an informative inquiry.

$6.75

British Strategy and Politics, 1914 to 1918

By Paul Guinn, Institute for Defense Analyses, Washington. "It is difficult to praise sufficiently warmly. He has extracted the meat from virtually all the source books; he has strengthened his conclusions by judicious use of original material in the Asquith and Kitchener papers, and his book is, as a result, an extremely valuable conflation of the published material on the war. . . . The general impression left on the reader's mind by this book is the skill of the author in showing how the war increasingly narrowed the outlook of the belligerents. . . . He shows how the original war aim—the restitution of Belgium—was expanded into the overthrow of Prussian militarism."—The Times Literary Supplement

$7.20

Oxford University Press / New York

Please mention The American Political Science Review when writing to advertisers

Germany: Yesterday and Tomorrow

By Peter H. Merkl, University of California, Santa Barbara. This balanced, understanding appraisal of West Germany is based solidly on Germany's past as well as the present. Professor Merkl discusses the underlying forces in the nineteenth century that provided the setting for Hitler's rise to power and that helped make Germany what it is today. He then considers how West Germany's political structure was revitalized after the war, giving a brilliant evaluation of Adenauer and the opposition parties. He takes a close look at how successful the new Germany has been in shaking off the vestiges of the old Germany.

Published September 30 $7.50

Defender of the Faith

William Jennings Bryan: The Last Decade 1915-1925

By LAWRENCE W. LEVINE, University of California, Berkeley. "This painstaking examination of Bryan's later years will do much to correct the distortion of the man that has come down to us. And it is a book that is long overdue."—Christian Science Monitor. "A convincing, multifaceted reassessment that contradicts the long-standing image of Bryan as compromising turncoat. Bryan emerges instead as a man of honest but often paradoxical and inflexible convictions."—The Booklist

$7.50

Equality and Liberty

Theory and Practice in American Politics

By Harry V. Jaffa, Claremont Men's College. Introduction by Charles H. Percy. Concerned with political realities, Professor Jaffa examines the way the Declaration of Independence has been interpreted by succeeding generations of Americans. "Professor Jaffa's wide-ranging essays on the American political system throw new light wherever they touch. . . . A most helpful and stimulating book."—Frank S. Meyer $5.75

The Springtime of Freedom

The Evolution of Developing Societies

By WILLIAM McCord, Stanford University. Is the prevailing notion that dictatorships are inevitable in developing nations really valid? With illustrations from 19th-century Europe, post-1917 Russia, modern Japan, Ghana, Nigeria, Egypt, India, and Indonesia, the author demonstrates how the democratic, pluralistic approach is far more viable.

$6.00, paper $2.25

Oxford University Press / New York

Please mention The American Political Science Review when writing to advertisers

Marxism in the Modern World

Edited by Milorad M. Drachkovitch

Bertram D. Wolfe, Merle Fainsod, Adam Ulam, and Theodore Draper are among the distinguished writers and scholars who analyze various political forms taken by Marxism in the 20th century: Leninism, Stalinism, Khrushchevism, Maoism, Titoism, and Castroism. Richard Lowenthal concludes the volume with an analysis of the prospects of pluralism in the Communist world. Hoover Institution Publications. $5.95

Kurt Schumacher

A STUDY IN PERSONALITY AND POLITICAL BEHAVIOR

Lewis J. Edinger

Following World War II, Kurt Schumacher was the most prominent figure in German politics. Yet when he died in 1952, his plans for political leadership were in ruin. Focusing on the interaction between Schumacher's personality and the setting in which he operated, the author uses Schumacher's career as a case history illustrating a new approach to individual political leaders. Illustrated. $10.00

Nationalization in British Politics

THE HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

E. Eldon Barry

Beginning with the earliest demand for nationalization by the Chartist-Radicalists in the 1830's, and continuing through the fulfillment of prewar promises by the third Labour government of 1945-51, this study presents the full story of one of the most important and controversial issues of British politics—an issue that has had the most far-reaching effects upon British social and economic life. $8.50

Party Politics in Puerto Rico

Robert W. Anderson

Covering the period from 1940 to the 1964 elections, this work views the political structure of Puerto Rico through its own party system rather than through its relationships with the United States. Emphasis is given to the "status problem"—the concern over defining Puerto Rico's ideal legal and moral position vis-à-vis the United States—and to the effects of this concern on party style, leadership, ideology, and organization.

October. About $6.75

Order from your bookstore, please

STANFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

The European Right

A Historical Profile. Edited by HANS ROGGER and EUGEN WEBER. "All students of modern Europe will be grateful to Professors Weber and Rogger, who, with their collaborators have produced a truly pioneering study of a fascinating phenomenon. It is one of the most interesting books in the historical and political field published in recent years."—New York Review of Books $9.50

Factional Politics in an Indian State

The Congress Party in Uttar Pradesh. PAUL R. BRASS. A study in depth of the problems facing the Indian National Congress in the state of Uttar Pradesh, during its transition from nationalist movement to political party. Basing his investigations on interviews with more than 200 political leaders, the author explores the impact of factional politics on the Congress' continued ability to maintain itself in Uttar Pradesh. $6.00

The Korean Minority in Japan, 1910-1963

RICHARD HANKS MITCHELL. An account of the problems posed by the presence of a large Korean community in Japan, including discussion of the Korean Communist and nationalist movements, the community's response to developments during World War II, and other problems of assimilation.

A Publication of the Center for Japanese and Korean Studies. Coming Spring 1966. $5.00

Diagnosis of the Brazilian Crisis

CELSO FURTADO. This volume is both a general polemic on the problems of the underdeveloped world and an application of Marxist and non-Marxist ideas to the concrete instance of Brazil. Its chapters on Brazil describe the historical growth of the Brazilian economy, analyze the causes of the current crisis, and show how the Northeast illustrates the economy's problems in a particularly acute form. $5.00

Islamic Reform

The Political and Legal Theories of Muhammad 'Abduh and Rashīd Ridā. MALCOLM H. KERR. This book is concerned with one of the leading themes of modern Islamic reformist thought, namely the attempt to revive and reconcile classical Islamic conceptions of law and government with contemporary political life. Published under the auspices of the Near Eastern Center, University of California, Los Angeles. Coming January 1966. $6.00

Conquest of Violence

The Gandhian Philosophy of Conflict. Revised Edition, with a new Author's Preface. JOAN V. BONDURANT. An examination of the technique of satyagraha and its far-reaching implications for social and political philosophy. "One of the most exciting political theory books in recent years."—W. H. Morris-Jones in Pacific Affairs.

Cloth, $4.50; Paper, Cal 115, $1.75

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA PRESS

Berkelev 94720

Two Important New Political Science Series

Editor: JOSEPH C. PALAMOUNTAIN, JR.

President, Skidmore College, Scott, Foresman Academic Advisor for Political Science

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT SERIES

The Scott, Foresman American Government Series provides an integrated group of paperbound separates which offers the instructor both continuity and flexibility and permits him, in effect, to construct his own course. Six "core" volumes in the series cover the traditional areas of the introductory course in American government. Additional auxiliary volumes permit intensive study of specific components of the course. Each book is the work of a distinguished scholar who writes with clarity, originality, and understanding in his special field. Emphasis throughout is upon analysis as opposed to description, with consistent stress given to policy and policy-making. Each volume in the series is also available in a hardcover edition.

The Six Core Volumes

Securing the Blessings of Liberty: THE CONSTITUTIONAL SYSTEM

by ARTHUR N. HOLCOMBE, Harvard University. Introduction by Vice President Hubert H. Humphrey. 1964, 192 pages

The Political Role of the Courts: JUDICIAL POLICY-MAKING

by GLENDON SCHUBERT, Michigan State University. Introduction by Lee Loevinger. 1965, 224 pages

Promoting the General Welfare: GOVERNMENT AND THE ECONOMY

by LLOYD D. MUSOLF, University of California, Davis. Introduction by Senator George McGovern. 1965, 208 pages

Official Makers of Public Policy: CONGRESS AND THE PRESIDENT

by LOUIS W. KOENIG, New York University. Introduction by Senator Joseph S. Clark. 1965, 208 pages

Unofficial Makers of Public Policy: PEOPLE AND PARTIES IN POLITICS

by JOHN H. FENTON, University of Massachusetts. Introduction by Senator Earle C. Clements. Ready Spring 1966, approx. 160 pages

The Liberal Democracy in World Affairs:

FOREIGN POLICY AND NATIONAL DEFENSE

by LAURENCE I. RADWAY, Dartmouth College. Ready Spring 1966

Forthcoming Auxiliary Volumes

LOCAL GOVERNMENT

by THOMAS A. FLINN, Oberlin College

CONGRESS

by RALPH K. HUITT, University of Wisconsin

IMPACT OF MEMBERSHIP IN INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATIONS UPON THE U. S. GOVERNMENT

by DANIEL S. CHEEVER, University of Pittsburgh

Paperbound Volumes: $1.75 Hardbound: $3.75

SCOTT, FORESMAN AND COMPANY

From Scott, Foresman

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT READINGS SERIES

The Scott, Foresman American Government Readings Series provides a selection of supplementary readers covering a wide range of topics. Each volume is edited by a specialist in the area under consideration. Each introduces a stimulating dialogue between articulate advocates of conflicting opinions, thus helping the student to become involved with crucial issues. Full introductions to each chapter in the books give the student the necessary history, concepts, and tools for understanding the readings in that chapter. Headnotes help him to read each selection with understanding and profit. A unique feature of the series is an original essay at the end of each volume which provides a commentary on and analysis of current and probable future issues and/or current research being carried on in the area under discussion. These essays show the relevance of issues and research to the student's own interests, needs, and abilities and also heighten his awareness of what a political scientist does and how he does it.

Initial Volumes

POLITICS, ECONOMICS, AND THE GENERAL WELFARE

Edited by MICHAEL D. REAGAN, University of California, Riverside. Ready in October, 192 pages

THE AMERICAN PRESIDENCY:

Vital Center

Edited by ELMER E. CORNWELL, Brown University. Ready Spring 1966, approx. 192 pages

Forthcoming Volumes

THE COURT AND CIVIL RIGHTS

Edited by MARTIN SHAPIRO, Stanford University

CONGRESS

Chicago

Edited by GEORGE GOODWIN, JR., University of Massachusetts, Boston

THE PEOPLE IN POLITICS

Edited by BRADBURY SEASHOLES, Tufts University

THE CONSTITUTIONAL SYSTEM

Edited by C. PETER MAGRATH, Brown University

FOREIGN POLICY AND NATIONAL DEFENSE

Edited by LESLIE H. GELB, Wesleyan University

Atlanta

Each Volume: Paperbound, $2.50

Dallas

Please mention The American Political Science Review when writing to advertisers

Palo Alto

Fair Lawn, N.J.

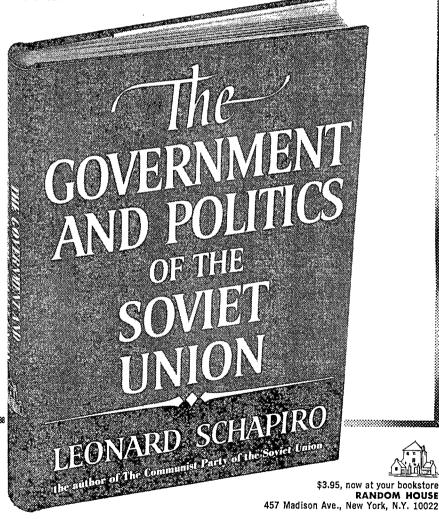

A WORLD-FAMOUS EXPERT ON THE SOVIET UNION PRESENTS

A comprehensive blueprint of the Soviet state—

FROM LENIN TO THE POST-KHRUSHCHEV ERA

Here is a basic introduction to how the Soviet government is run. Beginning with the history of the Soviet state, Professor Schapiro traces the role and function of the Communist Party...the structure and meaning of the constitution...the administrative apparatus... the workings of the central and local governments... and the means by which the entire system is held in control.

There is also a useful glossary of Soviet political and administrative terms and abbreviations that commonly appear in the news—plus lists and charts of governmental, administrative, and planning structures.

Please mention The American Political Science Review when writing to advertisers

Important Political Science Texts

THE AMERICAN SYSTEM OF GOVERNMENT

Eighth Edition

By JOHN H. FERGUSON, Pennsylvania State University; and DEAN E. McHENRY, University of California, Santa Cruz. McGraw-Hill Series in Political Science. 750 pages, $8.95.

Retains the basic approach and philosophy which have caused the previous editions to be so widely used and so highly esteemed. Offers a reliable factual account of the structure, institutions, and functions of American government. Represents a useful synthesis of the various approaches to the subject—historical, philosophical, legal, structural-functional, and behavioral. Both descriptive and analytical in treatment, this text stresses major questions of public policy and current political problems on the federal, state, and local levels.

THE AMERICAN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Eighth Edition

By JOHN H. FERGUSON and DEAN E. McHENRY. McGraw-Hill Series in Political Science. 637 pages, $8.50.

Designed for courses covering American government only at the national level, or for any course where a separate book at the national level is desired. Exactly the same as THE AMERICAN SYSTEM OF GOVERNMENT, except that it omits the concluding chapters which deal with state and local government.

A new edition of the Holloway and Ader STUDY GUIDE IN AMERICAN GOVERNMENT ($2.25) and a new INSTRUCTOR'S MANUAL ($2.00) are now available.

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL PROCESS

By CHARLES R. ADRIAN and CHARLES PRESS, both of Michigan State University. 756 pages, $7.95.

A clear, systematic treatment of the decision-making process and its component parts—institutions, actors, ideology, the legal framework, interest groups, and the communications process.

AMERICAN POLITICS AND THE PARTY SYSTEM, Third Edition

By HUGH A. BONE, University of Washington. Mc-Graw-Hill Series in Political Science. 700 pages, $8.95.

Retaining the comprehensive coverage that has been a valued feature of previous editions, this book is completely rewritten, including much new survey data on voter perceptions, demography of voters, and characteristics of party activists.

THE MAKERS OF PUBLIC POLICY: American Power Groups and Their Ideologies

By JOSEPH MONSEN, University of Washington; and MARK CANNON, Brigham Young University. 368 pages, $6.95.

Here is the first documented book to reveal and explain in depth the position, ideology, and goals of the major power groups that determine public policy in the United States.

VOICE OF THE PEOPLE: Readings in Public Opinion and Propaganda

Edited by REO M. CHRISTENSON, Miami University, Ohio; and ROBERT O. McWILLIAMS, Eastern Michigan University. McGraw-Hill Series in Political Science. 685 pages, $4.95.

This is the first collection of readings on public opinion and propaganda specifically designed to fit the needs and interests of non-specialists.

Send for your examination copies today

McGraw-Hill Book Company

330 West 42nd Street / New York, N.Y. 10036

The Rule of Law in European Integration

The Path of the Schuman Plan by Stuart A. Scheingold

An exploration of the role of the Court of Justice shared by the Coal and Steel Community, Euratom, and the Common Market. These inexperienced Community institutions have had to regulate matters never before left to the decision of international agencies, and the issues they have brought to the Court are of fundamental significance to regional integration. $7.50

One-Party Government

Transition Toward Control by Frank G. Snyder

Mr. Snyder's thesis is that the future of Mali—a country with remarkably little economic growth and equally remarkable political stability—will be largely determined by the character of its single political party, the Union Soudanaise. The party's tight organization, so successful in gaining and keeping a monopoly of political power, is shown to hamper its adaptation to postindependence responsibilities.

$5.00

The United States and the Hawaiian Kingdom

A Political History by Merze Tate

In the first comprehensive study of the penetration of American influence in Hawaii, Miss Tate preserves a remarkably objective balance in the midst of controversial literature. The development of American interest and investment in Hawaii is charted from the arrival of New England whalers and missionaries to the long-delayed treaty of annexation, with emphasis given to American political motives.

Children and Politics

by Fred I. Greenstein

Based on questionnaires and interviews, this study explores the political ideas of a sample of New Haven children aged nine through thirteen. Where do their ideas come from? How do their ideas vary with sex and with socioeconomic status? After reporting his findings, Mr. Greenstein speculates on the relationship between the political ideas these children now hold and their future political behavior. $5.00

A New China Policy

Some Quaker Proposals

A Report Prepared for the American Friends Service Committee

This report carefully reviews events in China in this century, looking at them from the Chinese point of view as well as our own. It then sets forth specific steps the United States might take in a new course likely to reduce tensions and promote a better life for all Asian people. cloth $3.00; paper 95¢

Yale University Press

Canadian orders

New Haven and London

McGill University Press

The Attack Submarine

A Study in Strategy by Robert E. Kuenne

To demonstrate how economic reasoning can help solve problems in other fields, an economist examines the theories of submarine deployment used in World War II, applies techniques of systems analysis to make the results more easily studied, and suggests alternative normative models for attack submarine deployment—both conventional and nuclear—in future limited wars. $6.00

Labor and Politics in Peru

The System of Political Bargaining by James L. Payne

By focusing on a single country and by identifying patterns of actual behavior, Mr. Päyne adds substantially to our understanding of Latin American politics and labor relations systems. He shows why collective bargaining and lobbying have been rejected by Peru's labor movement in favor of political bargaining in which the threat of violence is used to force the President to settle employeremployee conflicts, and how this threat influences political decision-making.

$6.75

Utopia

The Yale Edition of the Complete Works of St. Thomas More Volume 4

edited by Edward Surtz, S.J., and J. H. Hexter

The present volume takes into account the advances made in Renaissance studies during the twentieth century and places the Utopia firmly within the context of its times. A Commentary traces More's debts to the classics and to medieval and contemporary literature, and the Introduction treats the genesis and composition of the work. The definitive Latin text is based on the last edition to be corrected by More; the parallel English text is thoroughly revised.

$15.00

Now Available as a Yale Paperbound

Community Power and Political Theory

by Nelson W. Polsby

Following Robert A. Dahl's Who Governs? this is the second volume to come from a study of New Haven's political structure.

"The principal merit of this tour de force is that it juxtaposes the theoretical underpinnings of the two research approaches (stratification and pluralist) and their attendant empirical results. It is difficult, in view of his thorough documentation, to reject Polsby's contention that the stratification writers have failed to match theory and results. . . . This is a work of extreme relevance to those interested in the study of community power, the relationship of theory to research, and the sociology of knowledge."—The Journal of Politics. $1.45

Yale University Press
Canadian orders

New Haven and London McGill University Press "... I found Politics in the American States... an outstanding book, and one that will cause a stir in the field of State Government. The individual contributions all seem to achieve a high standard of factual richness and illuminating interpretations."

Gabriel Almond, Stanford University

"You have an excellent book, a well-worth publishing enterprise. It reviews and reflects the fresh, empirical literature over the last 15 years very well indeed. It does credit to the authors, the development, the profession, and the trends, if not progress, in state government. Most of all, I like the inclusion of the four 'policy and function chapters,' in addition to the conventional structure and process ones..."

Avery Leiserson, Vanderbilt University

POLITICS IN THE AMERICAN STATES

A Comparative Analysis

Herbert Jacob, University of Wisconsin Kenneth N. Vines, Tulane University

Contributors:

Richard E. Dawson, Washington University of St. Louis
Thomas R. Dye, University of Georgia
Daniel J. Elazar, Temple University
Robert S. Friedman, University of Michigan
Lester W. Milbrath, Northwestern University
Clara Penniman, University of Wisconsin
Austin Ranney, University of Wisconsin
James A. Robinson, Ohio State University
Robert H. Salisbury, Washington University of St. Louis
Joseph A. Schlesinger, Michigan State University
Harmon L. Ziegler, Jr., University of Oregon

Little, Brown and Company

BOSTON

TORONTO

Brookings books on public policy

CRISIS IN THE CONGO: A U.N. Force in Action

By Ernest W. Lefever. "... the first cool-headed account of what happened after the Belgians abdicated.... It is a clear, forceful piece of writing by a man who knows how to winnow." New York Times Book Review. Cloth $3.50 Paper $1.95.

THE ASSISTANT SECRETARIES: Problems and Processes of Appointment

By Dean E. Mann with Jameson W. Doig. The shortage of men qualified to fill the positions of under secretary and assistant secretary in the federal government has caused increasing concern in recent years. This examination of the recruitment process, based on specific appointments from 1945 to 1961, is intended to illuminate and evaluate the system, as a basis for future improvement. $6.75

THE HIGHER CIVIL SERVICE: An Evaluation of Federal Personnel Practices

By David T. Stanley. A realistic assessment of the federal government's use of higher scientific, professional, and managerial employees—the 16,000 executives and professionals in grades GS-15 through 18.

$3.50

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION IN DEVELOPING COUNTRIES

Edited by Martin Kriesberg. Papers presented at an international conference in Bogotá on the role of administration in development, governmental organization for development, and ways to strengthen teaching and research in public affairs.

Paper $2.95

THE IMAGE OF THE FEDERAL SERVICE

By F. P. Kilpatrick, Milton C. Cummings, Jr., and M. Kent Jennings. "For the first time in our national history we have been provided not only with a massive aggregation of basic data... but with highly refined and sophisticated analytical techniques by which the problem may be maintained under continuing surveillance..." Rowland Egger, Public Opinion Quarterly. $5.00 (The Source Book, a companion reference volume, $10.00.)

In Press

THE NEGLECTED ASPECT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS: American Educational and Cultural Policy Abroad

By Charles Frankel. Movies, publications, advertising and the like have created new international tensions and new forms of cooperation. Here is analysis of the implications for foreign policy.

Late 1965. $5.00

MAKING UNITED STATES FOREIGN POLICY

By Burton M. Sapin. An up-to-date analysis of the complex machinery of United States foreign policy. Mr. Sapin guides the reader through the maze of government offices which contribute importantly to the success—or failure—of our foreign relations. For publication in early 1966. Cloth $7.50 College edition in paper $2.95

CHANGING ADMINISTRATIONS: The 1961 and 1964 Transitions in Six Departments

By David T. Stanley. How soon, how thoroughly, how smoothly the Kennedy administration began to operate at the departmental level—with a brief discussion of the initial transition to the Johnson administration. For publication in late 1965. $3.95

Order from your bookseller or directly from Brookings.

1775 MASSACHUSETTS AVENUE, N.W WASHINGTON, D.C. 20036

new WILEY books for political scientists . . .

AMERICAN DEFENSE POLICY IN PERSPECTIVE

From Colonial Times to the Present

Edited by RAYMOND G. O'CONNOR, Temple University. This new book relates the role of military factors in the nation in the only manner possible to achieve understanding—by using a comprehensive historical approach. O'Connor surveys American defense policies from the colonial period through the Johnson administration. All the considerations that have affected the formulation and execution of policy are presented through selections from books, articles, official documents and speeches. Every facet of military policy is explored with a weight dependent on its importance at the time of its proposal. 377 pages. Paper: $3.95. Cloth: $7.50.

BOSS TWEED'S NEW YORK

By Seymour Mandelbaum, The University of Pennsylvania. Mandelbaum views the faults of the nineteenth century as intrinsic parts of the democratization of American society. He offers a communications model of man and society as a clue to understanding the dynamics of social change. This model, showing the process of making decisions in a rapidly growing city, demonstrates how Boss Tweed himself is symbolic of a society with a primitive communications network. 196 pages. Paper: $2.65. Cloth: $5.95.

from the WILEY America in Crisis series . . .

AMERICA'S ROAD TO EMPIRE: The War with Spain and Overseas Expansion

By H. Wayne Morgan, The University of Texas. Argues that Cleveland and McKinley pursued a logical course to remove Spain from Cuba but failed because Spain could not reform the island and end guerrilla warfare there. 124 pages. Paper: $1.45. Cloth: $4.95.

THE GREAT DEPARTURE: The United States and World War I, 1914-1920

By Daniel M. Smith, University of Colorado. Examines the confusion and drifting that led the Americans not only into the war but also into a rejection of the Versailles Treaty. But Smith also demonstrates how the war reflected American self-interests as well as American ideals. 221 pages. Paper: $1.95. Cloth: $4.95.

THE RELUCTANT BELLIGERENT: American Entry into World War II

By Robert A. Divine, The University of Texas. Traces the events leading to war in Asia and Europe and discusses the role of the United States in a world at war. Divine proposes that the United States became the prisoner of events abroad, formulating policies in reaction to decisions reached by other countries. 172 pages. Paper: $1.95. Gloth: $4.95.

AMERICAN DIPLOMACY DURING THE SECOND WORLD WAR, 1941-1945

By Gaddis Smith, Yale University. Presents the policies and events of this wartime period from the viewpoint of what American leaders of the time thought significant. Smith discusses the influence of individual personalities, national experience and military strategy on diplomatic decisions. 194 pages. Paper: $1.95. Cloth: $4.95.

JOHN WILEY & SONS, Inc.

Please mention The American Political Science Review when writing to advertisers new and forthcoming WILEY books for political scientists . . .

LAWYERS AND JUDGES

By Joel B. Grossman, University of Wisconsin. Using information culled from interviews and questionnaires, this book analyses the influence of the American Bar Association on the recruitment of federal judges. Grossman identifies the goals of each of the parties to the selection process as well as their strategies—and points out the formal rules and informal norms that govern their actions. 228 pages. $6.75.

THE GOLDEN ROAD TO MODERNITY:

Village Life in Contemporary Burma

By Manninc Nash, The University of Chicago. States the sources of susceptibility and resistance to social change in a newly developing nation—and points out the range of opportunities that appear to the ordinary villager in a modernizing society. Nash focuses on the peasants of Upper Burma whose responses to the government in Rangoon will determine the course of Burma's social and cultural change. 333 pages. $6.95.

ESSAYS ON COMPARATIVE INSTITUTIONS

By S. N. EISENSTADT, The Hebrew University. Encompasses essays on two different aspects of the study of institutions: the fully structured and organized institutions (e.g., age groups and bureaucratic organizations), and the behavioral processes and the personal attitudes related to them. Approx. 400 pages. $7.95.

FROM COLLECTIVE SECURITY TO PREVENTIVE DIPLOMACY

Edited by Joel Larus, Brandeis University. Examines how the concept of collective security has fared in the League of Nations and the United Nations and why it has been superseded by "preventive diplomacy." Using eight case histories, Larus includes selections from the records of the two international organizations to show how each tried to maintain the peace by collective means. Approx. 586 pages. Paper: Prob. $4.50. Cloth: Prob. $6.95.

POLITICS IN LEBANON

Edited by Leonard Binder, The University of Chicago. Containing the papers presented at a symposium, this is the first book on Lebanese politics to appear in twenty years. It represents the first comprehensive analysis of the politics of this country since the inception of Lebanese independence. Approx. 332 pages. Prob. $7.95.

GOVERNMENTAL POLICY AND INTERNATIONAL EDUCATION

Edited by Stewart Fraser, George Peabody College for Teachers. A research symposia discussing the comparative roles that various governments play in encouraging and controlling educational exchange. The studies highlight the contrast between recent developments in Western and Communist bloc countries—and are set against a philosophical, historical and cultural background of international education. Approx. 408 pages. Prob. $7.50.

605 Third Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10016

A SURVEY OF UNITED · STATES-LATIN AMERICAN RELATIONS

J. Lloyd Mecham

This analytical survey text is the first in ten years to trace the evolution of the Latin-American foreign policy of the United States from its beginnings in the days of independence to the present time. The book is organized both historically and topically, with adequate coverage of both United States policies of general application and United States relations with individual countries.

About 480 pages

Clothbound

A Fall 1965 Publication

POLITICAL INSTITUTIONS

Readings in Political Science

Howard D. Hamilton

One hundred seventeen articles, documents, and essays illumine the basic institutions, processes, and functions of government from Aristotle's time to the Freedom Rides. An introduction and study questions preface each selection, and a chart correlates the readings with major basic texts.

359 pages

Paper bound

1962

$3.95

POLITICS AND SOCIAL LIFE

An Introduction to Political Behavior

Edited by Nelson W. Polsby, Robert A. Dentler, and Paul A. Smith

This text and reader provides a systematic review of the scientific study of political behavior, emphasizing what we know now, not programs or promises. Each of the eight chapters contains an original essay integrating current knowledge on a topic of primary concern, plus eight to twelve outstanding recent studies of the topic.

879 pages

1963

$9.75

The first open wire line (linked here at the Nevada-Utah border) could carry only three calls and was vulnerable to interruptions.

50 years ago a transcontinental phone call took 23 minutes to complete

Today, when you dial it yourself, that same call goes through in about 25 seconds (and costs about one-tenth the price)

Telephone service has come a long way since that historic call in 1915. It has grown in scope from 9,000,000 phones and a single open line spanning the continent to 88,000,000 phones and a huge network of several hundred thousand channels including 24,000 that cross the continent, via several different routes, from the east to the west coast.

Accomplishment has been the keynote since the first coast-to-coast telephone call. Improvements in local exchanges and Long Distance circuits have led to better and more efficient telephone service.

These developments have been effective in reducing the cost of calls. Fifty years ago, the cost of a three-minute call from New York to San Francisco was $20.70. Today, it costs you as little as $1. (Rate for 3-minute, station-to-station call, after 8 P.M. and all day Sunday, plus tax.)

And still the future is full of promise. New phones will be introduced, technology will be improved and advances made that will open up a whole new world of communications.

Today, 30,000 calls a day are completed quickly and easily between New York and the west coast and Long Distance is truly "the next best thing to being there."

THE JUDICIAL MIND

The Attitudes and Ideologies of Supreme Court Justices, 1946-1963

by Glendon Schubert

This is a study of the human elements that underlie the many major changes in national public policy which have come about as a result of decisions handed down by the Supreme Court during the middle decades of the twentieth century. The author has undertaken a rigorous examination of the Court's decision—making record between 1946 and 1963, subjected it to factor analysis and cumulative linear scaling, and constructed a composite multidimensional model of the group decision—making function for the Supreme Court.

"Professor Schubert's volume is a brilliantly sustained extension of neglected methods to the analysis of the most distinctive institution of the American system of public order. . . . [He] has launched a mighty craft in intellectual competition. . . . "—Harold D. Lasswell.

275 pages 70 equations, figures, tables $10.00

DATA PROCESSING

Applications to Political Research

by Kenneth Janda

This handbook is designed specifically for the beginner as an introduction to the use of modern data processing technology in political research. Particular attention is paid to ways in which information can be recorded, organized, and manipulated in punchcard form. Sixtysix figures illustrate commonly used computers and auxiliary equipment, and provide facsimiles of original documents with information transcribed on code sheets and punchcards. Handbooks for Research in Political Behavior

288 pages cloth, $7.50 paper, $3.45

URBANIZATION IN WEST AFRICA

A Review of Current Literature

by Ruth P. Simms

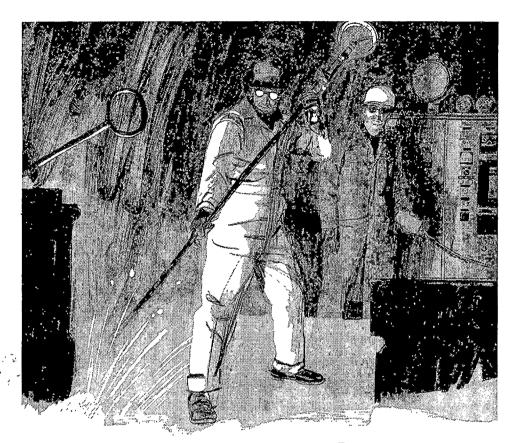

In this discussion, the author deals with the substantive literature of urbanization, population change, social change, and applied urban policy, as well as the specific methods (and attendant difficulties) involved in conducting research and gathering data for studies on urbanization. In her text, she refers to over 200 books, monographs, unpublished reports, theses, U. N. documents, and articles, which in turn are keyed to an extensive Annotated Bibliography.

109 pages paper, $2.95

NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY PRESS

Evanston, Illinois

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

VULCAN, A.D. MCMLXV

If the Roman god, Vulcan, were around today, that extraordinary ironworker might be astounded by the feats which his modern counterparts are performing—and without the use of supernatural powers.

At Central Foundry Division's Saginaw plant, he would find skilled metalmolding technicians using a specially designed electric induction furnace which keeps molten metals at 2750 degrees Fahrenheit. The metals are poured into molds which produce an amazing variety of vital automotive components with superior quality and dependability.

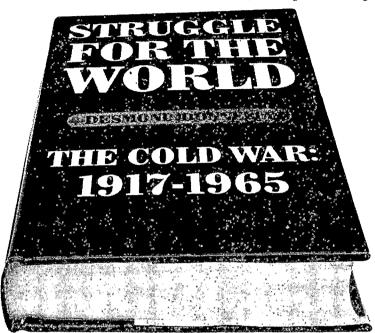

More than 25,000 General Motors people are employed in various phases of metal casting. This is not surprising because metals are basic to the manufacture of all GM products. Actually, these workers are but a small fraction of the total of 660,000 employes on the General Motors team. Each is a highly important factor in the progress of a most progressive company.

General Motors Is People...

making better things for you

"A skilled survey of the history of the cold war. ...searching, sensible and enlightening."

-THE EARL OF AVON (formerly Sir Anthony Eden)

STRUGGLE FOR THE WORLD

The Cold War: 1917-1965

by Desmond Donnelly

In this vitally important book, Mr. Donnelly traces the Communist drive for world domination from the Bolshevik Revolution to the new and appalling threat that mankind faces today from Red China. In his reasoned interpretation of events that have dominated our lives, he lays bare the remorseless aims of Stalin and offers a sharp perspective on such events as the struggle for Berlin, the Korean and Indo-China wars, Stalin's death, and the Cuba crisis that have increased the menace to the free world. He makes clear that while the United States and the Soviet Union have emerged as super powers, the American people have gained heroic stature by accepting the leadership once borne by the British-a burden that will become increasingly heavy in a future where, he writes, "lie new challenges and ordeals, calling for courage, more courage, implacable purpose and endless prudence." $7.95 at all bookstores

ST. MARTIN'S PRESS, 175 Fifth Ave., New York water man beginning the rations Behind the rations Behind the rations Behind the published in the United States in 1959.

DESMOND DONNELLY, British Labour

British Labour M.P., and a writer of note, has been published in most of the world's leading English-language journals. His earlier book, The March Wind: Explorations Behind the Iron Curtain, was published in the United States in 1959.

NEW DOUBLEDAY ANCHOR BOOKS

THE FIRST NAME IN QUALITY PAPERBACK PUBLISHING

THE GREAT DEBATE

Theories of Nuclear Strategy

by Raymond Aron; translated from the French by Ernst Pawel.

"A philosopher of distinction, a noted sociologist, a student of history, M. Aron . . . transcends the controversies which form the headlines of the day, to distill the positive contribution of both sides."—HENRY A. KISSINGER, Book Week.

95¢

THE BERKELEY STUDENT REVOLT

Facts and Interpretations

Edited by Seymour Martin Lipset and Sheldon S. Wolin.

Two political scientists from Berkeley, themselves in disagreement over the meaning of the revolt, here present a wide range of opinions from participants, faculty members and outside observers, plus a detailed chronology and a sampling of the pamphlets and manifestoes handed out by both sides. An Anchor Original. $1.95

THE ERA OF TYRANNIES

by Elie Halevy; translated by R. K. Webb, with a Note by Fritz Stern.

First publication in English of this important collection of essays by one of the greatest of modern historians. Written between 1907 and 1936, the essays, on the nature and development of socialism, include Halevy's brilliant analysis of World War I. An Anchor Original. $1.45

THE REFORM OF PARLIAMENT

by Bernard Crick.

This critical examination of the British Parliament's legislative role discusses current Parliamentary functions, attitudes, and institutional machinery, and sets forth positive proposals for the reform of both Houses.

An Anchor Original. $1.45

CONGRESSIONAL CONTROL OF ADMINISTRATION by Joseph P. Harris.

A thorough study of the controls Congress attempts to apply to Executive departments and agencies. Originally published by the Brookings Institution. $1.45

DOUBLEDAY & COMPANY, INC.

Garden City, New York including LAIDLAW BROTHERS, River Forest, Illinois, publishers of textbooks for elementary and secondary schools.

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION

JOHN M. PFIFFNER, University of Southern California; and ROBERT PRESTHUS, Cornell University

Standard textbook provides a comprehensive account of public administration today. It integrates the descriptive-institutional material of administrative science and the behavioral analyses of administration in action. Book analyzes the nature of public bureaucracy and the political environment with its attendant pressures on the public administrator; incorporates material on decision making and data-processing in fact finding and planning; reflects pertinent research in group behavior, individual motivation, leadership dynamics, etc. 4th Ed., 1960.

570 pp., illus.

$8.00

EUROPEAN POLITICS AND GOVERNMENT

A Comparative Approach

CLIFFORD A. L. RICH, Oklahoma State University; ROBERT O. GIBBON, Wisconsin State College, Eau Claire; LOWELL G. NOONAN, San Fernando Valley State College; HELMUT BADER, El Camino College; and KAREL HULICKA, State University of New York at Buffalo

Edited by CLIFFORD A. L. RICH

Designed for the first course in comparative government, this book presents a balanced account of the politics and government of five major European powers: England, France, Germany, Italy, and the U.S.S.R. Experts on each country analyze the causal determinants of political action, providing the student with a sound basis for drawing comparative conclusions. Book focuses on the governing process in order to give a clear understanding of how the major European systems compare to that of the U.S. A final chapter surveys trends toward European union. 1962. 780 pp., illus.

$8.00

Government and Politics in Latin America

Edited by HAROLD EUGENE DAVIS, The American University

Written by 11 contributing experts, this volume presents a balanced picture of the common political problems and trends in Latin America. The book depicts the rapidly changing, often violent political and social life in which emergent forces are taking shape; analyzes governmental institutions in relation to power structures and in terms of their functions; examines the social and economic problems that challenge these governments today. It discusses the policies adopted to deal with these problems and the administrative machinery employed. Book concludes with an evaluation of democratic trends and prospects revealed in the preceding chapters. 1958. 539 pp., illus. $7.50

PUBLIC FINANCE

EARL R. ROLPH and GEORGE F. BREAK, both University of California, Berkeley

Thoroughly class tested book sets forth the theoretical and technical issues in public finance at all levels of government. It shows effectively how economic intelligence can be applied to the problems of public finance; provides a descriptive-historical analysis of government finance today and its role in the economy. Various tax resources available to the government are presented in detail. Drawing mainly on American experience, the book examines in detail current social security programs, the problems arising from the rapid growth of cities, and fiscal theory and policy. 1961. 586 pp., illus. $7.50

The Ronald Press Company.....

Congo 1964

Political Documents of a Developing Nation, in the Original French

CENTRE DE RECHERCHE ET D'INFORMATION SOCIO-POLITIQUES of Brussels. This volume contains the most comprehensive collection of annotated political documents relating to all phases of Congolese activity during the year, and places particular emphasis on the crucial rebellion which became an international crisis in 1964. Documents are in French; the Introduction has been translated and expanded for the English-speaking audience by Professor Herbert Weiss of New York University.

450 pages. $12.50

Wilson

Campaigns for Progressivism and Peace, 1916-1917

By ARTHUR S. LINK. Volume 5 of Professor Link's authoritative biography of Woodrow Wilson covers events from the beginning of the presidential campaign of 1916 to the entry of the United States into the First World War.

478 pages. Illus. $8.50

Political Development in Pakistan

By KARL von VORYS. This analysis of Pakistani politics under Ayub Khan focuses on the practical limitations of that leader's ability to mobilize mass backing even when he is supported by a powerful army. Of particular significance is the non-totalitarian character of Ayub Khan's program and the demonstration it may represent of the extent to which democratic institutions are adaptable to the conditions of emerging nations.

350 pages. $6.50

The State and Economic Enterprise in Japan

No. 2, "Studies in the Modernization of Japan"

Edited by W. W. LOCKWOOD. Dealing with the extraordinary economic modernization that has been taking place in Japan since 1868, this is an analysis of Japan's historical opportunities and how men used them. Prepared under the auspices of the Association for Asian Studies.

735 pages. $12.50

Government Risk-Sharing in Foreign Investment

By MARINA von NEUMANN WHITMAN. Since World War II six risk-sharing institutions to stimulate foreign investment have been established by the United States government and several international organizations. Professor Whitman makes a thorough study of these institutions and evaluates the importance and effectiveness of each, from the Investment Guaranty Program to the Agency for International Development.

370 pages. $8.50

Princeton University Press

THE STATE OF THE UNION:

COMMENTARIES ON AMERICAN DEMOCRACY ROBERT B. DISHMAN, University of New Hampshire

Designed to provide basic government courses with a comprehensive picture of modern American democracy, this book offers sixty-four readings organized around key phrases from the Preamble to the Constitution. The use of this unifying principle makes possible a sense of definite form and development within a text which includes many different views and interpretations by contributors from a wide diversity of backgrounds. Supporting and carrying out the basic framework are twenty-eight essays by the editor which provide background material and clarify the points at issue. The titles of these editorial commentaries illustrate the generous scope of the work:

WE THE PEOPLE

FORM A MORE PERFECT UNION—The Nation and the States: What Future for Federalism? • Town and City, U.S.A.: What Price Urbanization? • The President and Congress: Must Separation Mean Stalemate? • The American Party System: How Responsive and Responsible?

INSURE DOMESTIC TRANQUILITY—Social Class in America: How Real is the American Dream? · Church and State: How High the Wall of Separation? · Big Business: Boon or Bane? · Big Labor: Too Weak or Too Strong? · Big Government: Servant or Master?

ESTABLISH JUSTICE—The Supreme Court: Court of Law or Keeper of the Nation's Conscience? · Crime and Punishment: Justice for the Innocent and the Guilty Alike?

PROMOTE THE GENERAL WELFARE—Government Under Pressure: Group Interests or the General Welfare? · Education in America: How Good are Our Schools? · The Arts in America: Whose Tastes Shall Prevail? · The Affluent Society: What Are the Problems of Abundance? · The Welfare State: Road to What?

SECURE THE BLESSINGS OF LIBERTY—The Negro in America: First- or Second-Class Citizen? • The Communist Party, U.S.A.: How Much Freedom for Subversives? • The Radical Right: Patriots or Fanatics?

PROVIDE FOR THE COMMON DEFENSE—The Challenge of World Communism: How Clear and Present Is the Danger? · Strategy for the Missile Age: How to Meet the Communist Challenge?

1965.

546 pages.

Paper.

$4.85

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS

College Department

597 Fifth Avenue

 \mathbf{N}

ESSENTIAL BOOKS FOR INSIGHT INTO THE POLITICS OF SOUTHEAST ASIA

The Rise of Indonesian Communism

by RUTH T. McVEY

The Communist Party of Indonesia (PKI) was founded fifty years ago. This important study examines the development of the PKI from its birth in 1914 to its temporary eclipse in 1927 after a disastrous attempt at revolution. Miss McVey documents the growth of the party as a part of the Indonesian political scene, and also as a component of a world movement. $10.00

Cambodia's Foreign Policy

by ROGER M. SMITH

How a small country, independent for little more than a decade, came to acquire critical importance in world affairs, and how she has made use of a policy of non-alignment to further her own interests in dealing with East and West, are subjects of this timely and important study.

$5.75

Thailand and the Struggle for Southeast Asia

by DONALD E. NUECHTERLEIN

This carefully balanced account of Thailand's foreign policy over the past 25 years details the country's foreign relations during and after World War II, its role in the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization, and its position as an anti-communist bastion of utmost strategic importance. $5.95

Cornell University Press

ITHACA, NEW YORK

Just published . . .

READINGS IN SOVIET POLITICS AND GOVERNMENT

A Reader

Edited, with introductory notes, by RANDOLPH J. BRAHAM, The City College of the City University of New York

A comprehensive collection of readings on Soviet government and politics featuring articles from both leading Western scholars and commentators and Soviet writers. 1965; 384 pages; $4.95

THE STAGES OF POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT

by A. F. K. ORGANSKI, University of Michigan

A study in comparative government which follows the modern nation from birth to death, showing how and why political institutions change from age to age, and concentrating in particular on the contribution of politics to economic development.

1965; 256 pages; $3.95

Recently published . . .

BRITISH POLITICS IN THE COLLECTIVIST AGE

by SAMUEL H. BEER, Harvard University

A valuable addition to our literature on British politics. The argument is stimulating, powerfully developed, and documented with rich scholarship.

—Leslie Lipson, University of California, Berkeley

1965; 384 pages; $5.95

In preparation . . .

PRIVATE POWER AND AMERICAN DEMOCRACY

by GRANT McCONNELL, The University of Chicago Spring 1966

POLITICS AMONG NATIONS

The Struggle for Power and Peace

by HANS J. MORGENTHAU, The University of Chicago

. . . a superh book, indispensable to students of the field.

—Henry J. Abraham, University of Pennsylvania Third Edition; 660 pages; 5 maps; $7.50

For further information, write to

ALFRED A. KNOPF, Publisher

College Department

501 Madison Avenue

New York 10022

Just published . . .

THE SOVIET POLITICAL SYSTEM

An Interpretation

by ALFRED G. MEYER, Michigan State University

A major work on the Soviet governmental system by a leading Western scholar. Professor Meyer is concerned with processes as well as institutions, and seeks significant informal patterns behind formal facades; he also draws fruitful comparisons between the Soviet system and other "model systems," including that of the United States, and modern bureaucratic organizations.

1965; 512 pages; $5.95

In preparation . . .

CRISIS AND CONTINUITY IN WORLD

POLITICS Readings in International Relations

READINGS IN POLITICAL PHILOSOPHY

Edited by GEORGE A. LANYI and WILSON C. McWILLIAMS, both of Oberlin College Spring 1966; about 640 pages; about $4.95

POLITICAL MAN AND SOCIAL MAN

Edited by ROBERT PAUL WOLFF, Columbia University Spring 1966; about 512 pages; about $4.95 paperbound

GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

An Introduction to Political Science Edited by JOHN C. WAHLKE, University of Buffalo and ALEX N. DRAGNICH, Vanderbilt University Spring 1966; about 620 pages; about $7.50

RANDOM HOUSE STUDIES IN POLITICAL SCIENCE

A distinguished series of original works in paperbound editions.

Just published

THE POLITICAL PROCESS Executive Bureau-Legislative Committee Relations, Revised Edition by J. LEIPER FREEMAN, Vanderbilt University PS13; $1.45

MARXISM AND COMMUNISM Essential Readings Edited by ROBERT V. DANIELS, University of Vermont PS49; $1.95

WIRETAPPING ON TRIAL A Case Study in the Judicial Process by WALTER F. MURPHY, Princeton University PS50; $1.95

BIG CITY POLITICS A Comparative Guide to the Political Systems of Nine American Cities by EDWARD C. BANFIELD, Harvard University PS48; $1.95

In preparation . .

THE UNITED NATIONS AND THE SUPERPOWERS United States-Soviet Interaction at the United Nations by JOHN G. STOESSINGER, Hunter College November 1965; PS53; about $1.95

THE REVOLUTION IN STATECRAFT Informal Penetration by ANDREW M. SCOTT, University of North Carolina November 1965; PS51; about $1.95

For further information, write to RANDOM HOUSE The College Department

501 Madison Avenue

New York 10022

INDEX TO ADVERTISERS

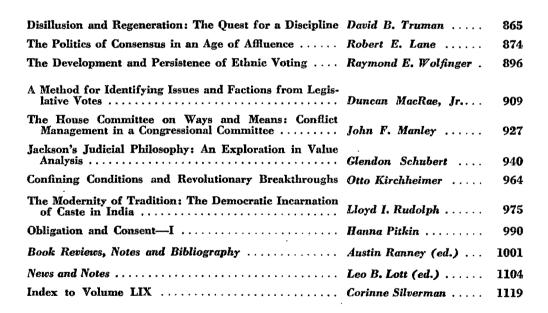

•
American Telephone & Telegraph Co	49
Basic Books, Inc	15
Brookings Institution	45
University of California Press 83	37
University of Chicago Press	30 .
Cornell University Press	57
Doubleday & Co., Inc 85	53
Free Press	25
General Motors Corporation 85	51
Harper & Row, Publishers, Inc	85
Harvard University Press816, 83	17
Holt, Rinehart & Winston, Inc
Houghton Mifflin Company 84	48
Institute for American Universities	26
Johns Hopkins Press820, 82	21
J. B. Lippincott Company 82	22
Little, Brown & Company 82
McGraw-Hill Book Company 84
Macmillan Company
Mendota Research Group 82
National Analysts
Northwestern University Press
Oxford University Press
Frederick A. Praeger, Publishers
Prentice-Hall, Inc
Princeton University Press	55
Rand McNally & Company827, 829, 83	31
Random House	40
Random House-Alfred A. Knopf858, 8:	59
Ronald Press Company
St. Martin's Press 83	52
Scott, Foresman & Company838, 83	39
	56
	36
D. Van Nostrand & Company, Inc	IV
John Wiley & Sons
· · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · ·	2 8
Yale University Press842, 84	43

Merican DOLITICAL SCIENCE Keview

Vol. LIX

December, 1965

No. 4

(For list of book reviews, see page 1000)

- Published quarterly by **-

Recent Research Projects

Conducted at the request of Federal, state and local government agencies
universities, and
foundations:

Community Renewal Planning Planning Action for Public Housing Integrated Housing Longitudinal Study of School Districts Attitudes toward Negro Demonstrations Transportation Planning Study Poverty & Social Isolation Fertility and Family Planning Manpower Needs of New York City Reasons non-Federal Scientists Remain non-Federal Longitudinal Study of Consumer Expenditures Retail Food Pricing Practices Food Consumption Behavior Motivations and Beliefs of Mutual Fund Investors High School Graduates: Four-Year Follow Up Attitudes & Aspirations of Teenagers Voting Referenda on Fluoridation Community Opinions about Cancer Attitudes toward Smoking & Health Community Knowledge of Communicable Diseases

METHODOLOGICAL RESOURCES:

Trained Interviewers ... Probability Sc Efficient Questionnaires ... Coding an Computer Programming ... Research I

For information write: Aaron J. Spec Vice President and Director. Social Sci

NATIONAL ANALY

1015 CHESTNUT STRE PHILADELPHIA, PA. 19

The Nation's Leading Social Science and Marke Founded 1943

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to Harper & Row, Publishers

Coming in January

DE GAULLE: IMPLACABLE ALLY

Roy C. Macridis

De Gaulle's important pronouncements and writings are brought together here, with emphasis on the World War II period and the years since his return to power as president of the Fifth Republic. The editor's analysis of De Gaulle's political philosophy facilitates an understanding of present French national government and foreign relations. The preface by Maurice Duverger appraises the relevance of De Gaulle's policies to the problems of contemporary world politics. 245 pp. Paper. $2.60

New and Recent

. - - - -

THE AMERICAN REPUBLIC: Its Government and Politics

Peter H. Odegard • Hans H. Baerwald A comprehensive analysis of the spirit and structure of the American Republic, focusing on political power, the ideas, values, and theories that have given direction and purpose to the U. S. government, and emphasizing process and policy. Instructor's manual. 851 pp. $8.50. American Government: Readings and Documents, edited by Peter H. Odegard, may be used with The American Republic or any other text. Paper. 617 pp. $4.75.

MODERN PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION

Felix A. Nigro This introductory text reflects the fundamental changes in the public administration field by emphasizing the policy-making role of administration and the analysis of human behavior in governmental organizations. Examples from all levels of government. Case studies. 539 pp. $6.75.

GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS OF THE UNITED STATES

William C. Havard A brief, yet sophisticated basic text on the U. S. government, with a critical evaluation of organization, functions, and policies and a full treatment of the working system of American politics at all levels. 245 pp. Paper. $2.95.

POLITICS AND THE WARREN COURT

Alexander M. Bickel Presents American democracy as a government of men as well as laws, arguing that politics as much as legal precedent determines whether Supreme Court decisions become social practice, using as examples the decisions on school desegregation, school prayer, Federal aid to education, and political reapportionment. 320 pp. $6.95

THE RISE OF URBAN AMERICA

Constance McLaughlin Green A Pulitzer-prize winner traces the economic, political, and social forces that led to today's urban civilization and shows that the American city is not a recent phenomenon. 224 pp. $4.95.

WHO'S RUNNING THIS TOWN?

Ritchie P. Lowry

"An examination of the leadership in a California community and . . . an effort to work out a scientific typology of the different kinds of leadership that might be applicable to other small American cities and towns . . . displays clear evidence of a lively intellect deeply involved with some of the important problems of contemporary social science and American life."—W. Lloyd Warner. 250 pp. $5.95.

HARPER & ROW, PUBLISHERS • 49 EAST 33d STREET, NEW YORK, N.Y. 10016

Please mention THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW when writing to advertisers

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW

Published quarterly by The American Political Science Association

EDITORIAL BOARD

HARVEY C. MANSFIELD, Managing Editor, Columbia University

OTTO KIRCHHEIMER, Columbia University

HAROLD STEIN, Princeton University

ANDREW HACKER, Cornell University

ROWLAND EGGER, Princeton University
STANLEY HOFFMANN, Harvard University

J. ROLAND PENNOCK, Swarthmore College

ROBERT E. LANE, Yale University

EDITORIAL ASSOCIATES

Austin Ranney, Book Review Editor, University of Wisconsin

LEO B. LOTT, News and Notes Editor, Ohio State University

Franklin L. Burdette, University of Maryland

S. Sidney Ulmer, University of Kentucky Isaac Kramnick, Harvard University Richard L. Merritt, Yale University

CORINNE SILVERMAN, Philadelphia

NIMROD RAPHAELI, University of Michigan

EDITORIAL OFFICE

Managing Editor, APSR 216 N. Oval Dr., Columbus, Ohio 43210

EXECUTIVE OFFICE

Executive Director, APSA
1726 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20036

THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW, published quarterly during the months of March, June, September, and December, is supplied to all APSA members. Individual and institutional memberships are $15.00 a year ($6.00 for graduate and undergraduate students). Foreign currency at the official exchange rate will be accepted for foreign subscriptions and foreign membership fees. The equivalent of $1 for additional postage should be added for foreign subscriptions.

Current issues are priced at $3.75 per copy; for back issues address Johnson Reprint Corp., 111 5th Ave., New York, N.Y. 10003.

Applications for membership, orders for the Review, and remittances should be addressed to the Executive Director, The American Political Science Association, 1726 Massachusetts Avenue, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036. Notices of change of address should be received in the Washington office by the 5th day of the month of publication.

Address correspondence about contributions to the Review to Austin Ranney, North Hall, University of Wisconsin, Madison, Wis. 53706; books intended for review, to James W. Prothro, Department of Political Science, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, N.C.; News and Notes items, to Leo B. Lott, 216 N. Oval Drive, Columbus, Ohio 43210; advertising, reprint and circulation correspondence, to the Executive Director at the Washington office. See notice herein, p. 1104.

Articles and notes appearing in the Review before the June, 1953 issue were indexed in The Reader's Guide to Periodical Literature. The International Index to Periodicals indexes current issues. Microfilm of the Review, beginning with Volume 46, may be obtained from University Microfilms, 313 North First Street, Ann Arbor, Michigan. A Cumulative Index of the Review, Volumes 1-57: 1906-1963, may be obtained from Northwestern University Press, 816 University Place, Evanston, Illinois.

Office of publication: Curtis Reed Plaza, Menasha, Wisconsin.

Foreign Agent: P. S. King and Staples, Ltd., Great Smith Street, Westminster, London. Second class postage paid at Menasha, Wisconsin. Acceptance for mailing at special rate of postage provided for in Section 1103, Act of October 3, 1917, authorized May 12, 1926.

Printed in the United States of America by George Banta Company, Inc., Menasha, Wisconsin.

Copyright, 1966, by The American Political Science Association

AIDS TO UNDERSTANDING, INQUIRY, AND DISCUSSION—POLITICAL SCIENCE TEXTS FROM MACMILLAN

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND THE ECONOMY by Emmette S. Redford, University of Texas, with contributions by Charles B. Hagan, University of Illinois

This book astutely fuses political and economic analysis, relating economic facts to political realities, urging students to see the government's relation to the economy as an aspect of the total process and problem of government. 1965, 672 pages, $8.95

THE

by Frederick H. Hartmann, University of Florida

East, Latin America, China, Japan, India, and Pakistan.

RELATIONS OF NATIONS,

A systematic treatment of foreign relations proceeding from general background material to specific relations among The United Second Edition States, Russia, England, France, Germany, Africa, the Middle

1962, 710 pages, $7.95

THE POLITICS OF STATE AND LOCAL

by Duane Lockhard, Princeton University

A realistic conception of state and local political operations combining current research in community power and public administration with ideas from legal and literary theory.

1963, 566 pages, $8.50

POLITICAL SCIENCE: An Introduction

GOVERNMENT

by J. Roland Pennock and David G. Smith, both of Swarthmore College

In its thorough coverage of the processes and institutions in democratic, semi-democratic, and non-democratic countries, this text relates political science to many other disciplines.

1964, 850 pages, $7.50

A BILL BECOMES A LAW: Congress Enacts Civil Rights Legislation, Second Edition by Daniel M. Berman, The American University

The way in which a bill proceeds through Congress to become law is the subject of this revised edition illustrated by the Civil Rights Acts of 1960 and 1964. The student is able to compare the factors that resulted in a weak bill of 1960 with those that contributed to the strong 1964 bill. Though emphasis is on a complete reading of the passage of the 1960 Act, the more recent material has been interpolated into the book in such a way as to insure a continuity of narrative. Coming 1966, approx. 160 pages, paper, prob. $1.95

Write to the Faculty Service Desk for examination copies

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY

60 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 10011

new and recent P-H texts of special interest

DIMENSIONS OF POLITICAL ANALYSIS: An Introduction to the Contemporary Study of Politics

by Cyril Roseman, Charles G. Mayo, and F. B. Collinge, all of San Francisco State College

THE COMMUNIST REVOLUTION IN ASIA: Tactics, Goals, and Achievements

edited by Robert A. Scalapino, University of California, at Berkeley

THE ELECTORAL PROCESS

edited by

M. Kent Jennings, The University of Michigan, and Harmon Zeigler, University of Oregon

GOVERNMENT REGULATION OF BUSINESS: A Casebook

Prepared by The Inter-University
Case Program, Inc.
edited by Edwin A. Bock,
Syracuse University, and President of the Inter-University
Case Program, Inc.

SOCIETY, LAW, AND MORALITY: Readings in Social Philosophy

edited by Frederick A. Olafson, The Johns Hopkins University Dimensions of Political Analysis provides first-hand familiarity with the perspectives and methods of prominent twentieth century studies in political science. This new text-reader presents and analyzes thirty selections which are organized to illustrate the major concerns of the discipline: a) traditional and behavioral analysis, b) the science of politics, c) power, d) communications, and e) competition, conflict, and control. The volume is designed to dramatize the use of basic concepts of political analysis in actual research, relating these concepts to the issues confronting students of government and politics. February 1966, approx. 384 pp., $6.95

Covering all of the major countries of East and South Asia, this volume presents the first comprehensive study of Asian Communism. Chalmers Johnson, Chong-sik Lee, John H. Badgely, and Ralph Retzlaff, among others, focus upon all aspects of Communist Party activity. Accent is on present trends and situations in Asia. Ample, well-documented background material serves to convey a sense of the historical nature, as well as the immediacy, of the struggle. 1965, 432 pp., $7.50

This new book views the electoral process from two main perspectives; the level of the individual voter and citizen and the level of the political parties and candidates. The contributions present a picture of the current trends in research and scholarship on the electoral process. Blending theoretical and empirical materials, the essays stress comparative and longitudinal data as well as emphasize parties and candidates as vital segments of the electoral process. January 1966, approx. 384 pp., $6.75

Each of the seven case studies in this new volume "describes the flow of events and the pattern of forces that led a federal government agency to initiate a regulatory action, and the actions and forces that went into consideration and decision of the case. Moreover, each case study narrative depicts the purposes, tactics, or outlooks in the regulatory process . . . a collection that will enable the reader to see the workings of regulatory processes from the different vantage points or perspectives of the major types of participants or contestants."—from the editor's Introduction. 1965, approx. 528 pp., $9.95

This collection of readings contains some of the most famous and influential views on the ways in which moral considerations impinge upon law, particularly in the area of civil disobedience. A thematic continuity is maintained by long excerpts from the really fundamental writers on the subject. 1961, 518 pp., $8.95

For approval copies, write: Box 903

Prentice-Hall, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 07632

The American Political Science Review

OL. LIX

DECEMBER, 1965

NO. 4

DISILLUSION AND REGENERATION: THE QUEST FOR A DISCIPLINE*

DAVID B. TRUMAN Columbia University

A discipline, at least to the initiated, is rnown more by the questions it asks than by he answers that it provides. For questions ndicate goals or aspirations that answers may tot reach. At certain periods, however, a field of knowledge may be more conspicuously charcterized by the controversies that occur mong those who work in it. When these take he form of debates over the adequacy of paricular answers, as determined by agreed, even hough sometimes imprecise, criteria of assessnent, they are unlikely to be highly prominent, except for the immediate participants. When, on the other hand, such controversies extend to he standing of the questions asked and place n dispute the means of appraising answers, it becomes obvious to all that something is hapening that has implications for the entire field. Clearly the discipline is undergoing redefiniion or at least an attempt at redefinition that nay sharply alter its meaning. If the criteria or admitting questions and for validating inswers are changed, the discipline is changed. inescapably, therefore, controversies of this ort involve participants and observers in onsiderable numbers.

The pertinence of these observations to the ield of political science in the past decade or so needs no elaboration, I am sure. It may be less obvious, however, that this situation in the ield has a history that extends back a good nany years. A view of that history may both hed useful light on our current controversies and perhaps help us to assess their implications.

At the very outset I am willfully going to commit the sin of parochialism by confining my emarks primarily to the discipline in the Jnited States. In justification I would argue that the problems of political science are, if only because of the number of practitioners involved, chiefly problems of American political science. In the period on which I shall focus, beginning roughly two decades before the turn of the century, the influences upon the men who were developing the American discipline did not have their origin solely in the United States, but their responses to these influences were highly distinctive. These responses, moreover, set the stage for the controversies that have had their center in the United States, though their margins have extended far beyond this country.

* Presidential address delivered at the annual neeting of the American Political Science Association, Washington, D. C., September 8, 1965.

In thinking about the contemporary development of political science I find particularly suggestive the notion of the paradigm, which is one of the two key concepts in Thomas S. Kuhn's The Structure of Scientific Revolutions. By this term he means a common set of beliefs, constituting a kind of open-ended model that more or less explicitly defines the legitimate problems and methods of a research field, the working elements of what he calls "normal science." The developmental pattern of a mature science, he argues, is a movement from one generally accepted view of a research field to a successor. Prior to the emergence of such a research consensus, a field—such as physical optics before Newton—is characterized rather by a number of competing schools, not necessarily "unscientific" but bearing at most a loose resemblance to one another.

Kuhn is concerned, of course, with the physical sciences, but he explicitly does not rule out the possibility that comparable patterns of development characterize the social sciences. He leaves open the question of whether any parts of the social sciences have yet acquired paradigms or ever will. He would not, however, deny that many, if not all, of those fields display most of the features of the pre- or nonparadigmatic stage of inquiry.

¹ Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1962.

In the formative years of political science in the United States, in the decades around the turn of the century, the field did not have a paradigm, nor has it acquired one since. Unquestionably the absence of such an agreed model has influenced the pace and pattern of change in the field, for a crucial feature of a true paradigm is its precision. This gives form and direction to "normal science." More important for the birth of scientific revolutions. precision in the paradigm permits the investigator to know when something is wrong, i.e., contrary to what should be expected, and to see the need for paradigm change. In the absence of a paradigm and hence of a relatively precise means of knowing where, if not why, an existing conception is deficient, dissatisfactions with existing formulations in a field are not eliminated. Rather they may be multiplied. But they are likely to lack the coherence and the sharpness of focus that can be provided by a true paradigm.

I think it is accurate to argue, nevertheless, that something loosely analogous to a paradigm characterized American political science for at least the half-century running from sometime in the 1880s into the 1930s. In order not to distort Kuhn's provocative conception, this should be thought of as simply an implicit though fairly general agreement on what to do and how to proceed in the field. Because the matters in agreement were vague and the terms applicable to them loose and imprecise, they permitted a product diverse both in quality and in intent. Despite this diversity, however, the works of most political scientists had a number of qualities in common that serve to identify the nature of the general agreement and the form and character of the discipline.

The political science that emerged about the turn of the century gradually displaced and was in considerable part a revolt against an older tradition of preceptive and scholastic formalism. The new trend was toward contemporaneity and "facts," in the name of "realism" and of "science." Its early stirrings can be illustrated by Woodrow Wilson's Congressional Government (1885) but interestingly not by his later treatise on The State, which was clearly of the older mold. More than by Wilson or by any American, the note of change was struck by James Bryce in his American Commonwealth (1888). The trend that it signified lasted well into the 1930s, but it reached something of a peak about the turn of the century as part of the general pursuit of "realism" that was characteristic of the Progressive Movement in literature, in journalism, and in most of the emerging social sciences.

At the risk of distortion and over-simplification, I shall propose six closely related features of this predominant agreement that profoundly marked the discipline. That mark helps to put our current quandaries and controversies in instructive context. These six features, stated for the moment without elaboration, were: (1) an unconcern with political systems as such, including $_{ m the}$ American system. amounted in most cases to taking their properties and requirements for granted; (2) an unexamined and mostly implicit conception of political change and development that was blandoptimistic and unreflectively reformist; (3) an almost total neglect of theory in any meaningful sense of the term; (4) a consequent enthusiasm for a conception of "science" that rarely went beyond raw empiricism; (5) a strongly parochial preoccupation with things American that stunted the development of an effective comparative method: and (6) the establishment of a confining commitment to concrete description.

Lack of concern for the political system as such meant, first of all, that the discipline worked within implicit and common-sense assumptions about the requirements of the system, its boundaries, and the articulation of its elements. Yet these assumptions essentially fixed many of the questions that the discipline could ask and set the limits on the answers that could be supplied, whether in analytical or in prescriptive terms. This in turn meant that particular segments of the system could be described and prescribed for without reference to implications for or effects upon the system as a whole. This tendency, it seems to me, is at the heart of the negative connotations recently attached to the label "institutionalist." The target of such criticism can hardly be the study of institutions, since one can scarcely imagine a political science in which institutions, as persistent patterns of political action, would not be a proper and central focus of concern. Criticism rather bears on treating an institution in its own terms, at face value, and without reference to other portions of the inclusive scheme or to the functions of a particular pattern within the system.

Unconcern with the system as such meant that political scientists, and commentators generally, assumed in effect a kind of atomistic non-system. Preoccupation with isolated particulars and a commitment to the concrete and the "practical" led so far away from concern with the political system as a whole that it was virtually assumed out of existence. The field in consequence was condemned to working within the conventional, legalistic conceptions of the system, since it lacked the means of dealing with it, conceptually and empirically, in any other terms.

Closely and quite logically associated with this unconcern for the characteristics of the system was a view of political change or development that optimistically and uncritically assumed an inevitable progress toward democracy and the rule of law, provided only that enlightenment through education and the public channels of communication was sensibly provided for. The apparent facts of the relevant political world-Western Europe, the Americas except for some trouble spots south of the border, the self-governing British Dominions. China, and Japan—did not, at least until the 1920s, sharply contradict this bland view. In any case, the conception was essentially taken for granted. This did not inhibit, rather it encouraged, an enthusiasm for particularistic reform. Unconcern about the political system permitted championing proposals such as the direct primary without attention to their ramifying effects, and the assumption of democratic progress confidently justified the effort. An uncritical preoccupation with reform relied upon a conception of linear democratic development that seemed likely to terminate in a withering away of politics and the realization of an immanent harmony among enlightened and right-minded men.

It is not remarkable that this unconcern with the political system and with a critical view of political change should have carried with it, especially among American political scientists, an indifference to theory as an element having anything but a conventional, ornamental utility for the field. Theory in any systematic sense was for the most part peripheral, not in the main stream of the discipline. Albert Bushnell Hart was not much exaggerating the temper of his profession when he observed in 1907, "The most distinctive American theory of government is not to theorize."2 This attitude was in part an over-reaction to the abstract formalism of an earlier day, but it also followed logically from the unexamined assumption that the system provided its own theory and that the task before the profession was to facilitate the inevitable flowering of democracy. Small wonder if the textbooks through which students in this period were introduced to political science (via American government) changed their implicit conceptual positions from chapter to chapter, from page to page, and even from paragraph to paragraph. A less obvious consequence of this indifference to theory was that the sub-fields of political science tended to develop in increasing isolation. They had nothing in common except that many of them dealt with American phenomena and that all of them talked about government in some way. Without theory, politics tended to become defined as itself an isolated sub-field, rather than as the process permeating every phenomenon studied by the discipline.

² Albert Bushnell Hart, "The Growth of American Theories of Popular Government," this REVIEW, Vol. 1 (August, 1907), p. 560.

The discipline in these years also tended to take its "science" seriously, but the type of science, almost inevitably, was a rank, nontheoretical empiricism. The dominant commitment was to the collection of facts, in mary cases almost for their own sake. This preoccapation may have been one influence toward developing, especially in the 1920s, new devices for the collection and analysis of dataprimitive population samples, interviews, word-association tests, and so on. But the climate of the field was such that the facts normally were assumed to speak for themselves. Empirical description, usually in association with uncritical reformist inferences, was a hallmark of the field.

An understandable consequence of the new realism was that political science became increasingly parochial, primarily engrossed in things American and, almost inescapably, in the minutiae of American phenomena. A natural result of this and related commitments was that the discipline did little to develop comparison as a basic component of investigation. One of the saving features of the older formalist persuasion was that it had displayed at least a rudimentary interest in comparative analysis. After the succession of the new realism, however, what was known as "comparative government" largely involved a description of the institutions and structures of particular European governmental schemes. The comparative element rarely went beyond legalistic distinctions and literary gestures.

Finally and ironically, all five of these factors combined to insure that, in rejecting confinement by the abstract formalism of the earlier period, the new realism adopted instead an equally confining and in some ways even more rigid mode of concrete description. Without an explicit concern for political systems as such, without an interest in the patterns and directions of political change, without some commitment to theory, and with a compulsion to raw empiricism and parochial concerns, the narrowness of this political science was virtually inescapable.

This brief and perhaps unfairly simplified sketch is not presented in a spirit of condescension. If it emphasizes shortcomings, moreover, that is not because I assume that the period produced no gains. Given the temper of the American scene in the Age of Reform, the state of the means of communication, the paucity of data, and the limited manpower available to the discipline, the emergence of these characteristics was natural if not inevitable. Within the limits that it accepted, the gains that the field made were not triffing ones.

This summary is offered rather to indicate that once the experiences of political scientists, whether as professionals or as citizens, began to raise questions that fell outside the implicit general agreement on what to do and how to proceed in the field, none of the features of this largely implicit consensus could long go unquestioned. As such non-congruent experiences multiplied, the positions assumed by the discipline became successively untenable and a search for alternatives inescapable.

No purpose would be served by attempting to pinpoint a time at which experiences inconsistent with the general agreement began to occur with disturbing frequency; the choice would be arbitrary and the effort meaningless. The process in any case was one of cumulation. Thus the immediate results of World War I probably were mixed in their impact. The dissolution of the Hapsburg monarchy, the formal institutions of the successor states, the establishment of the Weimar Republic, and the launching of the League of Nations presented no immediate inconsistencies. Many political scientists, in fact, found it easy to attach to the League and to other international organizations both the uncritical optimism of the professional consensus and the analytical assumptions associated with it. On the other hand, the Bolshevik Revolution, with its apparent and apparently successful rejection of these assumptions, may have had a more disturbing effect. Also the retrospective views of the politics of the War, illustrated in a rash of semi-popular books on propaganda and reflected in Walter Lippmann's essays on public opinion, indicated some degree of disillusion. Probably more disturbing were the Fascist coup in Italy and the later Nazi take-over in Germany, with their open and effective repudiation of the expectations and practices that underlay the implicit agreements of the profession. The associated political instabilities and counter-currents of change throughout Europe, especially in Spain and France, and the bankruptcy of the Third Republic in 1940, liquidated the intellectual utility of the rootless, untheoretic concern for descriptive detail that hobbled what was known as "comparative government," but they almost as obviously undermined the assumptions and the conventional imperatives of much of the rest of the field.

An order of experience different but of comparable consequence for the profession occurred during the New Deal and World War II periods as academic political scientists in unprecedented numbers were transplanted to Washington. The impact of such first-hand experience with problems and processes at the level of the national government cannot be calculated, of course, but one cannot doubt that it was substantial. This re-shuffling, moreover, probably was important not merely for the element of direct confrontation with national government but also for a confrontation of a different sort—with the practitioners of other social science disciplines. As political scientists found themselves in mutually instructive collaboration with men from other fields, they were almost compelled to reckon with the utilities that these disciplines offered, not only for coming to grips with questions of immediate urgency but also for dealing with questions more strictly professional in character. These influences undoubtedly were reciprocal, but the political scientists' side of the transaction is the one that concerns us here.

Finally, at least two sorts of development in the decades since World War II have contributed to the dissolution of the established professional consensus. One was the drastically altered character of world politics after Potsdam. As "over there" moved here, the need for a systematic concern with the processes of international relations and with political and national security strategy became compelling. The reality of nuclear weapons and the politicomilitary implications of operations in space could not be grasped, if they were to be understood at all, by the assumptions and concepts that had appeared viable in a world based on Geneva. A second such development was the break-up of the colonial system, the emergence of new nations or national entities, and the awakening of older ones, which revealed the inadequacy of a disciplinary posture that was essentially parochial, that took the nature of the political system for granted, and that lacked an adequate and explicit view of political change. The appearance of the new nations demanded not only some sophistication on these counts but also tools of analysis equal to the task of a genuine comparative method. The conventional descriptive language of "comparative government" was weak enough in dealing with the relatively homogeneous and generally stable institutions of the Western European tradition; it was for the most part less than useless for coming to grips with the differences, the novelties, and the fluidities of the new national systems.

Although it took experiences such as these and their cumulative effects to bring the discipline as a whole to perceive the inadequacies of the prevailing consensus, a succession of individual dissents antedated all or all but the most recent of them, and these were the seeds of counter-tendency. One thinks, for example, of Graham Wallas, whose Human Nature in Politics (1908), for all its over-enthusiasm about psychology's potential for political science, was an eloquent and, at least on this side of the Atlantic, influential rejection of institutional description for its own sake. You will expect me to mention the almost unclassifiable Arthur F. Bentley, who was in but not wholly of the Age of Reform. If Bentley has been misunderstood in the 1950s and 1960s, his work at least has emerged from forty years of almost complete neglect. The Bentley revival, moreover, was itself symptomatic of the widespread readiness within the profession—largely absent in 1908—to question the conventional guiding agreements. Comparable, if less explicit and less radical dissent can be seen in at least some of the work of other scholars in the same generation, including Beard, Goodnow, and Lowell.

One must certainly include, moreover, the work and the career of Charles E. Merriam, who for more than twenty years was the prophet of reconstruction in political science. The "Chicago school" that he created in the vears before World War II was not strictly a school. It had no dogmas and no orthodoxy except a restless skepticism concerning the adequacy of prevailing conceptions of the discipline and a corresponding receptivity to the unconventional. Among the most distinctive products of those years, however, were several that demonstrated a reach for the coherence of political phenomena. For example, political systems, their properties and conditions of change, were, then as now, a central focus of Harold Lasswell's work. Of the same order was Frederick L. Schuman's International Politics, which, when it appeared in 1933, broke dramatically with the rootless moralizing and mechanical description then prevailing and foreshadowed new patterns of analysis in that growing sub-field.

There were individual stirrings elsewhere in the 1930s, as in the work of Pendleton Herring, then and since a pacemaker for his students and colleagues. But restlessness within the field as a whole did not develop until after 1945, when the effects of the full range of inconsistent experiences began to appear.

Given the looseness and especially the lack of precision in the prevailing implicit agreement on what to do and how to proceed in the field, its weakening and gradual dissolution were bound to be followed by a confusion of competing and divergent, if not incompatible, views of the appropriate questions to be asked and the proper methods to be used. How long that state of affairs is likely to exist is anyone's guess. At least three possibilities suggest themselves. First, it may be that the discipline is so uninsulated from its environment that it will have to wait for a broad intellectual or social movement to give it implicit coherence, as the Progressive Movement seems to have done in the formative years. If this should be so, the wait, I suspect, will be a long one. A second possibility is that segments, at least, of the discipline have grown self-conscious enough to supply their own momentum and their own modes of coherence. These may then develop as increasingly divergent and separate schools, with little in common except some raw data and possibly, but not necessarily, a departmental label. Or, third, most of the discipline may have acquired a degree of self-awareness sufficient to permit it to set the outlines of what to do, if not altogether how to proceed, without total dependence on dominant currents of thought in the environment and without the widening cleavages in both conception and procedure that the second possibility would involve.

A case can be made for each of these, and at this stage it is impossible to say with confidence which of them, or of a number of variant patterns, will in fact develop. As an inveterate optimist, however, I am disposed to bet on something like the third possibility, and I should indicate my reasons for the wager as well as for my preference.

The first and most basic reason is the emergence—perhaps more accurately re-emergence of an explicit interest in the political system. I do not refer here to a particular kind of conception but much more broadly to a renewed awareness of the simple but important assumption that the phenomena of politics in any sphere are interrelated in persistent or recurrent patterns. More important than the awareness itself is that it has involved explicit examination of the relations among things political—efforts to specify forms or types of systems, the elements involved in them, the factors associated with alterations in systems, and probable implications of these forms and mutations for the strength of specified values. This constitutes, of course, a revival of interest in one of the classic problems in the study of politics, and it is significant for just that reason. For, if a new agreement is to emerge on what political science is about, it will not come, I am certain, from a conception that does not permit the discipline, at least in principle, to deal with such large, important, and classic problems.

This revival thus seems to point in the right direction, but its implications go beyond that advantage. As the political system becomes a central focus of inquiry, guided by careful theory—of which more in a moment—the isolation of sub-fields within the discipline should begin to break down. National and international systems are not identical, of course, but the questions they invite are not wholly dissimilar, nor are the terms in which they may be analyzed. Explorations at each level may be expected to have increasing relevance for the other. And the same may be said of subnational systems, the area last and least directly affected by the experiences that disrupted the once-prevailing agreement within the discipline. The centrality of system considerations also will make less permissible the analysis of an institutional segment or process without reference to an explicit conception of the system to which it relates. Finally, an attempt to deal seriously with the problem of the political system necessarily involves reconceptualizing, re-casting the language of inter-system comparison. This reconceptualization was clearly anticipated a dozen years ago when the Social Science Résearch Council set up the Committee on Comparative Politics. The committee was expected to concentrate on the developing nations, but the larger objective was to contrive ways of looking comparatively at whole systems in terms of variations in attributes common in some degree to all political systems, whatever their stage of development.

A second reason for betting on the possibility of a new disciplinary consensus is the revival of interest in theory. This development fundamentally was a predictable consequence of the break-up of the discipline's nontheoretical consensus. But it has been aided in significant measure in recent years by the increased accessibility of data in a number of sub-fields. No discipline, especially among the social sciences, has good data readily available in sufficient amounts. But when data are not easily secured, even in modest quantities, it is likely that an enormous proportion of research time will go into mere collection. In such circumstances, moreover, it is not astonishing that much professional work, even in the absence of an antitheoretical bias, is reportorial, journalistic, and non-theoretical. Thus one has the impression that the specialties that today are least engaged in renewed theoretical concerns are those that must scramble the hardest for data. "Kremlinology" as an alternative to theory is in part traceable, I suspect, to scarcity of data.

However this may be, a renewed emphasis on theory of all kinds seems to have occurred in recent years. I emphasize "all kinds" because, as might have been expected, it seems evident that the theory chorus is less polyphonous than cacophonous. Discord seems more prominent than harmony even within what some see as the solid ranks of "the new political science." Nevertheless, the renewed concern for theory seems clear, and I cite as illustration an impression that the majority of textbooks in all parts of the field today show a degree of care, at least about consistency of assumption and coherence of expository framework, that was rare thirty years ago. This care indicates nothing about the theoretical adequacy of these efforts, but it does suggest a more sophisticated level of expectation.

In noting a revived interest in theory I refer to the creation, development, or application of theory and to "theorizing," or the readiness to draw inferences from a set of data to the class of events to which they belong. I am not here discussing the analysis and explication of documents in the history of political thought, on which I want to comment in another connection. What I want to emphasize at this point is a growing self-consciousness and fruitful awareness of the necessary conjunction of theory and empirical investigation. Such awareness involves accepting the elementary point that an investigator never has a choice of whether to use theory or not, that the facts never speak for themselves but only through the assumptions and concepts that control their selection and analysis, and that in consequence the choice is only between implicit, internally inconsistent. and hopelessly inadequate theory, on the one hand, and explicit, logically defensible, and reasonably adequate theory, on the other.

I do not anticipate that an awakened respect for theory will eliminate a division of labor in the field based on differences of disposition, training, and aptitude. Nor do I suggest that every reported research will or should display its theoretical structure prominently. We shall continue to have and should wish to have more political scientists whose talents and sense of strategy lead them to work on and from conceptual schemes and formal models of broad reach.

We shall also continue to have and to need those who, like our great colleague V. O. Key, in full awareness of their broad assumptions, prefer to work more inductively. The goodhumored skepticism that helped to make Key so creative also made him brilliantly at home with his data and healthily uneasy when his sentences got much beyond them. He denied that he was a theorist, but he was one, though he was indisposed to work with higher abstractions or to embrace formal systems for which he saw no early possiblity of empirical test. His Southern Politics, for example, represented and probably more than any other single work encouraged the restless searching that has marked the field since 1945. The South he wrote about has all but disappeared less than two decades after the book was published. What is left? An indispensable record for the historian, but for the political scientist much more: a structure of propositions and inferences -many of them tucked away in footnotesthat have theoretical pertinence well beyond the South or the United States. One day, perhaps, someone will do what Key would have been too modest to do, namely, extract that structure from its contemporary setting and show the strength that sensitive empirical inquiry can bring to theory.

For the predictable future both modes of theorizing will be needed, and from time to time both may be profitably cultivated by the same man. In practice, though not in principle, it may not be possible to develop general models, to say nothing of hypothetico-deductive theories, with much systematizing or predictive power. Should that be the case, we should be compelled to rely upon more restricted theories of inferential origin. But even if the obstacles to general theory can be surmounted, the more restricted type is likely still to be necessary, at least to stimulate and in part to test the more inclusive. Theory of both sorts, moreover, like the revived awareness of political systems, should contribute to reducing the insulation of sub-fields and perhaps to their re-casting. It may even be possible at some future point for a sub-field to be known by the problems it addresses itself to rather than by the piece of real estate it focuses upon or the institution it investigates.

Finally, my third reason for counting on a new consensus within the discipline is what I would call a recommitment to the goal of science. Although it is at least partially implied by a revived concern for the political system and for theory, I am less confident of this tendency than of the other two and I can hardly be unaware that it is considerably more controversial. No topic in the last two decades has provoked more fruitless discussion or has more consistently produced false, or at least wholly unnecessary, oppositions. I would not touch the issue but for a desire to bury it rather than to raise it, although I probably cannot expect that a death certificate will be widely recognized or that my mortuary services will be generally welcomed.

Close to the heart of the matter, however particular issues may be phrased, is the question of definition. It is possible to define the requirements of "science" and "scientific method" in such categoric terms that nothing in the study of politics now or at any projected future time is or is likely to be eligible for the label. But, to quote from an essay by Ernest Nagel on which I shall rely heavily, such an effort also leads "... to the unenlightening result that apparently none but a few branches of physical inquiry merit the honorific designation."3 Thus, to specify that "science" requires the hypothetico-deductive procedures and the integrated form of systematic explanation exemplified by the science of mechanics or that it necessitates the use of a particular set of techniques regardless of the type of inquiry is probably to deny that the discipline can be scientific or at best to confine it to problems of the most trivial character.

It is not necessary, however, so to restrict the definition or even to espouse that form of science as a goal or an ideal, and I do not see the recommitment to which I refer as involving such a definition or necessarily such an espousal. If one accepts Nagel's characterization that "... the sciences seek to discover and to formulate in general terms the conditions under which events of various sorts occur, the statements of such determining conditions being the explanations of the corresponding happenings";4 and if one further agrees that "The practice of scientific method is the persistent critique of arguments, in the light of tried canons for judging the reliability of the procedures by which evidential data are obtained. and for assessing the probative force of the evidence on which the conclusions are based";5 then the recommitment in the discipline becomes sensible and, at least presumptively, manageable.

³ Ernest Nagel, The Structure of Science: Problems in the Logic of Scientific Explanation (New York, Harcourt, Brace and World, 1961), p. 449.

⁴ Ibid., p. 4.

⁵ Ibid., p. 13.

Science so conceived requires generality of statement but not in a specified degree, nor does it require a particular level of precision, or a limited set of techniques. It does not assure the truth of every conclusion that it reaches or the absence of bias deriving, for example, from the value commitments of the investigator. It does not suggest that a precise line divides knowledge or beliefs that can be labeled "common sense" from knowledge that claims to be "scientific," and it does not, finally, assert that only knowledge so derived can or should be admissible as part of the discipline—a point to which I shall return. Any science does aspire to explanations of classes of events, explanations subject to the controls of empirical evidence and with sufficient systematic power at least to place its findings beyond complete invalidation by the day's events. These are aspirations, as I see it, that lie close to the heart of the restlessness that has characterized the field for at least two decades.

It is recommitment to science in this broad sense that I see as an essential part of a new consensus in the discipline. A more restricted conception, corresponding to the rigorous requirements of mechanics, for example, almost certainly cannot be fruitful in any foreseeable future and will certainly have the consequence of fostering increasingly divergent schools. Without, however, a commitment to a science somewhat more openly conceived, the empirical work of the discipline will not progress, will not move cumulatively toward explanation, toward establishing relations of dependence between events and conditions. If the empirical work of the discipline does not move, moreover, the discipline will not.

A new agreement on what the discipline is up to, resting on a broad conception of the scientific enterprise, as well as on the two tendencies previously identified, is likely to permit movement and the expectation of progress in the field. As Kuhn has argued in a somewhat different connection, the absence of such movement and of the associated expectation probably lies behind the recurrent definitional debates about the "science" of the contemporary social sciences. "What would permit X field to move ahead?" is a question more fundamental than "Is it a science?" He suggests, and I think soundly, that such debates are less frequent among economists, not because they know what science is, but because they have achieved "consensus about their past and present accomplishments"; hence it is economics rather than "science" on which they agree.6

6 Kuhn, op. cit. pp. 159-60.

But why be concerned about a fresh consensus in the field, especially one that derives from the three elements discussed here? Why not welcome a diversity of competing and increasingly separated schools? Surely the temper of the times and the state of the technology are such that someone will exploit the potentialities of science in the analysis of political events and actions; if not "political scientists," then a school, or perhaps a set of scholars who do not carry the label "political science" at all. What difference would that make? Perhaps none at all, but I suggest we should not concede the point without reflection.

Even one who may be committed to the potential of the scientific enterprise in this field must grant that he cannot know how far that effort in practice will be able to go and must seriously entertain the possibility that in fact the distance may be fairly short. If "... it is any man's guess whether a comprehensive social theory of . . . [a scientific sort] is destined to remain permanently as a logical but unrealized possibility,"7 as much probably must be granted concerning such a political theory. Only a bigot would perhaps deny that significant progress recently has been made in explaining and developing a theory of electoral behavior, and only the most skeptical would reject the likelihood that other sub-areasperhaps the comparative analysis of public policy-could make similar gains. But one would be imprudent to project these accomplishments indefinitely. The practical obstacles may be too great. For example, it may not be possible to secure enough cases, enough standardized and precise observations, to make any reasonably reliable scientific statements about political systems, though the discipline must talk about systems.

From these cautionary observations I would draw two inferences. First, if the prospect of a comprehensive social theory lies so far in the future as to be a matter of guessing, then theory in the political realm, however comprehensive, for at least that long is likely to remain distinctively political. It will work primarily from data and concepts rooted in its more restricted area, and it will not appear merely as a special case of a more comprehensive theory of society. Second, if the reach of reasonably reliable science in the area of politics may for a long time and perhaps indefinitely be shorter than many might hope, then for so long the discipline will have to place some reliance upon knowledge that is less scientific or even nonscientific in character. The alternative for a discipline based upon consensus about itself is consistently to sacrifice relevance to rigor.

⁷ Nagel, op. cit. p. 462.

This position seems to me to contain two additional implications. First, it implies the need to include under relevance the function of assessing the probable consequences of proposals and events for the system and for the values implicit in it. I cannot accept the counsel of those who would have political scientists say, "Let George do it" when the question arises of assessing matters that fall within the subject-matter that they claim as their province. That seems to me defaulting on an obligation, and further, I do not believe any responsible fraternity of social scientists gives that answer, whatever its protestations to the contrary. This does not mean that we should run up the flag for the latest panacea, that our highest aspirations should be as political actors. or that we can fail to distinguish responsibly between what we know with some degree of reliability and what we merely judge to be valid. But it does mean that as political scientists we may have something to say. It means, further, that we cannot escape the obligation to predict, and a function of prediction is to sharpen and to broaden moral choice.

Second, if a fresh consensus about the discipline must include, for an indefinite future, a less or non-scientific component and if a continued assessing or evaluating function must rest fundamentally upon that component, then it seems to me clearly to follow that the classics in this field of thought, especially perhaps the more speculative documents, must be a central part of the training for and the practice of political science. I am aware of Whitehead's epigram, that "A science that hesitates to forget its founders is lost." But one may add that perhaps a discipline that does indeed forget its founders may also be lost. Remembering them does not, however, require that their writings be treated as scripture; revision is not equivalent to neglect.

Neglect amounting to forgetting would not be new to the field. The non-theoretical bias of the earlier agreement within the discipline thrust the study of political thought out of the mainstream and retained it largely as a gesture toward polite learning. Something akin to this attitude persists, it seems to me, in the contemporary Philistinism that regards everything in the classic literature as having only an ethical or normative revelance. Small wonder if in consequence of this sort of attitude, the study of the history of politicial thought appears to be the most isolated segment of the field, if a reciprocally fruitful dialogue between that segment and the more empirically oriented areas has been rare, or if younger political scientists committed to the empirical side of the discipline may see little in the classics that is relevant to their concerns. Such isolation, though understandable, seems neither necessary nor designable

The study of politics is old, but political science as a self-conscious discipline has not come a long road. On that way the discipline has inevitably been marked by the intellectual. moral and political influences-often contradictory and fruitless-that have dominated the days of its growth. From such influences, as much as from its own substance, have come the conflicts and disputes we have known for at least a decade. In attempting to trace these controversies I have had no thought of urging an end to disputation, an outcome whose undesirability would be exceeded only by its improbability. Rather I have tried to argue that if we can see the sources of our disagreements. we may be able to redefine some of them and to choose for a further investment of energy those most likely to encourage the growth of our collective capabilities.

Redefinition and redirection will depend upon the emergence of a new and broadly based consensus about the discipline. That may not occur; a persistent sectarianism may be inescapable. Continued and growing dissensus, however, can have unfortunate implications. It would encourage an indiscriminate rejection of much that is valuable both in our inheritance and in our contemporary efforts. It would be likely to restrict the range and power of our inquiries. It would be likely, finally, to reduce the relevance of those inquiries in days that ask for the maximum in trained intelligence. Should a new agreement emerge, it may take a long time and may be clearly recognizable only by hindsight. The challenge, I submit, is worthy.

THE POLITICS OF CONSENSUS IN AN AGE OF AFFLUENCE

ROBERT E. LANE Yale University

Marx is surely right when he says that the way men earn their living shapes their relations to each other and to the state; but this is, of course, only the beginning. Aside from all the other non-economic factors which also have these effects, there is the matter of the source of income, the level of income, and, especially, the security of income. Moreover, each of these factors has both an individual effect, a set of influences apparent in the study of individual enrichment or immiseration, and a social effect, the influences which appear when whole societies become richer or more secure economically. So I am led to inquire into what is happening to men's political interests, behavior, and attitudes toward politics and government in an Age of Affluence, a period when men's economic security and income have increased and when. for the first time in history, it appears likely that the business cycle can now be controlled. Like Marx's, my interest is in change over time.

Quite candidly, this is a descriptive account of attitudinal change in recent years, portrayed against a background of economic change. Only argument supports the inference that it is the economic change-implied in the term "Age of Affluence" shortly to be explicated—that is accountable for much of the attitudinal change. It would take another paper with closer attention to subsections of the population and specific economic conditions to establish this argument on a firmer footing. In the meantime, perhaps these findings can help illuminate the more general problem of the relationship between economic development and stable and effective politics, as well as to help us to see where American politics is heading.

The elements of the economy which are most relevant to such an investigation are five-fold, and the term "affluent society" or "Age of Affluence" refers here to more than higher per capita national income, though it includes that. The term embraces:

- (1) a relatively high per capita national income:
- (2) a relatively equalitarian distribution of income:
- (3) a "favorable" rate of growth of per capita Gross National Product (GNP);
- (4) provisions against the hazards of life-
- ¹ John K. Galbraith, The Affluent Society (Boston, 1958).

- that is, against sickness, penury, unemployment, dependence in old age, squalor—the features now associated with the term "welfare state"; and
- (5) a "managed economy" in the sense of conscious and more or less successful governmental use of fiscal and monetary powers to smooth out the business cycle and avoid depressions, as well as to provide for the economic growth mentioned in (3) above.

These five points include both economic conditions and governmental policies.

The appropriateness of the term "affluent society" or "Age of Affluence" rests upon intercultural and chronological comparisons; but in making these comparisons it is important to remember that an affluent society may still include a large number of very poor people: the average income of the poorest fifth of the families (consumer units) in the United States in 1962 was $1,662 and this had to provide for a little over three people, on the average. The term "affluence," however, is clearly relative both to other societies and previous periods. On the first point, comparison with other societies:

- (1) The United States ranked second (out of 122 countries) in GNP per capita (Kuwait was the first) in 1957, with no other country even a close competitor.³
- (2) According to one measure of "inequality of income distribution before taxes," the United States ranks about 7th in equality of income distribution. (Four British Commonwealth countries and India, for different reasons, are somewhat more equalitarian).4
- (3) Although until the last few years the
- ² These data and the economic and social statistics to follow are taken (or derived) from three main sources all by the U.S. Bureau of the Census: Historical Statistics of the United States, Colonial Times to 1957 (Washington, D.C., 1960), and its Continuation to 1962 and Revisions (1965); Statistical Abstract of the United States, 1964 (85th ed., Washington, D.C., 1964).
- ³ Bruce M. Russett and associates, World Handbook of Political and Social Indicators (New Haven and London, Yale University Press, 1964), p. 155.
 - 4 Ibid., p. 245.

annual increase of GNP was lower in the United States than in most developed and many developing countries (in Russett's volume, the United States is about 45th out of 68 countries), recently this has changed and the rate in the United States 1962-65 is about the same as in the Common Market countries.

- (4) Although relatively less extensive than in most European countries, the American welfare programs, now that medicare has been enacted, compare favorably in coverage and especially in absolute level of support with contemporary European programs.
- (5) With the possible exception of Italy, no European or developed Commonwealth country has suffered a recession (after the postwar reconstruction period) with anything like the depth or duration of the depressions of the twenties and thirties. This is also true of the United States, as we shall see below.

But our main interest here lies, not in comparative economics and politics, but in changing patterns in the United States. Were we not always an Affluent Society, a People of Plenty,6 bothered by the question "Abundance for What?" Relative to other nations, perhaps! But the modern era is different from previous eras in several important and relevant ways. It will be convenient to designate four economic time periods in the United States, of which only the last three are of current interest to us (and only the latter part of the earliest of these). The periods are: Agricultural State of Nature (1789-1869), Industrial State of Nature (1870-1929), Period of Economic Crisis (1930-1941), and Age of Affluence (marked by a preliminary uncertain period, 1946-50, and beginning to take on its central characteristics in 1951 and then continuing through the present). Inevitably, since we are dealing with more or less continuous change, the margins of the periods blur into each other. Each leaves its historical "deposit" in the milieu of the next, so that—as with countries still struggling with the remnants of the feudal order in the modern period-we have with us today substantial economic characteristics of the Agricultural State of Nature (not to mention the political and cultural residues of that period).

But since periods must have boundaries, let us mention our reasons for selecting these. The Industrial State of Nature began in 1870 when the society became more than half industrial and commercial, as indicated by the decline below the fifty per cent mark in value added to the national product by agriculture. During this industrial period, and prior to the great economic crisis of the 1930s, we find a decelerating rate of development, as indicated by the number of years required for the GNP to double (in constant prices): 13 years, then 13 years, then 21 years—taking us up to the midtwenties. But we are concerned with more than economic performances; we are interested in government policy as well. "Reform" during this period focused upon the regulation of "natural monopolies," such as railroads, grain elevators, and the like; pure food and drugs laws; and policing certain trade practices. There was no concept of a welfare state, and the nearest thing to an argument over a "managed economy" was the chronic debate over "easy" versus "hard" money.

The period of Economic Crisis (1930-1941) was, of course, marked by economic depression. the most extended and severe in our history. In this period GNP (in constant dollars) remained below the 1929 figure until 1939; investment fell off drastically, and widespread unemployment and suffering ensued. The period defines itself by these facts of economic life plus two things: first, the advent of welfare state policies (especially social security, unemployment insurance, extended home and work relief, and a variety of agricultural policies designed to relieve the insecurities and penury of farm life); and second, the early beginnings of a fiscal and monetary policy (pump priming, inflationary monetary policies) designed to eliminate the troughs of the business cycle. These policies, of course, were extremely controversial, but-if we omit the war years—one might say that the passage of the Employment Act of 1946 represented a turning point in governmental (but not business) acceptance of responsibility for a "managed economy" in this special moderate sense. Specific policies to implement this concept remained controversial in many circles for a long time thereafter.

The 1940s represent an anomalous period, partly because of the war, and partly because per capita GNP (hovering around $2,000 in constant 1954 dollars) scarcely changed during the reconversion period, with its widespread shortages and rapidly rising prices, from 1946 into 1950. People were much better off than in the 1930s, but civilians generally were not much better off (economically) than they had been in the first half of the decade. Although there were no recessions as serious as the 1920-21 recession, yet both 1947 and 1949 were difficult years. As a consequence the annual rate of growth of GNP was low (1.8 per cent from 1946 to 1950), and, moreover, this period, like all postwar periods, was marked by high industrial strife. Yet there was an important difference, compared to 1929, and also compared to 1935-36; the share of income going to the very rich, the top 5 per cent, declined substantially (1929 = 30 per cent, 1935-36 = 26.5 percent, 1946-50=c.21 per cent). From 1950 on, this proportion going to the richest 5 per cent scarcely changed, drifting down a percentage point or two, for the next fifteen years. Aside from this last feature, however, the period of the forties seems to have been characterized by some of the economic elements of earlier periods; but at the same time, the basic welfare state measures provided assistance for the very poor, the economically insecure, and for the unemployed—rapidly increasing in 1949 and 1950.

⁶ Ibid., pp. 160-61; also First National City Bank, Monthly Economic Letter, August 1965, p. 89.

[•] David M. Potter (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1954).

⁷ David Riesman (Garden City, N.Y., 1964).

The Age of Affluence, after its poor beginning in the 1940s, may be said (for analytical purposes) to commence in the 1950s, especially after the Korean fighting had stopped. From that time on, although three recessions have occurred, only the one in 1957–58 involved any decline at all in per capita GNP in real terms. The rate of growth improved substantially: from 1950 to 1961 the annual rate of growth was 3.1 per cent in constant dollars. Industrial strife declined; prices were more stable, and in this decade available spending money rose dramatically (50 per cent increase in disposable income—current dollars) with goods to spend it on

While the 1950s began to resemble a period appropriately termed an "Age of Affluence" (except for the unemployment), the 1960s look even better. From early 1961 into 1966 there have been no recessions, the longest continuous period of prosperity in our history. The annual rate of increase of GNP in constant dollars is about 4.2 per cent in real terms. Unemployment has declined somewhat, though it remains a "spot" on the affluent portrait. Equally important, the Kennedy and Johnson administrations make an explicit point of their use of fiscal policies, especially tax policies, to reduce or eliminate depressions and to encourage growth. Finally, in 1964 certain anti-poverty programs were instituted to attack unemployment, poverty and squalor with more precise instruments; and in 1965, for the first time in 20 years, major new advances were scored toward the realization of the welfare state, especially, medicare, extension of social security coverage; and a "break-through" was made on federal aid to education.

This long (but too brief) review of the economic and policy characteristics of recent times shows, then, a profile of increasing per capita income but decreasing economic effectiveness in the period of Industrial State of Nature (1870-1929); a period of Economic Crisis (1930-1941) with low income and no growth; an anomalous decade in the Forties; and then an accelerating economy in the Age of Affluence. No doubt the implications as drawn seem overly optimistic, but I see no reason to anticipate a reversal of any of the major trends (unless there is a war), though a slowing down of growth may take place. The question, then, is how these changes relate to political behavior and attitudes, especially in the contemporary period.

I. POLITICS AND CIVICS IN AN AGE OF AFFLUENCE

The relationships between individual affluence and political attitudes are comparatively well known, but the relationships between communal affluence and political behavior are somewhat obscure. Even more obscure are the relationships between change in affluence and change in politics. Consider the following plausible hypotheses:

One might expect an increased conservatism in the Age of Affluence, on the ground that as people become more prosperous they take on the known attitudes of prosperous individuals in an earlier period. Or, to the contrary, one might expect increasing support for the kinds of measures which have worked successfully in the past in helping to bring about the Age of Affluence, i.e., support for an extension of the welfare state.

One might expect a declining urgency of political concern, on the ground that when men are more satisfied with their lot in life they become less desperate for political help. Or, one might expect increased political interest and concern because these attitudes are generally related to higher income and an improved capacity to take an interest in matters other than immediate day-to-day breadwinning problems.

One might expect a shift in political cleavage from social class to religious and ethnic bases on the ground that economic issues would become less important, thereby releasing men's attention for other submerged conflicts. Or, one might argue that because religious and ethnic cleavages are nourished by economic insecurity and poverty, growing affluence and security would weaken the intensity of these conflicts too.

Finally, one might expect a decline in political partisanship, i.e., the extent and intensity of identification with a political party, on the ground that both parties are likely to accept the policies of the welfare state and the managed economy, thus depriving party differerences of much of their meaning. Or, one might argue that since social class is likely to lose its cuing function in elections, parties will remain important, or even become stronger, as intellectual and emotional "props" in electoral decisions.

The fact is that, as usual, both "theory" and common sense lead in diverse incompatible directions, and only evidence will help. The evidence to be presented here suggests a lessening of hostility between parties and religious groups, and a rapprochement between men and their government—a combination of changes which I cover in the term "politics of consensus." This does not imply that there are no sharp, intensely felt, hostile cleavages in society, but rather that these have (1) lost most of their political and emotional impact for most people (but not for Civil Rights workers), and (2) changed from cleavages in which the public was more or less evenly divided, to cleavages where the division is between a main body of opinion and a small and dwindling group. Specifically, the thesis has six themes. In the Age of Affluence:

- (a) people will come increasingly to trust each other, to feel less at the mercy of chance and more in control of their lives, and so to be more optimistic regarding the future. These changes, in turn will help to promote others:
- (b) people will slowly lose their sense of high national, personal, and group stakes in elections; political partisanship, while not changing on the surface, will change its meaning.
- (c) people will slowly change their class awareness and consciousness, so that the relationship between ideology and class status will change; but occupation and class will continue to influence electoral choice—even as the electoral "pivot" shifts.
- (d) religious institutions and dogmas will slowly lose their influence over men's secular thought, inter-faith hostility will decline, but religious community identification may retain a constant political "cuing" function.
- (e) the struggle for racial equality will be facilitated by affluence and its associated attitudes, but the sense of crisis and strife in this arena will continue or grow for an indefinite period.
- (f) there will be a rapprochement between men and their government and a decline of political alienation.

We cannot explore (for want of time and survey data) these changes in the earlier periods, so we will focus upon recent changes. The reader will understand the difficulties of relying on survey materials, with their different questions, eclectic timing, and, hence, ambiguous inserence. He will, I hope, further understand that the nature of the changes we are considering are glacial in their slow movements, interrupted by dramatic events abroad and influenced by changing leadership appeals at home. One can, moreover, write interpretative historical essays without data, or more closely controlled and specific studies well documented by data, and both seem equally immune from criticism. This paper lies in between; it is a speculative historical study making use of such data as come to hand.8

II. TRUST, OPTIMISM AND ALIENATION

(a) In an Age of Affluence, people will come increasingly to trust each other more, to feel more in control of their lives, and to be more hopeful regarding the future. Social alienation will decline.

Greater economic security and protection against life's hazards should, one would imagine, increase people's sense of well-being or happiness, and occasion a decline in various kinds of anxiety. In some ways, this seems to be the case, while in other respects it is not. Over the years, both in the United States and abroad, survey organizations have asked people "In general, how happy would you say you are—very happy, fairly happy, or not very happy?" (AIPO). The question, in spite of its superficial naiveté, has been found to be related to many concrete symptoms of adjustment and happiness and thus to have a promise of some validity.9 Comparatively speaking, by this test, the United States was in 1949 the third happiest nation (this statement sometimes amuses one's friends), with Australia by far the happiest and France the unhappiest.10 But over time, it would be impossible to conclude that the evidence suggests that Americans have become "happier" in the Age of Affluence. In the three-year period 1946 to 1949 there seemed to be a drift in this direction (from 39 per cent "very happy" to 43 per cent), but, when in 1957 the Survey Research Center asked an almost identical question of a national sample ("Taking all things together, how would you say things are these days—would you say you're very happy, pretty happy, or not too happy these days?"), only 35 per cent reported themselves to be "very happy." Since happiness, as the reader might suspect, is strongly related to education and income and since both education and income have been increasing, the findings are puzzling and suggest further inquiry.

8 The difficulties of showing change through survey data are substantial. Sampling error may often account for the differences (though it should be recalled that most comparisons are between a proportion in one survey, with a sample usually around 1600, and a proportion in another; not, as is more familiar, proportions of sub-groups in only one survey). Great differences such as one hopes for in correlational analysis, would here imply some rather unstable attitudes and hence indicate the influence of transient events rather than historical change. The most solid evidence is provided, rather rarely, by many observed changes in the same direction over a long period. Unfortunately, the data for this paper often come from sources which do not give the size of the sample, eliminating the possibility of significance tests or correlational tests. Wherever possible [Tables I(d), I(e), IV(a), VI(a), and IX(b)], I have tested the significance of the distributions by the method of difference of proportions (Z). The dichotomized differences are all significant beyond the .01 level. I wish to thank Mary Frase for these computations.

But there is other evidence to suggest the kind of basic changes in orientation predicted in the Age of Affluence. One of the fundamental attitudinal ingredients of successful democracies is a relatively widespread sense of interpersonal trust.¹² It is a correlate of several important democratic attitudes¹³ and, I believe, an ingredient in economic development itself, since this requires cooperation, responsibility and integrity to facilitate the working out of informal agreements.¹⁴ Comparatively, the

- ⁹ See Norman M. Bradburn and David Caplovitz, Reports of Happiness (Chicago, Aldine, 1965).
- ¹⁰ See compilation of survey material by Hazel Gaudet Erskine in Public Opinion Quarterly, Vol. 28 (1964), p. 519. Future reference to these compilations will be as follows: Erskine, POQ.
- ¹¹ Gerald Gurin, Joseph Veroff, and Sheila Feld, Americans View Their Mental Health (New York, Basic Books, 1960), p. 22.
- ¹² See Gabriel A. Almond and Sidney Verba, The Civic Culture (Princeton, N.J., Princeton University Press, 1963), pp. 266-68.
- ¹⁸ Morris Rosenberg, "Misanthropy and Political Ideology," American Sociological Review, Vol. 21 (1956), pp. 690-5.
- ¹⁴ This is the implication in David McCelland's discussion of other-directedness. See his The Achieving Society (New York, 1961), pp. 190-203.

United States is a "trusting" nation, perhaps the most trusting; but we may not always have been that way. In Table I(a) there is some suggestion that inter-personal trust has increased since the war and the immediate postwar period. If this is true it would provide the strongest attitudinal foundation for some of the political changes we shall examine shortly.

While the sense of current happiness does not seem to have grown in the Age of Affluence, nevertheless an important change has occurred in attitudes about the past, present, and future chances for happiness or life satisfaction. In Table I(b) we see a very strong suggestion that, compared to people in the later phases of the Period of Economic Crisis, people today believe that their lives provide greater satisfaction than their parents or grandparents had. The nostalgia of the Thirties for an earlier, possibly "village" America, seems to have declined, in spite of the resurgence of these attitudes said to be characteristic of the Goldwater campaign. If this is a measure of an emotional traditionalism, this change, too, is important.

Looking toward the future as a period offering greater promise of a happier life, could imply some dissatisfaction with the current state of things; but, on the contrary, it seems to me to imply exactly the opposite view, namely, that the present is full of hope, carrying within it the seeds of fruitful change. In any event, the increase in the past ten years of faith in the future compared to a plateau of relatively lower hope during the previous 13 years (Table I(c) seems to me to reflect exactly that sense of security in the future which one might expect from the protective arm of the welfare state and newly acquired control over the ravages of the business cycle. 15

This theme is further reflected and more directly stated in a question on the carrying out of plans, shown in Table I(d). Here, unfortunately, the time span between measures is short (1958 to 1964), and the change in attitudes relatively small. Moreover, the first measure is taken in a period of recovery from the only important recession in the Age of Affluence. Nevertheless it is suggestive that a growing sense of mastery over fate emerges—the very antithesis of the traditionalist orientation suggesting that one is the helpless object of forces beyond human control.

15 Candor compels me to note here that between 1937 and 1964 there was virtually no change in the belief that we will never do away with poverty in this country: in both 1937 and 1964 some 83 per cent said "no," we will never do it. Erskine, POQ, p. 526.

Finally, we must note in Table I(e) a somewhat larger increase in the belief that one is, in some sense, the child of fortune, blessed with better than the average share of good luck. Again we are dealing with "late" (for us) changes in the Age of Affluence, but the halving of the proportion of those who think of themselves as dogged by bad luck is surely significant. The implication is twofold: men feel more in control of their lives, as we said before, and

TABLE I. TRUST IN OTHERS; PERCEPTIONS OF LIFE NOW, EARLIER, AND LATER; CONTROL OVER ONE'S OWN LIFE, AND SHARE OF GOOD LUCK

(a) "Do you think most people can be trusted?" (OPOR, March 26, 1942; NORC, Aug. 1, 1948; Jan. 1964)^a

·	1942	1948	1964
	(%)	(%)	(%)
Yes	66	66	77
No '	25	30	21
No opinion	9*	4	2
* includes 5%	qualified	answers

(b) "Do you think Americans were happier and more contented thirty years ago than they are now?" (AIPO, Mar. 8, 1939).* "Do you think the average man gets more satisfaction out of life these days or do you think he got more out of life 50 years ago?" (SRC, Nov. 1964)b

1964) ^b	1939	1964
	(%)	(%)
In earlier period people were happier; got more satisfaction out of life	61	34
Not happier in earlier period; get more satisfaction out of life these days	23	59

(e) "Ten years from now, do you believe Americans will generally be happier than they are today?" (AIPO, May 18, 1939). "As you look to the future, do you think life for people generally will get better—or will it get worse?" (AIPO, March 15, 1952; Aug. 29, 1962)^a

16

7

Other, it depends, no opinion

	1939	1952	1962
			· · · · · ·
	(%)	(%)	(%)
Better (happier)	42	42	55
Worse (not happier)	35	34	23
No difference		13	12
No opinion	23	11	10

TABLE I (continued)

(d) "When you make plans ahead, do you usually get to carry out things the way you expected, or do things usually come up to make you change your plans?" (SRC, Nov. 1958; Nov. 1964)^b

	1958	1964
	(%)	(%)
Things work out as expected	52	59
Depends, other	1	4
Have to change plans	42	36
Don't know and NA	4	1
No. of cases	(1822)	(1450)

(e) "Do you feel that you are the kind of person that gets his share of bad luck, or do you feel that you have mostly good luck?" (SRC, Nov. 1958, Nov. 1964).

•	1998	1904
	(%)	· (%)
Mostly good luck	63	75
Pro-con; it depends	5	10
Bad luck	29	14
Don't know and NA	4	1
No. of cases	(1822)	(1450)

• Erskine, POQ, pp. 517, 523, 525. AIPO refers to American Institute of Public Opinion; OPOR to Office of Public Opinion Research; and NORC to National Opinion Research Corp.

b Inter-university Consortium for Political Research, Codebook for 1964 Survey Research Center Election Study. These sources will hereafter be abbreviated as "Consortium Codebook" and the initials SRC will be used for the Survey Research Center (University of Michigan).

"nature" or "the fates" or even "society" is less malevolent—perhaps even benign.

In review, in spite of the findings on "happiness," one can only conclude that during this period the direction of changing personal orientation has been toward a sense that life is better than it was, and will get still better; that people are more trustworthy; that events are more under control and fate is kinder. There is a group of intellectuals who have, in one sense, inherited the place once held by the proponents of Marx's immiseration theory of capitalism. With tongue in cheek, we may refer to them as "alienists," for their apostle is a psychoanalyst, Erich Fromm, and their theme is the increasing alienation of men from work, society and government. I have long suspected that they reflected their own discontent with society rather more than any mass discontent—some, like C. Wright Mills, have said as much. Partly too, I think, their views reflect their own alienation from the field of endeavor where there is a true elan, the field of science. Whatever the reason, and somewhat apart from the main argument of this piece, I suggest that the above data cast doubt upon the principal themes of these alienist thinkers.

III. POLITICAL PARTISANSHIP

(b) In an Age of Affluence, the sense of crisis and of high national, personal, and group stakes in national elections declines; political partisanship takes on a new meaning.

This change in "sense of crisis" is, perhaps, the most important attitudinal change from the Period of Economic Crisis to the Age of Affluence, and it is the most difficult to substantiate with really good evidence. The argument, however, is straightforward.

In an Age of Affluence an increasing proportion of the working class achieve sufficient income and security to adopt middle class social and political patterns—but they nevertheless are likely to remain Democrats. At the same time, the middle class will associate its own increasing welfare and security with the policies of the welfare state, including flexible fiscal policies, and will be in no mood for change. Many will become Democrats; others will be liberal Republicans. Many industrialists and businessmen will come increasingly to perceive that the fight against a limited management of the economy is not in their interests because these "liberal" policies provide the basis for the prosperity and growth in which they share. It is certainly not true that the more prosperous a person becomes, the less likely he is to be alarmed about political events. But, generally, I think it is true that the more secure he is about his income, and the more it appears to him that the government will not jeopardize that income, the less intense he is likely to feel about political decisions in the realm of economic affairs.

Before turning to time comparisons in the United States, something may be learned from cross-cultural comparisons of attitudes toward victory by opposition parties. From the data in Table II, one learns that the sense of electoral crisis is lower in the United States than elsewhere. This is enormously significant for the smooth functioning of democratic institutions, not only because it makes transition easier from one administration to another, but also because it reduces antagonism and hostility in electoral campaigns. The data also show a sensitivity in these foreign nations to real dangers; but for our purposes, let us note only one other point. In every country except Mexico the more conservative party is in power, but only in the United States—and there only in a minor way -is a larger proportion fearful of the conservative party policies than of the more liberal party. So much has the welfare state been accepted here that its mild opponents, even when in power, were considered more threatening than its apostles. This was true in 1960—perhaps the 1964 election may be interpreted as further confirmation of this point.

¹⁶ See Erich Fromm, The Sane Society (New York, 1955); C. Wright Mills, The Sociological Imagination (New York, Oxford University Press, 1959), esp. pp. 165-76.

Not infrequently the American experience is taken by (American) scholars to represent a kind of prototype for modernizing societies, a model of what is to become of them. If that interpretation is true, it implies that we have passed through some of the phases of economics and politics which these other nations are now experiencing—a hypothesis which runs counter to the notion of American uniqueness, and runs counter to much common sense as well. Nevertheless, the implication of Table II is in line with our major theme: the decline of a sense of high stakes involved in national electoral decisions.

These stakes might be national stakes, where the welfare of the country is somehow "risked," as implied by the question eliciting the Almond-Verba data; or the stakes might be more personal, turning on one's own economic condition; or they might refer to the welfare of the group to which one belongs. Changing attitudes toward these three kinds of stakes are reflected in Tables III and IV.

The argument for a declining sense of national urgency in electoral outcomes must rest on two comparisons over time, the only comparable ones I could find (Tables III(a) and (b)). One of them compares the responses to two similar questions: how much difference it makes which party wins, in 1946, and how much difference it makes which party runs the country, nineteen years later in May 1965. Note that the latter time follows by only several months an election in which the candidates were thought to have sharply different views on domestic and foreign policy. The decline in those believing partisan victory or partisan government of one kind or another makes "a great deal of difference" is suggestive of the process of consensus revealed in Table II and anticipated in our argument. The other comparison is between attitudes directly mention-

Per Cent

"The Republican Party now controls the administration in Washington. Do you think that its policies and activities would ever seriously endanger the country's welfare? Do you think that this probably would happen, that it might happen, or that it probably wouldn't happen?"*

"If the Democratic Party were to take control of the government, how likely is it that it would seriously endanger the country's welfare? Do you think that this would probably happen, that it might happen, or that it probably wouldn't happen?*"

Country Response "Prob		"Probably Would Happen," of total sample
United States		(%)
Republicans probably	y endanger welfare	5
Democrats probably	endanger welfare	3
Great Britain
Conservatives probab	oly endanger welfare	7
Labour probably end	angers welfare	17
Germany
Christian Democrats	probably endanger welfare	7
Socialists (SPD) prob	pably endanger welfare	12
Right wing (DRP) p	robably endangers welfare	35
Italy
Christian Democrats	probably endanger welfare	10
Communists (PCI) p	robably endanger welfare	60
Socialists (PSI) prob	ably endanger welfare	43
Socialists (PSDI) pro	bably endanger welfare	23
Right Wing party lik	te MSI probably endangers welfare	41
Mexico
Party of Revolutions	ary Institutions (PRI) probably endangers welfs	re 13
PAN (minor party)]	probably endangers welfare	18
PP (minor party) pro	obably endangers welfare	37

^{*} Appropriate changes in wording, of course, for each nation.

Source: Almond-Verba five-nation study; Consortium codebooks. The major report on these surveys is made in Gabriel A. Almond and Sidney Verba, The Civic Culture, op. cit. The number of cases for each country is about a thousand; U. S. survey was made in March 1960, others in June and July 1959.

ing "difference to the country" or "important to the country" in 1944 and in 1952—the beginning of the politics of consensus. Fortunately, in 1952 the question was asked twice, once before the election-mentioning only partiesand again after the election, mentioning the candidates' names. The lack of difference between these two times and wordings gives us a sense of the reliability of the attitudes involved. And the magnitude of the apparent change in attitude over this 8-year period suggests that chance or sampling error or minor differences in wording could not account for the change. But perhaps it is the difference between a war election and a peacetime election, rather than any between an election colored by the politics of the Period of Economic Crisis compared to the politics of consensus in the Age of Affluence? This would be a more plausible construct were it not for a previous (AIPO) poll in (August) 1942 asking people whether they thought the outcome of the election would "make any difference in the war effort"; only 30 per cent thought—correctly, as the election consequences for domestic mobilization programs showed-that it would make any difference in this particular respect, compared to 88 per cent seeing some unspecified difference in 1944. The implication is clear: people were carrying into the 1944 election—when postwar reconversion anxieties loomed—their sense of partisan alarm learned in the 1930s. In 1952, with a war in the Far East still unresolved, and the cold war in full swing, the sense that the country's welfare hinged on the election nevertheless dwindled drastically and the conditions were prepared for the very low sense of partisan alarmism seen in the 1960 Almond-Verba data presented above.

Part of the political style of the period of

(a) "Do you think it makes much difference or only a little difference which party wins the elections for Congress this fall?" (AIPO, Sept. 1946).

"Do you think it makes a great deal of difference or just a little difference which political party runs the country?" (AIPO, May 1965)^b

1946	1965
***************	•
(%)	(%)
49	39
31	40
11	14
9	6
	49 31 11

⁽b) "Which one of these ideas comes closest to the way you feel about this election: It is very important to the country that Roosevelt be elected; the country will be better off if Roosevelt is elected; the country will be better off if Dewey is elected; it is very important to the country that Dewey be elected?" (NORC, Oct. 2, 1944)²

"Do you think it will make a good deal of difference to the country whether the Democrats or the Republicans win the election this November or that it won't make much difference which side wins?" (SRC, Oct. 1952).

"Do you think it will make a good deal of difference to the country that Eisenhower won instead of Stevenson, or don't you think it will make much difference?" (SRC, Nov. 1952)°

	40	19	952
Very important to the country; good deal of difference	1944 (%) 54	October (%) 21	November (%)
Country will be better off; some difference; it depends	34	40	42
Won't make much difference; no difference	9	32	31

[•] Hadley Cantril and Mildred Strunk, Public Opinion, 1936-1945 (Princeton University Press, 1951).

transition to the welfare state—and, we must add, its brief resurgence in 1964—is the hostile posture of each partisan toward his opponents, something which follows naturally from the view that a great deal is at stake in the political contest. Not infrequently, in such a strained atmosphere, the election seems more of an effort to keep the other man out, rather than to elect one's own candidate. The evidence (not presented here) suggests that the intensity of opposition—except on the extreme fringes—is greater among the defenders of the liberal established order; the threat of deprivation of the welfare state is apparently felt more intensely than the threat which the welfare state, once established, implies to its opponents. In any event, it is our thesis that the politics of consensus is also the politics of support, rather than the politics of opposition. There is some evidence for this in the responses of three national samples to questions almost identically worded asking "would you say you are voting mostly to get one man into office (for 'R's candidate'), or mostly to keep the other man out (against 'opposing candidate')?" In 1944 the oppositional vote was 25 per cent, and in 1964, with the return of anti-welfare state politics, it was 21 per cent. By contrast, in the 1960 election-marked by some anti-Catholic voting, but not by threats to the welfare state and a managed economy, and basically in the consensual style—oppositional voting was only 10 per b AIPO release, May 1965.

[·] Consortium Codebook.

TABLE IV. DOES IT MAKE MUCH DIFFERENCE TO A PERSON'S OR A GROUP'S WELFARE WHICH PARTY WINS?

(a) "Do you think it will make any important difference in how you and your family get along financially whether the Democrats or the Republicans win? How is that?" (SRC, Oct. or Nov. of years indicated)^a Per Cent saying "no difference" or unable to think of any difference (don't know).

,	1952	1954	1956	1958	1960	1964
Presidential elections	(%) 53	(%)	(%) 66	(%)	(%) 66	(%) 66
Congressional ("off year") elections No. of cases	(1799)	65 (1139)	(1762)	72 (1822)	(1954)	(1571)

(b) "As of today, which political party—the Democratic or the Republican—do you think serves the interests of the following groups best: Business and professional people? White collar workers? Farmers? Skilled workers? Unskilled workers?" (AIPO, months uncertain, years as indicated)

Per Cent saying "No Difference"

	1952	1960	1964
Responses referring to own group (business and professional people referring to the interests of	(%)	(%)	(%) business and professional people, etc.)	(70)	(70)	(70)
Middle groups (less class conscious)
White collar	12	15	17
Skilled workers	13	14	16
Farmers	10	16	17
Extreme groups (more class conscious)
Business and professional	11	15	12
Unskilled workers	11	13	12

[·] Consortium Codebooks for election studies of years indicated.

cent, less than half as large.17

These findings and arguments deal essentially with the question of national stakes and concerns, but one might well argue that political life more directly reflects a person's own perceived self interest—at least Campbell, Converse, Miller and Stokes do seem to take this position. This is a fundamental question, for the heart of my argument rests on the view that the Age of Affluence produces, with occasional regression, political contests which do not jeopardize a person's income or economic security. Unfortunately, here, the time series only goes back to 1952 and hence the comparison must rely upon trends within the later era. My thesis, as it turns out, is only partially supported by the evidence, as may be seen in Table IV(a). Where, according to the argument, a slowly growing number of persons should emerge who do not believe that their own income will be greatly affected by the outcome of an election, we find instead, for the presidential years, a marked increase in this sense of "indifference" only between 1952 and 1956-followed by no change at all, a plateau. For the congressional years, a crucial datum is missing for 1962, but the change from 1954 to 1958 is in the expected direction. There are, of course, natural limits to the rise of this "indifference curve" and a counter tendency in the increased level of education in the population, for the more educated are more likely to see the links between their economic well-being and governmental policy. Nevertheless, if one might project these figures backward into time, one would infer, albeit somewhat hesitantly, a lower sense of indifference in the politics of the Period of Economic Crisis to correspond to the greater sense of national stakes we discovered in the earlier data.

^b AIPO release, Feb. 28, 1965.

¹⁷ Consortium codebooks, NORC 1944 election study and SRC 1960 and 1964 studies.

¹⁸ Angus Campbell, Philip E. Converse, Warren E. Miller, Donald E. Stokes, The American Voter (New York, 1960), pp. 205-7.

Finally, there is the question of perceived group or class stakes in a national election. As has often been said, politics is a group process, men often take their cue for party identification by some simple phrase such as "party of the business man" or "party of the working man." Where issues are obscure, categoric group tradition and alignment, mediated through primary groups, is central. The measure for this perception of group stakes in politics, as seen in Table IV(b), is the response to a question on the party which best serves the interests of each of five groups, classified by the group membership of the respondent. Here I have omitted some data on 1962 since congressional years are different in most series from presidential years (these data suggest an acceleration of the indifference effect prior to the 1964 election) and I have grouped the socio-economic classes in two divisions: the more flexible middle group and the more extreme and usually more class conscious group. The evidence, again rather tenuous, suggests that within the middle groups whose class identifications are likely to be less clear, there is a slowly growing sense that neither party will jeopardize the interests of one's own particular class. Even among the unskilled workers who have been the most partisan of any of these groups, this sense of indifference seemed waxing in 1962 (when the "no difference" responses were 19 per cent, a gain of 6 points in two years), only to be sharply cut back in 1964. Since the 1964 election was, as I have mentioned, a return to welfare state issues, the fact that the sense of "no difference" continued to grow at all, compared to 1956, for these three middle groups is a tribute to the strength of this attitude.

The importance of this measure of sense of indifference is, I think, much greater than is indicated by the small size of the groups involved. For if, at this extreme, the group is slowly growing which claims that there are no important group stakes in an election, then, for a much larger group, there must be doubts, inarticulate mood changes, and declining intensity of conviction.

Before closing this section on the declining sense of crisis, declining perception of threat-ened policies that might endanger the country, and declining belief that personal or group welfare is involved in an electoral decision, let us note two implied consequences which do not, in fact, take place. One implication is that people are becoming less interested in politics. Two extensive series of questions have been asked over time, inquiring into people's interest in the elections, and neither of them shows any decline; indeed, the SRC series catching every national election from 1952 to 1964 (except 1954) shows with some variation over the years, a peak interest in 1964 (41 per cent "very much interested") and a marked increase from 1958 to 1962 (from 26 per cent to 36 per cent "very much interested")—suggesting, if anything, an increased interest in this time period.

Moreover, rather paradoxically, no decline has been reported in the strength of party identification. That is, the proportion reporting that they are "strong Democrats" and "strong Republicans" has remained remarkably constant (with a slight increase in "strong Democrats" in 1964). Furthermore, although the proportion of people reporting themselves "independent" has increased slightly—from around 20 per cent in the 1930s and 1940s, to between 21 and 24 per cent in the 1950s and 1960s—the change is very moderate indeed.¹⁹

The consequent pattern emerging, therefore, is of the interested, party-identified citizen, following politics at least as closely as he did in the days of the great intense clashes when the welfare state was first launched and when men were harassed by insecurity and poverty; voting more regularly, and, indeed "personally caring" about the outcome as before; but believing that the national and personal stakes involved were not so great. People need their party identification as cues for voting decisions. For most voters, these identifications are the most significant means of orientation in politics. Hence, people will not give them up easily, and if they did, they would have to find others, such as race, or class, or religion, or charismatic leadership. But people are changing the meanings assigned to their party membership, and increasingly believe that the opposition is not so dangerous after all.

We can apply one test to this theory of the politics of consensus. If partisanship has lost some of its "bite" and acrimony, one would expect the views of partisans of both parties on the way in which the president is conducting his business to vary more or less together. Approval of the way the president is "handling his job as president" has usually been higher than the partisan vote for the president, in any case. But if we could show that the difference between the approval of members of his own and of the opposition party (Republicans for Roosevelt, Truman, Kennedy and Johnson; Democrats for Eisenhower) was less in the Age of Affluence

¹⁹ These findings on "interest," "personal caring" and partisanship are from the Consortium codebooks of the relevant years.

TABLE V. POLITICAL PARTISANSHIP AND APPROVAL OF THE PRESIDENT'S COURSE

"Do you	approve	\mathbf{or}	disapprove	\mathbf{of}	the	way	(name	of President)	is	handling his	job	as .	President?'	,
(ATPO)

Time President		% Support by Pres.' own party	% Support by opposition party	Partisanship of support: Pres. party less opp. party	Average partisanship difference
A. Presidents A	ssociated with Confl	ict over Welfare S	tate
		(%)	(%)
Feb. 1941	Roosevelt	90	40	50
Feb. 1947	Truman	59	41	18	36.3
Oct. 1952	Truman	50	9	41
B. Presidents in	n the Age of Affluenc	e (post-transition)	ì
Jan. 1953	Eisenhower	90	70	20
Jan. 1957	Eisenhower	95	66	29
Feb. 1960	Kennedy	84	55	29	27.5
Jan. 1964	Johnson	85	74	11
May 1965	Johnson	77	51	26

than in the Period of Economic Crisis (including the ambiguous 1940s), our case for historical change would be that much stronger. Since approval and disapproval fluctuate within presidential terms, an ideal measure would take each president at the beginning of his term; but we are forced here to employ the time periods in which the data are given by party breakdown as shown in Table V. By subtracting the per cent of the opposition party approving the president's handling of his job from the per cent of his own party so approving, we have a measure of partisanship.

As may be observed (Table V) from the average figures for the two periods, a substantial decline occurred in the partisanship of judgment, the degree to which the judgments reflect partisan divisions. Moreover, except for the special tragic circumstances bringing Johnson into power—circumstances which produced a burst of sympathetic good will toward the new incumbent—the variation in partisanship in this period is rather slight. It seems to have stabilized (to the extent that any set of attitudes at the mercy of historical events may be so described) in a modest 20 to 29 per cent range. In short, our expectations of the consequences of a consensual politics are generally confirmed.

IV. SOCIAL CLASS

(c) In an Age of Affluence, (1) people slowly lose (or relax) their class awareness, (2) the link between social class and ideology changes; but, (3) in spite of their security and prosperity, people do not increasingly think of themselves as middle class, and (4) social class does not (after a transition period) lose its link to partisan political choice, although the changing political "pivot" diminishes the importance of class voting in many electoral districts.

The absence, in American history, of a feudal structure or a landed class—and therefore of a peasant class-has given it a unique lack of class consciousness, as so many observers have noted. Yet American society has always been stratified and important differences in life chances, honor, and distribution of rewards inevitably enter into the experience of Americans, like others, and have been historically associated with political choice as well as many other attitudes toward society. Different social strata have always been the vehicles or milieux for different social movements, social ideas, and political parties. In the Age of Affluence, we would expect a continuation of past behavior and opinion modified very slowly by new feelings of security, life styles, and perspectives. I stress the slowness because social class, unlike political party, refers to the basic pattern of life experiences, learned early, reinforced daily, and inevitably loaded with emotion.

First, one wants to know both the nature of objective social change and the nature of subjective responses. Briefly, the proportion of white-collar workers has increased by an average of a little less than five percentage points in every decade for fifty years, with a much smaller increase during the Period of Economic Crisis and a larger increase in subsequent years (1940 to 1960). In 1960 43.2 per cent of the employed persons were in white-collar occupations (professional, technical, managerial, clerical and sales).

But, of course, there is a great deal of slippage between objective and subjective class identifications (some estimates indicate that self-misclassification is as large as 25 per cent). and, hence the objective occupational change is not a very good immediate indication of how people will see themselves over time. Measures on this go back to 194520 and 194621 and, after 1952 continue in rather orderly fashion to 1964.22 Any expectation that the increasing proportion of workers engaged in white-collar jobs, and the general levelling up of economic security and income, would produce an increased middle class identification, would turn out to have been wrong; about 40 per cent thought of themselves as middle or upper in 1946, and about 40 per cent again in 1964. In between, the decline in middle class identification noted by Converse in his comparison of 1945 data with 1952 and 1956 data has subsequently been reversed23 and, without finer examination of special groups, one can only conclude in 1965 that this aspect of "bourgeoisification" of society has not taken place. Men appear to be as willing today as they were about twenty years ago to see themselves as members of "the working class." As a nation we are certainly not "putting on airs."

But, as with party identification, it may be that class identification is slowly assuming a new meaning, a lack of intensity, a different reference. Here the SRC series shown in Table VI(a) gives us some clues, though rather slight ones. We would not—particularly just before the 1964 election—have expected much change, in any event; but we would expect a drifting decline in class awareness or consciousness in the sense of "thinking of oneself as belonging to a social class," partly because of the erosion of the intense feelings evoked by the experience of the 1930s, and partly through a change in age cohorts (in 1956 people in their fifties were the most class conscious age group). The time period is short, one of the figures is anomalous and is omitted from the table (in 1960 the comparable figure was 25 per cent), but after grouping contiguous years and thus doubling the sample sizes, a slow increase does appear in the proportion of people for whom social class is not a conscious reference. And if this is overtly true of this third of the population or so, one suspects that the meaning of class is changing for the other two-thirds, as well.

²⁰ Richard Centers, The Psychology of Social Classes (Princeton University Press, 1949).

Converse, in neat analysis, has already given a strong indication that this is probably the case. He relates, for each of the two periods, class identification and certain social opinions dealing with the government's responsibility for employment, medical care, and housing and electricity; and finds that the correlations between class and opinions decline markedly in each case. Moreover, this is true of both objective status and subjective class identification. This is strong evidence for a changed meaning of class identification so far as government policy is concerned. After all, government is increasingly seen as the agent for improving everyone's prosperity.

But would this also be true of attitudes toward unions, organizations which do not have this trans-class role and which, indeed, are often seen as (and are) the agents of class conflict? From 1936 to 1963 the Gallup polls have asked national samples about their attitudes toward unions: "Are you in favor of labor unions?" and "In general do you approve or disapprove of labor unions?" (Responses in contiguous years to these different questions indicate no difference in response patterns.) Three things are most notable about these responses. First, in this 26-year period, some fluctuation has occurred (from 58 per cent approve in 1938 to 76 per cent in February, 1957), with increased disapproval following severe strikes or critical investigations (like McCellan's in 1957), but no long term decline or increase in public criticism or support. Second, at no time has a majority of any group, including the business and professional group, failed to approve of unions. And third, and most important for our purposes, the discrepancy between working class and middle class support of unions seems to be growing, as may be seen in Table VI(b). Moreover, in the eleven years

²¹ Hadley Cantril and Mildred Strunk, op. cit., p. 116 (AIPO).

²² Consortium codebooks (SRC).

²³ Philip Converse, "The Shifting Role of Class in Political Attitudes and Behavior," in E. E. Maccoby, T. M. Newcomb, and E. Hartley, Readings in Social Psychology (New York, 1958), pp. 388-99. The consortium codebooks show the following proportions of national samples reporting themselves as "middle class": 1952: 37 per cent; 1956: 36 per cent; 1960: 31 per cent; 1964: 40 per cent. The 1952 figure includes "upper class."

²⁴ Campbell and associates, The American Voter, p. 357.

²⁵ P. Converse, "The Shifting Role of Class," op. cit., pp. 391-93.

TABLE VI. CHANGING PATTERNS OF CLASS CONSCIOUSNESS AND CLASS IDEOLOGY

(a) "There's quite a bit of talk these days about different social classes. Most people say they belong either to the middle class or to the working class. Do you ever think of yourself as being in one of these classes?" (SRC, Oct., Nov. years indicated)^a

	, ,	(average for 1956 and 1958)		The early 1960s (average for 1962 and 1964)
	Per cent	(N)	Per cent	(N)
No, never thinks of self as being in a social class	34.6	(1241)	37.6	(1078)
Yes, thinks of self as being in a social class	64.2	(2302)	60.8	(1744)
Don't know and other	1.1	(41)	1.6	(46)
Total	99.9	(3584)	100.0	(2868)

(b) "Are you in favor of labor unions?" (AIPO, Oct. 26, 1941). "In general do you approve or disapprove of labor unions?" (AIPO, Feb. 19, 1949; Nov. 11, 1953; Feb. 8, May 1, 1957; Feb. 8, 1959; Feb. 15, May 26, 1961; Jan. 30, 1963)

	F	Per Cent Approve		Index of	Unlikeness
	Manual workers	Business & professional	White collar		Manual wkrs. minus White collar
	(%)	(%)	(%)
1941 (October)	73		. 69		4
1949 (February)	67	65	63	2	4
1953 (November)	81	70	75	11	6
1957 (February)	83	73	77	10	6
1961 (February)	77	64	65	13	12
1963 (January	75	61	67	14	8

(c) "As things stand today, do you think the laws governing labor unions are too strict or not strict enough?" (AIPO, Jan. 15, 1960). "Do you think the laws regulating labor unions are too strict, or not strict enough?" (AIPO, Oct. 22, 1961)^b

1950	1961
(%)	(%)
54	60
43	48
34	35
	(%) 54

[·] Consortium codebooks.

between 1950 and 1961, a modest increase has occurred in the proportion of business and professional and of white collar workers—but not of manual workers—who believe that the laws regulating labor unions are "not strict enough" (Table VI(c)). Such evidence, running contrary to my main thesis (the weakening effect of socioeconomic status upon "ideology") suggests that there may be two themes here instead of one. Social class (objective and subjective) may have a weakening relationship to opinions about welfare state policies but not to opinions about labor unions. Perhaps, in a period when attention turns to questions of productivity and growth, rather than social justice and equality, and when the government, rather than unions, is the main agent of economic protection—especially for the underdog—unions will seem somewhat different to middle class and working class people. If this were the case, it would give us a better understanding of why it is that just at the time when the relationship between class and opinion on the welfare state is (in Converse's measure) weakening, the relationship between class and attitudes toward unions is growing stronger.

^b Erskine, POQ, Vol. 26 (1962), pp. 284, 288 (and AIPO release, Jan. 30, 1963).

But political choices, as we know, are only loosely related to ideology. The facts seem to be as follows: the relationship between social status or class membership and political choice ("status polarization" or "class voting") tended to become closer, as one might expect in presidential elections during the Period of Economic Crisis, at least from 1936 to 1940; then, after a depressed relationship in 1944 due to attention to war issues, the correlation reached a peak in 1948, whereupon it declined in 1952 and again in 1956. At this point it reached a plateau and remained at about the 1956 level in 1960 and, surprisingly, in 1964.26 By Alford's measure (a variation of Rice's "index of likeness")27 this 1956-64 plateau is at about the same level as the starting point of the series in 1936, suggesting that class voting has a kind of "natural level" for a given country in a given period, altered only occasionally by certain "critical elections."

But, while the measure of likeness (or, actually, "unlikeness") which Alford uses and which I have employed elsewhere in this paper, is useful in indicating some elements of similarity, it does not taken into account the level at which these similarities and discrepancies occur. For example, a situation where 60 per cent of the manual workers and 40 per cent of the non-manual workers vote Democratic (index=20), and another situation where 80 per cent of the manual workers and 60 per cent of the non-manual workers vote Democratic, (index = 20) are scored alike. Yet in the first instance, a majority of the manual workers is on one side of the political division, and a majority of the white collar and business and professional workers is on the other, whereas in the second case, a majority of both groups is on the same side.

Let us suppose that the party responsible for innovative institution of welfare state measures, and fiscal and monetary measures designed to level out the business cycle and promote growth, gradually extends its following in the Age of Affluence so that it becomes overwhelmingly the dominant party. This is done partly by a gradual shift in the middle "white collar" groups so that they see the more liberal party as appropriately "their own," and by some defection of business and professional groups, especially among Catholic and Jewish communicants. Our measure of political likeness does not change, but the pivot changes and we have a situation where class voting differences, with their winner-take-all payoff, become less important.

²⁶ The 1944-1956 changes are documented in Converse, ibid.; these, and the 1936, 1940 and 1960 data are reported in the most extensive available study of "class voting," Robert R. Alford's Party and Society (Chicago, Rand McNally, 1963), pp. 103, 352-53. The 1964 figures are based upon AIPO release, December 13, 1964.

²⁷ See Stuart A. Rice, Quantitative Methods in

²⁷ See Stuart A. Rice, Quantitative Methods in Politics (New York, 1928), pp. 210-11.

The evidence that this is the case is strong. A majority of the skilled and unskilled workers have been Democrats at least since 1928 and probably before,²⁸ with a variable minority occasionally voting outside the party (especially in 1952 and 1956). Even these defectors, however, tended to identify with the Democratic party throughout. On the other hand, historically the business and professional groups, the white collar groups, and usually the farmers, have identified with the Republican party, occasionally voting for Democratic candidates, but then returning to the fold-though returning in decreasing numbers. The consequence was that in terms of party identification at the end of the Period of Economic Crisis both parties started about even: in 1940 some 42 per cent of the population said they were Democrats, 38 per cent Republicans, and 20 per cent claimed to be Independents. By July 1964, just prior to the nomination of Barry Goldwater, the count was 53 per cent Democrats, 25 per cent Republicans, and 22 per cent Independents. And the shift seemed to be accelerating: between 1960 and 1964 all major groups became more Democratic, with the business and professional group moving a little faster than average (7 per cent shift compared to an average of 6 per cent) and thus becoming more Democratic than Republican for the first time.29 Thus, as far as party identification goes, all groups have Democratic pluralities, and although proportions differ between social classes, majorities tend to agree.

The difference between the kind of situation where majorities of all major social groups (business and professional, farmers, manual workers, etc.) agree, compared to a situation where the majority of one group is for one party and the majority of an opposing group is for another, is illustrated by the 1964 election.

²⁸ See Alford, Party and Society, pp. 225-31.

²⁹ AIPO releases, Feb. 21, 1960 and July 5, 1964.

In such an election business and union spokesmen (like Henry Ford and Walter Reuther), support the same candidate; the candidate of the dominant coalition assumes a moderating "national unity" tone and his opponent sounds "shrill"; references to class-linked slogans such as "union bosses," and "economic royalists" are muted in the dominant party. In short, the shifting "pivot" of class allegiance implies a very different kind of "democratic class conflict"-even though the index of unlikeness or of "class voting" may remain constant. Within the dominant party, the politics of consensus takes over, while the minority party occasionally reverts to the older politics of economic crisis.

V. RELIGION

(d) In the Age of Affluence, religious institutions slowly lose their influence over men's thought and behavior; religious prejudices and hostilities decline; but the influence of religious identification upon partisan political choice is among the slowest influences to change.

It may be argued that class divisions in politics, and the influence of status upon social and political opinion, are "healthier" for a society than are religious divisions and influences. They are less likely to be "moralized," therefore less likely to be intransigent; conflicts are more easily solved by economic growth and economic change; compromise is easier because the stakes are often divisible and allocable by small units; the controversies are increasingly subject to empirical proof, referring, as they do, to cause and effect in this world. Therefore, whatever one's feelings about religion in its own sphere, a declining influence of dogmatic religion (as contrasted to some Judeo-Christian ethics) on social thought, and of religious affiliation on political choice, might be seen as a step toward a more healthy polity.

Since the space is brief, let us, for the record, summarize some evidence pointing generally, with some exceptions, in this direction. The basic facts on religious affiliation and church attendance are these; the proportion of the population with some kind of religious affiliation increased in the 1920s, remained constant in the 1930s, increased substantially in the 1940s, increased very moderately in the 1950s, and from 1959 to 1962 (the latest date on which I have figures) increased not at all. Church attendance (as contrasted to affiliation) increased in the late 1940s and early 1950s to a peak average attendance of 49 per cent in 1958, and from that time decreased slowly but steadily to 45 per cent in 1964, with Protestants and Catholics moving in the same direction. 30 Since affiliation and church attendance have been higher among while collar than blue collar, and among better educated than less well educated groups, this levelling off and decline are, so to speak, "bucking" the educational and occupational trend. Some perception of this tendency seems to have entered the public consciousness. Asked whether religion is "increasing or losing its influence on American life," the proportion seeing religion losing its influence has recently grown: 1957: 14 per cent; 1962: 31 per cent; 1965: 45 per cent. These changes are late in the Age of Affluence; their political and ideological effects would not be expected to appear for some time.

Such observations refer to the theological or institutional aspects of religion, but the community effect, the identification with co-religionists, is something else.32 This can take a variety of forms, but, briefly, identification with co-religionists in recent years seems to include a declining element of suspicion and declining ideological component. The evidence for this is partly in the changes among Catholics (but not so much among Protestants) indicating greater hope for rapprochement of the Christian religions—ecumenicism.33 Among Protestants, on the other hand, there is increasing support for federal aid to religious schools, thus almost eliminating one of the major bones of contention between communicants of the two religions. National resistance to voting for "a well qualified man who happened to be a Catholic," decreasing over the years, collapsed with Kennedy's term in office (Table VII (a)). Attitudes toward Jews, as measured by the same question, willingness to vote for a "well qualified person who happens to be Jewish." have continuously been more accepting (Table VII (b)). And Jews themselves, a declining proportion of the population, indicate, in a brief series (1956, 1958, 1960) a modestly declining sense of greater "feelings of closeness" to other Jews, compared to closeness to non-Jews.34 The evidence is strong that ideolog-

³⁰ The U.S. Bureau of the Census, Historical Statistics, give the basic data on affiliation; The American Institute of Public Opinion conducts surveys every year on church attendance. The percentages given above are averages based on several surveys a year. Erskine, POQ, Vol. 28 (1964), pp. 671-75.

31 AIPO release, April 18, 1965.

32 See, for example, Gerhard Lenski, The Religious Factor (Garden City, 1963).

33 AIPO release, April 21, 1965.

³⁴ Consortium Codebooks; SRC data from election studies for years indicated.

ical divisions, suspicion, prejudice, and sense of difference, especially as these relate to political matters, are declining.

But not, apparently, the influence of religious identification on political choice. Employing, once again, the "index of unlikeness" (per cent of Catholics voting Democratic, less the per cent of all Protestants so voting), the series is as follows: 1948: 19; 1952: 19; 1956: 14; 1960: 40; 1964: 21.35 The decline of the relationship between religion and vote, predicted by Berelson on the basis of age-group differences in 1948, has not materialized, at least at this gross level. But, as the above attitudinal evidence indicates, the meaning has changed; and as the above trends in affiliation and attendance portend, the institutional reinforcement is likely to decline.

VI. RACE

(e) In an Age of Affluence, the struggle for equality by a deprived racial group will be facilitated by the expanding economy, the availability of governmental resources for special assistance, and the relative security of otherwise challenged and more hostile "opposition" groups. These conflicts will be expressed by the increased militance of the deprived minority group, and the vacillating, often reluctant, sometimes idealistic acceptance of these claims by the more affluent majority.

Racial cleavage, strife and politics are different from class politics in the United States, and, indeed, everywhere. Mobility ("passing"), inter-marriage, ecological scattering, and intergroup communication are much more difficult across race (caste) lines than across class lines; the middle groups identifying now with one side, now with the other are smaller; the role of property and relations of the different groups to the means of production are different; visibility and, hence, treatment by the dominant group are different. Changing group proportions are not induced by technology and the demand for new and different services; rather they are a matter of birth and mortality rates. And, most important, in the United States

³⁵ The 1948 data are computed from Angus Campbell, Gerald Gurin, and Warren Miller, The Voter Decides (Evanston, Ill., Row, Peterson, 1954), p. 71; the data for the other dates are based on AIPO release, Dec. 13, 1964, ³⁶ See Bernard R. Berelson, Paul F. Lazarsfeld, and William N. McPhee, Voting (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1954), p. 70. On the cognate matter of ethnic influences, see Raymond E. Wolfinger and Joan Heifetz, "The Development and Persistence of Ethnic Voting," in this issue of this Review, below, pp. 806-908.

TABLE VII. INDICATIONS OF DECLINING RELIGIOUS HOSTILITY IN POLITICS

(a)	"If your party nominated a generally well-qualified man for President, and he happened to be a Catholic, would you vote for him?"
	(AIPO, Oct. 4, 1963)

Year	Yes	No	Undecided
Contraction of the Contraction	(%)	(%)	(%)
1940	62	31	7
1958	68	25	7
1959	69	20	11
1960	71	20	9
1961	82	13	5
1963	84	13	3

(b) "Would you vote for a Jew for President?" (AIPO, Feb. 8, 1937). "If your party nominated a generally well-qualified man for President, and he happened to be a Jew, would you vote for him?" (AIPO, Oct. 23, 1963)

Year	Yes	No	No Opinion
	(%)	(%)	(%)
1937*	49	51	(excluded)
1958	62	28	10
1960	72	22	6
1963	77	17	6

* Data for this year are from Cantril and Strunk, Public Opinion.

there are only 22 million Negroes, about half of them still in the South. As a consequence, there cannot be a Negro party and a white party, except in some Southern communities; but for a national or a state contest, current trends suggest a division between one party regarded as more friendly to the Negro, made up of Negroes and whites pitted against a predominantly allwhite party. These trends rest in large measure on the wholesale northward migration of Negroes, stemming initially from wartime conditions of extreme manpower shortages and consequent job opportunities; and the repercussions of the migration in the South as well as the North. Under these circumstances, how have the Age of Affluence and the politics of consensus affected the situation?

In the first place, one needs to know whether or not the non-white population has shared in the affluent society. The answer, of course, is that they are still faring very badly, economically, educationally, and socially:

The median income of the non-white population is about half the median income of the white population (1962).

The median school years completed for non-whites is 8.2; for whites it is 10.9 (1960). This understates the difference, for the caliber of education in most non-white schools is notoriously poorer.

The proportion of non-whites in white collar jobs is 17.7 per cent; for whites it is 46.9 per cent (1963).

When, however, we turn to recent rates of change, the picture is a little better, for the Negro rate of increase in median income is about half again as high as for whites in recent years (1959-1962) and also in the war period. Similarly, in the past decade and a half, the proportion of workers in white collar jobs has increased about three and a half times as fast among Negroes as among whites. But in terms of education, there is little difference in rate of change; indeed, most recently it seems the white rate of increase has been greater than the Negro rate. On balance, the Negro has participated increasingly in some of the rewarding aspects of affluence, but for him the term "affluence," comparatively speaking, is anomalous: aspirations are running much beyond achievement, and the current level seems to belie the hopes for full equality.

I know of no available series of questions asked of Negroes over time to indicate whether or not they experience a greater or lesser sense of deprivation today compared to some previous time; whether their anger at the white community is greater or less; whether the frustration expressed in recent riots is greater or less than it was when anger and frustration may have been differently expressed; whether a sense of special community among Negroes is growing or declining and whether or not whites are more easily embraced in this community than they once were.³⁷ But, perhaps these are straws in the wind:

(1) Electoral participation in the South has been increasing for the past 15 years and will now (1965 and 1966) increase dramatically in certain places with federal voting registrars. It has always been high (education and income held constant) in the Northern cities. Where non-voting indicates coercion, the lifting of this coercive force may remove some sources of hostility; where it indicates apathy and withdrawal, the change may mean a decline of these symptoms.

³⁷ Some of these data are available and are increasingly accessible both at the Roper Center, Williamstown, Mass., and Inter-university Consortium for Political Research, University of Michigan, Ann Arbor. Further exploration of these data is needed.

(2) In 1960 a set of extended interviews (by a Negro) of working class Negroes in New Haven revealed, in the midst of hostility and frustration, a kind of non-alienated faith in "Washington" as a reliable (indeed, almost omnipotent) source of help.

(3) Two AIPO surveys in August 1963 and May 1965 revealed in the South (but not in the North) an increase of about 20 percentage points in the Negro group believing that Negroes were treated "the same as whites." 38

I put little stock in these indicators. I suspect the fact that about the same proportion of Negroes in 1946 and 1965 (roughly 70 per cent) believed that the Negro was "unfairly treated" or "treated less well than whites" in his community is a better measure of resentment.39 At the same time, I would expect a substantial change in the quality of this resentment: fear, apathy, self-hatred, and latent hostility in the 1940s and earlier; disappointment, frustration, manifest hostility, ambivalence, and qualified hope, in the later period. One indication of this last quality, hope, lies in the growing support among Southern Negroes for integrated schools, and the high proportion (70 per cent in 1956) of Southern Negroes who believe that "the day will come in the South when whites and Negroes will be going to the same schools. eating in the same restaurants, and generally sharing the same public accommodations."40

The survey evidence is substantial that for the white community, nationally, there is a growing sense that integration in schools (without bussing), residential neighborhoods, and in public accommodations is inevitable, socially desirable, and, with many reservations, personally acceptable. These data are presented in Table VIII. The rate of change is slow, and there are setbacks, now and then; but the series reveals a growing willingness to accommodate to the demands for change of a deprived group. At the same time, variable tensions emerge over the actual implementation of these demands by governmental action (or, probably, over any action by any agency). Thus, when asked "Do you think the Kennedy (Johnson)

³⁸ AIPO release, May 5, 1965.

³⁹ NORC, May 1946, reported in Erskine, POQ, Vol. 26 (1962), p. 139; AIPO release, May 5, 1965.

⁴⁰ AIPO release, March 1, 1956.

TABLE VIII. CHANGING ATTITUDES TOWARD INTEGRATION

(a) "Would you, yourself, have any objection to sending your children to a school where a few of the children are colored? Where half of the children are colored?" (AIPO)

Per Cent "Yes"

Childre	n are	Children	n are
Outside South	South	Outside South	South
(%)	(%)	(%)	(%)
13	72	39	81
7	72	34	83
10	61	33	78
7	37	28	68
	Children Colo Outside South (%) 13 7	South South (%) (%) 13 72 7 72 10 61	Children are Colored Children Colored Colored Colored Outside South Outside South (%) (%) 13 72 39 7 7 72 34 33

(b) "Do you think the day will ever come in the South when whites and Negroes will be going to the same schools, eating in the same restaurants, and generally sharing the same public accommodations?" (AIPO)

South Only

	Yes	No	Uncertain
	(%)	(%)	(%)
1957 (August)	45	33	22
1958 (October)	53	31	16
1961 (January)	76	19	5
1963 (July)	83	13	4

Sources: Erskine, POQ, Vol. 26 (1962), pp. 138, 141; AIPO releases, July 19, 1963 and May 23, 1965.

administration is pushing integration too fast, or not fast enough?" from 36 to 50 per cent have said "too fast." This is a measure of resistance to change, a measure of the lack of strength or salience of the ideal and of the discrepancy between verbal and behavioral support. Perhaps, too, it indicates a response to style or manner of "pushing"—consensual or argumentative and coercive; Johson has fared better than Kennedy in this respect. In any event, this apparent ambivalence and reluctant acceptance indicates exactly those attitudes which, in an insecure, depression-ridden, stagnant society might easily become violent hostility and implacable opposition. The lower income and less well educated people are more resistant than others to integration. What would their responses be if they were fearful of unemployment, less hopeful of the future, more suspicious of people generally and feeling victimized by fate; if, in short, they had the attitudes which we saw had changed with growing affluence in recent years?

How then has the Age of Affluence, shaped for the Negro by a partially sympathetic dominant white majority, affected his politics? In one sense "consensus" describes two aspects of the situation. First, Negroes have, ever since the New Deal, become partisan advocates of welfare state policies. Ideologically, in this sense, they are in tune with the dominant political theme of the times. Second, their partisan party preference has gradually, and with some reversals of direction in the 1950s, shifted toward the Democratic camp so that they are now more partisan than any other major group. In 1964, only 6 per cent voted Republican; nine months later only 9 per cent identified with the Republican party.41 Since there are about twice as many Democrats as Republicans in the United States, again, it seems, the Negro community has adopted the "in" party; in this respect they are in agreement with majorities in almost all other major demographic groups.

On the other hand, this dramatic increase (and it might be viewed with caution since, in the past, the Negro vote has been more volatile than others-more volatile than the manual worker vote, for example), has meant, according to the index of unlikeness, an increase in racial voting and partisanship, at least in 1964 and 1965. In one sense, this is a measure of hostile cleavage, since it reflects the partisan politics and policies of recent years. Moreover, the Republican party, having lost almost all of its Negro following, may come to believe that it is in its interest to stress "states rights," "law and order in the streets," and "voluntarism in school assignments," and other themes with barely disguised white racial appeal; in which case there will be a re-sorting, not of the Negroes, but of some village traditionalists, many Southerners, and some alienated and marginal Northern and Western urban dwellers. The Goldwater trial run for these themes was not encouraging in the North, but feelings on such matters run deep for an uncertain number of people, and the search for a winning theme may lead the Republican leadership in this direction. Then, racial voting, unlike class voting, will take on a new intensity and move away from the politics of consensus.

41 AIPO releases, Dec. 13, 1964 and Aug. 15, 1965.

But, probably, for most white people, neither the Negro's problem nor the "threat" of integration in their own communities (and certainly not elsewhere), is sufficiently important to determine partisan choice. The politics of consensus can go on around this "American dilemma," within sound of the battle but relatively undisturbed by it.

VII. POLITICAL ALIENATION

(f) In the Age of Affluence, there will be a rapprochement between men and their government and a decline in political alienation.

It is easier to make the argument that political alienation should decline than to find the evidence to support this view. The argument, again, is simple: the declining intensity of partisanship implies a decline in hostility toward government on the part of the "out" groupwith, perhaps, a reverse effect and embitter-ment on the "far out" right. Politics, then, deals less with moral absolutes and becomes more a discussion of means than ends;—its ideological component declines. Since everyone is "doing better" year by year, though with different rates of improvement, the stakes are not so much in terms of gain or loss, but in terms of size of gain-giving government more clearly the image of a rewarding rather than a punishing instrument. Taxes, while primarily the instrument for financing government, now also may be seen as instruments for maintaining prosperity and financing benefits for all rather than for redistributing income.

The difficulty with the use of some evidence supporting this is that I seem to have adopted a "heads I win, tails you lose" strategy with respect to the main source of recent data, the 1964 surveys. If these data show a decline in symptoms of alienation, they seem to support the argument that historical trends are thus revealing themselves. If they show an increase in alienation symptoms, they support the argument that the 1964 election was a regression to the politics of crisis. If we had a long enough time series, this dilemma of ambivalence could be avoided by showing a decline in alienation symptoms up to 1964, with a rise at that time.

In one series we do have exactly this pattern. Figure 1 shows a decline from 1952 to 1960 and then a rise in the proportion of (1) people who feel that public officials are indifferent to what "people like me think," and (2) those who believe "people like me don't have any say about what the government does," and (3) those for whom politics and government are "too com-

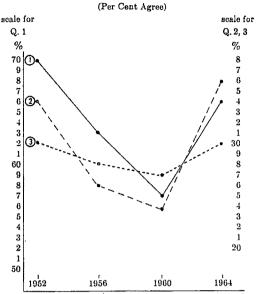

FIGURE 1. Decline and Rise of Political Alienation

- Q. 1. "Sometimes politics and government seem so complicated that a person like me can't really understand what's going on."
- Q. 2. "I don't think public officials care what people like me think."
- Q. 3. "People like me don't have any say about what the government does."

Source: SRC questions in election studies of years indicated, reported in Consortium code-books.

plicated" to understand. The trouble is that I can see no very plausible reason why the themes or personalities of the 1964 election should occasion these particular changes. That particular election might well have increased the crisis atmosphere; it might (and apparently did) increase the salience of "corruption in politics" themes; 2 it might have created new cleavages ⁴² This evidence, based on a comparison between SRC 1958 and 1964 findings, runs contrary to my main argument regarding the increasingly favorable view of men toward government in the Age of Affluence, but supports the minor theme: 1964 as a return to the politics of crisis and alienation. Actually, I think it is a more or less ephemeral response to discussion about corruption in the Bobby Baker case and the Johnson administration more generally. Compare reasons for not wanting one's son to enter politics, reported below.

TABLE IX. RAPPROCHEMENT BETWEEN MEN AND POLITICS: POLITICS AS A CAREER, ELECTIONS AS A DUTY, AND TAXES AS A BURDEN

(a) "If you had a son just getting out of school would you like to see him go into politics as a lifework?" (NORC, Nov. '43, Nov. '45). "If you had a son would you like to see him go into politics as a life's work when he gets out of school?" (AIPO, Dec. 28, 1944). "If you had a son, would you like to see him go into politics as a life's work?" (AIPO, July 20, 1953; March 5, 1955; March 3, 1965).

	Yes	No	No Opinion
	(%)	(%)	(%)
1943 (Nov.)	18	69	13
1944 (Dec.)	21	68	11
1945 (Nov.)	24	65	11
1953 (July)	20	70	10
1955 (March)	27	60	13
1965 (March)	36	54	10

(b) The duty to vote in elections: 1952, 1956, 1960.

	Per Cent Agree		:ee
	1952	1956	1960
(/7)	(%)	(%)	(%)
"If a person doesn't care how an election comes out he shouldn't vote in it."	53	45	43
"A good many local elections aren't important enough to bother with."	17	13	12
"It isn't so important to vote when you know your party doesn't have any chance to win."	11	9	7
"So many other people vote in the national elections that it doesn't matter to me whether I vote or not."	12	10	8
No. of cases	(1799)	(1762)	(1954)

(c) "Do you consider the amount of income tax which you (your husband) (had, have) to pay as too high, too low, or about right?" (AIPO)°

Per Cent Saying "Too High"

Year	Prof. & Bus.	White Collar	Farmers	Manual Workers
	(%)	(%)	(%)	(%)
1952 (March 12)	74	73	63	72
1953 (March 8)	61	61	55	59
1957 (April 24)	63	69	51	62*
1959 (April 15)	50	51	51	51*
1961 (March 8)	42	50	47	49
1962 (March 11)	50	49	36	51

- * Skilled workers only; in 1957 unskilled workers were 65%, in 1959, 58% saying "too high."
- ^a Cantril and Strunk, Public Opinion, p. 534; AIPO releases as indicated for 1953, 1955, 1965.
- b Consortium codebooks; SRC election studies, October or November of years indicated. These questions were not asked in 1964.
 - Erskine, POQ, Vol. 28 (1964), p. 161.

in society and thus have disrupted the politics of consensus. But why this campaign, at least compared to 1956 and 1960, should encourage a sense of ineffectiveness and lack of responsiveness in government, is obscure. Therefore, in spite of the appearance of a confirming pattern, we must leave this evidence as anomalous.

Nevertheless, as may be seen in Table IX, some evidence exists for believing that in certain ways there has been a rapprochement between men and their government and a decline in political alienation. In the first place, the increase in the proportion of the public who would like to see their sons (if they had any) enter politics as a career, is, I think symptomatic of a growing attitude that political life is both rewarding and honorable. One reason for interpreting this series in this way is the sharp decline in the proportion of arguments against such a career which refer to corruption: from 30 per cent in 1946 to 17 per cent in 1965.⁴³

On the other side of politics, the voter side, note the marked increase in the sense that one "ought" to vote under various more or less discouraging circumstances. These items, taken together, have been called a "citizen duty" scale and one may interpret these data as indicating a reinforced or growing belief that good citizenship means a politically more active citizen. From 1952 to 1960, in the eight possible comparisons over time in Table IX(b), each shows a growth of the sense of citizen duty.

In the argument set forth above, I suggested that attitudes toward taxation should change. The AIPO question, "Do you consider the amount of income tax which you (your husband) (had, have) to pay as too high, too low, or about right?" has been asked many times since 1947. The earlier years are non-comparable for several reasons, and show great variability, but we have data from 1952 to 1962 not only by national totals, but also by major occupational groups (Table IX(c)). The data reveal two things, especially: first, the lack of any substantial association between occupational status and attitudes toward taxation. We have known for some time that working class attitudes toward taxation did not fit into conventional concepts of "liberalism" (high taxes and high welfare payments); this is only further illumination of that point. And second—the point to be made here—is the general decline in a sense of taxation as too burdensome. (These findings, it will be observed, do not include the period of great discussion and final legislative action on tax reduction to improve the state of the economy.) Since opposition to "tax-eaters" and the burdens of taxation have traditionally been symptomatic of alienation from government, I think we may quite appropriately see this set of changing attitudes as a part of the rapprochement between men and their governments.

⁴³ AIPO release, March 3, 1965.

In spite of certain anomalies associated with 1964 data, including a constant state of "trust in government" from 1958 to 1964,44 I am persuaded that there has been a growing state of confidence between men and government, perhaps especially men and politics, during the Age of Affluence. This argument takes on weight when it is placed against the increased life satisfactions and self-confidence examined earlier, the decline in sense of crisis in elections, the changed meaning of class cleavages, the slow drift toward religious harmony, and even the reluctant yielding to the demands for racial equality. The headlines will not show this consensus, nor will the demonstrations at city hall or on the campus, but the ordinary man in the Age of Affluence is beginning to find some greater sense of hope and peace and self-assurance expressed in a less acrimonious political 44 The SRC 1958 and 1964 election studies asked, "How much of the time do you think you can trust the government in Washington to do what is right—just about always, most of the time, or only some of the time." Proportions in each category are nearly constant. I interpret this as a long run increase in trust equalized by an election which stirred up (short term) doubts on the matter. But perhaps it is better to leave it uninterpreted for now.

THE DEVELOPMENT AND PERSISTENCE OF ETHNIC VOTING*

RAYMOND E. WOLFINGER Stanford University

Mass immigration ended fifty years ago, but national origins continue to be a salient dimension in many people's perceptions of themselves and of others.1 Where this salience is widespread, ethnicity plays a major role in politics.2 Ethnicity is often an important independent variable in voting behavior. "Ethnic voting," as I shall call it, has two manifestations. (1) Members of an ethnic group show an affinity for one party or the other which cannot be explained solely as a result of other demographic characteristics. Voters of Irish descent, to take a familiar example, are more likely than other voters of similar economic status to be Democrats. (2) Members of an ethnic group will cross party lines to vote for-or against-a candidate belonging to a particular ethnic group.3

* This article is part of a paper delivered at the 1964 annual meeting of the American Association for Public Opinion Research, Excelsior Springs, Missouri. I am indebted to Martha Derthick, Heinz Eulau, Joan Heifetz, and my wife, Barbara Kaye Wolfinger, for help in formulating my argument, and to more friends than I can mention for many helpful comments on an earlier draft of the paper.

¹ For a recent statement of this theme see Nathan Glazer and Daniel Patrick Moynihan, Beyond the Melting Pot (Cambridge, MIT Press and Harvard University Press, 1963). "Ethnic consciousness" or "ethnic salience" exists when: (1) many people think of themselves, and are regarded by others, as members of a particular nationality group; and (2) such classification is salient. The two aspects of ethnic consciousness reinforce each other.

- ² Conflict among ethnic groups is a central topic in descriptions of politics in the Northeast; see, for example, Duane Lockard, New England State Politics (Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1959). For treatments of ethnicity in personnel appointments see Theodore J. Lowi, At the Pleasure of the Mayor (New York, 1964); and Daniel Patrick Moynihan and James Q. Wilson, "Patronage in New York State, 1955–1959," this Review, Vol. 58 (June, 1964), pp. 296–301. For a discussion of the social and political consequences of ethnic politics see Raymond E. Wolfinger, "Some Consequences of Ethnic Politics," in Harmon Zeigler and Kent Jennings, eds., The Electoral Process (Englewood Cliffs, N. J., 1966).
- ³ A good deal of data to support these propositions will be found in this article. For additional evidence see Angus Campbell, Gerald Gurin and

This article deals with the development and persistence of ethnic voting. The customary theory holds that ethnic voting is strongest during an ethnic group's earliest residence in this country and subsequently declines from this peak as the group's members make their way out of the working class.4 This might be called an "assimilation theory." It sees a direct relationship between the proportion of a nationality group in the working class and that group's political homogeneity. As more and more of the group join the middle class, its political unity is progressively eroded. Along with middle-class status, these group members are said to acquire different political interests and to identify more with the majority society and less with their nationality group: in short, they become assimilated. Presumably the end of the process is reached when group members are as occupationally differentiated as the whole population. At this point they are politically indistinguishable from the general population, or from a control group with similar non-ethnic characteristics, and ethnicity is no longer a factor in their voting behavior.5

This is a plausible argument, but it is not consistent with voting patterns in New Haven, Connecticut. People of Italian descent there Warren E. Miller, The Voter Decides (Evanston, 1954), pp. 77-79; Edward C. Banfield and James Q. Wilson, City Politics (Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1963), pp. 230-231; and Lucy S. Davidowicz and Leon J. Goldstein, Politics in a Pluralist Democracy (New York, Institute of Human Relations Press, 1963). Ethnicity is only one variable in voting behavior. This article concerns secular trends in its importance. Many short-term influences on voting decisions that also affect its importance are not discussed here; this omission should not be interpreted as an implicit assertion that these short-range factors are not relevant.

- ⁴ I will use the terms "ethnic group" and "nationality group" interchangeably to refer to individuals whose national origins set them apart from the predominantly Protestant old American society.
- ⁵ The assimilation theory is most clearly and explicitly stated in Robert A. Dahl, Who Governs? (New Haven, Yale University Press, 1961), pp. 34-36.
- ⁶ Data on New Haven are from an intensive study of that city's politics conducted primarily by Dahl, William H. Flanigan, Nelson W. Polsby, comprise about one-third of the city's population. Although the Italians are the poorest segment of the white population, they are also one of the strongest Republican voting blocs. If the assimilation theory held in New Haven, this Italian Republicanism would have been strongest some generations ago when Italians first settled there in numbers, and would have declined with the passage of time. But the overwhelming support that New Haven Italians give to the Republican party is a development of the past 25 years. It began when the first New Haven Italian candidate for a major city office won the Republican mayoralty nomination. Since then Italians have been the mainstay of Republican voting strength in New Haven, even in elections with no Italian candidates.

These events may not be as anomalous as they seem. They can be explained by a theory that may also be pertinent to many other places. I will discuss this alternate theory after a detailed description of the development of ethnic voting in New Haven. Finally, I will consider available evidence on the persistence of ethnic voting.

I. THE CONDITIONS OF ETHNIC POLITICS

The history of nationality group relations in New Haven is from all accounts typical of many industrial cities in the Northeastern states. In the course of the 19th and early 20th centuries the descendants of New Haven's original Anglo-Saxon Protestant settlers were outnumbered by waves of immigrants from Ireland and later from Southern and Eastern Europe. By 1910, according to the census data, twothirds of the population were first- or secondgeneration Americans; in 1960 some 42 per cent of the population were in these categories. More detailed information on the ethnic composition of the population comes from a sample survey of 525 registered voters conducted in the summer of 1959.7 White Protestants comprised less than 20 per cent of this sample; 31 per cent of the respondents were born in Italy or were in the second or third generation of Italian immigrants. Eleven per cent were of similarly recent Irish origin, 8 9 per cent were Negroes; and 15 per cent were Jews.

Beginning with the first mass Irish immigration the old settlers met the non-Protestant newcomers with hostility, economic exploitation, and religious discrimination. The immigrants were usually penniless and could get only the least desirable jobs. The affronts of everyday life enhanced their ethnic consciousness; so did the obvious gap in well-being between them and the old settlers.

In addition to Yankee hostility, other forces tended to maintain ethnic solidarity. For European peasants trying to live in an American city, a familiar language, religion and culture were comforting when so much else was different. Members of any given nationality group usually settled in the same neighborhoods, lived together and married among their kind and not with Yankees or other immigrants, formed nationality associations, and worshipped in national churches.

Needless to say, the ethnics often responded to the Yankees with a hatred that has not yet vanished, while many Yankees continue to look down on the ethnics. Members of each of the major ethnic groups still regard the others with varying amounts of good will, of jealousy and suspicion. As the years have passed, the immigrants and their descendants have moved, in varying numbers, into the middle class. This economic mobility did not result in equivalent geographical dispersion, in part because some of the new prosperity came from neighborhood enterprises such as groceries and mortuaries, in part because of the continuing comforts of ethnic proximity.

One consequence of this history is a persistent emphasis on ethnic differences, which continue to be a major organizing principle in the city's social structure. There are, for example, no less than six Junior Leagues in New Haven, including one each for the not very numerous local young ladies of Swedish and Danish extraction. There are also Jewish organizations with similar functions but different names. The and Raymond E. Wolfinger. It is reported ibid.; and in Polsby, Community Power and Political Theory (New Haven, Yale University Press, 1963), ch. 4; and Wolfinger, The Politics of Progress (New Haven, Yale University Press, forthcoming).

⁷ The sample was randomly chosen from voting lists. Sampling procedures are described in greater detail in Dahl, pp. 338-339. The survey was directed by William H. Flanigan.

⁸ This figure undoubtedly underrepresents the number of Irish in New Haven, since 83% of all Irish immigrants came to the United States before 1900; see U. S. Bureau of the Census, Statistical Abstract of the United States: 1955 (Washington, 1955), p. 95.

⁹ August B. Hollingshead and Frederick C. Redlich, Social Class and Mental Illness (New York, 1958), pp. 64-65. These authors report that ethnic identification divides New Haven's social structure "horizontally" just as economic distinctions organize it "vertically."

major Catholic ethnic groups have their own national churches.

Ethnic consciousness is an important and pronounced regional characteristic. It is difficult to suggest an objective measure for comparing ethnic salience, much less to find data on this subject, but on the basis of impressionistic evidence it appears that concern with national origins is much greater in the Northeast than in some other parts of the country. The reasons for this regional difference are not immediately apparent. The numerical prevalence of ethnics does not account for it, for the major cities of the West Coast have sizable ethnic populations.10 San Francisco has about the same proportion of first- and second-generation Americans as New Haven (43 as against 42 per cent) but there is no comparison between the two cities with respect to ethnic salience.11

This regional difference may be due to the fact that in the Northeast the non-British immigrants came to settled communities with relatively stable class structures and systems of status ascription. Only menial jobs were open to them. The distribution of economic rewards and opportunities reinforced the unambiguous class system. On the other hand, immigrants came to the West at the same time as the Yankees, or on their heels. "The Forty-Niners came from all parts of the world, and foreign accents

¹⁰ This table, taken from Banfield and Wilson, op. cit., p. 39, shows the proportion of first- and second-generation Americans in cities with more than 500,000 population in 1960:

Rank	City	%	Rank	City	%
1	New York	48.6	12	Philadelphia	29.1
2	Boston	45.5	13	San Antonio	24.0
3	San Francisco	43.5	14	San Diego	21.5
4	Chicago	35.9	15	Baltimore	14.8
5	Buffalo	35.4	16	St. Louis	14.1
6	Los Angeles	32.6	17	Washington	12.6
7	Detroit	32.2	18	Cincinnati	12.0
8	Seattle	31.4	19	Houston	9.7
9	Cleveland	30.9	20	New Orleans	8.6
10	Pittsburgh	30.3	21	Dallas	6.9
11	Milwaukee	30.0

There are some regional differences in the national origins of these ethnic populations; the Western cities tend to have more Scandinavians, for example. On the other hand, San Francisco, for one, has sizable Irish and Italian groups.

¹¹ For similar observations about regional differences see Glazer and Moynihan, op. cit., pp. 10, 250. They mention an alternate explanation: residents of western cities moved there after living in the East, hence they are less conscious of their European origins.

This point about regional differences applies only to concern about national origins among whites and does not deal with racial prejudice. were as common in the mining camps as American ones."¹² The two groups shared the same pioneering experiences¹³ and lived in communities with wildly fluctuating economies and unsettled social systems. Economic advantage was not so closely associated with ethnicity, and class distinctions were not so rigid.

The immigrants in New England were equal to the older settlers in only one relevant respect: they could vote. Little in their previous experience suggested that their opinions had much to do with government, and so their votes had no abstract value to them. But these votes mattered to American politicians, who solicited them with advice, favors, petty gifts, and jobs.

Two typical loci of immigrant politicization were the bosses of casual labor gangs on public works, who owed their positions to their ability to deliver their gangs' votes and their vote-delivering ability to their command of jobs; and the leaders of nationality associations, usually men who were the first to achieve some economic success. Such relationships set the pattern for ethnic politics. Each nationality group in a city had leaders who bargained with politicians, trading their followers' votes for money, favors, and jobs. For their part the politicians found it convenient and efficient to classify the electorate by ethnicity and to dispense rewards on this basis.

The tangible political rewards were limited. Not everyone could be given a job or a Christmas basket. Nor did everyone want such things; or need to get a son out of jail, or a relative into the United States, or a pushcart license from City Hall. But when one Italian was appointed to a public position his success was enjoyed vicariously by other Italians; it was "recognition" of the worth of the Italians. Ethnic solidarity let politicians economize on the indulgences they bestowed. It was unnecessary to do a favor for every individual to win his vote. Rewards given to the few were appreciated by the many. Money or jobs given to a few leaders

¹² Louis Berg, "Peddlers in Eldorado," Commentary, July, 1965, p. 64.

¹³ This shared experience is thought to be the reason for the inclusion of Jews in San Francisco high society: "the early Jews in the West could boast that they were pioneers among pioneers" (ibid., p. 65).

¹⁴ For a description of these social patterns see Oscar Handlin, The Uprooted (Boston, 1952), chs. 7, 8.

¹⁵ An excellent description of ethnic politics that expresses the style and flavor of these negotiations may be found in William F. Whyte, Street Corner Society, enlarged edition (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1955).

earned political returns in two ways: (1) through the votes that the recipient could deliver directly; and (2) through appreciation of the "recognition" he had earned. Public office was much the most effective such reward, for it was most visible and hence conveyed most glory.¹⁶

Certain of New Haven's other political characteristics were (and are) conducive to ethnic politics. In particular, the city's wards were small enough to be ethnically homogeneous. Politicians need schemes for classifying voters and they tend to look for such taxonomies in election returns. In New Haven the ward is the politicians' unit of electoral analysis, which facilitates explaining the outcome of elections on the basis of ethnic preferences.17 Since results were understood in ethnic terms, strategies were developed in the same terms. Politicians appealed to the electorate on the basis of ethnic rather than class differences. Moreover, many local political issues concerned the allocation of governmental services and facilities among different neighborhoods, and so contests for these rewards could also be interpreted as competition among ethnic groups.

For many years the urban immigrants were mostly Irish and the "outside" politicians were Yankees. In addition to minor rewards for many people, politics offered a few immigrants a path to real wealth and power, a path that was all the more important because prejudice and lack of education drastically narrowed the chances of a lucrative career in legitimate business or the professions. By the time later waves of immigrants arrived, the Irish had attained considerable political influence, largely in the Democratic party. Where this happened they replaced or joined the "outside" politicians with whom the leaders of newer ethnic groups bargained.

II. ETHNIC POLITICS IN NEW HAVEN

The first Irishman was elected to the New Haven Board of Aldermen in 1857. Henceforth 16 Lowi suggests that, unlike success in other fields, political eminence has a strong impact on ethnic perspectives: "Success in economic fields is highly individualized; . . . there is relatively little group symbolization of success. In contrast, political success, particularly in the big cities, is symbolized very highly in group terms" (op. cit., p. 46).

¹⁷ The present Mayor of New Haven was one of the first politicians to make use of professional sample surveys of the electorate. Data from the surveys he commissions are analyzed by ethnic group, rather than income, occupation, or education.

Irishmen and other ethnics held municipal office in increasing numbers. Democratic mayoralty candidates continued for a while to be Yankee businessmen, demographically indistinguishable from their Republican opponents. The election of 1899 marked the end of Yankee dominance in local politics. Cornelius Driscoll, born in County Cork, was elected mayor on the Democratic ticket. As the Irish subsequently strengthened their hold on the party, some Yankee Democrats defected to the Republicans.

The Irish were not reluctant to take the spoils of victory. In the early 1930s firstand second-generation Irishmen comprised 13 per cent of a sample of 1600 family heads in New Haven, but they accounted for 49 per cent of all governmental jobs. The Italians suffered most of all from Irish chauvinism: there were zo government employees among the 27 per cent of the sample who were Italian.18 These survey data exaggerate the Italians' exclusion from political rewards, but not by very much. In 1930 the proportion of Italians in low-paying municipal jobs was only a quarter of the proportion of Italians in the total population, and the ratio for better city jobs was much lower. By 1940 the Italians had attained half their "quota" of the poorer positions, and only about a fifth in white collar posts.19 Subsequently ¹⁸ John W. McConnell, The Evolution of Social Class (Washington, American Council on Public Affairs, 1942), p. 214. The data are from the Sample Family Survey conducted by the Yale Institute of Human Relations in 1931–33.

19 Jerome K. Myers, "Assimilation in the Political Community," Sociology and Social Research, Vol. 35 (1951), pp. 175–182. Myers estimated the number of Italians in various categories of muncipal jobs from the names in city directories and manuals. The Republicans lost control of City Hall in 1932 to John W. Murphy, a Democrat of the old school. Murphy, who stayed in office until 1946, usually carried the Italian wards, but by somewhat smaller margins than he received in other working-class neighborhoods.

As these findings suggest, there are impediments to a rational strategy of ethnic politics. (1) Party leaders may refrain from cultivating ethnic groups out of prejudice. In much of the East Coast the exclusiveness of Yankee Republican politicians aided the Democrats' proselytizing of immigrants. (2) Party leaders may be reluctant to share political spoils with "outsiders." This seems to have been true of many Irish Democrats. Until a very few years ago, one Democratic ward organization in a New Haven Irish neighborhood would not let Italians participate in any form of campaign activity. (3) There may be principled objections to making appointments on the basis of their representation in both appointive and elective positions has increased enormously.²⁰

The explanation of the New Haven Italians' Republicanism may then be thought to lie here: shut out of the Democratic party, they had no place to go but to the Republicans. This argument has two crippling limitations. (1) The Italians became more Republican during the period when they finally came closer to getting their "fair share" of municipal jobs. (2) Irish control of the local Democratic party is common in Northeastern industrial cities, but the level of Italian Republicanism found in New Haven is not. Allegations about the Republican inclinations of Italians abound in scholarly and journalistic literature, but concrete and systematic evidence for this general proposition is hard to find. Some Italians will split their ballots to vote for an Italian Republican, but the same is true for an Italian Democratic candidate. The best present source of data on this subject is the series of national election studies conducted over the past dozen years by the Survey Research Center of the University of Michigan. I have compared the party identification of the Italian and Irish respondents in the 1952, 1956 and 1958 studies who lived in the New England and Middle Altantic states. As Table I shows, the Italians are a little more inclined than the Irish to consider themselves Democrats.21 ethnicity rather than other forms of merit. For examples of this attitude see James Q. Wilson, The Amateur Democrat (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1962), pp. 283-288. It is quite possible, however, that such scruples are forgotten when the men who hold them actually attain power. Moynihan and Wilson describe the appointment policy followed by the young, liberal, intellectual staff of the newly elected New York Governor Averell Harriman: "... great efforts were extended to 'recognize' certain groups and careful records were kept of the racial and religious identity of the appointees" (op. cit., p. 296).

²⁰ See Myers; and Dahl, op. cit., pp. 43-44. In the 1950s, during a period of Democratic success, Italians held slightly more than their share of municipal elective offices.

²¹ For other data casting doubt on the notion of Italian Republicanism see Lockard, op. cit., pp. 210, 305-319; Samuel Lubell, The Future of American Politics (Garden City, N. Y., 1956), pp. 225-226; Davidowicz and Goldstein, pp. 11-12, 30-32; Bernard R. Berelson et al., Voting (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1954), p. 62; and J. Joseph Huthmacher, Massachusetts People and Politics 1919-1932 (Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1959), pp. 173, 179-184, 252, 260-261.

TABLE I. PARTY IDENTIFICATION OF ITALIANS AND IRISH IN THE NORTHEAST, 1952, 1956, AND 1958

Party Identification	Irish	Italian
	(%)	(%)
Democratic	51	57
Independent	18	13
Republican	32	30

	101a	100
N	152	143

^a Does not sum to 100 because of rounding. Source: Inter-University Consortium for Political Research. I am indebted to Ralph Bisco and Richard T. Lane of the Consortium staff for their assistance.

Since the level of Italian Republicanism found in New Haven is not common in the Northeast, local history is more likely to provide an explanation than are more widespread political events. Two such local causes can be identified. The first was the determined courting of the Italian vote by Louis and Isaac Ullman, the leaders of the New Haven Republican party in the first part of the 20th century. The Ullman brothers realized that the large and hitherto passive Italian population was an untapped source of potential Republicans. They set out to capture the Italians, using the familar techniques of ethnic politics. They helped them take out citizenship papers, registered them as voters, found them jobs, used their considerable political influence to smooth over administrative and legal difficulties, subsidized Italian-American fraternal and political clubs, and so on.

It is not too much to say that the Ullman brothers' foresight and political skill kept the Republican party competitive in New Haven. Although the Italians were the poorest part of the population, they were, in the thirty years after 1910, less favorable to Democratic candidates than any other immigrant group, except perhaps the Jews.²² In the 10th Ward, with the city's heaviest concentration of Italians, the Democratic share of the presidential and mayoralty vote fluctuated around 50 per cent. In fact, the 10th voted much like the city as a whole, a remarkable similarity in view of its residents' modest economic position.²³ The other wards in which Italians predominated were also less wholeheartedly Democratic than one would expect from their low income levels. It seems likely that this situation was due largely to the extent and intensity of the Ullmans' proselytizing.

²² Jews in New Haven, like those elsewhere, tended to vote Republican until the New Deal; see, e.g., Glazer and Moynihan, op. cit., pp. 168-169.

III. CRITICAL ELECTIONS

The Ullman brothers' efforts gave the Republicans a certain advantage with Italian voters. Yet for some thirty years the result was no more than a stand-off; the Italians split their votes more or less evenly between the two parties until the end of the 1930s. Since then they have been very strongly Republican. The big shift in Italian voting habits came when William C. Celentano, a self-made mortician and son of a fruit peddler, won the Republican nomination for mayor in 1939. Celentano was the first New Haven Italian to win either party's nomination for a major city office. He cut 10,000 votes from the enormous majority that the incumbent Democrat, John W. Murphy, had won two years earlier, and came close to winning the election. The Second World War kept Celentano from getting the nomination again until 1945, for the city's Republican leaders did not think it prudent to nominate an Italian while Italy was fighting against the United States. But in that year he defeated Murphy by 6,000 votes.

Celentano's candidacy brought thousands of Italians into the Republican party, as the voting history of the heavily Italian 10th Ward illustrates. In 1937 Murphy received 52 per cent of the Tenth's vote. Two years later, running against Celentano for the first time, he got 22 per cent and fared almost as badly in other Italian neighborhoods.²⁴ Matters improved somewhat for the Democrats during the war, but Celentano's second candidacy produced an even greater Republican swing; in 1945 Murphy won only 17 per cent of the 10th Ward's vote.

²³ Except for the 1928 election, when the 10th was 18% ahead of the city in its support of Al Smith, and the 1932 and 1936 elections, when Roosevelt ran about 10% ahead of the city-wide vote there. In other mayoralty and presidential elections prior to 1939, differences were generally minor; see Dahl, op. cit., pp. 48-50.

²⁴ President Roosevelt's 1940 "stab-in-the back" speech and World War II are supposed to have cost him some Italian votes in 1940 and 1944. Whatever the extent of this loss, it seems to have been recouped in the 1948 election; see Lubell, op. cit., 225-226. For differing assessments of the impact of Roosevelt's speech, see Whyte, op. cit., pp. 230-231; and V. O. Key, Public Opinion and American Democracy (New York, 1961), pp. 271-272.

In 1947 the Democrats tried to match Celentano's appeal by giving the mayoralty nomination to an obscure Italian dentist. Thereby they recouped most of their losses in Italian neighborhoods-their share of the 10th Ward vote rose from 17 to 42 per cent and was about this high in the other Italian wards-but lost heavily elsewhere in the city. Furthermore, a Socialist candidate won a sixth of the total vote and made his best showing in middle-class neighborhoods. Since this was several times greater than any third-party vote in a generation, anti-Italian sentiment may have motivated many of these Socialist votes.25 The 1947 election was the only one in the city's history in which both major party candidates were Italians.

In every mayoralty election since 1947 the Democratic candidate has been Richard C. Lee, a Catholic of mixed English, Scottish, and Irish descent who, for obvious reasons, emphasizes his Irish side. Lee unseated Celentano in 1953 after two unsuccessful attempts. Celentano did not run for mayor again, preferring to bide his time until Lee left the scene. Since then Lee has defeated a series of Republican candidates, usually by sizable margins.

Although Celentano has not run for office for more than ten years, his impact on the political allegiance of New Haven's Italians appears to have been enduring. In a well known article some years ago the late V. O. Key suggested "the existence of a category of elections . . . in which the decisive results of the voting reveal a sharp alteration of the pre-existing cleavage within the electorate. Moreover, ... the realignment made manifest in the voting in such elections seems to persist for several succeeding elections."26 Key called such contests "critical elections." As the following data show, Celentano's several mayoralty campaigns were critical elections with respect to the voting behavior of at least the Italians in New Haven.

Since 1947 the Italian wards have been the ²⁵ The success of the Socialist party in nearby Bridgeport was due to different causes. Capitalizing on public revulsion at corrupt "double machine" collusion between the two major parties, the Socialist leader, Jasper McLevy, won the mayoralty there in 1933 and stayed in office for 24 years.

²⁶ V. O. Key, Jr. "A Theory of Critical Elections," Journal of Politics, Vol. 17 (February, 1955), p. 4.

TABLE II. DEVIATIONS FROM NEW HAVEN CITY-WIDE DEMOCRATIC VOTE BY SELECTED WARDS WITH CONCENTRATIONS OF VARIOUS ETHNIC GROUPS—MAYORALTY ELECTIONS, 1949-61

Year and ethnicity of Republican mayoralty candidate ^a	City- wide Demo- cratic vote ^b	10th & 11th Wards (Italian) ⁰	16th & 17th Wards (Irish) ^d	19th Ward (Negro) ^e
	(%)	(%)	(%)	(%)
1949—Italian	46.6	-21.9	8.5	7.9
1951—Italian	49.9	-24.3	8.0	4.3
1953—Italian	51.9	-27.3	9.0	8.3
1955—Italian	65.3	-21.3	8.1	13.4
1957—Yankee	64.8	-14.4	11.5	14.2
1959—Italian	61.8	-20.2	11.0	16.3
1961—Yankee	53.5	-10.7	15.9	24.3
1950 median family	1110-00000 income	$3301	$2660	83174	$2117
		$2318	$3280

^a In all these elections the Democratic candidate was Richard C. Lee.

b Percentages are of the total vote cast for mayor.

^d Since about 1958 these wards have had an influx of Negroes.
^e Negroes comprised 72% of the 19th Ward in 1950. Increasing Democratic majorities there may be due in part to continued growth of the ward's Negro population.

Sources: Voting returns for 1949-57 are from official sources; for 1959-61, from newspapers. Choice of wards was based on a combination of Census data and political lore. (Census tracts do not coincide with wards. The 1950 Census data were matched with wards, but this was an expensive process and was not repeated for the 1960 Census.) One of the three wards with the highest proportion of Italian-born residents, the 12th, has a dissident Democratic organization and was excluded for this reason. Since the first sizable numbers of Irish came to New Haven 120 years ago, Census data on the birthplace of present ward residents are an unreliable index of Irish predominance. I have followed the advice of New Haven politicians in choosing the 16th and 17th as the most Irish wards.

most Republican ones in the city. Table II shows the city-wide Democratic percentage of the vote in mayoralty elections from 1949 through 1961 and the deviations from this percentage of wards with the heaviest concentrations of Italians, Irish, and Negroes, respectively. As the table indicates, even a Yankee Republican will make his best showing in the Italian wards. In fact, the Tenth is the only ward that Lee has never carried. Since the Italian wards are among the poorest in town, their marked Republican inclinations can be attributed to ethnic voting.

Italian support for Republican candidates has been so lopsided that the customary relationship between Democratic voting and foreign birth is reversed in New Haven. The ward-

TABLE III. DEMOCRATIC VOTE FOR STATE AND NATIONAL CANDIDATES IN NEW HAVEN AND IN SELECTED WARDS

Year and Election	City-wide Vote	10th Ward (Italian)	17th Ward (Irish)
1956 Presidential	45%	34%	51%
1958 Gubernatoriala	69	52	75
1962 Senatorial ^b	65	52	75

^a The candidates were the incumbant Democrat, Abraham A. Ribicoff, and Fred Zeller.

TABLE IV. PERCENTAGE IN WORKING CLASS OCCUPATIONS AND PERCENTAGE DEMOCRATS OF A SAMPLE OF NEW HAVEN VOTERS, BY ETHNIC GROUPS, 1959

	Mr I '. C I	Mar Wor		Demo	cratic
	Number in Sample	Per-	Rank	Per	Rank
47	Negroes	76	1	57	2
157	Italian Catholics	61	2	37	5
53	European Catholics	58	3	48	4
56	European Protestants	35	4	16	6
34	American Protestantsa	27	5	9	7
53	Irish Catholics	20	6	64	1
74	European Jews	15	7	52	3

⁸ "American" here means parents and grandparents born in the U. S.

Source: The table is based on 474 persons (of an original sample of 525 voters) who could be identified by religion and by place of birth of themselves, parents, or grandparents. The percentages Democratic are those who identified themselves as Democrats in response to the question: "Generally speaking, do you usually think of yourself as a Republican, a Democrat, or what?"

by-ward correlation coefficient (Pearson's r) between percentage of foreign-born residents and percentage of the vote for Democratic mayoralty candidates has been negative for most elections since 1937.27

While Italian Republicanism is a product of local politics, it is also expressed in state and national elections. The ethnic voting that resulted from Italian solidarity in New Haven is now manifested in elections where "recognition" of Italians is not an issue. As Table III shows, the 10th Ward (for example) has been considerably more Republican than the city as a whole in elections where neither candidate was Irish or Italian. For instance, ex-Governor Ribicoff barely carried the Tenth in 1958, while in the Irish 17th Ward, where the median ²⁷ Except for the 1941 and 1943 elections, when Celentano was not a candidate, and 1947, when both candidates were Italians.

On 1960 population shifts caused by an urban renewal project began to change the composition of the 10th and 11th Wards. By 1963 a substantial fraction of the old residents had been replaced by newcomers, most of whom were neither Italians nor Republicans.

b The candidates were Ribicoff and Horace Seely-Brown. Source: Official voting returns.

family income was more than $600 higher, he won by a three-to-one ratio.

Most Italians not only vote for Republican candidates, but consider themselves Republicans. Their party identification was changed and fixed by Celentano's several campaigns. Table IV shows the percentages of blue-collar workers and of Democrats in various ethnic groups. Little more than a third of the Italians are Democrats, although they are second only to Negroes in proportion of manual workers.

These tables show why New Haven politicians customarily explain the outcome of elections in terms of nationality groups rather than social classes: the most important lines of division in the electorate are ethnic rather than economic. In fact, ethnic cleavages wash out the usual relationships between socio-economic status and partisan preference. When New Haven wards are correlated by median income and Republican vote in the 1959 mayoralty election, the coefficient is -.02.28 Similarly, there is no relationship between the proportion of manual workers in an ethnic group and the percentage of the group's members who consider themselves Democrats, as Table IV shows. The salience of ethnicity explains the apparent anomaly that the Republican party's stronghold is in the poorest parts of town, while the Democrats draw their strongest support from middle-class Jews and Irishmen, as well as lowincome Negroes.29 Since the two best examples of ethnic voting are the Republican inclinations of working-class Italians and the Democratic affiliation of middle-class Irishmen, the political correlates of ethnicity do not merely represent underlying economic differences.

Plainly, the assimilation theory does not fit the development of Italian bloc voting in New Haven. The New Haven case can be explained by a different view of ethnic voting that I will call a "mobilization theory." I will introduce it by reexamining in greater detail the assumptions of the assimilation theory.

IV. THE MOBILIZATION OF ETHNIC POLITICAL RESOURCES

The assimilation theory is based on the assumption that the strength of ethnic voting depends on the intensity of the individual's identification with his ethnic group.³⁰ The theory supposes that this identification is never stronger than in the early years of residence in this country³¹ and declines thereafter as the immigrants gain some measure of well being. There is another prerequisite to ethnic voting that the assimilation theory overlooks: no matter how salient an individual's ethnic identification may be, it will not influence his voting behavior unless he sees a connection between this identity and the choice he makes on election day.³² How does the Irishman know which candidate (if any) is friendlier to the Irish? The implications of this problem are worth further exploration.

²⁸ The 1st Ward was excluded because most of its residents are Yale students.

²⁹ Dahl has an interesting table comparing the Negro 19th Ward to the Italian 11th. The two wards have similarly low occupational, income and educational levels, yet the 19th is overwhelmingly Democratic and the 11th is very Republican. This is the reverse of their partisan affinities in 1930 (Dahl, op. cit., p. 57).

Established politicians appealed to immigrants with tangible rewards and recognition. While one party may have been more vigorous in its efforts, both parties usually made some attempt to win their votes. These campaign efforts posed a twofold communication problem of pervasiveness and persuasion: how could the party get its message to every ethnic voter, and how could it make the message credible? Only some ethnics would get a job or favor, and only some would know of the recognition given by one party or the other; or, cor-

³⁰ Cf. Berelson et al., op.cit., pp. 67-72; and Angus Campbell et al., The American Voter (New York, 1960), ch. 12.

³¹ This may be a dubious assumption, although it is not crucial to my argument. There are indications that the previous identification of many immigrants was not with the old nation, but the old village or old province. In this view, it was not until the immigrants saw that Americans classified them by nationality that they themselves developed some sense of belonging to a nationality group.

One could also argue that, whatever the locale of his previous identity, the immigrant's first impulse was to forget this old identity and become an American, but that he was forced back into ethnic consciousness by old-settler prejudice. Recurring nativist phenomena like Know-Nothingism, the Ku Klux Klan, Prohibition, and the end of mass immigration probably increased many ethnics' self-consciousness. See, e.g., Richard Hofstadter, The Age of Reform (New York, 1955), p. 297.

³² Cf. the discussion of "political proximity" in Campbell et al.: "Groups as perceived objects may be located according to their proximity to the world of politics... at the individual level: as perception of proximity between the group and the world of politics becomes clearer, the susceptibility of the individual member to group influence in political affairs increases" (op. cit., p. 311; emphasis in original).

fusingly, by both. How did the ethnic know which party was friendlier to his people?

Precinct workers who talk directly to the individual voter are the most effective means of electioneering.33 There are no systematic data on precinct workers' activity at the peak of the immigrant era. Contemporary accounts indicate that, in at least some cities, few prospective voters could escape the attention of the political organizations.34 At present the level of precinct work is much lower. In northern cities with over 100,000 population less than 20 per cent of the adults reported contact with a party worker in a single presidential election.35 In New Haven, where both parties have very strong and active campaign organizations, 40 per cent of the registered voters have never been reached by a precinct worker.36

Let us assume that precinct organizations were able to contact almost every potential voter fifty years ago. What if both parties sent workers around? What if both parties had won—or bought—the support of some ethnic leaders?³⁷ No matter how fervently the ethnic might identify with his group, the appropriate political expression of this identification might not be clear to him.

First-generation ethnic groups seldom had many political resources aside from their votes. Many of their members were illiterate; except for the Irish, many could not speak English. At this stage it was easiest for the parties to compete for ethnic votes, for the enticements least in demand by party activists were most suitable for the immigrants. As time passed children went to school, men prospered, and the ethnic group produced representatives with the organizational and communications

³³ Cf. Handlin, "The immigrant might sometimes read an article on such a matter in his newspaper but was less likely to be persuaded by any intrinsic ideas on the subject than by the character of the persuader" (op. cit., p. 211). Such persuaders included, in addition to overt party workers, priests and the types of immigrant leaders discussed earlier.

³⁴ See, e.g., Robert A. Woods, Americans in Process (Boston, 1903), pp. 155-156.

²⁵ Source: data from the 1956 SRC study reported in Fred I. Greenstein, "The Changing Pattern of Urban Party Politics," The Annals, Vol. 353 (May, 1964), pp. 8-9.

³⁵ Raymond E. Wolfinger, "The Influence of Precinct Work on Voting Behavior," Public Opinion Quarterly, Vol. 27 (Fall, 1963), pp. 387–398.

³⁷ Whyte's discussion of bribery indicates that cash can have a powerful, if temporary, distracting effect on ethnic loyalties.

skills necessary for political leadership. There were greater demands on both parties for recognition and the men making the demands were more skilled at pressing their claims. Such demands raised the level of bidding between the parties, for now the ethnics were asking for rewards that were both scarcer and more highly prized by the people already established in the party organizations. The ethnics' ambitions were resisted by those who would be displaced. Because of this resistance and the time it took to develop political skills, a generation or more went by before members of the new nationality group found their way into positions of any visibility and influence.³⁸

Sooner or later some ethnics will occupy party positions. One party will nominate an ethnic for a minor office. Such positions are unimportant, and if the bid seems to pull votes the other party will soon match the offer.30 Most ethnic voters still have the problem of figuring out the "right" ticket to vote for, since it is still not evident which party is friendlier. The ethnic group may be given some unity if it has an unquestioned leader who can deliver its vote to the party with which he has made a deal, but this does not appear to have been a common phenomenon. Customarily, ethnic groups were fragmented, with several leaders, each telling his constituents about his exclusive inside track to the political bigwigs.40

The day will come when an ethnic will win a ³⁸ Cf. Lowi, "The representation of a new minority in places of power occurs long after it has reached considerable size in the population and electorate" (op. cit., p. 39). Elmer E. Cornwell, Jr. reports that in Providence, Rhode Island, "Members of a new group are not likely to appear as ward committeemen at all until some three decades after their first arrival in substantial numbers"; see his "Party Absorption of Ethnic Groups: The Case of Providence, Rhode Island," Social Forces, Vol. 38 (March, 1960), p. 208.

See also Lubell: "The key to the political progress of any minority element in this country would seem to lie in just this success in developing its own middle class" (op. cit., p. 79). Lubell does not discuss specifically the importance of candidacy for major office, which is the key point in any group's mobilization.

³⁹ Huthmacher has an interesting description of this competitive bidding process in Massachusetts (op. cit., pp. 119-126). His discussion makes clear the dangers of such strategies because of the jealousies aroused when newer groups are recognized.

⁴⁰ Prior to Celentano's nomination the Italian community in New Haven was reported to be fragmented; see McConnell, op. cit., pp. 159-160.

party nomination for a major elective office.41 When this happens the problems of pervasiveness and persuasion will be solved for many of his fellow ethnics. They will all see his name on the ballot, and many will take this as proof that the party that nominated him is the right party for them because it has given the most recognition to their group. The bigotry that often accompanies a "first" candidacy is likely to enhance the political relevance of ethnicity for the members of the candidate's group.

It seems plausible that an ethnic group will get such a major nomination when adversity forces one party or the other to appeal to new sources of support. This seems to have been the case with Celentano's nomination. In the late 1930s the New Haven Republicans were in dire straits. Some of the state party's leading figures had been implicated in the spectacular "Waterbury scandals." In 1937 the local party had suffered its most crushing loss in any mayoralty election in a century. Coming on the heels of Roosevelt's overwhelming re-election victory, Murphy's 1937 landslide must have suggested the need for a new campaign strategy to the city's Republicans; they had little more to lose. It was in this desperate situation that a member of New Haven's most numerous voting bloc was first nominated for mayor.

Celentano was chosen for the 1939 nomination by leaders of the Republican organization. In 1941 and 1943 the party had come close to beating Murphy with non-Italian candidates and by the summer of 1945 the city administration had suffered such a decline in popularity that Republican leaders were confident of winning the election that fall. They did not then want to give the nomination to Celentano, preferring a non-Italian who would be more dependent on their support. Celentano had to wage a hard fight in ward primaries to win the nomination.

The Democrats had nominated Driscoll, their first Irish mayoralty candidate, under similar circumstances a half century earlier. The great controversy over free coinage of sila For present purposes "major office" may be loosely but serviceably defined as any public elective office which is the central prize in a political system: mayor, governor, perhaps U.S. senator, and, of course, the presidency. Candidacy for minor office does not seem to produce so much ethnic impact, at least where candidates for such positions appear on the ballot below more important ones. This is particularly true in states like Connecticut where one can vote for an entire party slate with one choice. Such arrangements discourage split-ticket voting; see Campbell et al., op. cit., pp. 275-276.

ver had split the party and given the 1897 mayoralty election to the Republicans. The defection of Gold Democrats may well have driven the Democratic leaders of that day to adopt a strategy of maximizing their party's appeal to the Irish.42

The mobilization theory of ethnic voting states that: The strength of ethnic voting depends on both the intensity of ethnic identification and the level of ethnic relevance in the election. The most powerful and visible sign of ethnic political relevance is a fellow-ethnic's name at the head of the ticket, evident to everyone who enters the voting booth. Middle-class status is a virtual prerequisite for candidacy for major office; an ethnic group's development of sufficient political skill and influence to secure such a nomination also requires the development of a middle class. Therefore ethnic voting will be greatest when the ethnic group has produced a middle class, i.e., in the second and third generations, not in the first. Furthermore, the shifts in party identification resulting from this first major candidacy will persist beyond the election in which they occurred.

This is not to say that the growth of a middle class past the point of mobilization will necessarily produce increasing ethnic voting. Nor does the theory state that the resulting alignment is impervious to other political and social developments, or that more than one such shift cannot take place. But it does say that, in a given political arena and for a given nationality group, the development of voting solidarity is a product of leadership; that such leadership requires a middle class; and that such alignments are more durable than the political candidacies that produce them.

The mobilization theory seems to be more useful than the assimilation theory in explaining ethnic voting at the national level. Most members of ethnic groups in big cities are, by and large, strongly Democratic. It is often forgotten that this is a rather recent development. In the early part of the 20th century, when the foreign population of many big cities was predominantly first and second generation, these cities were carried by Republican presidential candidates as often as not. In 1920, shortly after the ending of unrestricted immigration, 42 Lowi, who has analyzed top-level mayoral appointments in New York City from 1898 to 1958, reports similar findings: "It has been the role of the minority party in New York to provice a channel of mobility for new ethnic groups. . . . The dominant Democratic organizations of the twentieth century have made efforts to attract the immigrants, but the minority Republicans made greater use of top patronage for these purposes" (op. cit., pp. 37-39).

the Republicans carried most cities with big immigrant populations. Harding swept New York, Cleveland, Boston, Chicago, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, and Detroit by an aggregate plurality of 1,330,000 votes. The Republicans did almost as well in 1924. But in 1928 the aggregate Democratic margin in these seven cities was 307,000, and since then they have gone Democratic in every election, usually by substantial margins.⁴³

Smith's candidacy seems to have been particularly important in its impact on partisan alignments in Southern New England. Connecticut, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island. with the highest ethnic populations in the country, were also, until 1928, stoutly Republican in state and national elections. Since then they have been in the Democratic column as often as not. Key's article on critical elections demonstrates this point more precisely. Cities which underwent a sharp and durable pro-Democratic change in 1928 had large Catholic, foreign-born populations; cities which reacted in the opposite way were largely Protestant and native-born. In short, the ethnic population of Southern New England has become more Democratic as the duration of its residence in this country has increased.

V. THE PERSISTENCE OF ETHNIC VOTING

I have argued that the importance of ethnicity in voting decisions does not steadily diminish from an initial peak, but instead increases during at least the first two generations. What next? While the assimilation theory may be inadequate for the first development of ethnic voting, what about succeeding generations? Does the importance of ethnicity diminish rapidly with more general acculturation and occupational differentiation?44 Or does it persist as a major independent variable, although perhaps declining somewhat in importance? It is commonly thought that the first alternative is more correct. I shall argue here for the second proposition and suggest some factors that seem to be associated with the persistence of ethnic Useful trend data on this subject are scarce. Data on Catholic voting patterns are suggestive since Catholicism is analogous to ethnicity as a variable in voting behavior. Catholics, too, tend to be more Democratic then Protestants, and this difference persists when income, occupation, or education is controlled—it is not simply an artifact of Protestants' higher status. 45

⁴³ Samuel J. Eldersveld, "The Influence of Metropolitan Party Pluralities in Presidential Elections Since 1920: A Study of Twelve Cities," this Review, Vol. 43 (December, 1949), p. 1196.

44 For a statement of this point of view see Dahl, op. cit., pp. 34-36, 59-62.

The passage of time by itself does not reduce ethnic salience: witness Quebec. Nationality groups seem to vary in their rates of assimilation. Few Irishmen have ancestors who came to the United States after the turn of the century. yet from all indications there are many places where Irish self-consciousness is still very strong—notably in New York City, for instance. But the Germans, who immigrated there in considerable numbers at about the same time as the Irish, no longer seem to be a self-conscious nationality group.46 Catholic preference for the Democratic party does not seem to be a result of the disproportionately heavy representation of Catholics among more recent arrivals to this country. When generation of American residence is controlled. Catholic-Protestant differences do not disappear nor even diminish significantly.47

The passage of time is thought to be associated with weakening ethnic consciousness not just through attenuation of immigrant memories, but because members of any given ethnic group will get better jobs and, after two or three generations, be represented among all occupational levels, more or less in proportion to their numbers.⁴⁸ Occupational mobility is believed to reduce the importance of ethnicity in voting decisions for two reasons: (1) it will produce economic interests inconsistent with ethnic voting; and (2) the mobile individuals will come into contact with a broader, socially

⁴⁵ Berelson et al., op. cit., pp. 61-71; Campbell, Gurin and Miller, op. cit., p. 71; Campbell et al., op. cit., ch. 12; and Scott Greer, "Catholic Voters and the Democratic Party," Public Opinion Quarterly, Vol. 25 (Winter, 1961), pp. 611-625. Berelson's study found that Catholicism was a stronger independent variable than socio-economic status in voting behavior. Like ethnicity, its importance is subject to much short-term variation. For example, Catholicism was much more important in the 1960 presidential election than in 1956; see Philip E. Converse et al., "Stability and Change in 1960; a Reinstating Election," this Review, Vol. 55 (June, 1961), pp. 269-280.

⁴⁶ On the "disappearance" of the Germans see Glazer and Moynihan, op. cit., p. 311; and Moynihan and Wilson, op. cit., pp. 299-300.

⁴⁷ Greer, op. cit., p. 621; and Campbell, Gurin and Miller, op. cit., p. 79. The latter study found that the partisan difference between Catholics and Protestants was as great in the fourth generation as in the first.

⁴⁸ All ethnic groups are not, of course, equally represented in various occupations; see, e. g., Glazer and Moynihan, op. cit., pp. 317-324.

heterogeneous environment that will dilute ethnic salience. 49

The extent to which social mobility alters the political expression of ethnic feelings undoubtedly varies with a number of other circumstances. The voting behavior of the New Haven Irish seems to have been relatively impervious to their changed social status. Although they are almost all in the middle class, their support of the Democratic party is so pronounced that it could not have declined very much as they went from manual labor to white collar jobs. Even when mobility does produce changes in political perspectives, these changes do not obliterate all hitherto existing predispositions. Social change begins from a "base point" of previous habits. Occupational mobility will change the politics of many of the immigrants' children, but it will do the same for old Americans. The net political difference between the two groups may be as great in the middle class as in the working class. This proposition is supported by the Elmira study, which found that differences between Catholics and Protestants in their support of the Republican presidential candidate were actually greater in the middle and upper than in the lower class.50 If anything, social mobility had heightened the importance of religion as an independent variable.

Upward-mobile members of the middle class have political characteristics intermediate between those typical of their old and their new status positions. While more Republican than their parents, they are considerably more likely to be Democrats than are status-stable members of their class. The voting behavior studies have established that as many as four-fifths of all voters identify with the same party as their parents. This is not just a reflection of similar life conditions; the authors of Voting report that most of their respondents whose vote was "inconsistent" with their social class were following parental political preferences.

- ⁶⁹ This assumes that the direction of ethnic influences will favor the Democratic party. When ethnic pressures are pro-Republican, as in the case of New Haven Italians, the problem of predicting the political consequences of social mobility becomes more complicated.
 - 50 Berelson, et al., op. cit., p. 65.
- ⁵¹ James A. Barber, Jr., "Social Mobility and Political Behavior," unpublished dissertation, Stanford University, 1965. See also Berelson et al., op. cit., p. 91.
 - ⁵² Ibid., p. 89; Campbell et al., op. cit., p. 147.
- 53 Berelson et al., op. cit., p. 90. For discussion of the varying strength and characteristics of the relationships between social class and voting behavior, see Campbell et al., op. cit., ch. 13; and

The data in Table II indicate that ethnic voting has not declined in New Haven in the postwar period. Deviation from the city-wide vote by Italian and Irish wards was as great in 1959 as in the 1940s. The smaller Italian deviation in 1961 may be a sign of declining ethnic salience, but it may also reflect Italian coolness to a Yankee Republican candidate, or the first wave of population changes resulting from the Wooster Square Renewal Project. At least in New Haven, all the social changes of the 1940s and 1950s do not seem to have reduced the political importance of national origins.

One contemporary trend that may be relevant to ethnic voting has not been mentioned. Most of the data in this paper describe only those ethnics who have chosen to remain in the old core cities. Their neighborhoods tend to be ethnically homogeneous but economically diverse, with working-class and middle-class families intermingled. It is plausible that those ethnics who have decided to stay in such neighborhoods despite their financial ability to move to the suburbs have stronger ethnic identifications, whether as a consequence or as a cause of continued proximity. What about the ethnics who have moved to the suburbs? They should be less ethnically conscious. Suburbs tend to be economically homogeneous and ethnically diverse; in these respects they are the reverse of the old city neighborhoods. It seems likely that these new suburbanites break off the interpersonal and institutional relationships that sustain and transmit ethnic consciousness. Since group solidarity is maintained by personal contact,54 it is probable that geographical disper-

Heinz Eulau, Class and Party in the Eisenhower Years (New York, 1962). As these books make clear, associations between class and party are mediated by a number of other personal and historical variables. One such is the difference between social class as measured by objective indicators like income, and subjective class, i.e., what the individual considers his class position to be. When middle-class people identify with the working class their political attitudes and behavior tend to resemble those of members of the working class. Possibly middle-class ethnics are more likely to consider themselves working class than are middle-class Yankees. This suggests one mechanism that would modify the political impact of social mobility.

op. cit., p. 74; and is supported by data in their

Ethnic groups may differ in their willingness to move from old urban habitats. Glazer and Moynihan report that Italians in New York, unlike some other groups, seem to remain, generation sion will dilute ethnic salience. At the same time, however, it will help to maintain the solidarity of the urban survivors by draining off those with the weakest ethnic identifications.⁵⁵

There are not many data relevant to these speculations. The American Voter's discussion of suburbanization is tentative and inconclusive, while an earlier analysis of some of the same data produced findings consistent with the line of argument in the preceding paragraph. 56 The most useful evidence comes from Scott Greer's study of Catholic voting behavior in and around St. Louis. He found that, with education and generation of American residence controlled, suburban Catholics were more likely than urban Catholics to defect to the Republicans. 57

Several political circumstances are also associated with the strength of ethnic voting. In general, it appears that ethnicity will be more important in the absence of other plain cues to guide voters' decisions. It is likely to play a greater role in non-partisan elections, where voters cannot rely on the party label.58 But, while party identification may impede the free play of ethnic salience, it also stabilizes and prolongs ethnic voting by providing a vehicle for continuing perception of ethnic relevance. Celentano's candidacy won Italian support not only for him, but also for the Republican party in subsequent elections because his association with the party led Italians to think that it gave them more recognition. Ethnic voting also seems to be less important when some great issue dominates political perspectives, as the after generation, in the same areas where they first settled. The areas of Italian concentration in 1920 and 1960 are substantially the same except where land clearance has displaced people (op. cit., pp. 186–187).

55 Immigration continues to provide a diminished but by no means negligible fresh supply of ethnics. Most of the 2,500,000 people who entered the United States as immigrants from 1950 to 1959 probably settled in neighborhoods inhabited by earlier arrivals from their respective countries.

⁶⁶ Campbell et al., op. cit., pp. 457-460; Fred I. Greenstein and Raymond E. Wolfinger, "The Suburbs and Shifting Party Loyalties," Public Opinion Quarterly, Vol. 22 (Winter, 1958), pp. 473-482).

⁵⁷ Greer, op. cit. p. 621. Even in the suburbs, however, Catholicism is a potent independent variable in voting behavior.

⁵⁸ Cf. James Q. Wilson, Negro Politics (New York, 1960), p. 43.

Depression did in the 1930s.⁵⁹ This may explain the unusually pro-Democratic voting of New Haven Italians in the 1932 and 1936 presidential elections.

The major proposition of this section is that ethnicity is still an important factor in voting behavior and is not eliminated by changes in the economic characteristics of the individuals affected. This is not to say that perspectives formed in the first generations of American residence will persist forever. Ethnic consciousness is fading; it is already faint in some parts of the country and for some ethnic groups. Continuing increases in education, geographical dispersion, intermarriage and inter-group contacts are all likely to reduce ethnic consciousness.

Even when ethnic salience has faded, however, its political effects will remain. One of the most remarkable tendencies in political behavior is the persistence of partisan affiliations for generations after the reasons for their formation have become irrelevant to contemporary society. Key and Munger's article on county voting patterns in Indiana is one of the best-known demonstrations of this proposition. Some Indiana counties were consistently Democratic while others, apparently identical in demographic characteristics, were consistently Republican. The roots of these variations seemed to be the origins of the counties' first settlers-New England or the South: "If one plots on the map of Indiana clusters of underground railroad stations and points at which Union authorities had difficulties in drafting troops, he separates, on the whole, Republican and Democratic counties."60 Key and Munger conclude that for many voters elections are merely "a reaffirmation of past decisions." It seems plausible that this will be the legacy of ethnic politics: when national origins are forgotten, the political allegiances formed in the old days of ethnic salience will be reflected in the partisan choices of totally assimilated descendants of the old immigrants.

⁵⁹ See Dahl, op. cit., pp. 49-51.

co V. O. Key, Jr., and Frank Munger, "Social Determinism and Electoral Decision: the Case of Indiana," in Eugene Burdick and Arthur J. Brodbeck, eds., American Voting Behavior (Glencoe, Ill., 1959), pp. 281-299, at p. 457 n. Similar findings for Ohio are reported in V. O. Key, Jr., "Partisanship and County Office: The Case of Ohio," this Review, Vol. 47 (June, 1953), pp. 529-531; and Thomas A. Flinn, "The Outline of Ohio Politics," Western Political Quarterly, vol. 13 (September, 1960), pp. 702-721.

A METHOD FOR IDENTIFYING ISSUES AND FACTIONS FROM LEGISLATIVE VOTES*

DUNCAN MACRAE, JR. University of Chicago

Roll-call votes are being used increasingly to throw light on various aspects of the legislative process. As long as these votes are neither simply unanimous nor cast purely on party lines, they contain information that can often be rendered more intelligible by the simplification or condensation of many votes into fewer variables or dimensions. The researcher interested in a particular legislative decision can thus profit by seeing whether it exemplifies a more general and repeated type of occurrence. The techniques of analysis used in studying legislative votes are broadly applicable to collegial bodies of many sorts, including municipal, state, and national legislative bodies; party congresses and conventions; the U.S. Supreme Court; and the United Nations General Assembly.1

Two major questions have been asked which lead to the search for different kinds of simplifying variables in this analysis. One concerns the issues that divide a given group of legislators at a given time, i.e., what general matters are being argued about? The second concerns the subgroups of legislators within the group selected for study: what are the blocs, factions, cliques, and the like, whose more persistent existence is reflected by the division on a given vote?

* The research on which this paper is based was supported by a grant from the Social Science Research Council. The computer programs used were designed under a prior grant from the National Science Foundation. The writer is also grateful to the Department of Political Science, University of California, Berkeley, for its hospitality during the period of the research, and to Leo M. Snowiss for helpful suggestions.

¹ Representative articles are S. C. Patterson, "Legislative Leadership and Political Ideology," Public Opinion Quarterly, Vol. 27 (1963), pp. 399-410; L. N. Rieselbach, "The Demography of the Congressional Vote on Foreign Aid, 1939-1958," this Review, Vol. 58 (1964), pp. 577-588; G. R. Schubert, "The 1960 Term of the Supreme Court—A Psychological Analysis," ibid., Vol. 56 (1962), pp. 90-107; H. R. Alker, Jr., "Dimensions of Conflict in the General Assembly," ibid., Vol. 58 (1964), pp. 642-657; F. Munger and J. Blackhurst, "Factionalism in the National Conventions, 1940-1964; An Analysis of Ideological Consistency in State Delegation Voting," Journal of Politics, Vol. 27 (1965), pp. 375-394.

These two questions are closely related. In factor or cluster analysis, they correspond to the analysis of roll calls and of legislators,2 respectively, with the aim of finding clusters of related roll calls or of legislators who vote similarly. Alternatively, they correspond to the study of factor loadings of roll calls as opposed to the factor scores of legislators. The Beyle-Rice bloc analysis of legislative votes, more recently used by Truman,3 is one approach to the second question. In cumulative (Guttman) scaling, the end-product is a simultaneous ordering of roll calls and of legislators; roll calls constitute cutting points between ordered categories, and legislators are distinguished by their placement in these categories.

The purpose of this paper is to present a method of analysis that throws light on both these questions. This method starts from cumulative scaling, but modifies it so as to make its results less dependent on preliminary hypotheses and more comparable with those of factor and cluster analysis. Other modifications of conventional scaling procedures are then introduced to reveal certain types of blocs or factions more clearly. Illustrative data are presented to show the types of inference that can be made.

Let us first reconsider the aims of roll-call analysis. To say that we are looking for issue dimensions, or for subgroups of legislators, does not specify the task accurately enough. It is crucial, in the first place, that the issue dimensions not be forced to be orthogonal, i.e., independent of one another. A central problem in the delineation of issue dimensions is that of comparing one issue-structure with another. These comparisons rest partly on the discovery of different issues in roll calls that took place at different times; but they also depend in an important degree on our opportunity to observe ² The term "roll call" will be used to refer to any division of legislators into two opposing groups on a political issue—including, for example, whip polls and discharge petitions. "Legislators" will refer to members of bodies (or groupings such as state delegations) analyzable in the ways proposed.

³ H. C. Beyle, Identification and Analysis of Attribute-Cluster Blocs (Chicago, 1931); S. A. Rice, Quantitative Methods in Politics (New York, 1928), ch. 16; D. B. Truman, The Congressional Party (New York, 1959).

differences in the degree of association of given issues with one another, in contrast with that between either different subgroups (e.g., parties) or different times. Thus the increasing use of computer programs for principal component analysis and orthogonal rotation of factors, though it has some advantages, has the great disadvantage of obscuring these contrasts. Oblique rotation of factors, when it becomes more generally available to political scientists, will avoid this particular problem; but the method proposed here is a simpler means to the same end.

To say that we are looking for blocs is also an insufficient statement of the problem. Blocs may vote together on particular issues, e.g., the "farm bloc." There are of course general divisions within legislatures, such as inter-party divisions, or within parties, such as the North-South split in the Democratic party; but not all blocs or factions have this character. To avoid prejudging this question, and to reveal issueoriented blocs more clearly, we propose to identify the sets of roll calls on which similar divisions occur, and only then to look for blocs as they may exist on each such set.5 This procedure also makes the resulting picture less dependent on the number of roll calls that take place on a given issue; for if a given division is repeated many times (e.g., in tactical struggles over civil rights), the apparent bloc structure may give undue weight to this division if all roll calls are counted alike.

I. CUMULATIVE SCALING AND COEFFICIENTS OF ASSOCIATION

We begin with procedures for cumulative scaling, which have been used extensively for the analysis of legislative votes. This method

- Most analyses of political data published so far, using analytic rotation by computers, to the author's knowledge, have used orthogonal rotation. Schubert's study (op. cit., pp. 96-97) is an important exception; he rotates to oblique axes based on Guttman scales, and avoids orthogonal rotation on grounds similar to those presented here. Another exception is J. G. Grumm, "A Factor Analysis of Legislative Behavior," Midwest Journal of Political Science, Vol. 7 (1963), pp. 336-356.
- ⁵ In so doing, we no longer assume that such a set of roll calls must be restricted to a single issue. This meets to some extent the criticism of A. Lijphart in "The Analysis of Bloc Voting in the General Assembly: A Critique and a Proposal," this Review, Vol. 57 (1963), pp. 904–905.
- ⁶ For a recent example, see Rieselbach, op. cit.; for a more detailed exposition of reasoning and was originally developed by Guttman for the analysis of answers to attitude questions designed by the researcher. Compared with factor analysis, it has the advantage of making fewer assumptions about linearity, cardinality, and (as we shall use it) the homogeneity of attitude continua; its underlying logic can be explained in non-quantitative terms.

The cumulative scaling model we shall use may be described first in the "perfect scale" case. For this initial exposition, we make the following simplifying assumptions and definitions:

- On every roll call, all legislators of the group being studied cast votes in which they choose between two alternatives.⁸ Unanimous votes of the group are omitted from the analysis.
- On each roll call, votes are classified as "+" or "-" in such a way that "+" on every roll call is positively associated with "+" on every other.
- The proportion of "+" votes on a given roll call, among all "+" and "-" votes on that roll call, will be called p₊.
- 4. We arrange the roll calls in descending sequence of p₊ and assume that there are no ties. Each legislator's "response pattern" is defined as his sequence of votes, classified as "+" or "-" and ordered in this sequence of roll calls.
- 5. A perfect scale pattern may then be defined as a response pattern in which no "-" response is ever followed by a "+". A perfect scale is a set of items for which the legislators under study all have perfect scale patterns.

For example, if four roll calls formed a perfect scale, then every response pattern would fall into one of five types: ----, +---, ++--, or ++++. These response patterns may be designated by the "scale scores" 0, 1, 2, 3, 4, corresponding to their numbers of "+" votes. If the legislators procedures, see D. MacRae, Jr., Dimensions of Congressional Voting, University of California Publications in Sociology and Social Institutions, Vol. 1 #3 (1958), pp. 203-333.

- ⁷ L. Guttman, "The Basis for Scalogram Analysis," ch. 3 in S. A. Stouffer et al., Measurement and Prediction (Princeton, 1950).
- ⁸ Voting systems with three alternatives (e.g., abstention) may often be analyzed by converting a trichotomy into two dichotomies. Votes for a multiplicity of unordered alternatives (as in a Presidential nominating convention) are less easily treated in this way.

who vote in these five patterns are placed in five categories in the order shown, the divisions ("cutting points") between the categories are the four roll calls, in descending order of p₊. Thus the scale ranks roll calls and legislators together. The value of p₊ for each roll call gives the proportion of all legislators who are to the right of that roll call.

So far we have said nothing about absences, "error" votes, or the meaning of the votes and scales in conceptual terms. These questions will be dealt with next.

We first consider certain limited problems of missing data and "errors," to illustrate ways in which cumulative scaling differs from other types of multivariate analysis, particularly factor analysis. When missing data (e.g., absences) occur in what otherwise would be a perfect scale type, and when they do not introduce ambiguity into the decision as to what that scale type would be, they may be replaced by hypothetical votes that "would have been cast"; for example, the response pattern +-000 (0 = non-response) would become +--- and OOO+- would become ++++-. And when a response (+ or -)differing from that in a perfect scale type could be altered in only one way to produce a perfect scale type, this change is conventionally made; if the response pattern was -+++, this would become +++++, and if it was ---+this would become ---.

These observations show that in the treatment of departures from perfect scale types, cumulative scaling does not treat all responses as interchangeable. A "+" vote on a roll call on which the +'s are a small minority (one with low p_+) is not treated the same as a "+" vote when they are a large majority. This distinction between items in different places on the scale will be important to us in interpreting scales.

The fact that not all roll calls need be treated alike is further illustrated by a finding that sometimes occurs in the scale analysis of legislative votes: the issue involved in roll calls at one end of the continuum is sometimes recognizably different from that at the other. For example, a "liberalism-conservatism" scale for the Democrats in the 31st Congress had several roll calls at one end (on which only a small liberal minority dissented), dealing with communism and civil liberties; items of this sort did not appear elsewhere on the scale. 10 This sort of divergence in content between roll calls in different ranges of p₊ can reveal the fusion of special issues into more general ones, the legislative tactics and strategy of the period being studied, or the relations among blocs or groups.

⁹ In factor analysis it is conventional to form factor scores by adding the weighted contributions of items loaded on a given factor; this procedure treats items as interchangeable, in the sense considered here. Schubert, in assigning scores on cumulative scales, also uses an additive procedure (op. cit.); this may be appropriate for matching scales with factors, but it is not the procedure that we propose here.

This possible heterogeneity of content within a scale points to a modification of conventional scaling procedures that will make them more appropriate to legislative analysis. Guttman scaling was initially devised to weed out badly chosen items in a set of attitude questions designed by an investigator to reflect a single underlying continuum or concept. The set of "all possible questions of the same content" that might exemplify this concept, was designated by Guttman as the "universe of attributes."11 When cumulative scaling has been applied to legislative votes, the procedure has usually begun with the selection of a set of roll calls judged to deal with a given general issue. Scaling has been viewed as a procedure for selecting within this set. But the investigator is more liable to errors of judgment with roll calls than with questionnaire items; he may fail to group issues as the legislators did, or even ignore certain issues. Moreover, in searching for issues or attitudes he may overlook certain bloc divisions that were not easily identifiable by common issue content, but which could nevertheless be revealed by the same procedures.

The method proposed here—to search for clusters of similar votes regardless of content—is therefore more empirical and less dependent on preliminary hypotheses or conceptual considerations than Guttman's approach. In making this change, we contend that the structure of legislative votes is a datum for the investigator to discover, not to create. Differences in content of scales at different values of p₊ are important legislative facts that should not be be obscured by method.

Our empiricism cannot be unbounded, however; otherwise it might lead to such absurdities as the selection of an arbitrary group of legislators simply in order to eliminate "error" votes, or the assemblage of a meaningless collection of roll calls for which the legislators in question had scalable votes. The aim of our research is to make general statements about legislative processes. These statements involve concepts and relations between them. Concepts acquire significance by virtue of entering into multiple relations or multiple, empirically concordant, definitions. ¹² Thus the reduction of a concept to a single operational definition would negate our central aim.

¹⁰ MacRae, Dimensions . . . , op. cit., p. 228.

¹¹ Guttman, op. cit., pp. 80ff.

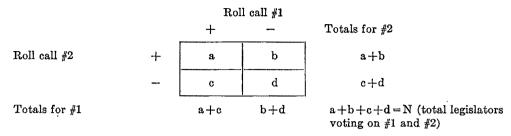

Fig. 1. Fourfold Table

For this reason one must provide additional definitions of "issue" and "bloc," to test whether an empirical cluster of roll calls, or the divisions of legislators on it, represents either of these concepts. Issues will be recognized here from the content of the roll calls involved; a cluster of roll calls may include more than one issue, and an issue may appear in more than one cluster. Blocs will be recognized from characteristics of the groups of legislators separated by a cluster of roll calls-in this paper, chiefly the state and region of their districts. Either of these definitions could easily be extended, while remaining consistent with the concept in question, if other types of information were included in the study.

If bases of legislative division are to be sought through empirical search of a heterogeneous collection of roll calls, the study of overall response patterns (long sequences of +'s and -'s) is an inefficient way to do this. It is easier to compare each roll call with each other. This procedure was presented (for questionnaire items) by Toby and Toby.13 Each item is considered as a dichotomy, and each pair of items yields a fourfold table, such as that in Figure 1. When the two roll calls in question have the relationship of two items in a perfect scale, one cell of the fourfold table will be empty. Suppose that, in Figure 1, roll call #1 has the higher value of p₊. It will then precede roll call #2 in the sequence of descending p+ described above. But from the definition of a perfect scale pattern, given above, no "-" is ever followed by a "+". Therefore no "-" on roll call #1 will be followed by a "+" on roll call #2, and cell b of the table will be empty. This cell is conventionally known as the "zero box."

¹² For further treatment of the last two points see A. Kaplan, The Conduct of Inquiry (San Francisco, 1964), pp. 41, 50.

¹³ J. Toby and M. L. Toby, "A Method of Selecting Dichotomous Items by Cross-Tabulation," ch. 15 in M. W. Riley, J. W. Riley, Jr., and J. Toby, Sociological Studies in Scale Analysis (New Brunswick, 1954).

We then examine all the fourfold tables generated by comparing each roll call under study with each other. As long as the scale criterion is met perfectly, only the presence of zeroes in the appropriate cells need be noted; but in actuality, some degree of "error" or departure from the scale model is usually considered acceptable. We then use some criterion to assess the adequacy or scalability of each fourfold table, and define a scale cluster as a set of roll calls, all pairs of which meet this criterion. This procedure was followed by Toby and Toby, with the criterion that the proportion of cases (legislators) in the "zero box" not exceed ten per cent of the total number of cases in the table.14 This criterion was consistent with the original rationale of error assessment in Guttman scaling, according to which each "error" or vote which departed from the scale model, was to be counted equally in assessing the adequacy of the scale. This notion has been embodied in the coefficient of reproducibility and in other proposed indices for measuring the adequacy of scales.15

One may argue, however, that "errors" between two items far apart in p_+ should be given particular weight; these would correspond to a legislator's voting first with a group at one extreme, and then with one on the opposite extreme. One would then wish to substitute for the equal counting of errors an unequal counting, depending on the distance between the items (c-b)/N.¹⁶ The author has previously done this by means of an exponential model based on latent-structure analysis.¹⁷

¹⁴ Op. cit., p. 343. It was also required that the numbers of cases in cells a and d each be at least twice that in the "zero box."

¹⁵ See, for example, H. Menzel, "A New Coefficient for Scale Analysis," Public Opinion Quarterly, Vol. 17 (1953), pp. 268–280; E. F. Borgatta, "An Error Ratio for Scalogram Analysis," ibid., Vol. 19 (1955), pp. 96–100.

This unequal counting, as well as other advantages, can be obtained by the use of Yule's Q-coefficient. For a fourfold table as shown in Figure 1, Q=(ad-bc)/(ad+bc). This coefficient has several desirable properties:

- a. For a perfect scale relationship between the two items in question, it attains the value +1.0.
- b. If the two categories (+ and -) of one of the items are reversed, Q changes only its sign.
- c. As the table departs from a perfect scale relationship, the error is effectively measured by the product bc. The use of Q weights the number of errors, b, in approximate proportion to the difference in values of p₊ between the two items, (c-b)/N,¹⁹ in relation to the product ad.
- d. The use of Q does not presuppose quantitative attitude continua, either manifest or latent, but can be justified in terms of pairwise rankings of legislators and the probability that these rankings will be consistent between two items.²⁰

¹⁶ It can be seen from Figure 1 that for roll call #1, $p_+=(a+c)/N$, and for roll call #2, $p_+=(a+b)/N$. The difference is (c-b)/N. If roll call #1 has the higher p_+ , this difference will be positive.

¹⁷ See D. MacRae, Jr., "An Exponential Model for Assessing Fourfold Tables," Sociometry, Vol. 19 (1956), pp. 84-94. This method was used in Dimensions..., op. cit.

¹⁸ See G. U. Yule, Introduction to the Theory of Statistics (London, 1911), p. 38.

¹⁹ This approximation is good as long as c is much larger than b.

²⁰ See L. A. Goodman and W. H. Kruskal, "Measures of Association for Cross Classifications," Journal of the American Statistical Association, Vol. 49 (1954), pp. 723-764. An alternative line of reasoning which leads to similar formulations is put forward in M. G. Kendall, Rank Correlation Methods (London, 3d ed., 1962), pp. 3-5. In comparing two rankings, Kendall counts the number of pairs of elements that are ranked consistently, and the number ranked inconsistently, out of all possible such pairs. With either of these approaches, it would be possible to assess a fourfold table not only in terms of the proportional consistency of the rankings it provides (as measured by Q), but also in terms of the proportion of rankings about which a judgment of consistency may be made. If this latter proportion is low (i.e., the proportion of ties is high), as in tables with extreme values of p+, the table may be given less emphasis in interpretation.

Each fourfold table may then be classified as "scalable" or not "scalable," depending on whether the corresponding value of Q attains a specified minimum value. This classification is analogous to similar procedures based on the proportion of cases in the zero box, or on a constant in the exponential model. A dichotomous set of relations of this kind can then be examined for clusters, such that within each cluster all pairs of items are mutually scalable, and no further items can be added.21 The task of searching for such clusters is greatly simplified if they are required to be mutually exclusive; this also avoids some artifactual relations between clusters. The particular procedures used will be described in the next section.

The procedure described so far does not depend on the minimum value of Q which is chosen as necessary for scalability. But because we are interested in placing legislators in relation to response patterns that fit the cumulative-scale model, we normally set a relatively high threshold value. If the incidence of error is too high, the assignment of scale scores to response patterns becomes difficult. The simplest way to realize the advantages of the scale model is to consider only data that have relatively little error. This choice concentrates our attention on certain types of roll calls at the expense of others; in factor-analytic terms, we concentrate on those with pure loadings on the oblique rotated axes, and with high communalities.22 It is of course possible (though not conventional) to set one value of the error threshold in identifying bases of division, and another in choosing subsets of roll calls for placing legislators on scales.

²¹ Computer programs for carrying out this operation are discussed in R. E. Bonner, "On Some Clustering Techniques," IBM Journal of Research and Development, Vol. 8 (1964), pp. 22–32. A related program was written by F. K. Bamberger for the Univac I, and used in exploratory research by the author. A similar program was written for the IBM 7094 at Chicago by R. Axelrod. These programs were costly in computer time, however; the clusters reported here therefore were obtained from the Q-matrix by paper-and-pencil methods, which are believed reliable up to a matrix size of about 150 items.

²² In the House of Representatives, the votes ignored by this choice tend to include a disproportionate number of questions affecting particular areas of the country, such as the appointment of judges for a particular district, the movement of an Army installation from one place to another, or the treatment of an industry whose production and markets are highly localized.

Table I. q-matrix for republicans, u. s. house of representatives, 84th congress*

ļ	8 01 8 8	o
	8 (0	0 × v
	8 8 8 8 6 6 6 6	6 ×
	8 8 6 6 6 6 6	×
	10 10	01 01 0 ×
	10 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0	0 0 0 ×
	6 6 6	e 01 x
	14 10 10 10	5 × ø
1956:	13	×
	ا	*
	% × ,	9
	09 8 6 6 6 ×
	88 80 00 × 10 00 ×
	6 8 6 6 × 1
	× × 8 × × × × × × × × × × × × × × × × ×
	© ∞∞∞∞∞∞	1
	£4 ∞ × ∞
	443 100 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0
	30 30 30 30 30 30 30 30 30	lence, Qmin ters. if that
	29 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0 0	dissiders at eclusic
	82 0 ×	r cent clust y scal
	24 × 60	party had at least 7 per cent dissidence, were members of scale clusters at Q _{min} main diagonal identify scale clusters, the Republicana is the opposite of that te with party.
	24 x x x x	at lead bers o' onal i dicane rty.
	× × × .	y had mem n diag Reput
	53 * * * * * * * * * * * * * * * * * * *
	x x	ich th 31 tha 1 left c ote fo n of v
	10 8 9 9 9 9 9 9 9 9 9 9 9 9 9 9 9 9 9 9	on wh y the ? sers to (+) v ciatio
	O O O O X	l calls ns only num! ttive (
	ω σ σ χ	02 rol retair icized inservs om th
::	ν α × α	*Of the 102 roll calls on which the this table retains only the 31 that a.8. Italicized numbers to left of the conservative (+) vote for chosen from the association of vo
1955:	Ф и	*O thie
	6 8 8 8 8 8 8 8 8 8 8 8 8 8 8 8 8 8 8 8	76 113 114 116 116 129 322 52 64 65
	CQ. no. 1955:	1956:

II. LOCATING CLUSTERS IN THE Q-MATRIX

The basic tool for this analysis is a matrix of Q-coefficients between pairs of roll calls, produced by a computer program.²³ Because we are concerned only with values of Q that exceed a specified minimum value, we omit from the matrix all lower values, and thus facilitate the visual search for clusters. Table I shows an illustrative Q-matrix for Republicans in the House of Representatives in the 84th Congress (1955-56).

Each row, and the corresponding column, corresponds to a roll call, identified by the year (1955 or 1956) and the sequence number used by the Congressional Quarterly.24 Originally all the 102 roll calls on which the Republicans had at least seven per cent dissidence were analyzed in this fashion; but for reasons of space, only the 31 that fell into scale clusters are shown in Table I.25 Values of Q in the table are multiplied by 10. The "positive" vote on each roll call was provisionally chosen as that vote associated with the Republican party, as contrasted with the Democrats; the one roll call in the table for which this polarity was reversed is marked with a dagger (†). The threshold value of Q chosen for this study is 0.8; this value was chosen as high enough to separate distinct issues, but low enough to include a sufficient number of roll calls in the scale clusters to permit inferences about them.

We define a scalable cluster as a set of roll calls, all of whose pairs have associations of at least .8. Such clusters may be found in the matrix by search for symmetrical patterns such as those shown in Table I. When such a cluster exists, the roll calls in it may be indicated by enclosing their diagonal elements in boxes which mark the corresponding rows and columns. Wherever one of these rows intersects another column belonging to the same cluster, the value of Q at the intersection must be at least .8; these intersections are also enclosed in rectangular boxes in Table I. Since the matrix is symmetrical, we need examine only the ²³ See D. MacRae, Jr., "IBM 1401 Q-Matrix and Editing Programs for Legislative Votes," Behavioral Science, Vol. 10 (1965), p. 324. For each pair of roll calls, only those legislators voting on both are counted in the calculation.

²⁴ These numbers are used to identify the roll calls in the Congressional Quarterly Almanac, Vols. 11, 12 (Washington, 1955, 1956).

²⁵ The actual computer printout also indicates the value of p₊, and the provisional "positive" vote (yea or nay), on each roll call. This preserves all the information in the individual fourfold tables except for the distribution of non-voting.

upper triangular part. The largest cluster in Table I is marked "I"; of the eight items in the cluster, seven dealt with foreign aid and one with the debt limit. The debate on the last item included reference to foreign aid.

After the identification of the first cluster, two general procedures are available for finding further distinct clusters. One is to proceed as in factor analysis, and to compute residual associations before repeating the procedure; this method has been used in a set of computer programs designed by Tryon.26 A second procedure involves treating each association in the matrix simply as a dichotomous variable; a special case of this type, which is the procedure used here, involves deleting the roll calls in the first cluster from the matrix, and repeating the procedure on the reduced matrix.27 This decision assigns each roll call to no more than one cluster. It also insures that the actual votes, rather than some mathematical function of them, will meet the same tests for scalability in all clusters and thus permit comparable placements of legislators.

The two next largest clusters among the remaining roll calls in Table I (including seven each) are labeled 2 and 3. All the roll calls in cluster 2 dealt with agricultural issues. Cluster 3 dealt with reciprocal trade; one item in the group (5-43)28 almost entered cluster 1, but 5-52 was preferred to it as completing an eightitem cluster with higher average Q. Cluster 4 (5 items) dealt with the pay of postal employees. Cluster 5 included four items dealing with housing and atomic power. Item 5-22 could have entered cluster 5 as well as 4, but the five-item cluster 4 as shown had higher average Q and was preferred on this basis. We terminate the search for clusters with groups of four roll calls.29

²⁶ See R. C. Tryon and D. E. Bailey, Cluster and Factor Analysis (in preparation). Reference is made to this method in D. MacRae, Jr., "Cluster Analysis of Congressional Votes with the BC TRY System," Western Political Quarterly (in press). See also Tryon and Bailey, "The BC TRY Computer System of Cluster and Factor Analysis," Multivariate Behavioral Research (in press).

²⁷ More elaborate procedures of the second type are presented in Bonner, op. cit. In the procedure used here, ties between clusters of equal size are resolved in favor of the cluster with highest average Q.

²⁸ To designate roll calls by number, we precede the Congressional Quarterly number by the last digit of the year (5 or 6).

29 In general, we terminate after the first six

Of these clusters, numbers 1-4 dealt with clearly recognizable issues, of greater or lesser generality. Cluster 5 may have dealt with the more general "welfare state" issue. None, according to criteria we shall specify below, corresponded to a major bloc division in the Republican party.

Clusters enable us to identify recurrent bases of division in a legislature, and to list the legislators who occupied particular places in such divisions. In looking for clusters we ask general questions and get general answers. The method of cluster analysis that we have described sometimes leads to close decisions in allocating roll calls to clusters. But the identification of the basis of division, and the placement of legislators, are not usually greatly altered by moving a few roll calls into or out of a major cluster.

If we wish to trace roll calls on particular bills and to find what more general divisions they exemplify, another approach is available. We may build initial scales from roll calls related to the bills in question. These scales, or individual roll calls of interest, may then be examined in relation to the more general scales, or to other roll calls in the Q-matrix. In this way the particular bills may be placed in a wider context.

III. THE PLACEMENT OF LEGISLATORS ON SCALES

Once a cluster of roll calls is found, the legislators under study may be located according to their relative favorableness or unfavorableness to the positions considered positive on those roll calls. They may be assigned scores in terms of the conformity of their response patterns with perfect scale patterns. These scores give further information about the meanings of the scales, by identifying extreme legislators on a single scale or deviants in the relation between two scales. Distinctions between bases of division may then be studied with the aid of these legislators' views, as expressed in debates, other communications, or (for contemporary studies) interviews. Legislators' positions on scales may also be related to other relevant variables, such as constituency or career characteristics.

We shall sketch the procedure for placement of legislators briefly, since their positions will be used here only to clarify the relations between scales. It is assumed that positive polarities have been chosen consistently for the roll calls in the cluster. The next step in the procedure is to arrange the roll calls in the cluster scales and ties, if all possible scales containing as few as six roll calls have been found.

in descending order of p+, and to group them into sets marking off approximately equal intervals in the range of p+ from 1 to 0. Not every roll call will become a separate cutting point on the scale, since we permit considerable non-scale response between two items with values of p+ close together. Instead, we use "contrived items," each consisting of two or more actual roll calls; the legislator's "vote" on such an item is considered to correspond to the preponderant vote on the component roll calls.30 An objective procedure is followed for assigning each roll call to a contrived (or ordinary) scale item.31 Legislators' response patterns on these contrived items are then assigned scale scores in terms of their resemblance to perfect scale patterns.32

The associations between legislators' scores on pairs of scales measure the associations between the scales. From the Q-matrix one can estimate these associations by noting whether there are many high Q's between roll calls in one cluster and those in another. But a more precise answer to this question is possible in terms of the associations between legislators' positions on pairs of scales. The index of association we shall use is Goodman and Kruskal's gamma.33 This index includes Q as a special case, if applied to a fourfold table. Gamma (or Q) measures the probability that a pair of individuals in the table will be ranked consistently on the two variables. In a fourfold table. for example, each dichotomy (horizontal or vertical) may be considered as a ranking of all legislators, though with a great many ties. The only pairs of legislators about whom we can clearly say that the information in the two ³⁰ This procedure was proposed in S. A. Stouffer et al., "A Technique for Improving Cumulative Scales," Public Opinion Quarterly, Vol. 16 (1952), pp. 273-291.

 31 In the descending sequence of values of p_+ , any interval of .10 or greater is first marked off as a division point. Then each sequence of values of p_+ between these division points, or at the end of the overall sequence, is further divided if it spans a range of p_+ greater than .15. This division is made by specifying further division points, equally spaced, with intervals as near to .10 as possible. The roll calls falling between each pair of division points then constitute a contrived (or if only one, an ordinary) item. This procedure, while useful for placing legislators, discards information provided by the distribution of p_+ .

³² The detailed procedures are essentially the same as those specified in MacRae, Dimensions..., pp. 321-322.

33 Goodman and Kruskal, op. cit., pp. 749-751.

rankings is consistent or inconsistent, are those who occupy different rows and different columns in the table. If their places in the table are to the upper left and lower right, respectively, these two rankings are consistent; the number of ways in which such a pair might be drawn (in the fourfold table in Figure 1) is ad. If their places are on the upper right and lower left relative to one another, their rankings are inconsistent, and the number of possible inconsistent pairs is bc. Thus the coefficient Q =(ad-bc)/(ad+bc) measures the number of consistent pairs minus inconsistent pairs divided by the total number of pairs about which a judgment of consistency might be made. The same expression may be obtained by reasoning in probability terms.

The index gamma is obtained by a straightforward extension of this reasoning to any larger table comparing two sets of ranked categories. The terms in gamma corresponding to ad and bc are simply the sums of a number of such products of cell entries.³⁴

The associations between scale positions for Republicans in the 84th Congress, corresponding to the scales discussed above, will be shown below in Table III. It will be seen there that foreign and domestic issues arrayed the Republicans quite differently at that time, and that agricultural issues were separate from both.

IV. THE INTERPRETATION OF SCALE CLUSTERS

The example we have presented involves a set of relatively clear and distinct issues, easily recognizable from inspection of the substance of the legislation involved in the corresponding roll calls. Not all sets of clusters are quite so clear, however, and additional principles of interpretation must be introduced before we can proceed to compare the divisions of the two parties in various Congresses.

Our aim in interpreting clusters, as suggested above, is to center attention on bases of legislative division that can each be recognized by a variety of approaches—whether by various statistical methods, classification of issues or blocs by informed observers, or relations with outside variables. The procedure that we propose for defining clusters can in fact yield two clusters that deal with much the same issue, or it can combine two apparently different issues in the same cluster. The ways in which this can happen, and procedures for interpretation, may be indicated by reference to a previous analysis of the 81st Congress.³⁵

³⁴ For an elementary discussion of gamma, how to calculate it, and its relation to Q, see M. Zelditch, A Basic Course in Sociological Statistics (New York, 1959), pp. 180-186.

This previous analysis differed from the present one in three principal respects: it started from conceptual definition of issue clusters, rather than purely empirical definition; it used a different model for assessing the scalability of a pair of items from the corresponding fourfold table; and it set a more stringent error threshold for accepting a pair of items as mutually scalable. In spite of these differences, the broad lines of interpretation resulting from that study are sustained by re-analysis following the method proposed here. Table II presents the relations between the scales identified in the former study and those found in the reanalysis.

The main similarity between the results of the two analyses is that certain issues are represented by very similar scales, completely distinct from others, in both studies. Foreign aid is completely distinct from domestic issues for both Republicans and Democrats; no roll call that appeared in a foreign-aid scale in one analysis appeared in a domestic scale in the other. For the Republicans the re-analysis produces two foreign-aid scales (columns 3 and 7) rather than one, apparently involving a distinction between economic and military aid. For the Democrats there is only a single foreign-aid scale. Agricultural issues also form a completely distinct scale for the Republicans in both analyses (though they do not, in the re-analysis, for the Democrats³⁶). This distinctness of issues is thus a clear and consistent finding with respect to variations of method, if not (as we shall see) with respect to time.

A second similarity is that for the Republicans, domestic issues other than agriculture tend to be divided into two types, which we shall call urban and non-urban. Urban issues are those with a special appeal, on the liberal side, to representatives with urban constituencies—primarily housing and civil rights. Non-urban issues are ones on which a Republican might experience district pressure to vote on the liberal side without representing an urban district; principal examples are labor relations, social security, taxation, natural resources, and civil servants' pay.³⁷

- 35 MacRae, Dimensions . . . , op. cit.
- ²⁶ This finding is consistent with the high associations between the former agriculture scale and the former welfare-state and race-relations scales $(\gamma = +.70, +.79 \text{ resp.})$.
- ²⁷ This distinction was shown to be related to the rural or urban character of constituencies in Dimensions..., op. cit., pp. 266-268.

TABLE II. COMPARISON OF FORMER SCALES AND NEW SCALES, 81st CONGRESS

		Distribution		A. Republi oll Calls in		Vew Scales
			Ne	w Scale No	. and Subj	ect
	1 Urban	2 Non- F urban	3 oreign aid	4 (Patron- age)	5 Urban	6 Agricul- ture	7 Foreign aid	8 D.C. revenue	None	Tota
Old Scale
Welfare state	5	_		1	2				6	14
Race relations	9	4		·	2				6	21
Labor relations	1	7		1	-				2	11
Foreign aid	-		. 8				3	_	3	14
Cotton-peanuts		_				4			1	5
Parity-oleo	_	_						_	4	4
None	7	6	1	6	4	3	3	6		•
Total†	22	17	9	8	8	7	6	6
•		Associ	ations	(γ) Betwee	n Old and	New Scale	5*
Welfare state	77	77	54	46	81	-12	47	52
Race relations	80	71	41	40	83	-08	35	56
Labor relations	59	83	10	59	57	18	08	69
Foreign aid	61	31	97	10	51	19	82	09
Cotton-peanuts	06	11	15	07	09	89	12	-16
Parity-oleo	37	09	63	20	38	44	38	02
				B. Democ	rats
		Distribution	on of R	oll Calls in	Old and l	New Scales
			New	Scale No. s	nd Subject	t
	1	2 Foreig	n (3 Commu-	4	5	6	N	one	Total
	Domestic			nism)	(Rural)	Pricin	g Hou	sing
Old Scale
Welfare state	. 23			3		-	3	:	5	34
Race relations	24			1	1		1		3	30
Foreign aid		9							2	11
Agriculture	2			1	1			-	3 .	7
Oleo				-		-			3	3
None	23	5		4	6	5	1
Total†	70	14		9	8	5	5	.
		Associat	ions (γ) Between	Old and N	ew Scales*
Welfare state	89	56		84	70	39	80
Race relations	95	57		86	75	32	83
Foreign aid	48	96		44	36	24	33
Agriculture	85	71		88	79	27	70

[†] Including a few roll calls assigned to more than one scale in the previous study (op. cit., pp. 324-331).

* With polarity of former scales reversed. Decimal point is omitted.

In analyzing this distinction, however, we observe that the scales in question are no longer perfectly separate in the two analyses. Among the roll calls in the "welfare state" scale of the earlier analysis, five fell in new scale 1, none in new 2; and for the earlier "labor relations" scale, almost the converse was true (one and seven respectively). But roll calls from the former "race relations" scale fell more evenly in both. Moreover, roll calls in these three old scales were also found in new scales 4 and 5. We must therefore reconcile disparities between conceptual and empirical definition of clusters.

For the Republicans, Scale 5 ranked the members of the party in a way that was associated highly with that of Scale 1 ($\gamma = +.86$; see Table III). Moreover, seven of its eight roll calls dealt with bills that were also involved (at other legislative stages) in Scale 1.38 In addition, its associations with other scales of the former analysis (Table II) and of the re-analysis (Table III) were nearly identical with those of Scale 1. We therefore regard Scale 5 as an artifact of the method of clustering used, and not distinct in issue content from Scale 1. We shall refer to such a scale as a "shadow" scale. This is not to deny the possibility of discovering meaningful (though small) differences in legislators' rankings on the two scales, by detailed analysis; but since we have not discovered them, we consider these scales to measure essentially the same thing. A similar problem also arises for the two foreign-aid scales (3 and 7) found for the Republicans in the re-analysis.

38 Further evidence of this overlap arose in the process of cluster identification. A number of roll

The converse problem arises for the Democrats: two conceptually distinct areas of legislation, corresponding to the "welfare state" (Fair Deal) and "race relations" scales, merge in one dominant scale in the re-analysis. This new combined scale ("domestic") is highly associated with both old scales ($\gamma = +.89$ and +.95, Table III). The two former scales were highly associated with one another as well $(\gamma = +.84)^{39}$ and had similar patterns of association with the other new scales. One might ask, then, whether these two areas of legislation should be considered the same or different for the Democrats at that time. This question may be answered in two ways. First, the issues are clearly distinct, and it should be regarded as an empirical statement, not a definition of a new "issue," that they elicited similar voting patterns in that Congress. If they did not do so at other times (and this sort of change did occur for foreign aid), then we need not change our definitions of issues from one period to another in order to describe this change. For this purpose, conceptual definition clearly assumes primacy.40

On the other hand, it is equally clear that similar groups of Democratic congressmen were opposing one another on the Fair Deal and on civil rights or race relations. Basic to this opposition was the North-South split in the calls in Scale 1 could equally well have been placed in Cluster 5; they were simply assigned to Cluster 1 by the preference which our rules give to larger clusters. Moreover, a change in the minimum Q also transferred items from one cluster to another.

³⁹ This was also pointed out in Dimensions . . . , op. cit., pp. 251-252.

⁴⁰ This position was taken by Guttman when he introduced the scaling technique. See Measurement and Prediction, op. cit., pp. 72, 84, 85.

⁴¹ The two issues were not similar in this sense for the two parties combined, however; the Republicans were generally more favorable to civil rights than the Democrats.

party. For analysis of blocs or factions, then, we must recognize that these two major issues were in a sense "the same." This reasoning will be elaborated below when we discuss the relations between scales and factions.

In spite of the problems that result from the application of rigid statistical rules for cluster identification, these rules have definite advantages. In the first place, an empirical search reveals issues that might not have been hypothesized by the researchers. Not only are unexpected issues seen (e.g., clusters have been found dealing with veterans' affairs, with public power in the West, and with public lands), but different bases of division are found for different parties and periods. Some of these issues could have been found, to be sure, by empirical search within narrower "preliminary universes of content," such as that of domestic nationwide issues. But the conceptual procedure risks a lack of objectivity in relation to various investigators' notions of how issues should be classified. This may bias any conclusions reached about the change of issues over time, if the researcher identifies the issues at each period on the basis of a preliminary subjective selection of roll calls.

A second advantage of empirical search is that it is well suited to discovery of bases of legislative division that are not centered about issues. One such example is the distinction between divisions, in a parliamentary system, that center about issues and those that center about the fate of the cabinet.⁴² Another such example is the use of clusters of roll calls to delineate blocs and factions.

V. POSTWAR ISSUES IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

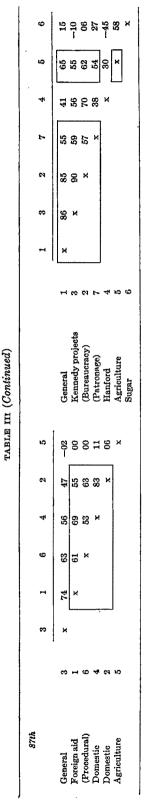

We may now apply the method to a substantive problem: the tracing of issues in the House of Representatives in the two postwar decades. We choose for analysis five Congresses, involving four combinations of party control of the Presidency and Congress: the 80th (D,R control respectively), the 81st (D,D), the 83d (R,R), the 84th (R,D), and the 87th (D,D). The 87th Congress (D,D) is added to permit examination of temporal trends. Associations between the scales found in these Congresses, for each party separately, are shown in Table III.

Consider first the table of associations for the Republicans in the 84th Congress (next to last table in the left-hand column). The five scales ⁴² See D. MacRae, Jr., "Intraparty Divisions and Cabinet Coalitions in the Fourth French Republic," Comparative Studies in Society and History, Vol. 5 (1963), pp. 164-211.

Table III. Association between scales in five congresses*

2	- 11	Republicans			Democrats	rats
X		1 6 5 2 7	4		2	ı	7.0	က
X		x 86 56 60 04 -42 -49 (Draft) x 73 67 01 -42 -45 Foreign aid x 56 -29 -58 -52 Taxes x 66 -29 -56 Domestic x 61 42 Public lands x 70 Rural & communism x 70 Rural & communism	×	17 ×	37 ×			64 62 77 73 ×
1 3 2 5 4		3 7 1 5 2 8 6 4 x 83 64 52 27 05 -16 -09 Foreign aid x 58 47 24 11 -21 00 Domestic x 77 48 -05 -41 (Communism) x 77 44 -18 -60 Pricing x 17 -42 (Rural) x 17 -42 (Rural)	N ×	x 83 x	3 x x	6 42 88 88 × ×		4 48 81 81 x x
Republicans Democratis Democratis 4 x 57 -12 -18 -03 General 1 x 86 79 73 19 x 50 -28 Domestic 3 x 74 61 22 x x 6 x 74 61 22 x x Foreign trade 4 x 59 16 Agriculture 2 Agriculture 2 x x		1 3 2 5 4 Poreign aid 2 x 2 2 2 2 2 2 2 2 2	7 62 81 8 x	68 69 7 89	3 49 70 57 55 x x	6 14 32 32 32 32 32 32 32 32 32 32 32 32 32	4 111 052 112 x x x x x x x x x x x x x x x x x	8 -76 -83 -70 -76 -65 -65 -65 -65 -65 -65 -70 -70 -70 -70 -70 -70 -70 -70 -70 -70
x 57 -12 -18 -03 General 1 x 86 79 73 19 x 32 -28 Domestic 3 x 74 61 22 x x 62 -01 Contracts 5 x 74 61 22 x x -05 Regional 6 x 59 16 x x Foreign trade 4 x x x		Republicans	က	d ^{ro}		4	, ==1	67
		x 57 -12 -18 -03 General 1	88 ×	79 74 x	73 61 59 x		- 21 20 X	- 40 - 17 - 17 - 22 - 22

* Associations are gammas with decimal point omitted. "General" scales include both foreign and domestic issues; "domestic" include both urban and non-urban. Parentheses enclosing a title indicate that fewer than 80% of the items in the scale in question conform to the title category.

for which associations are shown in Table III are the same ones that were identified in the Q-matrix of Table I. Scale 1, dealing with foreign aid, has relatively low associations with all the other scales except that for foreign trade (Scale 3); this association was foreshadowed by several high values of Q between roll calls in the two scales in Table I. The two other scales that form a separate grouping deal with domestic matters: Scales 4 (postal pay) and 5 (welfare state; here classed as "urban"). Scale 2 (agriculture) is relatively independent of the other four.

The table of associations we have just discussed illustrates several general principles of presentation in Table III. First, groups of scales, all of which have values of gamma of at least .5 with one another, are enclosed in rectangles to indicate their membership in "higher-order clusters." Second, the "positive" votes chosen for each scale are those on which the Republicans proportionally exceeded the Democrats in the majority of the roll calls in the scale in question.43 Thus the "agriculture" scale for the Republicans in the 84th Congress has small negative associations with all the other scales, because the segment of the party voting with the Democrats (in favor of price supports) tended to be the most conservative (i.e., to oppose the Democrats most) on other issues. Third, the various scales (rows and columns) are arranged in such an order as to bring their highest positive associations near the diagonal, rather than according to size of cluster (which their serial numbers indicate).

These last two principles throw into relief four scales on which inter-party alignments—often relating to the President's position—were reversed in relation to intra-party divisions. In each case the reversal is revealed by a set of high negative associations between the scale in question and others, placing the scale in a higher-order cluster. First is the Democrats' scale on the draft in the 80th Congress (#4), which we shall discuss below. Second was their "rural" scale in the 81st Congress (#4), on which urban liberals joined Republicans to oppose the Southerners' acreage allotments for cotton and peanuts, as well as the Truman Administration's cutback in postal services. This latter economy move by the Administration also led to polarity reversal on the Republicans' scale #4, though with lower negative associations. 44 In the 83d Congress two more reversals occurred, as one such scale appeared for each party (#4 for the Republicans and #8 for the Democrats) when the Eisenhower administration took liberal stands backed by most of the Republicans, drawing liberal support but conservative opposition.

⁴³ The principal exception to this rule concerns votes on civil rights, on which the Democrats generally voted more conservatively. The polarities on civil rights roll calls were reversed before application of the rule. Scale #5 for the Republicans in the 80th Congress was assigned a polarity consistent with its higher-order cluster; the two of its four roll calls whose polarities were thus reversed were on Republican bills opposed by Democrats and conservative Republicans.

By placing closely associated scales near one another in each table, we arrange issues in a sequence that is broadly similar across parties and Congresses. The issue of foreign aid can usually be placed at one end of such a sequence. and we place it first (top row and left column) where possible. The first scale in nearly every case either deals primarily with foreign aid or combines foreign and domestic issues ("general"). At the other end of the sequence is usually a scale dealing with agriculture or agricultural interests. Between are scales dealing with a variety of domestic issues. When the issue of foreign trade appears, it is sometimes quite independent of the rest, as for Democrats under Eisenhower; sometimes closely related to foreign aid, as for the Republicans in the 84th Congress; and sometimes merged in a general scale, as for the Republicans in the 87th Congress.

In every table for the Republicans, two or more scales involving domestic issues can be found that differ in their degree of association with both foreign aid and agricultural or rural issues; domestic issues more closely associated with foreign aid tend to be less closely associated with aid to agriculture. In most cases, the former scales are recognizably concentrated on urban issues and the latter on non-urban issues (as defined above). Thus the diversity of division we observed for the Republicans in the 81st Congress is a more general characteristic of that Congressional party.

Throughout the Congresses studied, the Democrats in the House tended to be divided in a more unitary way than the Republicans.⁴⁵

⁴⁴ The polarity of Scales #4 for the Republicans and #4 for the Democrats is reversed in Table III relative to Table II. This is because in the previous study, polarities were chosen for intra-party consistency, while they are chosen here to show the relations between internal divisions and interparty differences.

⁴⁶ For domestic issues, this difference between the parties has also been observed in another study of this period: David R. Mayhew, "Democrats and Republicans in the U. S. House of Agricultural issues never merged with others in the principal higher-order cluster for the Republicans, while they merged for the Democrats in the 80th and 87th Congresses, and were so closely related to other domestic issues in the 81st and 83d Congresses that no separate agriculture scale appeared. Similarly, foreign aid twice failed by wide margins to fit into a domestic higher-order cluster for the Republicans (81st and 84th Congresses), while for the Democrats the two failures (81st and 83d Congresses) were by much narrower margins. Finally, the proportion of roll calls in the Qmatrix which entered the leading scale cluster was always higher for the Democrats than for the Republicans, as will be shown in Table IV

Comparing Congresses, we can see evidence of a greater consistency of division within the Democratic party on various issues in the 87th Congress than in the previous ones. Among the Democrats there was a steady trend toward consistency, which can be traced in the relation between foreign and domestic issues. In retrospect, the voting patterns of the 80th Congress appear particularly inconsistent. At that time American foreign policy was taking a new direction, as exemplified by Truman's program of aid to Greece and Turkey, and the continuation of the draft in peace time; the wartime alliance with the Soviet Union was being reversed. Support for Truman's policy was stronger, proportionately, from his own party than from the Republicans; yet, within the Democratic party, factional alignments were reversed. The small group of Democrats who opposed these policies tended to come from the left of the political spectrum, while the Republicans who opposed were from the right. This alignment explains the fact that for the Democrats at that time, all the associations of the "draft" scale (#4; including the vote on passage of Greek-Turkish aid) with domestic issues were negative. This scale did enter into a higher-order cluster that reflected an underlying constancy of division within the party; but it was not consistent with the other scales in relation to inter-party alignments, or to the President's position. The associations between foreign aid and domestic issues were also low.46

This state of affairs did not last long. Foreign Representatives: A Study of Intra-Party Coalition Patterns in the Postwar Period," Ph.D. dissertation, Harvard, 1963, esp. ch. 6.

⁴⁶ This low association is partly due to the inclusion of Marcantonio and Isacson (ALP, NY) together with the Democrats; on Scale 6, they joined a small group of conservatives in opposing foreign aid.

TARLE IV	. INCLUSIVENESS	OF LEADING	SCALE CLUSTER.	2

		Republicans		Democrats
Congress	Subject of first cluster	Per cent of all roll calls in this cluster	Total roll calls in matrix	Subject of first cluster	Per cent of all roll calls in this cluster	Total roll calls in matrix
.,		(%)			(%)
79	Domestic	10	136	Domestic	36	139
80	Foreign aid	14	73	Domestic	29	103
81	Urban	12	181	Domestic	38	176
82	Domestic	26	138	Domestic	28	139
83	Foreign aid	14	77	General	19	104
84	Foreign aid	8	102	General	22	85
85	Non-urban	11	144	Domestic	32	136
86	Domestic	13	130	Domestic	37	127
87	Foreign aid	12	159	General	41	150
88	General	13	150	General	51	144

aid was still distinct from domestic issues in the 81st Congress, but the left wings of both parties then tended to support it more consistently. And with the succeeding years, the convergence between the alignments on foreign and domestic issues became such that by the 87th Congress the Democrats revealed a "general" scale, combining foreign and domestic issues. The Republicans had such a scale as well, but it was less dominant and the coalescence of issues over time was less pronounced for them.

In this transition, party control of Presidency and Congress does not seem to have played the dominant role. The particular policies that Presidents urged on Congress, from Greek-Turkish aid to trade and agricultural policies, may well account for important changes in the configuration of issues. But the general degree of organization of issues seems to have been more a constant difference between the legislative parties in the House, and for the Democrats to have shown a trend over time toward consistency, than to have been altered and reversed by changes in party control. The differences shown in Table III do not easily fit the latter hypothesis.

VI. THE VOTING PATTERNS OF BLOCS AND PARTIES

In addition to the identification of issues, our procedure can also aid in the identification of certain types of blocs or factions. The Q-matrix provides two sorts of relevant evidence: the allocation of roll calls among clusters and the distribution of p_+ in these clusters. While a uniform distribution of p_+ was considered best in Guttman's initial procedure, the actual non-uniform distributions observed in legislative analysis provide useful information about bloc divisions. If a group of legislators is regularly divided into two opposing blocs, this will be revealed by a corresponding scale cluster in which the cutting points (p+) are concentrated in a narrow range. The same phenomenon will result if a minority bloc repeatedly splits off from the remainder of the larger group; in this case the values of p+ will be concentrated nearer the extremes (0 or 1), and we shall be more likely to say that a single "bloc" was involved than that there were two opposing blocs. If two mutually exclusive minority blocs (e.g., small left and right wings) split repeatedly from the main segment of a party, but not at the same time, this fact will be revealed by a single scale cluster with two concentrations of values of p+ near the two extremes.

If concentrations of p+ of this kind are observed in scale clusters that are general in content, we infer that if blocs exist they are effective over a wide range of legislative subjectmatter; if they are observed in clusters that are narrowly restricted in subject matter, we infer that the blocs are issue-specific. Clearly this distinction is one that should be allowed to arise out of the data, rather than being imposed by restrictive assumptions or models. Presumably the deepest cleavages within a party, or the divisions between parties that tend to set one whole party against another, will be characterized both by very general scale clusters (containing roll calls on a great variety of topics), and by a narrow concentration of cutting points (p_+) .

In the House of Representatives in recent years, a bloc division of this sort has been more prevalent among the Democrats than among the Republicans. One way to show this is to compute the proportion of all roll calls in a Qmatrix which enter the first or largest cluster: Table IV shows this proportion for each party in ten recent Congresses. In every case the proportion is higher for the Democrats than for the Republicans. The subjects of the leading clusters also help to explain the difference between the parties; in four Congresses the leading cluster for the Republicans concerned foreign aid, while the leading cluster for the Democrats always included domestic issues. This difference in subject-matter is due to the greater diversity of cleavages in the Republican party, not to its being divided on fewer domestic issues. Not only were various domestic issues, including agricultural issues, more distinct for the Republicans in terms of relations among scales; but, as another manifestation of the same variety of division, roll calls were less concentrated in any particular cluster.

Some effects of party control of the presidency and congress can be seen in Table IV, for the Democrats but not for the Republicans. The Democrats' most inclusive leading scale clusters were observed in the 88th, 87th, 81st, 86th, and 79th Congresses, and their least in the 83d, 84th, 82d, 80th, and 85th. Of the first five, four were Congresses in which the Democrats controlled both congress and the presidency; of the last five, the lowest (83d) was the one instance in which the Republicans controlled both, while three others involved "truncated majorities" in which the party controlling congress did not control the presidency. Thus Democratic control of both branches seems to have made the Democrats' divisions more consistent. The two exceptions can also be explained plausibly. The 86th Congress was the third of a series of truncated Democratic majorities, and one preceding a presidential election which the Democrats had hopes of winning; the Democratic leadership in congress was putting forward its own policies and not merely opposing the president. Conversely, in the 82d Congress, in spite of nominal Democratic control, the coalition of Republicans and Southern Democrats had asserted its control from the opening of the first session47; of all the Congresses in this series with nominal Democratic control, this was the one with least Democratic strength. Moreover, a presidential election was approaching and Republican prospects seemed favorable. Some Democratic congressmen may have decided to vote in terms of the particular appeals of legislation for their districts, rather than the general appeals of President Truman, who was having difficulty with his programs. In this sense the political configuration of the 82d Congress may have resembled that of the 80th.

⁴⁷ See F. M. Riddick, "The Eighty-Second Congress: First Session," Western Political Quarterly, Vol. 5 (1952), pp. 106, 108; Congressional Quarterly Almanac, Vol. 8 (Washington, 1952), pp. 58-59.

The proportion of roll calls in the leading scale for the Republicans shows far less clear association with party control. The unusually high figure for the 82d Congress may be attributed to repeated divisions of the party on a series of roll calls on amendments to the Defense Production Act, which constituted nearly half of the roll calls in their leading scale. Bills on this subject were introduced in 1951 and 1952, each time with an open rule permitting numerous amendments. These amendments were used to embarrass the Truman Administration; and possibly the prospects of electoral victory in 1952 induced most Republicans to join forces in support of the diverse amendments opposing governmental controls.

The dominant scales found for the Democrats are such as might have resulted from division of the party into blocs; and their greater dominance, when the Northern Democrats controlled the legislative program, suggests that the bloc division within the party was heightened at those times. But before reaching such a conclusion, we must ask whether the division was a deep one or merely set off a few dissidents at one extreme. For this reason, as well as others, we must study the distribution of p₊ among the roll calls in each leading scale cluster.

The distribution of p₊ within a scale is a useful datum concerning the repeated divisions of the set of legislators being studied. The Democrats' leading scales do show the concentration of values of p₊ that might have resulted from division of the party into two blocs; the dispersion of p₊ in these scales (semi-interquartile range) varied from .07 to .12 in the ten Congresses studied. If cutting points had been uniformly distributed over the permitted range (from .07 to .93), the corresponding dispersion would have been .22, about twice as great.

Not surprisingly, the Democrats' dominant scale invariably arrayed Northern urban congressmen at one end and Southerners at the other. But the median value of p₊ did not always divide the party precisely into Northern and Southern wings; for while the proportion of Southerners⁴⁸ varied between .36 and .55 over the period studied (86th and 80th Congresses respectively), the median value of p₊ varied from .18 to .68. When the South was proportionally strong within the party, it tended to gain the votes of some middle-of-the-road Democrats as well; while in recent Congresses (85th through 88th) the South was not only proportionally weaker but also tended to lose votes from within its own group. Whether this change corresponds to a change in the boundaries of social groupings in the party-i.e., of blocs as revealed by evidence other than similarity of voting—requires further testing. If our identification of blocs is correct, we should expect Border-state Democrats, and some Southerners, to have interacted more in recent years with their Northern party colleagues. It is also possible, however, that the inclusion of foreign aid in the dominant scale in recent years has moved the dividing point farther toward the conservative, or Southern, end.

⁴⁸ Representatives from the eleven former Confederate states.

While the Republicans' leading scales were less dominant than the Democrats', they too showed concentrations of p₊. Most often their divisions tended to set off a small liberal faction, as the Democrats' set off a conservative minority. But in the 79th and 81st Congresses the Republicans' leading scale revealed minority factions at both extremes. ⁴⁹ The properties of the Republicans' leading scales are harder to describe with assurance, however, because for that party one or more scale clusters were often close rivals of the largest; and depending on whether domestic or foreign issues were involved, the distributions of p₊ were quite different.

The observed concentrations of p+ might be thought to result from legislative strategists' decisions to bring certain bills to the floor, or the willingness of committees to allow them to come up, or the insistence of interested minorities on the yeas and nays. But these factors still permit minorities at either extreme of a party to vote separately on roll calls; votes on passage and on conference reports characteristically set off small minorities of the opposition, and in the 79th, 80th, and 81st Congresses, minorities on the side controlling the House were also frequently set off on roll calls. Until further analysis yields alternative explanations for the observed concentrations of p+, we shall regard them as reflecting actual social groupings within the parties, i.e., blocs.

The division between the parties themselves also constitutes a useful test of our method of bloc identification. If the same procedure we have described is applied to the entire membership of the House, the proportion of roll calls in the leading cluster is higher than for either party alone in the 83d Congress, but lower in the 87th.⁵⁰ Thus in a legislature where the parties have relatively weak internal discipline, as they do in the United States Congress, the divisions within the parties can be considered as apparently comparable with the divisions between them. If we wish to speak of a "multiparty system" in Congress, we should make the necessary quantitative distinctions between the "parties."

⁴⁹ Bloc analysis of the parties in the 81st Congress also showed the Republicans to be divided into more and smaller subgroups than the Democrats. See D. B. Truman, The Congressional Party, op. cit.

It is also possible, conversely, for a deep legislative cleavage to cut across party lines. This possibility is illustrated in the votes of the French Radicals from 1956 to 1958. By late 1956, after the fall of the Mollet cabinet and the investiture of Maurice Bourges-Maunoury, a deep split had developed in the parlimentary party, centering about support for, and opposition to, Pierre Mendès-France. This division existed in the UDSR as well. When these two parties were scaled together, the main cluster reflected this division.51 Of 22 roll calls under the Mollet cabinet, only one fell in the main cluster; of those under the subsequent cabinets, 58 per cent did. Within this cluster, the semiinterquartile range of p+ was only .10. Thus this division into two blocs, while it crossed party lines and was not itself reflected in a formal division between parties, was deeper and more consistent than that between the two major parties in the U.S. House of Representatives.

We can now evaluate the propriety of scaling two or more parties together. If the investigator wishes to reveal a major bi-factional cleavage, he should study the votes of both factions together and examine the major scale cluster as an indication of the cleavage. If more than two factions combine in shifting patterns of coalition, like those of the Fourth French Republic, this method will best reveal cleavages if only two major factions or parties are studied at one time. On the other hand, if one wishes to reveal the diversity of issues that divide a legislative body, there may be advantages in studying the 50 The proportions of roll calls in the leading scale, if the parties are combined and the same procedures followed as for a single party, are .27 for the 83d Congress and .35 for the 87th. The division between the parties at the median p_+ appears, however, only when the dominant scale is a domestic one.

 51 Details of sampling are reported in MacRae, "Intraparty Divisions . . .," op. cit. The results given here differ from those in that reference in that a minimum level of Q=.8 was used for comparability with the Congressional data presented here.

individual factions separately and examining their internal divisions. This might entail separate studies of individual parties or of major factions within a party. The method we have presented may make it possible to identify such factions empirically without the need of assumptions such as a geographical or historical definition of the "South." 52

VII. SUMMARY

The method proposed here for identifying issues and factions modifies the customary procedures of cumulative (Guttman) scaling in several ways:

- It searches for clusters of similar roll calls by empirical examination of pairwise relationships.
- (2) Each possible pair of roll calls is evaluated for scalability in relation to a threshold value of Yule's Q-coefficient, and "errors" or departures from the scale model are thus weighted unequally. Because Q is a coefficient of association, the results are more comparable with those of factor and cluster analysis.
- (3) It is no longer assumed that each scale need correspond to a single issue-continuum. Instead, the possibility of combination of issues by factional opposition is considered, and variations of issues among different ranges of p₊ may be interpreted.
- (4) A non-uniform distribution of p₊ in a scale cluster is taken as a useful datum revealing factional structure, rather than simply an inconvenience in the selection of scale items.

These modifications, though not altering the scaling procedure fundamentally, serve an important purpose: to adapt it to the particular needs of legislative analysis, as against questionnaire analysis. Modification (2), which relates scale analysis more closely to other methods, may also have value in other applications.

Results from this relatively empirical method agree fairly well with those of a previous study of the 81st Congress based on an initial conceptual grouping of roll calls.

Substantive results for postwar issues in the U. S. House of Representatives, and other selected data, are presented to illustrate the utility of the method. During this period the Democratic party in the House was more consistently divided than the Republican. The degree of organization of the internal cleavages of the Democratic party increased from the 80th to the 87th Congress. Party control of the presidency and congress was related to the degree of dominance of the Democrats' major scale, but not to the Republicans', and not clearly to the general degree of organization of intra-party divisions. Particular legislative programs of individual presidents did, however, find their counterparts in the relations between scales.

52 This is of course an aim of the Beyle-Rice method, as pointed out by D. B. Truman, op. cit.

In terms of the dominance of a major scale cluster, the degree of bi-factional division of a legislative body, a group of parties, or a single party may be regarded as a continuous variable. Inter-party divisions find their place on this continuum. In the House of Representatives, the inter-party division is not always dominant, as the North-South cleavage among the Democrats approaches it in degree of dominance. The division within the French Radical party and UDSR in 1956–58, however, was more completely dominant in the votes of that period than the division between the parties in the U.S. House of Representatives.

Although this empirical method gives rise to artifactual "shadow" scales duplicating others in content, additional information permits the identification of such scales. In particular, all scales or higher-order clusters found in this study, which have associations (γ) no greater than .5 with outside scales, have clearly recognizable and distinct issue content.

The Q-matrix can be analyzed without resort to the particular clustering techniques presented here. The data it contains are very close to the fourfold tables themselves. The relation between individual roll calls of interest to the investigator and major issues or bloc divisions can thus be revealed, and those that have little such relation can be studied separately.

This method has the great advantage of simplicity. It requires little more for its understanding than a knowledge of the properties of Q and γ . No knowledge of matrix algebra or multidimensional geometry is required. The method uses computers, but it is relatively easy for the user to understand completely the operations that the computer performs on the data. Some of the disadavantages of the method could undoubtedly be reduced by greater technical sophistication; however, it is presented as a useful step toward the fuller exploitation of legislative voting records.

THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS: CONFLICT MANAGEMENT IN A CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEE*

JOHN F. MANLEY Syracuse University

The House Committee on Ways and Means, according to its members, is assigned the responsibility of resolving some of the most partisan issues coming before Congress: questions of taxation, social welfare legislation, foreign trade policy, and management of a national debt which exceeds $300 billion.1 Yet members of the Committee also contend, at the same time, that they handle most of these problems in a "responsible" way. A Republican member of Ways and Means echoed the views of his fellow Committee members when he said "it's the issues that are partisan, not the members." A Democratic member went so far as to claim that Ways and Means is "as bipartisan a committee as you have in the House." And a Treasury Department official who has worked closely with Ways and Means for several years believes that it is a partisan committee in the sense that you get a lot of partisan voting. But while you get a lot of party votes the members discuss the bills in a nonpartisan way. It's a very harmonious committee, the members work very well and harmoniously together. Sure there is partisanship but they discuss the issues in a nonpartisan way.

The purpose of this paper is, first, to describe and analyze some of the factors which

- * I want to thank several scholars who commented on an early version of this paper: H. Douglas Price, Richard F. Fenno, Jr., Randall B. Ripley, Robert L. Peabody, Nelson W. Polsby, Frederic N. Cleaveland, James D. Barber, Leo Snowiss, Charles O. Jones, and Lewis A. Froman, Jr. I owe a special debt to David W. West, a perceptive friend and adviser who recently left the Committee's staff.
- ¹ This article is based on interviews conducted during 1964 with twenty of the twenty-five members of the Committee. The average interview ran 80 minutes. Questions were open-ended, no notes were taken during the interview, and all quotations are derived from notes made immediately after each interview. In addition, staff members, lobbyists, and executive department personnel were interviewed, some at great length. As a 1963–1964 Congressional Fellow I worked with Congressmen Thomas B. Curtis (R., Mo.) and Dante B. Fascell (D., Fla.), and was able to observe the Committee directly.

affect the Ways and Means Committee's ability to process, in a bipartisan manner, political demands which its members regard as highly partisan issues. Ways and Means is neither racked by partisanship nor dominated by non-partisanship; conflict and consensus coexist within the Committee and the balance between them varies chiefly with the nature and intensity of the external demands which are made on the Committee. Second, an attempt is made to contribute to the development of an analytical framework, based on Fenno's study of the House Appropriations Committee, which may prove useful for the comparative analysis of congressional committees generally.²

For analytical purposes, the Ways and Means Committee is here conceived as a politcal subsystem of the House of Representatives, charged by the House with a number of tasks, but in the normal course of events enjoying a high degree of operational autonomy.³ Its primary task vis-à-vis the House is the resolution of political demands, many of which involve high stakes in money, power or dogma. To perform this function the Committee must solve certain problems of internal organization and interaction, and these internal problems are inextricably linked to the nature of the environmental demands which the Committee is set up to process. The Ways and Means Committee, in other words, receives from its environment, and it generates internally, demands with which it must cope if it is to maintain itself as a viable subsystem of the House.

² Richard F. Fenno, Jr., "The House Appropriations Committee as a Political System: The Problem of Integration," this REVIEW, Vol. 56 (June, 1962), pp. 310-24. Fenno's approach has been applied to two other committees. See Charles O. Jones, "The Role of the Congressional Subcommittee," Midwest Journal of Political Science, Vol. 6 (November, 1962), pp. 327-44; Harold P. Green and Alan Rosenthal, Government of the Atom (New York, 1963), ch. 2. Other committee studies which may serve as a basis for comparisons include Charles O. Jones, "Representation in Congress: The Case of The House Agriculture Committee," this REVIEW, Vol. 55 (June, 1961), pp. 358-67; Robert L. Peabody, "The Enlarged Rules Committee," in New Perspectives on the House of Representatives, Robert L. Peabody and Nelson W. Polsby, eds., (Chicago, 1963), pp. 129-64; James A. Robinson, The House Rules Committee (Indianapolis, 1963); George Goodwir, "Subcommittees: The Miniature Legislatures cf Congress," this REVIEW, Vol. 56 (September, 1962), pp. 596-604; Ralph K. Huitt, "The Corgressional Committee: A Case Study" this REVIEW, Vol. 48 (June, 1954), pp. 340-65. See also Fenno's forthcoming book on the House Appropriations Committee, and his study of the House Education and Labor Committee, in Frank J. Munger and Richard F. Fenno, Jr., National Politics and Federal Aid to Education (Syracuse, 1962), ch. 5.

These internal and external demands give rise to a set of decision-making norms and roles which govern intra-Committee behavior and regularize its relations with outside actors. Committee norms and roles enable it to manage three distinct but related problems: (1) problems associated with tasks (instrumental interaction); (2) problems of personal gratifications and interpersonal relations (affective interaction); and (3) problems of integration.⁴

³ For the general theory behind this paper see Talcott Parsons and Edward A. Shils, eds., Toward a General Theory of Action (New York, 1962), pp. 3-44, 190-233; Talcott Parsons, "Some Highlights of the General Theory of Action," in Roland Young, ed., Approaches to the Study of Politics, (Evanston, 1958), pp. 282-301; and Marion J. Levy, Jr., The Structure of Society (rev. ed., Glencoe, 1957), pp. 19-84. For discussions of functionalism see Kingsley Davis, "The Myth of Functional Analysis as a Special Method in Sociology and Anthropology," American Sociological Review, Vol. 24 (December, 1959), pp. 757-72; Irving Louis Horowitz, "Sociology and Politics: The Myth of Functionalism Revisited," Journal of Politics, Vol. 25 (May, 1963), pp. 248-64; Don Martindale, ed., Functionalism in the Social Sciences (Philadelphia, 1965).

⁴ Parsons and Shils, op. cit., pp. 208-09. These problems are also dealt with in the literature on small groups. See Sidney Verba, Small Groups and Political Behavior (Princeton, 1961), pp. 117-43; Josephine Klein, The Study of Groups (London, 1956), pp. 115-33; George C. Homans, The Human Group (New York, 1950), pp. 319-20; Michael S. Olmstead, The Small Group (New York, 1959), chs. 4, 5, 6; Barry E. Collins and Harold Guetzkow, A Social Psychology of Group Processes for Decision-Making (New York, 1964), chs. 3, 10; Dorwin Cartwright and Alvin Zander. eds., Group Dynamics: Research and Theory (Evanston, 1953); A. Paul Hare, Edgar F. Borgatta, and Robert F. Bales, eds., Small Groups: Studies in Social Interaction (New York, 1955).

All three are affected by the type of subject matter and the external demands placed on the Committee; the internal operations of the Committee cannot be fully understood apart from the tasks which the Committee is expected to perform for the House.

The need for internal organization of a heterogeneous group poses integrative problems for the Way and Means Committee. Integration, as defined by Fenno, is the degree to which there is a working together or a meshing together or mutual support among roles and subgroups. Conversely, it is also defined as the degree to which a committee is able to minimize conflict among its roles and its subgroups, by heading off or resolving the conflicts that arise.⁵

Put in a somewhat different way, as Parsons notes,⁶ the integration of roles depends on motivating individual personalities in the requisite ways. In order to stimulate the members of a group to contribute to the group's well-being and to the realization of its goals, they must be induced to share certain values and to behave in prescribed ways, either through the distribution of incentives or the application of sanctions, or both.⁷ Members must, in a word, be socialized if the group is to be well integrated, and in congressional committees socialization depends on inducements.

Part I, below, deals with three interrelated variables and their relationship to Committee integration: the norm of restrained partisanship, the nature of the subject matter, and the external demands of the House. Part II considers the role of the chairman as an independent variable, describes how Chairman Mills directs the Ways and Means Committee, and offers some reasons why he operates as he does. Part III discusses the socialization processthe Committee's attractiveness, which predisposes the members to respond to socialization, and its ability to satisfy members' personal and political needs. The integration of four key roles, chairman-ranking minority member and newcomer-experienced member, is considered in Part IV. A final section offers some suggestions for comparative committee studies.

I

Minority reports by Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee and motions

- ⁵ Fenno, op. cit., p. 310.
- ⁶ Parsons and Shils, eds., op. cit., pp. 24-25.
- ⁷ Chester I. Barnard, The Functions of the Executive (Cambridge, 1956), pp. 139-60. Frank J. Sorauf has recently analyzed political parties from an inducement-contribution perspective; to recommit on the House floor frequently accompany the major bills reported by the Committee. In addition, the Committee members are clearly split along general ideological lines: the Democrats now overrepresent and the Republicans underrepresent their party's support for a larger federal role. These indices of partisanship do not, however, reflect a critical integrative norm which governs the behavior of members in executive session: the norm of restrained partisanship. In the words of one experienced staff member,

I think you will find that Ways and Means is a partisan committee, there are usually minority views. But partisanship is not that high when they discuss the bill and legislate. About 95 percent of the time the members deliberate the bill in a nonpartisan way, discussing the facts calmly. Then toward the end Byrnes [the ranking Republican] and the Republicans may go partisan. The things the Committee deals with are big Administration issues, so you are bound to get minority views and partisanship. But Byrnes likes to take a nonpartisan attitude toward things and it gets partisan only toward the end. On some votes they go party line but on others they don't. It all depends on the issue.

see his Political Parties in the American System (Boston, 1964), pp. 81-97.

⁸ E.g., U. S. Congress, House, Committee on Ways and Means, 85th Cong., 2d sess., H. Rept. No. 1761, Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1958, pp. 55-87. Congressional Record, June 11, 1958, Vol. 104, pp. 10881-82. Committee on Ways and Means, 87th Cong., 2d sess., H. Rept. No. 1818, Trade Expansion Act of 1962, pp. 83-104. Congressional Record, June 28, 1962, Vol. 108, pp. 12089-90. Committee on Ways and Means, 87th Cong., 2d sess., H. Rept. No. 1447, Revenue Act of 1962, pp. B1-B28. Congressional Record, March 29, 1962, Vol. 108, pp. 5431-32. Committee on Ways and Means, 88th Cong., 1st sess., H. Rept. No. 749, Revenue Act of 1963, pp. C1-C28. Congressional Record, September 25, 1963, Vol. 109, pp. 18118-19.

⁹ During the 87th Congress the Democratic members of the Committee averaged 81 percent on Congressional Quarterly's index of support for a larger federal role; the Republicans averaged 17 percent. A comparable disparity, 85 percent to 27 percent, shows up during the 88th Congress. Moreover, in both congresses the Democrats and Republicans on Ways and Means now appear to be more "liberal" and less "liberal," respectively, than the rest of their party colleagues. Data compiled from Congressional Quarterly Weekly Report, December 28, 1962, pp. 2290–95; October 23, 1964, pp. 2549–53. This may not have been true in earlier years.

A couple of Committee members feel that Ways and Means decides most issues on a partisan basis, but the preponderant view is that of a Democrat who declared that "most of the time we go along up to a certain point and then a sharp party vote will come. On the tax bill [Revenue Act of 1964] we went along for a long time without party votes, working very well, then the Republicans lined up at the end against it. There's very little partisanship up to a point, when the political factors come in. and then a partisan vote comes."10 Or a Republican who said "we try to write the best legislation we can in a nonpartisan way—more so than any other committee. We work in a nonpartisan way. Sure there are philosophical differences but they never become the partisan legislative fighting that they do on other committees."

The norm of restrained partisanship means that members should not allow partisanship to interfere with a thorough study and complete understanding of the technical complexities of the bills they consider. Members have a bipartisan responsibility to the House and to the nation to write sound legislation. They may disagree over what decisions the Committee ought finally to make but there is a firmly rooted consensus on how they ought to go about making them. Several variables affect the norm of restrained partisanship but two of them are of prime importance: (1) the nature of the Committee's subject matter; (2) the relationship between the House and the Committee.

(1) Working in a "responsible" way is valued highly by members of the Ways and Means Committee, and by "responsible" they mean being "conscientious," "thorough," "careful," and "studious." They emphasize the extreme complexity and national significance of the Committee's subject matter and this realiza-

10 This was confirmed by the Committee's ranking Republican member, John Byrnes, in the debate over the 1964 Revenue Act: "We tried to come up with as good a bill as we could. And I say to the Speaker it was not done on a partisan basis -and that has been confirmed by the chairman. It was done on a bipartisan basis, up until the last few days. When they had almost all the drafting completed and perfected, then they said, 'Now we don't need your help any more, boys; we will put the steamroller to work.' But up until then it was on a bipartisan basis." Congressional Record, September 25, 1963, Vol. 109, p. 18113. Contrast this with E. E. Schattschneider's account. Politics, Pressures and the Tariff (New York, 1935), of the making of the Smoot-Hawley tariff in 1929-

tion inclines them to constrain partisanship. "We deal with the most complicated, technical subject in the Congress, in the country for that matter, we have to be thorough on Ways and Means," according to a Democrat; a Republican said simply "you just don't mess around with taxes, it can create millionaires or paupers." All the members realize that they have to be responsible, another Democrat contended, and "this means that we don't do things on the basis of partisan or political advantage. We can reach a general consensus. Sometimes what a Republican will offer will be accepted by unanimous consent." A Republican who described the ideal GOP member in terms which made him certain to be in conflict with the Democratic members of the Committee paradoxically added that "partisanship is not too high on Ways and Means taxes, trade, and social security should not be settled on a partisan basis."

Both partisan and nonpartisan tendencies permeate the Ways and Means Committee and are reflected in the Committee's operating style.

Those members who attend the protracted meetings go through a laborious process of illuminating the implications of arcane tax, tariff, debt and social security proposals. They are assisted by experts from the executive agencies, the House Legislative Counsel's Office, the staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, and at times by employees of the Library of Congress. Legislation is pondered line by line. When the Committee makes a decision it is translated into technical language by the experts ("technicians") and brought back to the Committee for final approval. The decision-making style varies somewhat from issue to issue but in general it is marked by caution, methodical repetition, and, most important, restrained partisanship.11 "We get together and go through things as twenty five Americans all trying to do what's for the public good. It's even rare for a bill to be reported out by a 15-10 vote."

But the internal relations of the Ways and Means Committee are not devoid of partisan political or personal disputes. Restrained partisanship is the widely accepted norm governing the Committee's day-to-day operations and it does dampen partisanship and promote integration. It also, on occasion, breaks down. Not all Committee decisions are made in the full Committee meetings. Republican members frequently caucus in order to develop a united front on key pieces of legislation and party line splits are not as rare as some members imply.12 The norm of restrained partisanship does not stifle all dissension. A Democrat, for example, complained that the "Republicans sit there in Committee, vote for things, let things go by without saying anything, and then come out on the floor with motions to recommit, simply to surprise the Democrats." Personal feuds also erupt from time to time. On the whole, however, the Committee feels that the complex political demands which it must settle are of national importance and should be handled so far as possible on their merits.13

¹¹ Protests about the Committee's procedure are quite rare, but see the minority views on a 1955 bill extending corporate and excise tax rates in which the Republicans complained about the way a tax credit was "rammed" through the Committee. Committee on Ways and Means, 84th Cong., 1st sess., H. Rept. No. 69, Revenue Act of 1955, pp. 36-38.

(2) Virtually all the major bills reported to the House by the Ways and Means Committee are considered under a closed rule which precludes all floor amendments unless they are first accepted by the Committee. There is no lack of protest against this so-called "gag" rule but many members of the Committee and of the House argue that it saves the members from themselves. 14 Tax and tariff bills are so

¹² For a discussion of recent party battles fought on the floor over Ways and Means bills see Randall B. Ripley, "The Party Whip Organizations in the United States House of Representatives," this Review, Vol. 58 (September, 1964), pp. 570-74.

13 The subject matter of Ways and Means appears to be essentially different from that of the House Education and Labor Committee, at least during recent years. Education and Labor must resolve basic ideological issues whose emotional content has been higher than the issues coming before Ways and Means. For a discussion of the influence of jurisdiction on Education and Labor, see Munger and Fenno, op. cit., pp. 109-12.

14 From 1955-1965, forty-seven bills were debated under closed rules, nine under open or modified open rules, and the rest (over 350 bills) under unanimous consent or suspension of the rules. A typical statement was made by Representative Howard W. Smith in the 1955 fight over a closed rule for the Trade Act: "Mr. Speaker, I recognize the difficulty of many Members of the House on this bill; we all have our own problems in our own districts, but this is a question that affects the whole country.... It has been recognized ever since I have been on the Rules Committee that bills of this type should be "sensitive" and "complex" that the House insulates itself from the demands of pressure groups by channeling the pressure into the committee stage of the process. On the few occasions when Ways and Means bills have been considered under open rules, one veteran Democrat claimed, "you had chaos." ¹⁵

Members of the Ways and Means Committee are induced to follow the norm of restrained partisanship when they mark up a bill because of the autonomy which the closed rule gives to the Committee. A Republican, for example, expressed the common view that,

On our Committee we have a responsibility to the House, we have to do the best job we can... The closed rule prevents amendments and changes so we have to perfect the bill. Other committees can bring a bill to the floor with provisions in it they know will be taken out on the floor. Ways and Means doesn't do this, we can't do this.

considered, as a practical matter, under a closed rule. The original bill setting up this program, as I recall, and the extensions in 1953 and 1954 were considered under closed rules. Nobody seemed to object at that time; as a matter of fact, both the majority and minority members of the Ways and Means Committee came before the Rules Committee and joined in the usual request that that committee makes of the Rules Committee for a closed rule." Congressional Record, February 17, 1955, Vol. 101, p. 1676. On this occasion the closed rule was almost defeated; it was adopted by one vote only after Rayburn took the floor and told his colleagues that "the House on this last vote has done a most unusual and under the circumstances a very dangerous thing....Only once in the history of the House in 42 years in my memory has a bill of this kind and character been considered except under a closed rule. How long it is going to take, how far afield you will go, I do not know. . . . So as an old friend to all of you, as a lover of the House of Representatives and its procedures, I ask you to vote down this amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Brown]." p. 1678.

15 Closed rules do not mean that the House has no influence over the substance of bills reported by Ways and Means. Chairman Mills has a reputation for keeping his ear close to the ground and for gauging House sentiment. House demands, if they are strong enough to attract wide support, are reflected in Ways and Means bills even though no floor amendments are allowed. In order to ease passage of the 1962 Revenue Act, for example, Mills reduced the amount of the controversial investment credit from 8 percent to 7 percent. Congressional Quarterly Weekly Report, March 30, 1962, p. 492.

One Committee member explained that "there are congressmen who have been here for years and can't understand social security. The average congressman can't understand what we deal with and you just can't open it up on the floor. We try to report well-rounded packages of legislation, the best bills we can. We compromise a lot to get a good bill we can report out. You don't report controversies just for the sake of controversy."

A House vote on whether or not to debate Ways and Means bills under a closed rule is in a sense a vote of confidence in the Committee. The Committee is widely thought to be the master of its esoteric subject matter and almost every member has a stake in maintaining this reputation. The House expects the Committee to polish its bills to near perfection technically and, perhaps more important, to make a satisfactory adjustment of the competing demands which surround Ways and Means bills. This expectation partly explains why Ways and Means is noted for time-consuming diligence, and it also buttresses the Committee's adherence to the norm of restrained partisanship. The distinctiveness of Ways and Means was expressed by one member when he said "the House is jealous of the Committee. Many members say our bills can't be amended because we know it all, we're the experts. They are jealous." One of his colleagues sounded the same note when he observed that "the House says here are a bunch of smart guys, we won't tamper too much with what they do. The Ways and Means Committee has a reputation of being a well-balanced, level-headed group and the House respects this. . . . You just can't open a tax bill on the floor. The House knows we won't pull any fast ones."

II

If the Ways and Means Committee has been able to manage internal partisan conflict more successfully than the House Education and Labor Committee—and apparently it has—this is due in no small way to the leadership style of the chairman, Wilbur D. Mills (D., Ark.). With the exception of one member who denied that there is a leadership structure within Ways and Means (it is, he claimed, an "amalgamated mess"), members agree that Mills runs the Committee and runs it well.

¹⁶ Compare this description of Mills with that of Graham Barden (D., N.C.), former chairman of Education and Labor, whose leadership tended to create rather than resolve internal conflicts. Munger and Fenno, op. cit., pp. 122–24.

Mills's fellow Democrats consider him "powerful," "prestigeful," "quite a guy," "clever," "fine," "subtle," "smart," "patient," "expert," "best mind on the Committee," "leader," "key man." Perhaps of greater significance for purposes of integration is that these views are shared by the Republican members. They say Mills is "very effective," "a good synthesizer," "leader," "real student," "master of tax affairs," "fair," "calm," "intelligent," "impartial," "able," "well educated," and "not arbitrary."

Mills promotes integration by treating everyone fairly. He is careful to protect the rights of the Republican members and he gives the Republicans, a former staff member claimed, "pride of authorship" in bills even though the minority members may ultimately oppose them on the floor. Constraints on participation, both in public hearings and in executive sessions, are very loose. One high ranking Republican said of Mills,

We deal with things on which Republicans and Democrats are in basic, fundamental disagreement and when you have something like this you are bound to get disagreement and minority reports. I think the major reason things don't disintegrate is Mills. Chairman Mills is very fair and reasonable. I can visualize disintegration and bickering if some of the members now ever become chairman, quite frankly, but all the time I've been on the Committee the chairmen have been reasonable men.

Mills recalls that as a boy he used to hear his father talk about the Ways and Means Committee with William A. Oldfield, an Arkansas congressman who was a member of the Committee during the 64th-70th congresses. When Mills was elected to the House he knew that Ways and Means was a choice assignment and he made an early attempt to get on it. His first try failed largely because he did not lay the proper foundation with the House leadership, but he tried again and with the leadership's support succeeded. Mills's attitude toward the Committee helps explain why he leads it as he does, always sensitive to threats to the Committee's status and prestige; but it is also a source of pride for some of the members. "You hear some criticism of Wilbur," said a Republican, "but he has a high regard for the Committee. He takes care of it, respects it, and acts to insure its effectiveness on the floor." This commitment to the good of the Committee is a subtle factor in Committee integration but its presence is undeniable, even if there is no precise way to measure its importance.

17 During the hearings on the Trade Expansion Act of 1962, for example, Keogh (D., N. Y.) complained about the amount of time consumed by Curtis (R., Mo.). Mills replied that the Committee would sit until Curtis was through with his interrógation. Committee on Ways and Means, 87th Cong., 2d sess., Hearings on H.R. 9900, Trade Expansion Act of 1962, II, 740. On another occasion, Mills moderated an interchange between Representative Bruce Alger (R., Texas) and James B. Carey of the A.F.L.-C.I.O. over whether or not Carey had implied that Ways and Means, by failing to pass the King-Anderson health care bill, was responsible for the death or discomfort of the aged. Mills ruled that Carev did not have to answer Alger's question but he defended Alger's right to propound such a query. Alger took pride in Mills's defense of his rights. Committee on Ways and Means, 88th Cong., 2d sess., Hearings on H.R. 3920, Medical Care for the Aged, IV, 1880-83.

For Mills, the Committee's reputation is dependent upon House acceptance of its bills. He does not like to lose and he usually avoids becoming so committed to an issue that he risks losing a bill on the floor. After waiting sixteen years to become chairman he lost part of the first major bill he brought to the floor; because of his bargaining skill and willingness to compromise, members feel, he has been beaten only once since then on a bill of any consequence.

Part of the reason why Millstries to accommodate different and sometimes conflicting political demands is the internal composition of the Committee. Two or three of the Democratic members are more conservative than the rest and—before the Committee's party ratio was changed from 15–10 to 17–8 they could determine outcomes by voting with a solid Republican bloc. Conversely, one or two Republicans have been known to "go off the reservation" and vote with the Democrats.20 Depending on the issue, Mills may have to contain Democratic defections or lure a Republican vote. His base on the Democratic side is large and firm on most issues: even if some Democrats do not attend he can get their proxies. Neither party, however, is completely monolithic on all issues. Levels of commitment vary and in a delicately balanced situation Mills proceeds cautiously to make sure that he has the votes when he needs them. Two staff members commented: "Mills really likes to get a consensus if he can and this is one of the reasons partisanship is relatively low. He lets things settle and tries for agreement. He's just like that." "It's surprising how much Mills gets his own way. He'll sit back very quiet and let the boys thrash it out, let them go at it with their paper swords. Then he'll say we ought to do this and usually that's the way it's done." Committee integration may be positively or negatively affected by the style, ability and personality of committee chairmen.

¹⁸ The most dramatic recent example of how a committee's subject matter can affect its behavior and success in the House was the issue of federal aid to education. See H. Douglas Price, "Schools, Scholarships, and Congressmen: The Kennedy Aid-to-Education Program," The Centers of Power, ed. Alan F. Westin (New York, 1964), pp. 53-105.

¹⁹ The first bill Mills lost was a temporary unemployment compensation measure. Congressional Record, May 1, 1958, Vol. 104, pp. 7910-11. The second was a conference report to carry out the International Coffee Agreement, Congressional Record, August 18, 1964 (daily edition), pp. 19501-07.

The influence of the chairman on integration may also vary with committee structure. For example, the chairman may be a crucial factor in a committee, such as Ways and Means, that does its work in full committee rather than in subcommittees; but he may be less important or have different effects in a committee that operates through relatively autonomous subcommittees (Appropriations).

TTT

Political socialization is a dynamic and continuous process by which a group perpetuates its norms, values and roles.²¹ It is dynamic in that the content of what is passed on changes with new problems and demands; it is continuous in that it affects both newcomers and experienced members. To the new member socialization involves exposure to and inculcation with the norms of the group. To the experienced member it consists of the maintenance of his conformity to group norms or, if he resists, tension between his values and behavior and those of the group.

²⁰ See the votes reported in Elizabeth J. Brenner, The Trade Expansion Act of 1962, Congressional Quarterly Special Report, pp. 29-30; also the close votes on key sections of the Revenue Act of 1964, Congressional Quarterly Weekly Report, August 23, 1963, pp. 1473-83.

²¹ Compare this definition with that of Gabriel Almond who says by political socialization "we mean that all political systems tend to perpetuate their cultures and structures through time, and that they do this mainly by means of the socializing influences of the primary and secondary structures through which the young of the society pass in the process of maturation. . . . Political socialization is the process of induction into the political culture." Gabriel A. Almond and James S. Coleman, The Politics of the Developing Areas (Princeton, 1960), p. 27.

Socialization depends upon the attractiveness of the group and upon its ability to regulate behavior through the allocation of positive and negative incentives.²² Objectively measured, Ways and Means is the most attractive committee assignment in the House. John C. Eberhart compared House committees from 1914 to 1941 and found that Ways and Means had the highest prestige.²³ Similarly, Warren Miller has compared committee assignments between the 80th and 88th Congresses and Ways and Means places first.²⁴

Members are attracted to Wavs and Means for a variety of reasons. Most frequently mentioned are its power and prestige. Ways and Means is "tops," "the guts of government," a "real blue-ribbon committee," a "choice one." One member, who was neither especially attracted to Ways and Means nor happy with the detailed nature of the Committee's work, said you just don't leave a "blue-ribbon" committee like Ways and Means. "You just go up from Ways and Means," a Democrat said, "you don't go to another committee-Appropriations, Rules, or Interstate. You go to Senator, Governor, that sort of thing. It's a springboard and many members have gone on from it." When asked if he ever tried to shift to a different committee another Democrat replied, "are you kidding! Why leave heaven to go to hell? There's no committee in Congress, including Appropriations, that's as important as Ways and Means. Why step downward once you have reached the top?"

Group identification is high on the Ways and Means Committee and the members usually refrain from behavior that is likely to weaken the Committee's position in the House. The Committee's attractiveness buttresses the norm that outlaws such behavior. Members may disagree and they may even quarrel among themselves but, as one Democrat said, "we fight our battles in executive session and not in public." A conservative Republican member who almost never agreed with anything supported by the Democrats declared that "we keep personal things to ourselves and we stick together when someone attacks the Committee." The Committee has been criticized by its own members but this happens very rarely.25 Every member derives satisfaction from the Committee's reputation: they are predisposed by the Committee's attractiveness to follow the ground rules of partisan battle which place rigid constraints on the ways in which disagreement is manifested.

22 Barnard, op. cit.

²³ Cited in George B. Galloway, Congress at the Crossroads (New York, 1946), p. 90. For some critical comments on Eberhart's methodology see James A. Robinson, "Organizational and Constituency Backgrounds of the House Rules Committee," The American Political Arena, ed. Joseph R. Fiszman (Boston, 1962), p. 214.

²⁴ Warren E. Miller and Donald Stokes in a forthcoming volume on representation and Congress, to be published by Prentice-Hall in 1966.

Socialization is also affected by the group's ability to offer the members positive incentives in return for approved modes of behavior. The Ways and Means Committee serves as the source of positive incentives in at least three important ways:²⁶ (1) affective relations inside the Committee, (2) influence in the House; and (3) relations with constituents.

(1) Unlike most other congressional committees (Senate Finance is another example), the Ways and Means Committee functions in executive sessions of the full committee, and not through subcommittees. Members meet in direct face-to-face contact for weeks at a time and this style of deliberation is accompanied by a fairly well defined set of interpersonal norms. Committee meetings are not supposed to be partisan battles; some acrimony does develop but on the whole the members feel that to be effective they must maintain decorum and act in a gentlemanly way. Bitter personal disputes erupt infrequently and even public conflicts which appear to be disruptive of interpersonal relations are often played out in a benign spirit. A Republican who found

²⁵ The Committee was reluctantly criticized by a Republican member in 1955 for rushing through H.R. 1, the extension of the Reciprocal Trade Act, without giving the members time to study it or propose amendments. Congressional Record, February 18, 1955, Vol. 101, pp. 1743-44.

²⁶ March and Simon contend that the stronger the individual's identification with a group, the more likely his goals will conform to his perception of group norms. They identify five factors which affect group identification: (1) prestige; (2) perception of shared goals; (3) satisfaction of individual needs; (4) frequency of interaction; and (5) degree of competition between group and individual. In this paper I deal with the first three of these. James G. March and Herbert A. Simon, Organizations (New York, 1958), pp. 65-66.

it difficult to follow these norms was "talked to" by a senior Republican and told that he was losing his effectiveness by being so adamant. If a member starts to berate another member his colleagues will try to restrain him. You "don't attack one man continually" on Ways and Means; "we spar a lot but it never gets serious." "We don't have knock-outs, maybe we are a little more clubby, more closely knit than others." Members believe that they are "responsible" men who "respect the other fellow" and who "get along pretty well with others."

These attitudes and norms help make the Committee a satisfying group to belong to. A Republican said, Relations with the Democrats are usually harmonious. It's like a fraternity where you have different clubs with different symbols and minor disagreements. There's a spirit of camaraderie that prevails. Oh, we have our differences now and then, and we jab back and forth, but it never really gets too serious. We are all concerned with how the Committee looks to outsiders and if there's a lot of bickering the Committee doesn't look good. Take Banking and Currency for example after Patman took over. He's arbitrary and the Committee's prestige has sunk way down. We know that to be an effective committee we must be reasonable.

In the words of a Democrat "everyone's a moderate . . . they screen out those members who would play for publicity and make a lot of noise. . . . "Two Democrats attributed their appointments to Ways and Means to personal characteristics of their rivals as aspirants, One of these "went off half-cocked," was "controversial" and not "well-liked"; the other was "compulsive" and he would not be right for Ways and Means where members have to "contain" themselves. Another member said plainly, "we don't want any screwballs and since I've been a member we haven't had any screwballs. These men are pretty carefully selected, you know, so you don't get radicals."27 "Comparing Ways and Means with my former committees, and with other committees I know of, there is a spirit of cooperation between Republicans and Democrats. We are members of the 'club' now."

²⁷ The same man, a Democrat, explained his election to Ways and Means in these words: "No one wanted to go much farther north... for fear of running into a radical liberal, and no one wanted to go much further south for fear of running into an extreme conservative, so they picked me. They wanted a moderate liberal and a liberal moderate and I fit the bill."

Personal traits are not the only consideration in the recruitment process to Ways and Means. Seniority, region, and policy orientation are important and, in many cases, decisive. When these criteria are not of overriding importance, or when more than one contestant meets them, a popular man who is "responsible" has an edge over someone who has made enemies, especially on the Democratic side where Ways and Means members are elected by a vote of all Democratic members of the House; and objective reasons can usually be found to rationalize affective predilections. These informal recruitment criteria and norms of behavior combine with the Committee's attractiveness to produce men who are inclined to follow group norms, to value harmony, and to promote integration. Members prefer to disagree amicably if they can; they feel more comfortable in a low-tension environment and they realize that to protect the Committee's status as the "queen committee" they must manage partisan dissension in a non-destructive way.

As indicated above, partisan considerations and policy orientation are important factors in determining contests over seats on the Ways and Means Committee. In 1963, for example, Phil Landrum of Georgia was denied a seat on Ways and Means largely because he was considered to be too conservative by his Democratic colleagues in the House. Landrum was elected to Ways and Means in 1965 after demonstrating more liberal inclinations by, among other things, guiding the poverty bill through the House.28 Republicans, on the other hand, want men on Ways and Means who "all fall within pretty much the same general philosophical area" and who will "go down the line" for the party.

(2) Membership on the Ways and Means Committee makes one a member of the House elite. Ways and Means members share in the Committee's prestige and, at a more practical level, they are in a good position to accumulate political credits with their colleagues. All congressmen, at one time or another, are concerned with problems that relate to taxes, social security or trade. On swapping favors one Committee member explained, ²⁸ Congressional Quarterly Weekly Report, January 18, 1963, p. 46. Landrum's growing liberal tendencies are reflected in his scores on the federal role index: 86th Congress, 33 percent support for a larger role; 87th Congress, 61 percent; 88th Congress, 80 percent. Congressional Quarterly Almanac, XVI, 1960, p. 136; footnote 9, supra.

Hell, I'm always being approached by members. It's important, you know. I might go to a member of Public Works once in ten years but they seek my assistance all of the time. Same with all the members of Ways and Means. . . . When I need a favor I can always call on Republicans whom I have helped on Ways and Means bills.

Democrats on Ways and Means have a unique source of influence because of their control over assignments to other committees.29 Committee assignments in a political system whose life revolves around committees are of major concern to every member of the House. The Ways and Means members normally enjoy—with the exception of assignments to the Rules Committee, which are of special interest to party leaders—a high degree of influence in making appointments. The committee-oncommittees function increases their contacts with members from their zone. Newly elected congressmen are indebted to them from the first day they arrive and, as a member moves up the committee hierarchy, he is continually dependent on his representative on Ways and Means.30 "They call you 'Mr.' and 'Sir' when you are on the committee on committees," one member said. House members "look up to me"; a third member said "they come to you and that's very important. Members are always coming to me for things and when I go to them, boy they remember.'

In short, the members of Ways and Means stand above many of their peers in the House and they associate this preeminence with the Committee. They are, therefore, induced to follow the norms which insure the continuation committees was evident on the 1963 tax bill, when Mills used the 15 members to help get the bill through the House. Ripley, op. cit., p. 570. Members sometimes take soundings for Mills and act as an informal whip system of their own. As one member remarked, "If I can support it in Committee and on the floor then they [members from his zone] can support it too." When asked what he could do if they did not vote as he did on a Ways and Means bill he added, "Well, I suppose if it were [a senior member] I couldn't do very much, but if it were some new member who didn't have a prime committee yet I could do something."

²⁹ On the Committee on Committees see Charles L. Clapp, The Congressman: His Work as He Sees It (Washington, 1963), pp. 183-212; also Nicholas A. Masters, "Committee Assignments in the House of Representatives," this Review, Vol. 55 (June, 1961), pp. 345-57.

of the Committee's stature: restrained partisanship, responsible law making, and reasonable behavior.

(3) Most members of the Ways and Means Committee find the Committee a good place from which to satisfy constituent demands. Not every member believes that he can serve his constituents better from Ways and Means than he could from any other House committee, but several do. Moreover, no member's district is so intimately dependent on a committee other than Ways and Means that he risks electoral defeat simply because of his committee assignment. Few members would disagree with a newly appointed member, Dan Rostenkowski (D., Ill.), who told his constituents in a newsletter,

This has been a wonderful year for me. In May I was selected to fill a vacancy on the House Ways and Means Committee. As this is the Committee on Committees, appointment must be made by a vote of the Democratic members of the House, and I am proud to say that I was unanimously chosen by my colleagues... This is the most important committee in the House.... It is a most interesting assignment, but more important, it places me in a position whereby I can be more effective in assisting you with your needs, both personal and legislative.²²

Intensive bargaining surrounds the myriad parts of a major Ways and Means bill and it is often possible for a member to promote or protect constituent interests by letting it be known that he will support a position unfavorable to the Administration. Executive department representatives may even try to lure Republican support, as evidenced by the late Howard Baker's success in getting one of his favorite proposals included in the Revenue Act of 1964.³³ "You know, you can really do things for your constituents on the Committee. Boy, if you are a horse-trader you can really move. Exports, imports, that sort of thing."

³¹ Joel Broyhill, appointed to the Committee in 1964, was thought to be running a grave risk in leaving the District of Columbia Committee and the Post Office and Civil Service Committee because many of his Virginia constituents are government employees who work in the District. Broyhill met the issue head-on by stressing the importance and prestige of Ways and Means and he was re-elected, albeit with a somewhat smaller percentage of the vote than he received in 1962. Washington Post, October 3, 1964, p. B2. He was reappointed to the District Committee in 1965 without having to yield his seat on Ways and Means, notwithstanding the general rule that membership on the latter is "exclusive."

³² Dan Rostenkowski, "Washington Report," July 20, 1964, p. 2. Congressman George M. Rhodes (D., Pa.), shortly after he was elected to Ways and Means, could take credit for two amendments to a social security bill which were of interest to his constituents. "A Report from Congressman George M. Rhodes," July 16, 1964, p. 1.

Major legislation is not the only opportunity for serving one's constituents and friends. Ways and Means also processes so-called "members' bills," which are perhaps the best examples of bipartisan cooperation on the Committee. A member's bill is supposed to be a minor piece of legislation that ameliorates the impact of some small feature in the tax laws or makes some "technical" improvement in other laws that come under the Committee's jurisdiction; it is regarded as a "little" thing, of no special interest to anyone other than the Committee member who introduced it.³⁴

From time to time during the course of a Congress, Committee members are asked to list in the order of their preference (or chance of passage) those bills which they would like the Committee to consider during "members' bill time." Every member is given the opportunity to call up a bill or bills, depending on how many times they go around the table. If he can get the unanimous consent of his colleagues, his bill will be reported to the House, called up on the House floor by unanimous consent or suspension of the rules, and usually passed without objection.

From On April 30, 1964, Chairman Mills stood on the floor of the House and asked unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of twelve members' bills. Eleven of these bills ³⁵ For an explanation of this provision see Committee on Ways and Means, 88th Cong., 1st sess., H. Rept. No. 749, Revenue Act of 1963, pp. 45–47. It allowed the exclusion from gross income of a limited amount of capital gain received from the sale or exchange of a personal residence by a person 65 years old or over.

³⁴ Typical members' bills alter the tariff on brooms made of broom corn, provide a credit or refund of self-employment taxes in certain cases, allow the free importation of spectrometers for universities, provide tax-exempt status for non-profit nurses' professional registries, continue the suspension of duties for metal scrap, etc.

²⁵ Congressional Record, April 30, 1964 (daily ed.), pp. 9397-9410. Mills also tried to get S. Con. Res. 19 which expressed the sense of Congress that bourbon whiskey is a distinctive product of the United States and that no imported whiskey were passed by voice vote and one, H.R. 4198 introduced by Representative Shelley (D., Calif.), was defeated when another non-Ways and Means member, Matsunaga (D., Hawaii), objected. H.R. 4198 provided for the free importation of soluble and instant coffee and Matsunaga thought that before it was passed the Hawaiian coffee industry should be consulted. Mills had also intended to call up a bill introduced by Hale Boggs (D., La.), the third ranking Democrat on Ways and Means, but another member of the Committee, Thomas B. Curtis (R., Mo.), prevented it by indicating to Mills that he would object.

Of the eleven bills passed at this time, four were introduced by non-members of Ways and Means. The Committee reported these bills as favors to them. Two of the remaining seven were introduced by Republican members of Ways and Means, and five by Democratic members.³⁶ All twelve were reported unanimously by the Committee and most were supported actively on the floor by the ranking Republican member, John Byrnes (Wis.).

A member's bill may be killed by another member of the Committee, as in the case of the Boggs bill, or it may be killed or postponed by other members of the House, as illustrated by Matsunaga's objection to H.R. 4198. Not every member's bill becomes law. But many do. If influence in the House is defined as the ability to accumulate credits and dispense them with skill then the members of the Ways and Means Committee, if they stick together, are in a good position to exert influence and satisfy the demands of their constituents and friends. Favors that are "little" in the sum total should be labeled "bourbon" passed at this time, but John Lindsay (R., N.Y.) objected on behalf of two female constituents whose income came from a small distillery in Mexico. Sober heads prevailed and the resolution passed the House later.

³⁶ On December 18, 1963, the Committee similarly announced its intention to report 32 members' bills. Seven of them were introduced by non-members, 17 by Democratic members, and 8 by Republican members.

³⁷ For discussions of bargaining see Robert A. Dahl and Charles E. Lindblom, Politics, Economics, and Welfare (New York, 1963), chs. 12, 13; Lewis A. Froman, Jr., People and Politics (Englewood Cliffs, 1962), pp. 53-58; Robert L. Peabody, "Organization Theory and Legislative Behavior: Bargaining, Hierarchy and Change in the U. S. House of Representatives," a paper read at the annual meeting of the American Po-of things are often large to individual congressmen, and when small favors like these are dispensed over a period of years they amount to a considerable fund of credit on which the Committee (and its Chairman) may draw if the need arises. Ways and Means reports and passes a relative handful of major bills; it processes dozens of noncontroversial members' bills. When the Committee "cashes in its chips" to pass a major bill the chips are members' bills and other favors which it performs for members of the House.

Members' bills are important benefits which members of both parties enjoy by virtue of their membership on the Committee. They help satisfy the members' need to meet some of demands of their constituents; and they induce the members to cooperate with one another to this end. The continued success of members' bills depends on the Committee's relations with the House. Members' bills are positive incentives which emanate from the Committee and by helping to promote the members' interests they promote integration.

TV

Committee integration is also affected by the hierarchy of status and role which exists within the group. Members of the Ways and Means Committee play different roles and if the Committee is to be well integrated these roles must be legitimized and ordered.³⁸ Two sets of roles are of special significance: chairman and ranking minority member, and experienced member-newcomer.

The relationship between the chairman and the ranking minority member is a potential source of conflict in the Committee. Mills, who was elected to the Committee in 1942, has been chairman since 1958. John Byrnes of Wisconsin has 18 years' experience on Ways and Means and has been the ranking Republican member since 1963.³³ Their roles set limits to the degree of cooperation between them and they frequently oppose one another on key policy matters, both within the Committee and on the House floor. There is, however, a good deal of cooperation and mutual respect between them.

litical Science Association, New York City, September 4-7, 1963.

²⁸ Parsons and Shils, eds., op. cit., p. 203; John C. Wahlke, Heinz Eulau, William Buchanan, and LeRoy C. Ferguson, The Legislative System (New York, 1962), pp. 7-28.

³⁹ Several people associated with the Committee stated that Mills and Byrnes played prominent leadership roles even before they formally became chairman and ranking minority member.

Both men realize that their positions may be reversed some day and they therefore cooperate on most procedural and some substantive matters.

When the Ways and Means Committee comes to the House floor with a major bill it is often the quintessence of party conflict in the House. But the easy fraternization between Mills and Byrnes even at the height of floor battles is indicative of the spirit within which the Committee has performed its day-to-day labors.

Mills and Byrnes have jointly sponsored legislation which is referred to Ways and Means and they have collaborated on certain kinds of bills on the floor. 40 One staff member described the two men in these words, Mills calls the shots, he runs the show. If a member would like a Committee meeting next Monday, for example, he'd have to get Mills to call it. Every once in a while Mills is questioned about hearings and witnesses but he's very good about it. He discusses these things with Byrnes. The hearings last fall [1963] on beer concentrate were Byrnes's doing. He wanted them, so he and Mills arranged a date. It's quite informal. Mills and Byrnes are good friends. In many ways they are very similar. Both are dedicated and have no outside life-no hobbies, never take vacations. The Committee is their life. They take work home. They remind me of guys working in a factory who punch in and out, go home and wait for the next work day to begin.

Members of both parties are "safe" on critical issues and they are, therefore, bound to be opposed on some things. The disintegrative effect of this built-in partisanship is tempered, however, by the tendency of newly elected partisans to accept subordinate roles within the Committee until they become familiar with the subject matter and are accustomed to Committee procedure.

The apprentice role is firmly established on Ways and Means and the new member who wants to be effective does not (even if he could) try to match wits with his more experienced colleagues. This is due in part to the Committee's complex subject matter. One veteran member said that "when I first went on the Committee I used to leave the meetings with a headache, truly a headache! The stuff was just over my head. I just kept plugging along and gradually you catch on. The things we deal with are so complex!" "Detail and technical, oh there's so much detail and it's so technical! You have to take work home and study. Everything is complicated now. Social security has become complicated, tax and tariff too." A junior Democrat added, Leadership is pretty constant. The men who sit at the head of the table naturally lead the Committee. They are knowledgeable and have been around a long time. . . . Now that doesn't mean that if I have a question I can't get my oar in. There's no problem about that. But leadership is as you go up the ladder. Neither ______ nor I will ever be fire-balls on the Committee; we are too old.

⁴⁰ See H.R. 12545 and 12546, 88th Cong., 2d sess., 1964. These bills concern the relative priority of federal tax liens over the interests of other creditors. In addition to their cooperation on members' bills see the debate on H.R. 11865, the 1964 Social Security Amendments, Congressional Record, July 29, 1964 (daily ed.), p. 16680.

Or a junior Republican,

Byrnes and Curtis are real students, are experienced, and know more about it. They should lead the Committee. Yesterday, for example, I could have spoken on the Renegotiation Act but I am quite content to let Byrnes and Curtis handle it. They are the experts. I'd tell a new member to get familiar with the four or five major things the Committee deals with. To study hard.

"Jennings is a smart member and Martha Griffiths shows a lot of potential. But we are all learners and beginners, the older members are the ones we listen to." "You have to learn," a Republican said, "and I want to learn. It would be resented if I tried to talk too much or overdid it. . . . So keep your damn big mouth shut a while. If I tried to talk a lot it would be resented, while it wouldn't for an older member."

Newcomers to Ways and Means are expected to "attend religiously, study hard, and pay attention to what the experts are saying." And the "experts" are the experienced members. A new member may participate right away but it is a fundamentally different kind of activity from that of the senior members. In Junior members are neither muzzled nor immobilized; they exist in a state of animated quiescence until they have absorbed enough information to make meaningful contributions to the policy discussion.

Friendly and cooperative relations between the chairman and the ranking minority member, plus well established norms of deference governing the degree and kind of participation by senior and junior members, constitute a system of decision-making which is marked by restrained partisanship. During their apprentice period the behavior of new partisans is controlled by the impossibility of rapidly accumulating expertise in the Committee's subject matter. They are exposed to the norms of the group; they soon detect the Committee's leaders; and they learn how to become effective members.

⁴¹ The role of apprentice on the Ways and Means Committee contrasts sharply with the Education and Labor Committee, where newcomers are expected to play a major part immediately. Munger and Fenno, op. cit., p. 119.

The socialization process is not perfect on Ways and Means but in terms of its ability to negate the influence of divisive partisan factors it compares favorably in recent years⁴² with some other committees, most notably the House Education and Labor Committee. It is doubtful if any amount of incentives derived from the Committee, or any number of years experience on the Committee, could result in the total integration of dedicated conservatives like James Utt or committed liberals like George Rhodes, but not even the most ideologically oriented members are immune from the group pressures to restrain partisanship, to articulate dissension in certain ways and not in others, and to contribute to the perpetuation of the Committee as the number one committee in the House.

The importance of time and chairmen becomes clear when one compares the conflict-ridden way the Committee handled the excess profits tax in 1950 with its relatively pacific handling of both the 1962 and 1964 Revenue Acts. For the 1950 bill see Stephen K. Bailey and Howard D. Samuel, Congress at Work (New York, 1952), pp. 350-52.

* * *

The major differences in emphasis between Fenno's approach and the one adopted here are that I have stressed the influence of external House demands on the internal operations of the Committee, taken the role of chairman as an independent variable of prime importance to the Ways and Means Committee, considered socialization as a blend of attractiveness and inducements, and attempted a linkage between Parsons's focus on integration and Barnard's stress on inducements. Whatever the approach. it is clear that the inner life of congressional committees, a hitherto little explored part of of the workings of Congress, deserves the attention of political scientists as a way of increasing our knowledge about legislative behavior and explaining why Congress accepts or rejects the recommendations of its "little legislatures."

JACKSON'S JUDICIAL PHILOSOPHY: AN EXPLORATION IN VALUE ANALYSIS*

GLENDON SCHUBERT Michigan State University

Robert H. Jackson died more than a decade ago, and his departure from the Supreme Court marked the end of an era in American judicial politics, since he left behind as a minority those remaining of the colleagues who had joined with him to compose the so-called Roosevelt Court. He was still very much alive when I interviewed him shortly after the Steel Seizure decision in 1952, and subsequently when the initial stages of the present research were designed and carried out. His unanticipated and fatal heart attack had two incidental consequences that are relevant here: it fixed an unavoidable natural closure for the data—his activities-that I was studying, and at the same time imposed an insurmountable foreclosure upon one of my research ambitions. For the best way to validate generalizations about a man's attitudinal predispositions and belief systems is to check them as predictions against his future behavior; social scientists understandably repose lesser confidence in findings about hypotheses that can be validated only statistically, and then only by retrospective testing. Perhaps it was an error, therefore, not to have switched from Jackson to some other justice as a subject; but even one who chose a younger justice (such as Arthur Goldberg) might have guessed wrongly about his tenure, and Jackson's career did offer several unusual advantages-for reasons that will be explained

* This research has been assisted by the Penrose Fund of the American Philosophical Society: the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences; the Institute of Advanced Projects of the East-West Center, and the Computer Center, both of the University of Hawaii; and especially by various research facilities of Michigan State University. Individuals to whom special acknowledgment is due include Frank A. Pinner, Frank Sim, and Norman Luttbeg, all formerly associated with the Bureau for Social and Political Research; George Kantrowitz, Steighton J. Watts, and James E. Holton, all formerly graduate students in political science at Michigan State University; and David Danelski of Yale University, who read and commented on the paper.

¹ C. Herman Pritchett, The Roosevelt Court: A Study in Judicial Politics and Values, 1937-1947 (New York, 1948).

shortly—which it seemed important to exploit. This is a sector of political research in which relatively little has been done, and it is possible that the theory and methods employed here may be useful to others in the study of political values. The substantive findings are confined to a single individual; but nothing in the theory and methodology bears any unique relationship to Jackson—or to judges, for that matter. They can be used to analyze the attitudes of other types of political decision-makers who make observable choices with which are associated verbal rationales that are or can be systematically recorded in a reproducible form.

The data for this study include all the three-hundred-odd opinions that Robert Jackson wrote as a Supreme Court justice, and all his votes in the more than a thousand formal non-unanimous decisions in which he participated. His opinions have been classified by type and analyzed for their value content, using correlational, cluster, and factorial methods; and his votes studied by cumulative scaling. These materials, so analyzed, make it possible to test several hypotheses, primarily by intercorrelating his values, and by correlating his values with his votes and the types of opinions in which they were articulated.

There is no dearth of what evidently is impressionistic literature on the subject of judicial attitudes. The law reviews, and to a lesser extent the political science journals, frequently carry discussions of the imputed attitudes of individual judges—and especially, of justices of the United States Supreme Court. Moreover, these discussions customarily are based upon an analysis of judicial opinions; and Jackson has not been neglected by the legal commentators or the judicial biographers.² Some of them—notably Jaffe and Nielson—have purported to discuss the essence of Jackson's philosophy as a judge; but the essences they find are not in agreement. The typical conclusion has been that it is futile to attempt to discover any systematic structuring of attitudes for Jackson. Weidner, for instance, warns:

² E.g., Vincent L. Barnett, "Mr. Justice Jackson and the Supreme Court," Western Political Quarterly, Vol. 1 (1948), pp. 233-242; Charles Fairman, "Robert H. Jackson: Associate Justice of the Supreme Court," Columbia Law Review, Vol. 55 (1955), pp. 445-487; Felix Frankfurter, "Mr. Justice Jackson," Harvard Law Review, Vol. 68 (1955), pp. 937-939; Eugene C. Gerhart, "A Decade of Mr. Justice Jackson," New York University Law Review, Vol. 28 (1953), pp. 927-974, and America's Advocate: Robert H. Jackson (Indianapolis, Ind., 1958); Louis L. Jaffe, "Mr.

The most striking feature of Justice Jackson's judicial philosophy is that it can only with great difficulty be made to conform to any of the neat and currently-popular classifications of Supreme Court justices... The way out is to abandon attempts to squeeze the justices into these deceptively precise categories... The classification of Supreme Court justices as advocates of either judicial activism or judicial restraint, and the use of statistical devices to facilitate the process, can be a helpful approach to some problems of constitutional law. But it is inadequate to the task of determining the judicial philosophy of a particular justice. Jackson, for one, cannot be so readily pigeonholed.³

In similar although less dogmatic vein, Barnett remarks that "in striving to associate Jackson's views with some doctrine or set of doctrines which will neatly explain them all, one is beset with difficulties." And even Pritchett-whom Weidner evidently had in mind as the only previous commentator who attempted to make some use of quantification in guiding his appraisal of Jackson-concludes that his own "figures, however, average out a certain unpredictability in Jackson's votes."5 In a subsequent attempt at a summing up, Pritchett adds that "the rather erratic nature of his opinions ma[kes] it difficult to catalogue him.... The unpredictability of Jackson's performance leads one to question whether he has developed any systematic theories about civil liberties or the judicial function."6 Justice Jackson," Harvard Law Review, Vol. 68 (1955), pp. 940-948; James A. Nielson, "Robert H. Jackson: the Middle Ground," Louisiana Law Review, Vol. 6 (1945), pp. 381-405; Robert J. Steamer, The Constitutional Doctrines of Mr. Justice Robert H. Jackson (Cornell University, Ph.D. Dissertation in Political Science, 1954; University Microfilms No. 9802); Symposium, "Justice Robert H. Jackson," Stanford Law Review, Vol. 8 (1955), pp. 1-59; and Paul A. Weidner, "Justice Jackson and the Judicial Function," Michigan Law Review, Vol. 53 (1955), pp. 567-594.

- ³ Weidner, op. cit., pp. 593-594.
- 4 Barnett, op. cit., p. 241.
- ⁵ Pritchett, op. cit., p. 261.
- 6 C. Herman Pritchett, Civil Liberties and the

In this state of our knowledge, Jackson appears to be a particularly appropriate subject for a study by behavioral methods. Perhaps at least in this instance any substantive findings that emerge will not be open to the usual rhetorical charge that all the elaborate paraphernalia serve only to confirm what already is known by prudent men of common sense.

I. THE DATA AND METHODS OF ANALYSIS

Jackson participated in the decisions of the Supreme Court for a total of twelve terms: 1941-44 and 1946-53.7 During this period, he wrote 138 institutional opinions (for the Court), 51 concurring opinions, and 113 dissenting opinions. He also wrote 4 opinions, consisting either of jurisdictional dissents, or of memorandum opinions in his ex officio capacity of supervising Justice for the Second Circuit, that are included for some purposes in the analysis below. In addition, he wrote 16 opinions that are here scored as nulls, since his discussion is limited to statements of facts without value-preferences indicated. Eight other opinions were jointly written by Jackson and various other justices. These 24 opinions have been excluded completely from analysis in the present study.8 My principal data for present purposes consist, therefore, of the decisions in the cases to which 306 opinions authored by Jackson relate;9 and my primary focus is upon his opinions and votes in these decisions.

The Variables. The data were analyzed in terms of four sets of variables, which I shall call "content variables," "opinion variables," "voting variables," and "chronological variables."

The identification of the content variables¹⁰

Vinson Court (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1954), pp. 18, 228-229.

- ⁷ Jackson was on leave of absence from the Court throughout the 1945 Term, acting in the role of United States Chief Counsel in the Nuremberg war crimes trials. See Whitney R. Harris, Tyranny on Trial (Dallas, Tex., Southern Methodist University, 1954). Only six months before his death, in his introduction to this book, Jackson wrote that "the hard months at Nuremberg were well spent in the most important, enduring and constructive work of my life."
- ⁸ For a list of Jackson's opinions, which contains some omissions and duplications but which corresponds closely to the independently compiled list used in the present study, see the Stanford Law Review, Vol. 8 (1955), pp. 60-71.
- ⁹ Jackson wrote both the majority opinion and a separate concurring opinion in Wheeling Steel Corp. v. Glander, 337 U. S. 562, 574 (1949).
 - 10 For other recent discussions and examples of was based on an analysis of all of Jackson's opinions. A panel of three judges-two graduate students and myself-read and scored independently each opinion for the presence of any of a set of 33 substantive categories. I had first constructed a code which defined these content categories on the basis of a preliminary examination of about 20 per cent of the total of Jackson's opinions. This code was to some extent modified in the process of analyzing the complete array of cases—which required. of course. reevaluation of some opinions. Any instances of disagreement in scoring were discussed among the panel of judges until a consensual judgment was reached. Subsequent research in political attitudes and ideologies11 indicates that the attitudinal dimensions relevant to Supreme Court behavior are considerably broader and more heterogeneous-and consequently fewer in number—than I had assumed at the time the present project was begun.

Conceptually, each of these variables represented a continuous attitudinal dimension for Jackson, but the method of classifying the data had the effect of treating each variable as though it were dichotomous. Each variable was directionally defined, and Jackson might make a statement either in affirmation or in negation of the variable; henceforth I shall use the term "value" to refer to either of the two directional meanings (positive or negative) that are associated with each variable.12 The coding rules required that such statements be in normative form, and not merely factual assertions. (For example, if Jackson said that a defendant in a state criminal case had confessed during a period of extended interrogation while he was being held incommunicado by the police, content analysis, see Robert C. North et al., Content Analysis (Evanston, Ill., Northwestern University Press, 1963); and Fred Kort, "Content Analysis of Judicial Opinions and Rules of Law," and Glendon Schubert, "Civilian Control and Stare Decisis in the Warren Court," both in G. Schubert, ed., Judicial Decision-Making (New York, 1963), pp. 133-197, and 55-77.

¹¹ E.g., Herbert McClosky, "Conservatism and Personality," this Review, Vol. 52 (1958), pp. 27-45; Robert E. Lane, Political Ideology (New York, 1962); Glendon Schubert, The Judicial Mind: The Attitudes and Ideologies of Supreme Court Justices, 1946-1963 (Evanston, Ill., 1965).

12 "Variable" denotes the content category; the name (or symbol, or short title) of the variable in apposition with a valence symbol (+ or -) or phrase ("positive value" or "negative value") denotes the affective meaning of a particular stimulus or response set.

the content analyst left such a remark unscored, as a factual assertion; but if Jackson said that it was a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment for a state to convict a defendant on the basis of a coerced confession—and irrespective of whether he thought that this had happened on the facts in that particular case such a statement was scored as agreement with the positive value of the second variable: "freedom from state restraint of civil liberty." It was also possible, and not uncommon, for Jackson to agree with both the affirmative and the negative value of the same variable in a single opinion; in such cases, the variable was scored as ambivalent for that opinion.) Since most variables were not discussed (at least, normatively) in most opinions, scoring as "absent" was most common. It is the joint occurrence of content values (scored as either affirmative or negative) that is of interest in the analysis below.

Some of the initial set of 33 content categories turned out to be univalued, and therefore of little help in making correlational analyses; others appeared to have neither a logical nor a psychological bearing upon Jackson's voting behavior. An example of one of the original categories which was both univalued (in effect, with marginals of 67 pro and 4 con) and nonfunctional (in relationship to voting) was judicial Candor, a subject upon which Jackson often exhorted his colleagues in normative terms and criticized them in factual propositions of which the following are typical:

Justice "X" [frequently Murphy or Black] is not (but should be) candid; the majority in this case are not candid; etc.

The Supreme Court should not overrule precedents sub silentio, but should come right out and say what it is doing.

The Supreme Court should not proceed by indirection.

The Supreme Court should not indulge in legal fictions; the Court ought not to sponsor myths concerning judicial behavior.

Supreme Court justices should articulate their major premises; the Court should practice what it preaches.

The Court has [deliberately] sublimated the conflict underlying the instant case.

The lower court in this case was more candid than is the Supreme Court [by pointing out that ghost writing flourishes in official circles in Washington].

Accordingly, the original list of 33 categories was later reduced to 13, in part by eliminating from further consideration the merely verbal (as I came to deem them) ones such as candor.

Other categories were combined; for example, among the six initial categories ultimately combined to form the variable "Supreme Court policy-making," is STARE DECISIS, which for Jackson was markedly bivalent. The positive value characteristically would take this form of utterance:

A justice should follow a precedent with which he disagrees until a majority of the Court will forthrightly agree to overrule it.

The Supreme Court does not appear to (but should) follow its precedents.

The Court should give "full faith and credit" to its own prior decisions.

The Court should follow stare decisis, even when it leads to a wrong result, when Congress has acquiesced in the decision.

The Court should follow stare decisis, except when the proposed new policy clearly is preferable to the old one.

The Court should not make new constitutional law unless the old law is unsound and "works badly in our present day and society."

Jackson affirmed his belief in stare decisis in 74 opinions. On the other hand, in 22 other opinions he expressed quite opposing views:

Throughout its history, the Court has been required from time to time to reconsider a precedent decision (and should do so now.)

The Court should not follow precedents that clearly are blunders.

The Court should not follow precedents that are not acceptable to a majority of the sitting Court.

The Court should not follow stare decisis when to do so would lead to a wrong decision.

It is better to create confusion by overruling a precedent than for the Court to adhere to a rule that it cannot and will not respect in application.

The reduced set of content variables consists of the following:

- National restraint of political (civil) liberty.
- 2. State restraint of political (civil) liberty.
- 3. National restraint of economic liberty.
- 4. State restraint of economic liberty.
- 5. Monopolistic control of enterprise.
- Federal (national-state) relationships.
 Executive or congressional policy-making, or both.
- 8. Lower court policy-making.
- 9. Lawyers.
- 10. Litigants.
- 11. The public interest.
- 12. Colleagues (other Supreme Court justices).
- 13. Supreme Court policy-making.

The opinion variables fell into four categories: institutional, concurring, dissenting, and jurisdictional or memorandum.

There are only two voting variables: C (political liberalism/conservatism, née civil liberty) and E (economic liberalism/conservatism). Most of the data for these variables are available in the recent report of another research project, which analyzes the votes of all justices of the Supreme Court in all decisions on the merits for the period of the 1946-1962 Terms, on the basis of the political and economic policy variables.13 The coding of Jackson's votes for the cases in which he wrote opinions, beginning with the 1946 Term, was taken directly from this larger pool of voting data. In order to include similar voting data for his first four terms, the relevant decisions of this earlier period were evaluated in relation to the political and economic variables. Each decision was scored as an outcome for the set of participating justices in that case, and Jackson's vote was then scored (just as that of each other justice) in relationship thereto. This voting analysis of the 1941-44 Terms was carried out half a dozen years after the content analysis of opinions was completed, which no doubt tended to minimize further the possibility of analyst bias, and to confirm the independence of the two sets of observations.

Like the content variables, the two voting variables were scored dichotomously, but with the differences that no ambivalent category was recognized for either, and the two voting variables could not jointly occur in the same decision. Although Jackson might (and often did) discuss many values in an opinion, or the same value more than once (and perhaps inconsistently), he could vote only once, and in only one way, in any single decision. Consequently, his vote in each decision was coded in one of the following five categories: (a) politically liberal (C+); (b) politically conservative (C-); (c) economically liberal (E+); (d) economically conservative (E-); or (e) other.

The major chronological variable was derived by partitioning all Jackson's opinions (and their associated votes) into three equal periods of time: the 1941-44, 1946-49, and 1950-53 Terms. In order to test certain of my hypotheses it was also necessary to compare the first period with the latter two combined; or, the last period with the first two combined; and in one instance to use a slightly different breakdown, in order to compare the 1941-44 and 1946-48 with the 1949-53 Terms.

¹³ The Judicial Mind, op. cit. fn. 11, supra, esp. ch. 5, "Liberalism, Political and Economic."

The primary method of analysis consists of a cross-tabulation of the joint occurrences of variables within and between the four sets. Generally speaking, four-fold tables, phi coefficients, and chi squares (or Fisher's exact probability test) were computed for each cross-tabulation of a pair of variables.

The Reduced Content Matrix. In order to define the political and economic content variables consistently with the two corresponding voting variables, the set of content variables was further reduced by combining the first and second variables "freedom from national restraint of civil liberty" and "freedom from state restraint of civil liberty" into paravariable #14 (political liberalism/conservatism); and by combining the third, fourth, and fifth variables, "freedom from national restraint of economic liberty" and "freedom from state restraint of economic liberty" and "monopolistic control of enterprise" all with reversed polarity,14 into paravariable #15 (economic liberalism/conservatism). At one time I planned to study the phi correlation matrix for this revised set of ten variables (#6-15), using cluster and factor analysis in order to isolate the more fundamental latent dimensions of Jackson's attitudes as a judge. For technical reasons, however, it was necessary to eliminate three more variables from the correlation matrix before undertaking these further analyses. The frequency for the ninth variable (lawyers) was so low (18), and the marginal distributions for variables #11 (public interest) and #12 (colleagues) were so extreme (56-1 and 7-154) that useful correlations between these three and the remaining variables could not be obtained. Therefore, the cluster and factor analyses were based upon a sevenvariable matrix. Henceforth, short titles for particular values, or symbols as indicated, will be used instead of numbers to designate these variables: N (#6), A (#7), J (#8), X (#10), P (#13), C (#14), and E (#15).

The correlation matrix for the content variables was cluster analyzed by the elementary linkage, hierarchical syndrome, and rank-order typal methods.¹⁵ It was factor analyzed by the principal axes method, followed by varimax rotation.¹⁶ The phi coefficients and associated chi squares, and the factor analysis and rotation, were calculated on computers.

¹⁴ Sign reversals were necessary for the economic variables, in order to maintain continuity with other recently published research in judicial attitudes toward economic policy. See idem; and Harold J. Spaeth, "An Analysis of Judicial Attitudes in the Labor Relations Decisions of the Warren Court," Journal of Politics, Vol. 25 (1963), pp. 290–311, and "Warren Court Attitudes toward Business: The 'B' Scale," in Judicial Decision-Making, op. cit. fn. 10, supra, pp. 79–108.

II. THE HYPOTHESES TO BE TESTED

The hypotheses to be tested will be stated, together with the supporting considerations for each.

1. The values articulated by Jackson in his opinions correlate in clusters that correspond to meaningful attitudinal concepts.

Particularly during the period since Jackson's death, a body of cumulative knowledge about the social psychology of judicial attitudes has begun to be developed. I assume that my cluster findings ought to articulate with these data; but the clusters of content values will not necessarily coincide with the impressions that a reader sophisticated in the general subject-matter field-viz., the traditionally trained constitutional law scholar-might gain from having read all or a substantial portion of Jackson's opinions. Findings based on the cluster analysis should be more valid, more reliable, and more precise than those based upon purely qualitative opinion analysis. For few subjective opinion-analysts attempt to base their findings upon a reading of all of a judge's opinions; and fewer still could claim to make consistent observations, and retain adequate recall to keep them in mind and to make the millions of associations and comparisons involved, when the universe of data comprises over three hundred opinions, many of which are dozens of pages in length. For such a task, computers have inherent advantages, whatever their other limitations. From a statistical point of view, the cluster analysis findings might be thought of as the mean, from which subjective opinion-analyses could be expected to deviate.

The clusters ought also to be "meaningful" in the sense that we should not expect to find patent inconsistency in the relationships denoted. The training of a lawyer and the vocation of a writer of judicial opinions are to articulate arguments characterized by at least prima facie rationality.

¹⁵ Louis L. McQuitty, "Elementary Linkage Analysis for Isolating Orthogonal and Oblique Types and Typal Relevancies," Educational and Psychological Measurement, Vol. 17 (1957), pp. 207-229; McQuitty, "Hierarchical Syndrome Analysis," ibid., Vol. 20 (1960), pp. 293-304; and McQuitty, "Rank-Order Typal Analysis," ibid., Vol. 23 (1963), pp. 55-61.

¹⁶ Harry H. Harman, Modern Factor Analysis (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1960), pp. 154-191, 301-308.

The test by which we shall measure this hypothesis is whether the cluster analysis findings: (a) define attitudes which are consistent with other behavioral research findings about judicial attitudes; and (b) are internally consistent.

2. The latent attitudinal dimensions revealed by factor analysis of Jackson's opinions will correspond to the latent attitudinal dimensions attributed to the Court as a whole, during the same period, on the basis of scaling and factor analysis of voting data.

Since cluster analysis deals only with the manifest or surface relationships of the correlation matrix, the attitudinal dimensions vielded by factor analysis can be expected to uncover more complex and subtle interrelationships. The requirement that Jackson's attitudinal factors correspond to those that previous research has identified as common to the decisionmaking group of which Jackson was a member is premised upon two assumptions: (a) that opinion writing and voting are alternative behavioral modes of response, both of which are determined by a judge's attitudes toward the stimuli presented by cases for decision; and (b) that the variables that Jackson recognized as most important in his judicial decisions-not necessarily his valuation of those variablesdid not significantly differ from the consensus of his colleagues concerning which were the most relevant and important content variables. Black and Jackson, for instance, might agree that the political liberalism/conservatism variable (viz., a civil liberties issue) represented the most important question for decision in a case relating to a Communist's claim of the violation of his constitutional right to freedom of speech: but their respective valuations might be very different: Black might argue in his opinion and vote in favor of political liberalism, while Jackson might affirm the negative value of political conservatism.

The confirmation of this hypothesis will depend upon a comparison of the findings from the factor analysis of the content-variable correlation matrix, with findings from scaling and factor analysis of voting data for the whole Court.

3. Jackson's votes, in relation to the political liberalism value, will correlate positively and significantly with his affirmations of the same value in his opinions; a similar proposition is asserted to obtain between his votes for and against economic liberalism, and the economic liberalism content-value.

The assumption here is the same as the first advanced in support of Hypothesis 2, above: that opinion writing and voting are alternative behavioral modes of response, both of which are determined by a judge's attitudes toward the stimuli presented by cases for decision. If this is true, then Jackson should affirm the political liberalism value in opinions which he wrote to justify pro-civil liberty votes, and he ought consistently to affirm the political liberalism value more than any other content-value in such cases; moreover, there should be few (if any) cases in which his opinion negates the civil liberty value although he votes in favor of it. Of course, this assumption is in accordance with intuitive expectations premised upon the presumed relatively high degree of rationality in judicial behavior: but so far as I have been able to discover, no one thus far has attempted to design an experiment which might make possible either proof or disproof of this basic assumption about judicial decision-making.

The test of this hypothesis will be statistical: the stipulated correlation must be positive and significant, at a level of confidence of not less than .05 (one-tailed).

4. There are no significant differences between Jackson's value assertions in concurring, and in dissenting opinions; but there are significant differences between his value assertions in institutional opinions, and in either concurring or dissenting opinions, or both.

It is usually assumed that there are differences between the values a judge asserts when he speaks for the Court, and what he says in dissent. As Cardozo put it:

Comparatively speaking at least, the dissenter is irresponsible. The spokesman of the court is cautious, timid, fearful of the vivid word, the heightened phrase. He dreams of an unworthy brood of scions, the spawn of careless dicta, disowned by the ratio decidendi, to which all legitimate offspring must be able to trace their lineage. The result is to cramp and paralyze. One fears to say anything when the peril of misunderstanding puts a warning finger to the lips. Not so, however, the dissenter. . . . For the moment he is the gladiator making a last stand against the lions. The poor man must be forgiven a freedom of expression, tinged at rare moments with a touch of bitterness, which magnanimity as well as caution would reject for one triumphant.17

Little or no consideration appears to have been given, however, to the content-value relationship between concurring and other opinions. One might reasonably speculate that a con-curring justice should feel no greater sense of responsibility than a dissenting justice. Therefore, one ought to expect to find significant differences between institutional and separate (concurring or dissenting) opinions, but not between concurring and dissenting opinions.

¹⁷ Benjamin N. Cardozo, "Law and Literature," Yale Review, Vol. 14 (1925), p. 715.

A supporting argument might be drawn from small group theory. Since four justices constitute the minimum number necessary to support an institutional opinion,18 while it is the maximum for either a concurring or a dissenting opinion, Jackson clearly had to compromise his views with a much larger group when he wrote for the Court than otherwise. The extent to which a judicial opinion represents the personal views and language of the author presumably varies inversely with the size of the group which accepts the opinion; and so institutional opinions should tend to be more depersonalized than concurring or dissenting opinions. On both psychological and sociological grounds, therefore, we should expect that if any significant differences in the value-content of opinions emerge, they will be in accord with the stated hypothesis, which can be verified statistically in the same manner as Hypothesis 3, except that the test for Hypothesis 4 is twotailed.

5. There were significant changes, reflecting certain critical events that occurred on and off the Court, in both Jackson's opinion and voting behavior.

Let us examine this hypothesis by testing a set of more specific but independent subhypotheses:

5.1. The longer Jackson remained on the Court, the more conservative he became.

It frequently has been assumed that judges (like other people) become more conservative as they grow older, and remain longer on the bench. Certainly this assumption was the explicit premise of President Roosevelt's charges against the Court, in the "Court-packing" episode of 1937; and evidently, Jackson himself agreed with it.19 In order to test this hypothesis, we can compare the marginal totals for the voting and content-variables of civil liberty and economic policy, for the three four-year periods. In order to accept this hypothesis, it is required that changes occur in the stipulated direction, that these changes be progressive from period to period, and that they should be statistically significant at the .05 level of confidence (one-tailed).

¹⁸ In the relatively rare occasion (for the Court) when only six or seven justices participate in a decision.

¹⁹ Robert H. Jackson, The Struggle for Judicial Supremacy (New York, 1941), pp. 184-188.

5.2. There was a significant increase in Jackson's dissenting behavior after his failure to succeed Stone as Chief Justice.

Jackson's presidential ambitions had been cut short by Roosevelt's third-term decision; and his apparently good chance of succeeding Chief Justice Hughes was foreclosed by the outbreak of World War II.20 Evidently, despite Roosevelt's death in 1945, he then had expected to return from his triumph at Nuremberg and assume the center chair on the Supreme Court bench in place of Stone, who died on April 22, 1946 as the war crimes tribunal's work drew to a close. Soon afterward Jackson was told that Hugo Black was lobbying with Truman against his promotion; the upshot was Jackson's long cable from Germany to the judiciary committees of both houses of Congress,21 exposing to public view (in confirmation of long-standing Washington gossip) his version of the "feud" between Black and himself which had split the Court.²² Since Truman already had submitted Fred Vinson's name to the Senate for confirmation, the almost certain effect of Jackson's pronunciamento would be to serve as an epitaph to his political ambitions.

If it is true that Jackson returned to the Court in 1946, bitterly disappointed at the frustration of his ambition to achieve an honor that he (and many others) thought he had earned and deserved—and more specifically, a frustration due to the political chicanery (as he saw it) of his colleague Black, the leader of a "bloc of libertarian judicial activists" with whom Jackson differed in a struggle for leader-

²⁰ "Robert H. Jackson," Fortune, Vol. 26 (March, 1938), pp. 78-80; Marquis W. Childs, "The Man Who Has Always Been a New Dealer," Forum, Vol. 103 (March, 1940), pp. 148-154; Herbert Corey, "A Man with a Flexible Future," Nation's Business, Vol. 25 (September, 1937), pp. 75-76, 78, 119; Wesley McCune, The Nine Young Men (New York, 1947), pp. 180-181, 186; Gerhart, America's Advocate, op. cit. fn. 2, supra, pp. 229-231.

²¹ The New York Times, June 11, 1946, p. 2, col. 3-6; United States News, Vol. 20 (June 21, 1946), pp. 81-82.

²² Gerhart, America's Advocate, op. cit. fn. 2, supra, pp. 258-265; Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., "The Supreme Court: 1947," Fortune, Vol. 35 (January, 1947), pp. 73-79, 201-212. Gerhart's pro-Jackson account should be compared with John P. Frank, Mr. Justice Black: The Man and His Opinions (New York, 1949), pp. 124-131, which offers a countervailing bias.

²³ Robert H. Jackson, The Supreme Court in the American System of Government (Cambridge, Mass., Harvard University Press, 1955), p. 57.

ship on the Court—then we might reasonably expect Jackson to articulate his disappointment and disagreement by writing more dissenting opinions than he had felt to be necessary or appropriate during his first four terms on the Court. Such behavior would provide an appropriate dénouement for the act of political suicide he had committed at Nuremberg; and Jackson was by no means insensitive to the implications of an increase in a judge's propensity to dissent, for he wrote in his valedictory, the undelivered and posthumously published Godkin Lectures,²⁴ that:

... there is nothing good, for either the Court or the dissenter, in dissenting per se. Each dissenting opinion is a confession of failure to convince the writer's colleagues, and the true test of a judge is his influence in leading, not in opposing, his court.

A statistical test of this hypothesis would consist of a comparison of the totals for Jackson's majority and dissenting opinions, for the periods before and after his absence from the Court during the 1945 Term. Since an increase in the proportion of Jackson's dissents is predicted, the test will be one-tailed, and as before the confidence level of .05 is posited as the criterion for acceptance or rejection.

5.3. After his return from his experience as chief prosecutor at Nuremberg, Jackson became more conservative toward civil liberty, in both his opinion and voting behavior.

A subjective reading of Jackson's opinions which discuss civil liberty issues leaves one with the impression that his intimate familiarity with the rise of the Nazi movement under the Weimar Republic—a subject which he frequently found occasion to discuss in his extra-judicial writings subsequent to 1946had convinced him that it was suicidal for a democracy to permit conspiratorial, revolutionary groups to organize, to advocate openly their seditious doctrines, and to contest with rival groups for the control of the streets. Many persons, including many judges, would agree with such a position, without having had the very exceptional sensitization to the threat of fascism that Jackson must have experienced in his role as chief prosecutor. But the hypothesis here is that Jackson's attitude toward "ordered liberty" became more conservative as a consequence of his having had the unique experience that Nuremberg afforded; and that this change in his attitude had a significant effect upon his subsequent behavior as a judge.

A statistical test of this hypothesis is provided by comparing the marginals for the political liberalism/conservatism content and voting variables, for the periods before and after his absence from the Court during the 1945 Term. The test should be one-tailed, since the direction of change is predicted; and the .05 level of confidence is the criterion for decision.

5.4. After the end of World War II, Jackson became more conservative toward economic policy, in both his opinion and his voting behavior.

This hypothesis rests upon the assumption that Jackson's fundamental economic orientation was that of a conservative: he was a selfmade man and the leading lawyer in a small city, located in an area where traditional and business values were decidedly dominant; and his life-long friend and early client was the head of a local utility corporation.25 Jackson liked and lived the life of the upper middle-class gentleman; and most of his friends enjoyed similar socio-economic status. The fact that he himself was a Democrat, while the community in which he lived and most of his friends (during the first four decades of his life) were staunchly Republican, presents no real contradiction; to the contrary, the traditional basis for Jackson's choice of party is in strict accord with the findings of many investigations of political socialization.26 His great-grandfather, Elijah Jackson, was described as a "stiff Democrat" and was identified with a group who "were generally intense partisans of General Andrew Jackson"; his grandfather, Robert R. Jackson, "was a Democrat throughout his life, [who] boasted to young Robert of having voted for Franklin Pierce and for every Democratic candidate for President from that time down to Woodrow Wilson"; and his father, William Eldred Jackson, "remained an outspoken Democrat," in "a community that was intensely and sometimes bitterly Republican."27

Jackson's conversion to the economic liberalism of the New Deal was a necessary function of his career in national politics, but there is no need to assume that his enthusiastic support of the New Deal's economic programs was not perfectly "sincere." Similarly, his attack upon the economic conservatism of the Hughes Court²⁸ is in the style, and has all of the ear-

24 Ibid., p. 19.

²⁵ Bernard R. Berelson, Paul F. Lazarsfeld, and William N. McPhee, Voting (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1954), pp. 1, 94, 100; McClosky, op. cit.

²⁵ Herbert Hyman, Political Socialization (Glencoe, 1959), p. 74; Eleanor E. Maccoby et al., "Youth and Political Change," Public Opinion Quarterly, Vol. 18 (1954-55), pp. 23-29.

²⁷ Gerhart, America's Advocate, op. cit. fn. 2, supra, pp. 26-28.

²⁸ Op. cit. fn. 19, supra, passim.

marks, of the partisan advocacy of a brief filed by the President's counsel before the bar of public opinion, Jackson's disclaimer of "dispassionate.... consider[ation]"29 to the contrary notwithstanding. Both the necessity of preserving the image of a "typical New Dealer"—as he was called by journalists in the late 1930s—so long as hope of the Chief Justiceship (or even of the Presidency) remained, and the pressures to uphold the successful prosecution of World War II, provide reinforcing explanations for the assumption that Jackson would write and vote as an economic liberal during his first four terms on the Court. None of these considerations survived after Jackson returned to the Court in 1946, and we might well expect that his acceptance of the end of his political career would be accompanied by an apparent shift to the right that would bring his decision-making behavior in regard to economic issues in closer accord with his personal ideology.

